The persecution and self-importance of paranoiacs are coat-hooks to hang the persecution of others on. Mass deaths are hung on paranoia and psychosis. Huge changes in the destinies of people and countries are hung on self-importance and schizophrenia[1] – the ability to deny one's most horrible actions.

The huge gap between self-persecution and self-importance creates an emotional void that acts as a driving force. When nothing of importance is happening, when ordinary life and interaction is occurring, they appear empty, lost, and unable to casually interact. Hence those deconstructed always seek drama and prefer intense dramas like war.

The huge gap between self-persecution and self-importance creates an emotional void that acts as a driving force. When nothing of importance is happening, when ordinary life and interaction is occurring, they appear empty, lost, and unable to casually interact. Hence those deconstructed always seek drama and prefer intense dramas like war.

Those deconstructed prefer dramas they control, dramas they have created, or have had a hand in creating, and are motivated by the continual cover-up of their shame. Deconstructed, self-important, neurotic-paranoiac-schizophrenics have a natural preference to create large dramas on the scale of war.

In this way, on 14 March 1939, Hitler could watch a movie and dictate to two secretaries simultaneously, one a proclamation to the German people, another a proclamation to the Czech people, and a letter to Benito Mussolini of Italy, while he watched a movie and kept the Czechoslovakian President Hácha waiting from 1.15 am to 4 am.

When Hitler finally saw President Hácha he said Germany would invade his country in a few hours at dawn, which it did.[2]

Such things of importance become natural and things ordinary become clumsy and unnatural. Paranoiacs are tense and insecure and find it difficult to form relationships. They are socially incompetent, habitually self-centred, and react badly to criticism.

[1] The common use of schizophrenia – 'split mind' – is used.

[2] Hermann Göring, pp. 183–4.

Those deconstructed have the same social patterns as paranoiacs. The history of antagonistic war leaders is full of paranoiacs who are tense and insecure – who find it difficult to form normal relationships. Alexander the Great, for instance, was a necrophiliac. He used to ride into battle naked and sodomise the injured as they were killed, or kill the injured and then sodomise the dead. These homosexual necrophiliacs would then have their press announce that they were heroes with such names as 'Alexander the Great' and 'Lawrence of Arabia'.[3]

Neurotics have the ability to harm themselves and Hitler did this through his sexuality, his massive drug addiction and his refusal to see a qualified doctor.

Hitler's mother had two stillbirths before Adolf and stillbirths are suggestive of congenital syphilis. During Hitler's deconstruction, he was instilled with a fear of syphilis and a fear of educated doctors. Thus Hitler was drawn to quacks for the treatment of syphilis.

The British played on Hitler's neurosis towards 'syphilis and educated doctors' by introducing the British-run quack, Dr Theodor Gilbert Morell, a 5'6", 16½ stone (105 kg) delusional who had professed to be a venereal specialist for the previous six months. His office in Kurfurstendamn was covered with diplomas, qualifications and the signed photographs of famous film-acting clients. Hitler envied the famous and was drawn to this. This was a standard British set-up and has often been satirised in the movies.

Dr Morell became Hitler's doctor from January 1937 to April 1945, and no matter how much he was criticised by Hitler's staff, including other more reputable doctors in Hitler's staff, Hitler clung to Dr Morell like a fearful neurotic momma's boy. Hitler and Dr Morell had been designed for each other. Each time Hitler woke up, the first to attend to him was his aide. The second was Dr Morell, who began Hitler's day with an alphabet soup of drugs to treat his phantom syphilis.

[3] Thomas Edward Lawrence (1888–1935) was George Bernard Shaw's illegitimate son with one of Renoir's models. Turks interrogated him by sodomy with no new information forthcoming. The Colonel of MI-5 took him to a disused post office, placed him on the large mailing table, jumped on his head till his neck broke, then placed the body beside his motorcycle – officially an accident to this day.

As a dedicated neurotic, Hitler was dependent on having his non-existent syphilis treated. As a dedicated paranoiac, Hitler clung to superstition even if it was to kill him.

Paranoiacs are prone to superstition. Religion is based on superstition. All one needs to turn people to a superstition, like religion, is to make them paranoid. To do this, a few people are killed, a few more are harassed, the lot are surrounded, and the fear of God is instilled into them – hence religion.

Religion is a double-edged sword, a superstition that kills its own people through the practice of 'fear of life' and an even greater 'fear of death'. It is a huddle mentality, easily struck from the outside when their heads are down. In this way war and religion have been working together hand-in-hand for centuries.

The priests provide paranoia in the church (fear of God) and assist the military in their cover-ups (fear of exposure from military intelligence). The military kills and religion cleans up to begin the cycle again and again.

This creates an ongoing fear of reality and fear of God, with the army providing the fearful reality and the need to believe in God . . . and the Church providing the House of God – 'the House of Paranoiac Superstitious Fear of Reality and God'. Hence Hitler was backed by the Catholics.

Such is the cyclic symbiotic relationship between the military and religion, with both groups specialising in paedophilia. The victims of paedophilia enter either the church or the military often to repeat the cycle as adult priests and mercenaries, thus creating the 'paedophile's family tree'. This occurred amongst both the Nazis during WWII and Americans after WWII with the British running the Nazi paedophile programme.[4]

[4] Since the first edition of this book, the British have admitted torturing German prisoners to death, but without any mention of British paedophilia. Americans repeated Nazi paedo-atrocities in Operation ANACONDA, sexually molesting, brutalizing, murdering and kidnapping children in such a breath-taking total lack of compassion that, to all intents and purposed, they were the same force. Both forces were heavily influenced by the occult, use occult practices and arguments in their affairs have shown absolutely no degree of compassion whatsoever. In Abu Ghraib Americans were so sentenced without mentioning paedophilia in any media.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

After WWII religion remained popular for twenty years and then waned as people forgot about the war. Religion was revived again with 9-11 which created the biggest run on Bibles since the printing press was invented.

Since the Freemasons' declaration of the end of religion in 1891, religions have been increasingly replaced with the League of Nations (1918–39) and the United Nations (1945–2001). The UN became completely ineffective when the US refused to fund it and then agreed to fund it to 50% as long as no American was ever charged with war crimes. In this simple step the UN stepped aside and allowed an unchallenged US military dictatorship of the world. Very quickly 9-11 happened.

The UN supports paranoia by setting up camps and having audible sex orgies and gang-bangs, while those outside are selectively slaughtered. An American female doctor working for the UN did this in Rwanda in May 2004, having sex with a row of male UN workers.[5] The Rwandans outside could hear her orgasmic screaming as they were getting their throats cut. This promotes paranoia, superstition and religion, all of which are noticeably rampant in the African countries. Superstitious paranoid Africa is now the new centre of Catholicism and Catholicism is now a black-centred religion.

Europe was like this between the wars – paranoid, superstitious and religious. Paranoia, superstition and religion are the pre-heaters to war. For the cycle of wars to continue unchallenged, the proliferation of ignorance is essential.

The Bible is not a document for enlightenment but a document to categorise trust and support paranoia. It was originally written by the Catholics between AD180 and AD240 as a means to suppress the Christians. It worked. Ever since, Christians have been renowned for their fear of death and tend towards paranoia about anything and everything. The Christian superstition is that a stocky swarthy olive-skinned dead man will come back to life as a tall thin white man and take away their paranoia and fear of death. This is pathological paranoia. Continuing the analysis en masse, it makes Christians borderline in society and they are treated as such.

[5] Under "UN failures", Wikipedia lists "Sexual abuse by UN peacekeepers" as occurring in Burundi, Democratic Republic of Congo, Ivory Coast, Liberia [and Rwanda]. The abuse is widespread and ongoing, despite the many UN probes and revelations. UN Peacekeepers have been sexually abusing/gang-raping girls as young as 12 in at least a third of the countries they occupy.

Religion, war and paranoia – faith, death and the fear of life – are rekindled every time we attack ourselves. If religion can work in this way, why not war?

Borderline refers to the border between normality and psychosis. Borderline people are characterised by a disinterest in exertion, boredom, weariness, depression and sudden inappropriate outbursts of anger. Hitler had all of these attributes. His father had them more so and was either schizophrenic or borderline schizophrenic.

Hitler himself was not schizophrenic because that disease takes hold before the age of 45 and needs to be present for at least six months. He also did not have the lesser schizophreniform, nor did he have a schizo-affective state, a term invented by the American J. Kasanin in 1933 to describe people that were 'odd'.

Hitler was part neurotic, part paranoid and part borderline schizophrenic. This was developed as a result of being deconstructed and continually drugged by the British and as a result of having his 'anchor phrases' continually activated. Hitler became a partial psychopath, as was his Tavistock training, and he acted accordingly. Hitler lost it at times and was a borderline personality with a schizotypal disorder.[6]

Hitler himself said, "They always said I was crazy".[7] "Newsreels of the time showed his tremendous, absurd self-awareness – scarcely a natural being."[8] Hitler had an air of difference. "Anyone who has seen this man [Hitler] face to face, has met his uncertain gaze without depth or warmth, from eyes that seem hard and remote, and has then seen that gaze go rigid, will have certainly experienced the uncanny feeling that that man is strange, that man is not normal."[9]

[9] East Prussian industrialist Hermann Rauschning, 1940.

Psychopaths rarely show the perseverance and persistence that Hitler and Stalin had. They could only complete their jobs with the assistance of British war-school training and continual support which included British spies. Both Stalin and Hitler pursued their goals in a similar time frame. Stalin trained in 1907 and was involved in the 1917 Russian Revolution. Hitler trained in 1912 and was involved in a putsch in 1921 and 1923. They both shared a decade of lag from their British training to revolutions in their own countries.

Both Stalin and Hitler pursued their goals during WWII as a counterpart to Britain's desire for war.

What appears to be 'a warring psychopath' is often 'a deconstructed paranoiac', or more specifically, someone deconstructed who has a tendency towards paranoia. In Hitler and Stalin's case, they were deconstructed people whose paranoia could be utilised. This made them perfect combative killing machines.

Hitler and Stalin were motivated to war. They did not seem to mind that their opponents were equally their informants in 'the play of death', as long as it was others who did the dying. They would do anything to achieve this . . . to kill as many others in order to survive, and to fake their own deaths where necessary. When their doppelgängers died they began to believe in their own immortality. This made them even more delusional and forever braver.

Under these conditions war could only escalate.

Hitler's Deconstruction

February–November 1912

The author may appear to be labouring points into exclusive simplicity, but such a mindset was used to develop subconscious deconstruction. The reconstruction of the subconscious, on the other hand, is based on a similar but opposing model.

The first method of reconstruction, seconded from the KGB under instructions from the author, is to bypass the conscious and unconscious mind and talk directly to the subconscious by playing music at one level with the message received by sound pulse on the second level.

The second method, developed by the author, prior to receiving the first method, bypasses the conscious and unconscious minds and talks directly to the subconscious in its language, which happens to be something rather close to Cockney rhyming slang. The conscious mind is kept busy focusing on some part of the face, body and action thereof, while the unconscious mind focuses on the corresponding quality or attribute desired. The corresponding colloquial speech patterns are then utilised to instruct the subconscious.

The conscious and unconscious minds are used as protectors for the subconscious. When they are kept busy the message goes straight to the subconscious. Because the conscious and unconscious minds are busy in a sympathetic state, the message is immediately integrated on all levels, without confusion and is 'three minds ready'.

In this way suboncscious integration takes place to a predetermined goal and all actions in the universe of that mind fall into place.[1] The subconscious mind then acts as a Google search engine, unlimited in scope, to ensure that the predetermined goals eventuate.

In this way, the most ordinary people can have a life of genius.

[1] This method was developed in Budapest (February–August 1990) after interviewing the KGB in Moscow and noticing that the population had been deconstructed . . . I've worked on a client and five minutes later they've said, "So what, nothing's changed", and walked out with a completely different attitude. It became hard to justify the fee so I turned to history's great unpayer – history.

The first method is easier, but requires equipment and applied continuous application for ten hours. The second method can be achieved in a matter of minutes, does not require any equipment, and can be done without the other person knowing it is being done. Both have their advantages.

Such deconstruction feed-lines used by the British Psych-Ops war school to Adolf (Edmund) Hitler were: "You are special. You will change the map of the world. It is your destiny to do so. Suppress those who think against you. Suppress those who speak against you. Suppress those who act against you. Surround yourself with people who can be moulded to your vision."

Consequently, Hitler had a failure to act responsibly to his own people and had no conscience about doing evil. Others thought him evil whereas Hitler considered it his destiny and all others compliant to his subconscious view of the world.

Once Hitler was used to start WWII and bring Russia in on an equal footing, Hitler and Stalin were then set against each other. This brought great mirth to the military Freemasons at Tavistock who watched the war privately with great interest. Their eye was on improving the next generation of training. This type of military training has been developed over the last five hundred years and shows no sign of abating.

At least now subconscious training can be debated.

Hitler was in his alpha state when his conscious, unconscious and subconscious minds were aligned with his Psych-Ops training – for an aggressive takeover. In this state he could be considered a genius. In lesser activities he was moody, irritable, lazy, difficult and bipolar. He was firing on all cylinders only when aggressively taking over Europe or building his new Germany.

Herbert Döhring ran Hitler's house at Berchtesgarden and was a member of Hitler's personal bodyguard, the SS Lifeguard, Leibstandarte: "Hitler was very moody. His whole expression could change in a few hours. He made a colossal impression. His gaze would pierce right through you."

Fridolin von Spaun: "Suddenly I noticed Hitler's eyes resting on me. He was indeed observing me. And that was one of the most curious moments in my life. I had the feeling that he was searching somehow – the gaze which at first rested completely on me suddenly went straight through me and into an unknown distance. It was so strange. And the long gaze which he had given me convinced me completely that he was a man of honourable intentions. I can only say that I'm glad that I saw Hitler's beautiful side."[2]

It's an old psychological trick to focus on the back of someone's head. The recipient feels disregarded and simultaneously that the person can see right through them, creating awe and admiration without effort on the part of the gazer.

During deconstruction, the group to be paranoid about is selected and implanted. Thus, if one wants to 'kill Jews', one selects a paranoiac with a personal history of persecution and implants a hatred of Jews. The more Jews they kill, the more invincible they feel. Humans are easily programmed like this. Hitler was programmed by the British to kill the Jews and this was his invincibility pill.

Racism is passed down from generation to generation on the same principles. In this way, the British killed the Jews by deconstructing the subconscious of a paranoid Austrian. That it worked to such a degree surprised even the British Freemasons, but it didn't occur without continual 'destiny' support.

During Hitler's deconstruction, he was trained to kill the Spanish, Jews, Czechs, Poles, Russians, Americans, the French and those from the low countries (Belgium and Holland – low on the watertable). He was also trained to consider Germans as sacrificial heroes. He was trained to terrorise the British and to stop terrorising them when ordered. In this way, the British had created the perfect opponent for war and had much of their war fought for them. (Hitler could have won the war at Dunkirk in June 1940 after only nine months had not the British interfered with him.)

"I have not come into this world to make men better, but to make use of their weaknesses."[3] Not only is this the perceived credo of a borderline psychopath, but it is a hallmark of deconstruction. Schizophrenia, deconstruction and the latest technology of military assistance have many traits in common. These include:

[3] The Last Days of Hitler, p. 274.

1. Thoughts believed to come from external sources – "Get up and get out of here".
2. Sensations believed to occur from outside sources – He thought he was "the Man of Destiny, the Chosen . . . I am the voice that calls from the desert . . . I bring the mandates of Providence."
3. Auditory hallucinations and actions in which the person believes they are acting under external control – Hitler's entire upper palate were metal fillings capped with porcelain and his lower jaw had two metal bridges. He wore a radio receiver in his mouth through which all his thoughts and actions could be influenced – upper palate for the subconscious and the lower palate, which could be audibly heard, for the conscious mind – "Get out of the bunker now".

These three sensations were to become the cornerstone of German psychiatry – thoughts and sensations from outside sources and auditory hallucinations. Hitler and the classification of schizophrenia were developed simultaneously (1911/12). Commensurate with the Freemasons' destruction of God (1891), all divine experiences have since become pathologised, although the origin of their pathology has not been identified.

In conjunction with these deconstructed/schizophrenic states and his British military training, Hitler had the most remarkable recall of military data and the ability for things that interested him (that which he was deconstructed into) well above the norm. That is, his subconscious mind had been trained in certain areas to perform exceedingly well. In other areas he was trained to be exceedingly bad and to procrastinate. He was a brilliant military strategist, but he had the worst body odour of anyone in history. Hitler smelt like the devil at a pit stop. He was an avid drug user, would walk around with food spilt all over him, not make decisions, and sleep until 2 pm. Churchill was the same, exactly the same.

Despite this, one of the great British military strategists and historians, Basil Liddell Hart, wrote that Hitler was possibly one of the greatest military strategists of all time. This did not come from waffling about in the ghettoes of Vienna, but in the military Psych-Ops War School of Tavistock, England. It was they who had planted five hundred years of military experience in him.

The Tooth Fairy

Hitler heard voices in his head his entire adult life. "While I was in the trenches, I heard a voice that said 'Get up and get out of here'. And so I did. A few moments later a grenade exploded on the group with whom I had been eating just before, and no one survived."[4]

For the rest of his life, Hitler continued to hear voices that called him and guided him, so much so that he was convinced he was "the Man of Destiny, the Chosen". He shouted to his crowds, I am the voice that calls from the desert . . . I bring the mandates of Providence . . ." This was blamed on his mother telling him of a great future. His mother and aunt, Klara Põlzl, had lost four children and had two stillbirths before Adolf was born.

But there is now a more modern explanation. Amalgam fillings are comprised of mercury, silver, copper, tin and zinc, with the average person having ten fillings and each amalgam filling weighing 1 gram, giving a total of 10 grams of fillings. Each filling is 52% mercury, creating an average of 5.2 grams of mercury in each mouth.

In 1848, the American Society of Dental Surgeons found 11 of its New York members guilty of malpractice for using amalgam fillings and suspended them. Amalgams were not accepted as standard practice until after 1895. The common term for mercury in Germany was then 'quick silver' and the German pronunciation for 'quick' is 'quack'. Those dentists who used amalgam fillings were called 'quacks'. This term has now come to mean anyone who is an "ignorant pretender to medical skill".[5]

In the 1960s and '70s dental assistants were putting mercury fillings in teeth without holes, merely as practice. In the 1970–80–90s many people were complaining that they were receiving radio signals transferred from teeth, to jaw, to ear. This resulted in a rush on white ceramic fillings and the removal of mercury fillings in the 1990s.

But the dentists, with the help of the military, went one step further and offered micro-radios as dental appendages from 1999. These were used as self-fitted two-way radio molar caps as illustrated in the movie Charlies Angels (2001). Directional microphones were developed and a voice can now be projected and heard over a kilometre away. (See The Fluoride Con, Appendix 2)

[5] The Random House Dictionary of The English Language.

Certainly the Illuminati and Freemasons that trained Hitler had this simple radio technology in 1912. Radio transmissions existed publicly from 1897 but the Illuminati had them a century earlier.

There is no greater way to keep a subject's 'subconscious fit to the cause' than by talking to them invisibly, advising them to move, and then killing everyone else. This places absolute trust in the voice within and it is almost impossible for that person to act otherwise. After all, it is the voice that guides their subconscious into safety.

This resulted in those who were trained and deconstructed (brainwashed) by the external party (British military, Freemasons and Illuminati) in feeling invincible, immortal and full of self-praise.

Amalgam fillings are bad enough, but Hitler didn't have any. Hitler's teeth were in constant decay and he had 18 fillings which were all metal, fronted with porcelain. He had only five natural teeth left. His upper jaw was entirely metal in one large bridge and his lower jaw had two significant bridges.[6]

Adolf Hitler had a radio receiver in his mouth wired straight to his hearing receptors. The upper palate was the main receiver and spoke directly to his subconscious brain. The two lower bridges transferred the audible sound to his ears and brought these messages into conscious thought. Hitler was a puppet with wooden and metallic strings (sex and teeth). Only a person with a similar dental record within 50 metres would pick up the same message, but his radio messages were finely tuned to the make-up of his dental work only. Similar dental records were rare, kept out of range, or extinguished.

Although Hitler was wracked with doubts and uncertainty, he was limitlessly obstinate and intransigent and it was unthinkable for him that he would die before his mission was complete. He felt designated by God and history to create a stable Europe for a thousand years. He had feelings of greatness and purpose, immortality and importance, and could not see a world other than his one. He had no sense of harming others and carried on regardless.

"Hitler called himself 'the greatest liberator of humanity' . . . He took his role of saviour with the utmost seriousness. He eliminated the one most obvious revolutionary phenomenon of which people were most afraid: the Marxist left."[7]

Both Stalin and Hitler were treated like gods by their countrymen, both leaders replaced 'God', and both were accused of having superhuman qualities. After all communism is 'anti-God and anti-Family' and in fascism there can be only 'one'. In both communist and fascist countries, God is replaced by whomever has totalitarian power and all subjects are subordinate to their will.

Early days of Deconstruction

In September 1908 Hitler disappeared into the darkness of the flophouses and homes for men. Here he was quickly spotted by British Intelligence in the Asyl für obdachlose shelter in Vienna. It was this experience which rid him of any compassion, referring to the Vienna home for men as "that school for meanness". This experience was the foundation for his "brutal struggle" and was the principle theme of Mein Kampf (My Struggle).[8]

After leaving Liverpool in May 1913, officially as his deceased brother Edmund, Hitler returned to Vienna and Munich where he was charged with draft dodging, but got off. Ironically when war came he volunteered.

"As for his record in the First World War and his having won the Iron Cross First Class – I do not know. I never saw his file in the Ministry of War, but I do know that several people lost their lives over that file and I think that there must have been something pretty bad in it."[9]

Hitler won the Iron Cross Second Class in December 1914, the regimental certificate for bravery in May 1918 and the Iron Cross First Class on 4 August 1918. His fellow soldiers said that he was always under some sort of strain and saw no evidence for these awards. History has not unearthed any either. Hitler was put forward for all these decorations by the Jewish regimental adjutant, Hugo Gutmann.

Despite these decorations, he was never promoted past private first class, which essentially means he was 'keen, brainless and had no ability to lead men', but with Jewish connections.[10] Hitler was promoted under British influence so that he could carry weight with the German people later.

Hitler attempted a lesser-known revolution in 1921 and was charged and convicted on 18 February 1922 by Judge Gay Knightheart. Considering it was a revolution, four policemen were killed and they were caught robbing a bank, the normal charge would have been treason followed by execution. But it was reduced from what should have been a death penalty to one month in prison. This illustrated Hitler's high degree of British Intelligence protection even then.

Hitler attempted another revolution on 9 November 1923. He took over a right-wing meeting in a beer cellar in Munich and called for a national revolution. This was the famous Beer Cellar Putsch or Munich revolution in which another four policemen and a further eight revolutionaries were killed. At the same time, Hitler's men tried to rob a bank. Hitler was placed under arrest and put on trial, which was heard in February 1924.

Hitler applied to have his sentence reduced – something you only do if you have extreme confidence in your connections. Without connections, the sentence would just as likely have been increased. Hitler's appeal was heard by the same Judge Gay Knightheart, who, as his name suggests, was under the influence of the British Freemasons and their longer-term plans to use Hitler to create war. Hitler should have got eight years, but only got nine months in the rather comfortable Landsberg prison.

The only people who can be compulsorily repatriated in the build-up to war are convicted criminals. History's finger points loudly at this, especially when their sentence is so reduced.

One of Hindenburg's comrades from WWI, General Ludendorff, wrote, "I prophesi to you solemnly that this cursed man will take our Reich (country) into the abyss". He was well aware of Psych-Ops training and could see that Hitler had the signs of a British trained Psych-Ops agent.

General Ludendorff and Adolf Hitler were also co-conspirators in the 1923 Munich Beer Hall Putsch. When the shooting started, General Ludendorff carried on walking and Hitler hit the deck. During the trial Hitler's co-conspirator General Ludendorff complained that Hitler had hit the deck, regarded this as cowardice, and never revised his opinion.

At the end of the trial (26 February 1924) General Ludendorff, Hitler and supporters were photographed outside the courthouse, standing in triumphant poses. I queried the Spymaster about this and he said, "They're German, what do you expect".

It wasn't so hard for Hitler in Landsberg prison. He had a pleasant cell with pictures and decorations and had many visitors including his friends Leutnant Colonel Kriebel and the dapper Emil Maurice. When remembering his stay at Landsberg Prison, Hitler later mused, "We could have opened a tobacconists shop in there from what we were given."

Hitler's mission statement was war in Germany, gifting France to England and war with Russia, as a method of mutual self-destruction.

Referring to Hitler in 1927, Walther Stennes said, "He would talk and talk about the deeds he was going to do and, mind you, he actually did nearly all the things he promised. Fifteen years later [1943] . . . I would often pick up the newspaper and read of how he had done more of those things of which he had talked at our tea-table. One afternoon he told us how, when he was the ruler of Germany, he would have a great war and conquer the world; and when he had done that, he would lay out a Victory Avenue from Doberitz to Berlin and would line it with captured guns and tanks as a memorial to the German Army. Well, he did rule Germany and he did have his great war and he very nearly won it. He also built that Victory Avenue."[11]

Coded Words

Hitler's oratory even hypnotised himself. His eyes would glaze as he repeated himself into a frenzy. He was his own oral ecstasy. In synch with his Freemasonry Psych-Ops training, Hitler wanted to expand into war as soon as peace was mentioned. "Peace" was one of his activating words to plan for war with whatever direction the word "peace" came from.

"Goering could not understand Hitler's aggressive attitude towards Britain which appears to have sprung up after the Munich Accord ['Peace for our Time', 30 September 1938]."[12] Straight after this, Hitler made a speech attacking Churchill (Britain) and the Bolsheviks (Russia) – just as he was trained to do.

Walther Stennes: "Hitler had an incredible ability to think quickly, to judge quickly and to get quickly at the essentials of a situation . . . [but] he had no principles whatsoever, and this helped him.

"Hitler always managed to convince people that he really believed what he said. He would have tears in his eyes, but often his speeches were poor stuff in every way . . . Hitler would go straight on with his theme regardless of what the other person had said.

"He could switch so suddenly from being very nice to very nasty . . . at that moment I seemed to recognize the voice of the Devil . . . He was infernally persuasive and, if he tempted others in the same way, that would explain much of what happened in Germany. I was frightened . . . It was typical of his methods; one moment strict legality and the next, naked force.

"Hitler was moody – strange and quite inhuman. He had an uncanny influence on people which we could never understand, but no normal man and certainly no normal woman could possibly like him. [Voice of Walther and Hilde Stennes.]

"The real trouble was Hitler himself . . . He seemed to have an actual preference for muddle and complexity and he certainly liked to set different people against each other, then he felt sure that they would not combine against him . . .

"He would, for instance, delay the making of a decision for weeks while he was . . . talking to quite unimportant people. He was not lazy, sometimes he would not go to bed for one or two days, but he always shirked making a decision."[13]

It is common for double agents deconstructed by foreign ideologies to avoid alcohol during times of their missions. For Hitler, this was virtually all the time. He drank mineral water, avoided smoking, but was a dependent drug user and had his men taking daily doses of methamphetamines (speed).

Deconstructed double agents often rule over populations they have drugged for the purposes of deconstruction. This helps with the manifestation of their phantasmagoria, their all-encompassing illusion – their implanted reality they wish to impose on others to assist their cause.

Learning from Hitler, America began the Asian drug wars as the cheapest method of exporting drugs 'free' into the participating Western nations. The Asian wars simultaneously developed addicts and a counter-culture movement that rebelled against the war . . . by lapping up the drugs – the real reason for the war.

Spymaster: "Put a Hippie in a suit and what do you have? A fascist dedicated to deconstructing the masses."

Spying

When Hitler was working for 'British Army Intelligence' in Germany, he fronted as a German spy, and collected information on all the smaller parties. As for the Germans, he was not supposed to get involved with the parties. As for the British, he was supposed to get involved and draw on his Psych-Ops training, take the party over, mould it, and use it as his vehicle for ruling Germany.

> This was to be his vehicle for fulfilling such British affirmations as: "You will rule Germany; You will be the great ruler; You will build an empire greater than the British; You will become the world's most prominent household name; There will be no one more famous than you; You will be more famous than Wagner; You will carry on from Wagner and fulfil all the dreams his music and politics laid out; Your grandmother Maria Anna Schicklgruber was raped by Jewish aristocracy; Bring down the Jews; Take their money and their rights and kill them; You will be the greatest prophetic figure the German people have ever seen; Support will come from the most unexpected sources and will be available to you whenever needed; You will be the greatest liberator of humanity; Your life will flow into the glory of world fame; You will overturn the millennia."

All this from an insignificant down-and-out tramp desperate to make his mark on the world. It worked. He is still the world's most notorious man.

At the age of thirty, Hitler found a malleable political party on the street and changed its name. "In 1919, while acting as an informer for the German Army, spying on the activities of small political parties, he became a member of one of them, changing its name to the National Socialist German Workers' Party, (National soczialistiche Deutsche Arbeiterpartei) abbreviated to NAZI, in 1920."[14]

"Wagner's [1813–83] political writings were Hitler's favourite reading, and the sprawling pomposity of his style unmistakably influenced Hitler's own grammar and syntax. Wagner's political writings, together with the operas, form the entire framework for Hitler's ideology.

"He thought of history as a kind of hall of fame with doors wide open to ambitious men. He knew nothing of the meaning and justification of tradition . . . he changed the map of Europe, destroyed empires, and promoted the rise of new powers, evoked revolutions, and brought the colonial age to an end.

"He considered himself Europe's last chance . . . he remained a European provincial with his gaze irretrievably fixated on the antagonisms of a vanished era . . . Despite his fundamentally defensive posture, he was long regarded as the really progressive, modern figure of the age . . . with the aura of stardom . . . from the totalitarian cult of the personality . . . Hitler blatantly proclaimed himself a ruler of this type. He himself also consistently stressed the optimistic, future-orientated character of Nazism. Its reactionary feature and its pessimistic nostalgia with regard to civilisation were largely given voice by Himmler . . . and a sizable band of the SS leadership.

"Wedded to his dreams, he was one of those who would prefer a life of disaster to a life of disillusionment . . . Unlike the Fascist type in general, he was not seduced by history but by his own educational experience, the shudders of happiness and terror that had been his in puberty."[15]

Hitler was trained by the British to build up Germany's infrastructure for war. Hitler was trained to hate and kill the Jews and to get back at the Rothschilds for taking over the Bank of England in 1815. (See The Bank of England Heist, Appendix 6)

"Hitler had rightly been called detached . . . his defensiveness was so full of resentments, and for this reason he defended the world he allegedly wanted to protect until he succeeded in destroying it.

"So it was that this reactionary man, unmistakably moulded by the nineteenth century, propelled both Germany and large parts of the world into the twentieth century. Hitler's place in history is much closer to that of the great revolutionaries . . . he drew his critical impulses from the desire to prevent the dawn of modern times and to return, by means of a grand, world-historical correction, to the starting point of all errors and mistaken developments.

"It remained for Hitler to confer upon it the radicalness that made it properly revolutionary, thus profoundly changing a country . . . Under the demands of the totalitarian leader state, venerable institutions collapsed, people were wrenched out of their traditional slots, privileges were done away with, and all authorities that were not derived from, or protected by Hitler were smashed . . . since he knew how to make himself credible to the masses as an all-embracing substitute authority . . . he managed to confer the features of the Zeitgeist upon his emotional bias"[16] . . . through control of the media and entertainment.

Bridget Hitler: "Although I think it is a great mistake to overrate Adolf, I think it is an even greater mistake to underestimate him. Above all he is a confident actor with method in his greatest madness. He is the master of the art of the double-cross and is just as ruthless with his family and his friends. He is as much a mystery man to his followers as to the Americans, except in the cases where they 'have something on him'. Schaub, Streicher and Goering are understood to be in this enviable position.

"In my opinion Adolf is an arch-hypocrite, perhaps the greatest of them all. He has always carefully arranged it so that he is not personally to blame for the deeds committed in his name. He was undoubtedly preparing right now the excuses for every crime he had perpetrated in the name of Germany.

"'It is not I,' he will say 'but the German State which did this or that. I ask it in the name of the German people. I was easily elected by the vote of the German people. For myself I have done nothing.'"[17]

Germany was the only defeated country in WWII that had failed to produce a resistance movement that survived. This is an indication that the leader was Psych-Ops trained and that another country and ideology were running him.

An interesting aside to Hitler and Stalin's British deconstruction lies with the Russian Foreign Affairs negotiator Molotov (1890–1986) who visited Germany in an attempt to negotiate the key to war with the West – the so-called "Molotov-Ribbentrop Non-Aggression Pact" (23 August 1939) between the Soviet Union and Germany, which came with British approval.

The Betar was a Jewish Intelligence agency that received the latest military training. They were mostly failed revolutionaries and always ready to prove themselves. They existed within the Bolshevik and Tsarist Intelligence, but were entirely loyal unto themselves. Their stock-in-trade became standard practice with such influences as the Molotov cocktail and Molotov's "Nyet" ('No') at UN meetings, which fostered the Cold War.

As a Jew, Molotov was privy to briefings from the Betar. When he visited Germany in 1939 he said to his German opposite number:

> "I can't believe how many things you have here that we also have in the Soviet Union. They are even called the same names, but yours are in German."

It was as if Molotov was thinking that Hitler and Stalin had attended the same war school, which of course they had – Tavistock, in Britain.[18]

Churchill invented the term 'Iron Curtain' for Russia, received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1953 (for books he didn't write) and was knighted the same year. "He achieved a world reputation not only as a gifted strategist and inspiring war leader, but as a great orator, a talented painter, and a stylish writer with a profound sense of history."[1]

Churchill, a Freemason and Druid, was also an alcoholic and a manic-depressive who may or may not have achieved all of these things. From the early 1900s Churchill drank a mixture of champagne and brandy and lounged in his bath until 2 pm singing Clementine while his manservants kept the temperature just right.

Winston Churchill made his famous speeches in the House of Commons: "I have nothing to offer but blood, toil, tears and sweat" (Inaugural Speech, 13 May 1940); "We shall fight them on the beaches" (Dunkirk, 4 June 1940); "This was their finest hour" (Battle of Britain, 18 June 1940); and "Never in the face of human conflict has so much been owed by so many to so few" (Battle of Britain, 20 August 1940) . . . but Parliament was not wired for sound at the time and the BBC had contracts for all but Churchill's parliamentary speeches.

Straight after the 4 June 1940 "We shall fight them on the beaches" speech, Churchill went to the BBC studio at Shepherd's Bush to deliver the same address to beam live to America and the Commonwealth. The recording equipment broke down and when the BBC asked Churchill to make the speech for a third time, he refused, saying, "I am rather busy, get an actor to do it".

Norman Shelley (1903–80) was a BBC radio Children's Hour actor for the BBC radio production of Winnie the Pooh. He was also a well-known Churchill impersonator and recorded the voice of 'Churchill' for all of the above speeches on 7 September 1942. He took his teeth out to correctly imitate Winston Churchill, something Churchill congratulated him on later.

There is still some debate amongst historians as to whether Churchill or Shelley did the live speech for BBC radio and which of them recorded "Never in the face of human conflict has so much been owed by so many to so few". The well endowed and much in demand, Norman Shelley, is not to be confused with Geoffrey Wilcott, "the funny old queer". Geoffrey Wilcott played Eeyore in the BBC's 'The House at Pooh Corner', a different radio show which started in April 1940. See Denis Gilford's, The Golden Age of Radio, an Illustrated Companion for minutia.

Norman Shelley first claimed that he had recorded Churchill's famous speeches in the late 70s stating that the British Council had confidentially asked him to stand in for Churchill. According to Shelley, Churchill was too busy to come into the recording studio, but we now know that most members of Cabinet were heavy drinkers during the war years and Churchill was one of the most prolific. Such was Churchill's drinking that he began imbibing in his bath from 10 am to 2 pm, by which time he had finished his second cigar.

Churchill had a great deal of difficulty with alcohol, it was rumoured by his peers to be excessive, but was passed off as of little consequence, treated as taboo by embedded historians (which covers almost all published historians) and was never challenged until the next generation of insiders made it to print.

Churchill's speeches were first released by Decca in 1964. In 1983 the BBC asked Decca to stop claiming they were all BBC recordings, and in 1984 the BBC claimed the speeches were made by Churchill at his home in Chartwell (circa 1950). As well as infuriating the embedded historians, even this proved false.

In 1990 Sensimetrics (Cambridge, Massachusetts) confirmed some of the Churchill recordings to be the voice of Norman Shelley. The BBC Sound Archive then confirmed that Norman Shelley had recorded these at the old Transcription Service Studios near Regent's Park, with the rider that this was intended for the British War Council to send to America.

In October 2000, copies of these recordings were found by his son, conductor Anthony Shelley, in the attic. They were marked "BBC, Churchill: Speech. Artist Norman Shelley [stamped] September 7, 1942". The BBC then argued that the original recordings were mislabelled.

Richard M. Langworth of The Churchill Center (Hopkinton, N.H.) further stated: "What Shelley recorded, after the war, was an obscure, unpublished Churchill speech, the origin of which has eluded even the Churchill Archives."

History's confusing debate continues between those who believe in the right to know, those who believe they know right, and those who believe it's their right for other's not to know. As such, history is always a three-way debate with new excuses arising as soon as the previous ones lose credibility. History is incredulous until someone comes up with a story from the coalface that is so outrageous it's the truth. Intelligence refers to this as "The ring of truth".

It may have taken fifty years to find out that Churchill had made the speeches in the House of Commons, but not all the radio broadcasts and not all the recordings . . . but even that is not the end of the matter.

History critic Christopher Hitchens: "Some of Churchill's worst speeches were delivered from the bottle's mouth, and some of his best could not, as we now have reason to know, have been delivered at all without the deputising of an impersonator.

"Churchill's later histories both suffer from defects and, as with the case of the Katyn massacre[2] contain unpardonable and self-interested revisions of the truth. As to [alcohol-related] longevity, an entirely pickled Queen Mother has just died at the age of 101."

The originality of some of Churchill's paintings is also up for grabs. It was the style those days to be an all-rounder, a Renaissance man, and there were plenty of artists for hire – Hitler's original doppelgänger for instance (1911–13). Churchill showed none of these renaissance attributes at Harrow, where he did so badly he was punished for poor work and lack of effort. He had to sit his entrance exam three times and then qualified to join the Royal Military Academy near the bottom of his class of 102.

In giving him the benefit of the doubt, school may have suppressed what intelligence Churchill had and he was admitted to the Royal Society for his artistic works, which were uninspired, but technically competent.

Debate continues over Churchill's famous speeches. Others have said that it was made for BBC broadcast by James Robertson Justice who later played Lord Scrumptious in Ian Fleming's Chitty Chitty Bang Bang (1968) . . . but this is poppycock.

[2] The Katyn massacre of 25,700 1939 Polish POWs occurred with Churchill's complicity. They were killed by the Soviets in 1940 using 9mm German Geko bullets. This was then blamed on the Nazis in 1944. When all the camps were added up, the Soviets had killed 60,000-70,000 polish POWs in related massacres.

After Norman Shelley's first 'Winston Churchill' radio broadcasts (18 June 1940) and recordings (7 September 1942), another actor played the part of Winston Churchill, while Britain's war leader was either inebriated, in another country, or in another country with the excuse that he was either inebriated or having a visit from "the Black Dog" of depression.

Leslie Howard (1893–1943) was a nice guy who had leading film roles in Berkeley Square (1933),[3] The Scarlet Pimpernel (1935), as George Higgins in Pygmalion (1938), which later became My Fair Lady, and as Ashley Wilkes in Gone With the Wind (1939), the world's most watched film. He also acted in The First of the Few (1942).

Leslie Howard was also a homosexual who had a flat in Chelsea, London. He was caught in a sexually compromising act in a public toilet in London and arrested for homosexual behaviour. Instead of charged he was taken to a military base where he spent the next three months learning to imitate Winston Churchill. He was not told it was for a canned meat operation, but then again, they never told their flight crews either.

The military then dressed Leslie Howard as Winston Churchill and leaked it out through known double agents that Churchill was going to fly to Cyprus. The plane was then shot down by the Germans 40 km off the English coast on 1 June 1943 and Leslie Howard was killed. Meanwhile Churchill went by another route to the Middle East and for the next 10 days the Germans thought Churchill was dead (1–11 June 1943). Officially Leslie Howard was killed on a special mission flight from Lisbon to London. Winston Churchill had doppelgängers for voice and transport and probably went through them with alarming regularity.

The gay Leslie Howard playing the heterosexual Ashley Wilkes, predicted his own future with this classic line from Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's Gone With the Wind:

> "Most of the mysteries of the world were caused by wars and when the wars are over, no one ever knows what they were about."

It is not uncommon for those who seek retribution for their sins to mock enormous service to humanity as a form of appeasement. Service to the United Nations is a prime example. It is run and dominated by war criminals, and as such, it has been a primary ingredient in every war since 1950.

Kurt Waldheim was a German Sonder Führer (interpreter) in WWII and gave instructions to the Germans and the untermenschem (people not considered worthy of living). He then served as the Secretary General of the United Nations for nine years (1972–81). He was eventually charged in the 1980s with attempted murder over the Tonner's Club Investigation, but even this was swept under the carpet. Authorities rely on criminals in suits and their previous crimes make them completely malleable.

The Tonner's Club are made up of prominenti who bet money on the losses of shipping tonnage. This began in WWI, ran through WWII and has continued on to the present. Shipping sabotage was taught by the Stasi and the East German Navy at a Special School at Bolinger Bay on the Baltic Coast in East Germany. Records were 'lost' in 1989 and Bolinger Bay also appears to have disappeared off the map.

From the 1700s, Baltic shipping companies had their headquarters in London. In order to discuss chartering vessels and transporting cargo, they would meet in coffee houses – 'The Virginia and Baltic' was the most prominent. Here they would discuss international trading activities and also the sabotaging of competing vessels, something pirates were used for.

Pirates were given the timetables and routes of their competition. Since economic trade was by the trade winds and currents, the fast routes were more dangerous, and those shipping companies with the highest rate of delivery quickly dominated.

Some pirates were supported by their governments as a form of economic warfare and when they wanted to retire, all they had to do was exchange their last big booty for a knighthood. This was the case with Sir Francis Drake (knighted in 1580) who had been pre-sponsored by Britain's Queen Elizabeth.

English pirates even doubled as the royal navy during this period. In a lot of cases the pirates had more sway over the royal navy than if they had the Queen's commission in their pocket. Pirates like Sir Francis Drake were able to mix socially with royal naval officers and walk into their meetings with casks of Spanish sherry under their arms. They often had more power than those with gold braid on their shoulders. Drake was renowned for making suggestions and he virtually taught the royal navy the tactics used against the Spanish Armada.

English cannon balls were lighter and their fire was far more accurate than the Spanish. English sailors could lob a cannon ball into the crow's-nest of the mizzenmast at 2000 yards then board the galleons, knife in mouth, cutlass in hand. Drake was a thinking pirate who conjured up all aspects of terror and focussed this on the Spanish. Terror then became the ultimate English tactic and the ports of London produced more pirates than any other.

Drake was adept at reading the tides and the winds and picking on the Spanish out of thin air. The Spanish called him 'el Diablo' ('The Devil') and Drake always seemed to know instinctively when to hit the Spanish when they least expected it.

Drake was adept at forging alliances with natives, whose language he did not speak. He hated the Spanish with all his might and was constantly looking for other races to join in his Holy Crusade. There are lines in the poem 'Drake's Drum' by Sir Henry Newbolt that are really true.

Drake despised most of the gentlemen that he was often called upon to serve with, but he was adept at massaging egos. The royal navy was impressed by his ability to predict and read the Dons (Spanish). He could look at the Dons' sails and rigging and predict when they would tack and when they would strike their colours (surrender). He'd acquired an instinctive feel for his enemy from the many years of preying on them, but was often magnanimous in victory and not in favour of dishing out ill-treatment.

There is a famous line from a conversation between Drake and Sir Walter Ralegh. Ralegh questioned what the crew were doing when they were supposedly mucking around and this occurred nearly 20 years after the battle of the Armada.

Drake said, "There not idle, they're busy manufacturing souvenirs from the Armada.

Whereupon Ralegh said, "But that was twenty years ago".

Drake replied, "Well they will age them and its best not to disturb them while they're doing this." He pointed to a group in the fo'c's'le [crew quarters at bow] firing bullets at various flags. "The last person that disturbed them accidentally was shot dead. Do I rest my case?"

Drake was always on the lookout for hideouts and he acquired an eye for land from having to defend these isolated places. During WWI German commerce raiders put into a lot of these hideouts and often found traces of previous inhabitants – Francis Drake and his pirates. These islands and coves were nearly all off the sea routes and were isolated by geography as much as any other factor. Drake used them to the best of his ability, never defending them for too long and using fallback positions and reassembly points like the seasoned guerrilla he was.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 20

Out of the use of pirates to eliminate competing shipping, the Tonner's Club quickly became a powerful force in merchant shipping.

Kurt Waldheim, Secretary General of the United Nations (1972–81) was part of this, as well as being a Sonder Führer and giving instructions to kill the untermenschem.

Crimes even make organisations completely malleable. In the 1970s, Interpol were completely malleable due to their involvement in a major paedophile scandal in Brussels. Interpol were running a hotel for paedophile victims, but were caught using them in a kiddy-porn film, thus achieving the opposite of what they set out to do.

Spymaster: "Interpol never recovered from its formative years when it was part of the Gestapo. Interpol claimed major changes were made, but the spy who spoke with me said: 'Yes, Hitler's picture was taken down'."

Churchill has since been exposed as being involved in at least three assassinations in England. Britain has been so desperate to cover up Winston Churchill's war crimes and failings that BBC Television ran a one-sided campaign in 2002. In November 2002 Churchill was voted "The Greatest Briton of All Time", with Winston promoted and no one else portrayed as being in the running.

In a country of 60 million people, only 1 million votes were received and Winston Churchill, formerly known as 'the Butcher of Gallipoli' was crowned 'The Greatest Briton of All Time'.

59 million people didn't vote. The BBC did the rest.

Meanwhile what we don't know stagnates history. What is still not clear – Hitler's attempted peace talks, the Hess flights to Britain, the real Hess death, Hitler's escape out of Berlin and where and when he died – lies under Britain's 100-year suppression rule.

Hitler is considered the man who turned Europe into a 'Howling Wilderness', but this was originally an American plan of war for Samar (circa 1900). Plans of war and invasion were sold privately to other countries so that they would go to war with someone else.

America sold its plan to create a "'Howling Wilderness' for the extermination of Samar" to Britain in 1900 without Britain ever knowing they had bought it (1900–39); and Britain sold its plan to attack America's Pearl Harbor, to Japan in 1925. This one took 16 years to eventuate (1925–41). Touché, old chaps.

Hitler was a British agent and double agent who worked with the British Freemasons and monarchy to destroy France. Army Captain Walther Stennes talking to an English guest in Berlin in 1930: "Hitler had a strange sneaking regard, almost an affection for your country. Certainly he never meant to fight you, although it is equally certain that from a very early date in his career, he was determined to have a war."[4]

The German General Staff started planning WWII in November 1918, as soon as WWI had finished.

In support of England, Hitler banned his own Secret Service from spying on the British. To cover for this, he also banned the Freemasons and Catholics in Germany, which only had a small public effect on Thursdays and Sundays, but allowed and encouraged the British Secret Service to live underground in Germany.

Many British spies completely ignored the British–German animosity and continued trading as though it was peacetime, but with bargains to boot. After all, you could buy the plans of the Luftwaffe for the price of finishing a house. Hitler, being part of the plan, turned a blind eye to the free flow of influential information across the globe. As long as he had motors and firepower behind him, he was happy.

Adolf would lose himself in fantasy by watching two feature films each night like the 1938 The Star is Bright (Es Leuchten Die Sterne), about an isolated male in a suit of armour being courted by a single harem girl. It was a mixture of King Arthur and a Turkish delight; but his favourite film was The Lives of a Bengal Lancer (1935) about the British rule of India in exchange for the protection of India's northern borders – a Mafia tactic if ever there was one.

'We'll protect you by occupying you,
and if you don't let us,
we'll activate your enemy,
whom we control.'

[4] The Amiable Prussian, p. 81.

Herbert Döhring, a member of Hitler's SS Bodyguard (1936–43): "It was his favourite film and he couldn't wait to see it. He'd sit down and rub his hands together, 'It's starting. It's starting'. He'd talk about this huge English Empire and how such a relatively small number of people could establish and manage India and keep it in order."[5]

To Hitler, the British rule of India was perfect proof of the superiority of the Aryan race. "Let's learn from the English, who with 250,000 men in all, including 50,000 soldiers, governed 400 million Indians. What India was for England, the territories of Russia will be for us."[6]

Not all the German generals went along with Hitler's ambitious plans. General Beck was frightened Hitler was leading Germany into another world war and he communicated this to the British through underground means, contacting Sir Frank Roberts of the British Foreign Office (1930–68).

This was fatal because the British were arranging the war and had been working on it for the previous sixty years with a very focused effort since 1907 when Stalin was trained, 1912 when Hitler was trained, and from the last days of WWI (November 1918). Stalin had lived and trained in England for almost four years and spoke perfect English, as indeed did Hitler.

Sir Frank Roberts: "He [General Beck] said, if only you and the French would stand up to Hitler, then we'd do something about him. The British replied, 'Well hadn't you better start doing something about him, then perhaps we can help you.' However, with Hitler's success, this group had less chance of doing anything about him."[7]

General Beck desperately needed the British to stand up to Hitler at Munich. Instead, the British rolled over and watched their protégé Hitler continue.

Britain's Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain, made three trips to Germany to broker for peace with Hitler (15, 22, 29 September 1938). On the last trip he had a press conference by his plane before he left for Munich and said: "When I was a boy, I used to repeat, 'If at first you don't succeed, try, try, try again'. That's what I'm doing. When I come back I hope I may be able to say, as Hotspur in Henry IV, 'Out of this nettle danger, we plucked this flower safely'."

Chamberlain was a naïve fop. He was genial with dimples and looked like everyone's favourite uncle. He was not a wartime Prime Minister at all. He was, however, a British puppet filled with hope and misinformation, destined to achieve nothing.

The British government were so embarrassed by this speech, they took out "as Hotspur in Henry IV" and muffled "nettle" so that it could barely be heard, but sounded more like "metal". His speeches were so terrible, Churchill looked brilliant when he replaced him and all the British eagerly followed Churchill, but it was into war, not into peace.

The Munich conference took place inside the brand new Führerbau Nazi building on 29 September 1938 and lasted into the early hours of the following morning. Attended by Hitler, Chamberlain, Mussolini and the French Prime Minister, Edouard Daladier, the Czech representatives were there, but Hitler refused to let them in. Mussolini presented his own demands at the meeting, but these had been supplied to him earlier in the day by the Nazi's and were essentially the same demands Hitler made.

At the meeting Chamberlain said, "You have thousands of young people in uniform?" and Hitler replied, "But so do you. You call them the Salvation Army and the Boy Scouts" – to which Chamberlain had no reply.

Hitler had all the information he needed from the British and he increased his demands to take over Sudetenland (the outer areas of Czechoslovakia) with no British resistance. In exchange for a country, he gave Chamberlain a piece of paper saying "Peace for our Time". The two fascist radicals, Mussolini and Goering, ran roughshod over the very genial and very British, Chamberlain. Hitler's demands were agreed to so long as it was "Hitler's final territorial demand". Hitler was so chuffed, he was skipping like a madman.

Germany demanded Sudetenland because all the Czech fortifications were in that area. General Beck told Hitler that if the Czechs fought, the German Army would have immense problems. General Beck further promised the British that Hitler would be arrested the moment he ordered war.

Just after 1.00 am on 30 September 1938, the four leaders signed the Munich Agreement allowing Germany to occupy Sudetenland, beginning the following day, Saturday 1 October 1938, with the Czechoslovakian takeover to be complete by 10 October 1938.

Upon returning to London, Chamberlain said:

> "The settlement of the Czechoslovakian problem which has now been achieved is in my view the prelude to a larger settlement in which all Europe may find peace."

Virtually every British politician disagreed and Churchill loudly called the Munich Agreement "a total unmitigated defeat".

Just as planned, on Saturday 1 October 1938, the German Army rolled into the Sudetenland and the Czech people fled with only the clothes on their backs. Hitler was welcomed into Sudetenland, but not into inner Czechoslovakia where there was resistance, but to little effect.

Hitler said:

> "I did not think Czechoslovakia would be virtually served up to me on a plate by her friends."

As the representative of the Western Allies, Hitler thought little of Chamberlain: "Our enemies are little worms. I saw them at Munich." Hitler and the Nazis were now drunk on power. All German plans to overthrow Hitler were shelved and the generals resigned themselves to follow Hitler into his future. Chamberlain had ensured that WWII was a certainty.

The takeover came as a big shock to the naïve Chamberlain who wondered why Hitler had not consulted him. Der!

It was all over in ten days and the British Freemasons who backed Hitler told Chamberlain he was a jolly good fellow and promoted him to Lord President of the Council. With the Czechoslovakian takeover complete, WWII had begun in earnest. Chamberlain had run out of uses and excuses and was killed by in-house liquidation, dying on 9 November 1940 of 'cancer'.

Churchill was in on this and did not attend Chamberlain's funeral. He paid non-committal homage by calling him an "English worthy". This set the level of his respect amongst the public and the warmongers. Any kudos Chamberlain was remembered for, he did not deserve.

Chamberlain was used as 'a vehicle for war' without his knowledge and his naïvety led to WWII lasting longer. Germany had prepared for war during his naïve prime ministership and they now had land and weapons from other countries, at least in part, gifted by him.

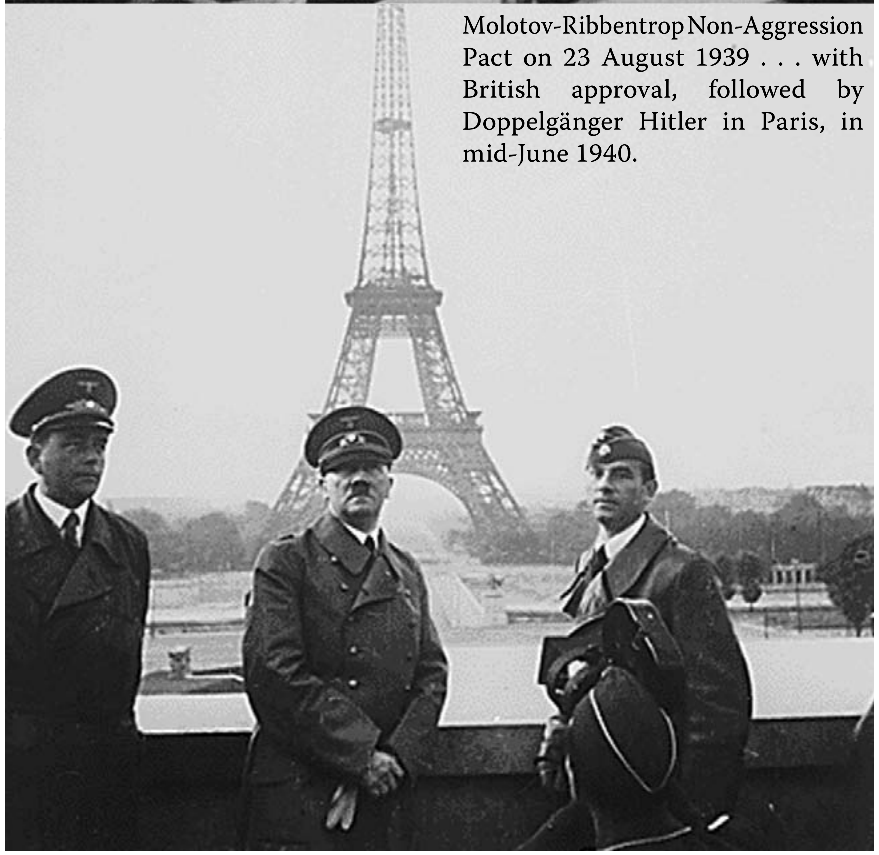
Molotov-Ribbentrop Non-Aggression Pact on 23 August 1939 . . . with British approval, followed by Doppelgänger Hitler in Paris, in mid-June 1940.



Hitler's Doppelgängers

To top it off, once the occupation was secure, one of Hitler's doppelgängers went to Prague in place of Hitler. He overlooked the city from the third floor of the castle of the Czech kings, 17 metres above the street, and stood there like a bad actor, without waving, as the German military paraded past stunned and silent Czechs. Hitler was in conference with the British at the time, and the actor Andreas Kronstaedt was Hitler's doppelgänger in Prague.

The English brought no enemy against Hitler, and by non-interference encouraged the war to develop, and develop, and develop. Hitler then applied to the Bank of England and had £6 million of Czech gold released to him. The Bank of England did this without hesitation or delay and this money was used to finance Hitler's leap-frogging war effort.

During this time the English and Germans had a 'swinging door policy' in their backrooms for both nationalities. They were still working together, albeit undercover, through spies and diplomats. Military secrets were traded like sports cards, some for personal gain, and others for the pack. Certainly Hitler's "intuitions scored massive triumphs in the first two years . . ."[8]

France was next. It was not supported by Britain or Russia and was crushed from all sides. After June 1940, WWII became a war for profit, selling arms, grabbing land, and setting up the Americans as the new world superpower with Prescott Bush selling American-made arms to the Nazis contravening the Treaty of Versailles and making enough of the green stuff to buy two US presidencies.

Doppelgängers for Everyone

The British Air Force Intelligence Officer Fred Winterbotham was intrigued by the way everyone ran out from their chauffeur-driven cars in Berlin and then turned at a right angle and ran into the building. One of the SS said, "We do this because of the Swallows, the communist party assassins".

They got sick of this by the mid-1930s and organised a doppelgänger contest amongst the ranks of the Storm Troopers, for anyone who looked like anyone important. Every region or 'Gau' was judged, and the finalists were sent to the main centre for one of the most bizarre competitions in history – the "Gau doppelgänger contest" – the Hitler lookalike contest. Some of the doppelgängers were touched up and improved with plastic surgery. None of the contestants here said: "I want world peace".

[8] The Cambridge Biographical Encyclopedia.

There were doubles for Goering and doubles for Hitler. The Gestapo then checked their background, giving preference to fathers with large families who really loved their children. Those who didn't love their children enough were dismissed because they weren't able to be bribed. The body doubles would be encouraged to turn a blind eye and a deaf ear to much of what the Nazi party was doing.

After the war a stunning German double of Hitler was located, complete with surgically altered nose, but he was financially well off and remained a bachelor all his life. As such, despite similarities, he was deemed unsuitable for the role as doppelgänger.

All the top brass, the Storm Trooper leaders, and the 'Gaulieters' (Area Commanders) had doppelgängers. The only one who didn't have a body double was Joseph Goebbels, who had a limp from a clubfoot. Because of this, Goebbels and his wife and children were served up to the Russians at the end of the war. They were the only true bodies left in Hitler's bunker at the Chancellery and they lent an air of legitimacy to the so-called bodies of Adolf and Eva. The Russians identified them all and then erroneously jumped to the conclusion that all the bodies were who they were supposed to be. Unfortunately they told Stalin this and then stuck to the story, even after they found it to be a deception.

In the book I was Hitler's Maid (1940), the author Pauline Kohler recalls five of Hitler's doppelgängers sitting around the table in her kitchen. They had come from poor working-class backgrounds and were kind men who spoke about their children a lot. She said she always felt an empathy for these guys and could relax around them, something she couldn't do around Hitler. These were fathers who had been commandeered and were as committed to Hitler's service as they were to their families.

Some of these were Gustav Weber (also spelt Weler), the actor Andreas Kronstaedt, Hitler's favourite driver, Julius Schreck (d. 1936) and Heinrich Bergner who was killed when Colonel Claus Schenk Graf von Stauffenberg planted a bomb under Hitler's table on 20 July 1944.

A clear signal of a double agent (rather than a doppelgänger) is that they leave you feeling on edge, like you've been talking to a ghost, or an ideology, that is deathly forceful but not physically present. The same experience can be had talking to a Catholic priest, who simultaneously represents the Holy Ghost and the paedophile movement. This has the effect of suspending reality and leaving one on edge with trust and distrust at loggerheads.

The effect was quite hypnotic, almost as though both the priests and double agents were similarly trained.

Double Agents and Double Agents

By March 1941, Hitler began to realise how he had been set up by the British. As a 'begrudged national' and 'British double agent', he wanted power over Germany, but he didn't want to die in the process. The war was supposed to be over in 18 months and the first part of the war had gone more or less according to plan. British and German counterparts had each other's phone numbers and any deaths were strategic, most of them French and occurring in France.

'C' (General Sir Stewart Graham Menzies): "The fact is that all sophisticated intelligence services maintain contact with their enemies . . . [The German General] Canaris was never a British agent in the accepted sense of that term . . . Canaris never betrayed his country's secrets to me or to anyone else on the British side, although his men did . . . he did contact me and ask me to meet him on neutral territory with a view to putting an end to the war . . . I never saw Canaris. But I did like and admire him. He was damned brave . . ."[9]

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

When the former Commander-in-Chief of the German Forces in Italy, Field Marshal Albert von Kesselring was on trial in Venice, "a sensation was caused by a British Intelligence Corps officer, Colonel Scotland, who told the court that he had served in the German Army during the war, and knew at one time the disposition of nearly all German armed forces".[10] In Germany Colonel Scotland was known as General von Schotland – a British agent in the German High Command. He'd bought kudos ahead of time by fighting for the Germans in the trenches in WWI.

This is not dissimilar to Hitler's story.

[10] The Illustrated London News, 8 March 1947, p. 247.

The first part of WWII was considered a 'fake war' as all the battles happened at sea. Hitler had received all the information needed to invade France from Britain's sexually dubious fascist King Edward VIII (head of the Freemasons and the monarchy) and Wallis Simpson (the American-born German bisexual spy and prostitute), thus bypassing all points of resistance and capturing France, like a 'walk in the park' (mid-June 1940).

Hitler's pact with Britain's warring Freemasons was to occupy and destroy France in exchange for Germany. This was completed after just nine months in June 1940. The French could do nothing, so formed a 'resistance' against the fascists – a black beret-wearing communist resistance. It was a brilliant scam to make France a socialist country.

Britain and Russia didn't come to France's rescue and France has remained a dedicated socialist country ever since.

Peter Fleming (1907–71), Ian Fleming's older brother was in hospital during March 1940. While hospitalised he wrote Flying Visit in which Hitler dropped in on London via parachute and the following day buildings were silhouetted as fires lit up the daytime sky like the sun. Within 14 months, the fiction the British wrote had become the reality the Germans enacted.

Ian Fleming (1908–64) knew that Hitler had been trained as a British agent in Tavistock (Lord Callaghan was also trained there). He knew that there was an agreement between Hitler and his British trainers that the war would only go on for nine to eighteen months and that the first nine months was to be a phoney war. (As a result Hitler tried to commit suicide on 10 March 1941, 18 months and 1 day after the war started.) Ian Fleming knew that Hitler was gunning for peace and would send his second in command to negotiate – so he played on this.

"Ian Fleming knew that Hitler, Himmler and Hess were all fascinated by the occult, particularly astrology, but also by occultist rituals. Secret Agents such as Frau Nagenast, an astrologer who Hess consulted and paid, were employed to produce charts that pointed to the 10th of May [1941] being a portentous time for Hess to fly to Britain. Fleming carefully made sure that the astrological forecasts that Hess received from his usual astrologers contained very similar information. This was accomplished using intrigue, bribery and forgery."[11] Fleming used astrology, double agent contacts through the Peace Party, and forged letters from Mrs Mary Violet Roberts.

Fleming used Hess's usual astrologer, occultist Ernst Schulter-Strathaus. In an intelligence file Ian Fleming read about 'The Link', an Anglo-German organisation founded by Admiral Sir Barry Domvile, a diminutive occultist, as so many are.

Admiral Sir Barry Edward Domvile KBE, CB, CMG (1878–13 Aug. 1971) was the son of an Admiral and had been promoted through the ranks at great speed. His naval career spanned from 1892–36. He was the Director of British Naval Intelligence (1927–30) and the Vice-Admiral Commanding War College (1932–34). As such he was a prime target for subversion. He visited the Dachau concentration camp in Germany (1935) and the Nazi government impressed him. On Joachim von Ribbentrop's invitation he attended the Nuremberg Rally in September 1936.

Admiral Sir Barry Domvile then founded 'The Link', which operated as an Anglo-German cultural non-party organisation with a journal that reflected pro-Nazi views to its 4300 members. MI-5 investigated and closed the organisation down in late 1939, soon after WWII began.

Admiral Sir Barry Domvile was considered a serious enough threat to be interned in Brixton Prison (7 July 1940–29 July 1943). Here he developed a view similar to jailed doppelgänger Hess – that there was "a Jewish-Masonic conspiracy". He was released to his home in Hampshire on the understanding that he would be interned as soon as the Nazis invaded.

Admiral Sir Barry Domvile's expressed view was that Hitler "would soon be in this country, but there was no reason to worry about it, because he would bring the Duke of Windsor over [formerly King Edward VIII who was successively exiled in France, Spain and Portugal] as King and conditions would be much improved".

Via agents, Fleming fed the line to Hess that 'The Link' had been driven underground and was in a position to use the Duke of Hamilton to negotiate peace and overthrow the Prime Minister, Winston Churchill. The Duke of Hamilton was less well known as the Duke of Hamilton and Brandon, and a few histories refer to Brandon as being the agent. The Duke of Hamilton was the agent!

Christened Douglas Douglas-Hamilton (1903–73), from 1940 he was the 14th Duke of Hamilton and the 11th Duke of Brandon, the hereditary keeper of Holyroodhouse, hereditary bearer of the Crown of Scotland, and acted as Lord Steward of the Royal Household (1940–64). In the 1920s his father destroyed Hamilton Palace (the family seat in South Lanarkshire), but Douglas Douglas-Hamilton made enough out of WWII to purchase Lennoxlove House (East Lothian) in 1946.

Douglas Douglas-Hamilton, the Duke of Hamilton and Brandon, was the Squadron Commander in the Auxiliary Air Force (1927–36), flew the first flight over Mount Everest in 1932, commanded the Air Training Corps, played a senior role in the Royal Air Force and was responsible for air defence over Scotland. He played a significant role in setting up the aircraft manufacturer, Scottish Aviation Ltd, at Preswick Airport. In 1978 this became part of British Aerospace Plc. Whatever Brandon wanted over Scottish airspace Brandon got over Scottish airspace.

Englishwoman Violet Roberts was the aunt of Walter Roberts, a close relative of the Duke of Hamilton and Brandon and was in the political intelligence and propaganda branch of the Secret Intelligence Service (SO1/PWE). Walter Roberts was also friends with Karl Haushofer, Hess's occult mentor. Walter Roberts wrote a letter to Karl Haushofer[12] and Hess took a great interest in this. Haushofer then replied to Violet Roberts suggesting Walter Roberts's post office box in Portugal for further correspondence. This letter only was conveniently intercepted by the British mail censors.

After the war had been going for 20 months, Hitler, a 'British trained and deconstructed Psych-Ops double agent', sent his close friend Rudolf Hess to Britain and Karl Horn to America to instigate one or more of the following:

Plan A: 'Negotiate for the end of WWII'.
Plan B: 'Hitler's anonymous escape to America'.
Plan C: 'Peace for our Time with Britain and America'.

With Hitler out of the picture, Germany could fold with minimal damage, Berlin would return to its merry ways and Hitler could live out his days in South America as so many other Nazis did. Hitler sent his deputy and pilot Rudolf Hess (47) to negotiate for the end of WWII with Britain. Knights Cross holder and ace Messerschmitt 110 pilot Karl Horn accompanied him.

This was told to the Spymaster by one who had taken a part in the interrogation of the real Hess. At the time he did not understand the full picture and the interrogation haunted him ever since. He told the Spymaster of the psychotic Austrian G-Man and suggested that Hauptmann Karl Horn (Squadron Commander) was hauled off the Battle of Britain operation and did not enjoy the special flights. Horn didn't look forward to the Hess peace mission, but felt obliged to obey the Führer's commands as he was a Knights Cross holder. There's even some question of whether it was Horn or Hess who flew the aircraft to Scotland.

Hess's tutor at university, Professor Karl Haushofer (1869–1946), played an important role. He was an occultist and one of the conduits between Hess, Hitler and MI-6. Horn took direct action because Hess was rendered incapable of going to America for fear of capture and execution. Instead his capture happened in Britain. Horn went to America because it was virtually their only chance of stating the case for peace.

The British and Germans had each other's phone numbers and it was not unusual to fly to each other's country during the war on 'diplomatic missions' and for these flights to be cleared of attack. The British even had German 87 octane avgas refuelling stations at designated MI-6 airstrips when no Allied aircraft flew on 87 octane. British planes used 100 octane avgas.

In the 1930s, the US Government passed a law prohibiting the sale of fuel additives or their formulae. Despite this, an American company gave Germany the secret to flying on low octane avgas by supplying them with the necessary chemical additive, ethyl lead.[13] (See Not Without American Help, Appendix 3)

The Danes purchased a German Condor Bomber in 1937/8 and it was very obviously used as a bomber. Although it had been fitted out as an airliner and was flying for Air Denmark, the stewardesses almost had to crawl up the aisles on their hands and knees to get to the passengers.

When the Nazis invaded Denmark, some Danes managed to load the Condor with fuel and fly it to England in 1940. By 1942 it was reported that the Condor had become so tatty that the British wanted to break it up for spare parts, but they had no other Condors and the parts were not transferable. There was no way a Condor was in good condition in 1940 and bad condition in 1942. The German Condor was used for special work – intelligence speak for intelligence operations.

The German Condor became the ideal aircraft to fly in and out of Europe on special missions and was used safely in German territory. As is typical in wartime, the plane was acquired by an airline in Britain that soon went broke. This left the German Condor plane without an itinerary.

A lot of aircraft from both sides were written off as navigation errors when they had landed intact. Britain now claims MI-6 aircrews were trained to fly Luftwaffe planes and that some Luftwaffe aircrew were MI-6 trained.

This coincided with the British-owned German transport aircraft (ex-South Africa) which allowed German and British meetings to take place in either country, or in any other country. This was done on numerous occasions and entirely in secret.

This is how World War II was progressively agreed upon.

Hess and Hess Fly to Britain

10–11 May 1941

The British summoned the real Hess (the Deputy Führer from 1933) through secret channels to Scotland and had arranged 10 May 1941 as his most portentous day. Switzerland, Portugal (British) or Spain (Fascist), Scandinavia, and Czechoslovakia were other possible destinations for his flight, but these were all optional decoys. At the same time a doppelgänger Hess flew to Scotland from a different location in Germany.

The dates on both the real Hess's and the doppelgänger Hess's three weather maps illustrated these other destinations. The fact that they had three weather maps meant that the real Hess did not know where he was going until after he had refuelled in northern France and received additional directions. The lack of clarity was intended from the beginning so that the myth of the real Hess (1884–1941) being an accidental defector or madman could be maintained and he would never be found.

The real Hess, Hitler's best friend and second in command, left Germany in secret on 10 May 1941 and landed his Messerschmitt Me110C near Abbeville in north-west France in a makeshift airfield. The Germans had secured these airfields all over France for the Battle of Britain (over eight months earlier). These were essentially flat grassed strips with a tower holding gravity-fed fuel and a telephone.

The real Hess refuelled himself and received further instructions by telephone as to his destination and departure time. He camped the night and was due to fly out the following evening, setting himself above the tail end of the Luftwaffe blitz on London. Karl Horn was with him.

The Omega Files say that Hess flew to England on 10 May 1941 to stop the war with Britain and was arrested as a 'war criminal'. However, they do not say that Hess spent a layover-night in France in order to wait for cover from the blitzkrieg. The blitzes went from September 1940 to May 1941 and Hess's cover was the last of the blitzes. Six weeks later Germany was focusing on Russia.

Hess's body double was well trained and this mission had been planned for a long time by both the British and the Germans. Doppelgänger Hess knew all of real Hess's history and had become an expert pilot.

The following day as 5.45 pm on 11 May 1941, doppelgänger Hess took off from Augsburg airfield near Munich in a not unpublicised event. The last person to speak to him was Hitler's radio dentist, Dr Friedrich Kohn, who belonged to the same secret Tibetan Lodge as Hitler, as did his quack doctor, Theodor Morell.

Augsburg is 50 km north-west of Munich and 30 km north of Landsberg Prison. Doppelgänger Hess took off in the next model of Messerschmitt, the Me110D, and flew low and north at 385 kmph (238 mph) to Cologne in northern Germany and refuelled. He took off from Cologne at 7.35 pm, heading across the islands off Holland and into Dutch airspace, where he linked up with the head of SS Intelligence, Reinhard Heydrich, who was an avid pilot. He was flying in Dutch airspace with Allied attention elsewhere on the blitzkrieg. Heydrich had three special SS pilots with him.

The real Hess was given specific instructions when to leave the makeshift airfield near Abbeville on the evening of 11 May 1941 and what flight paths to take. He was instructed to avoid the flak corridors, where they were most likely to get hit, and to fly at different heights and different speeds until he met with the blitzkrieg raid ('lightning war') on London. He was instructed to fly over the top using the Luftwaffe for cover during his most exposed time. Hess then met with the three escort planes by flying parallel on a bearing over Waddenilanden, the chain of islands stretching across northern Holland.

Goering was the commander of the Luftwaffe and a German-born British agent. This meant the British controlled many aspects of the German Air Force and knew what they were doing most of the time, including the London blitzes. Even before a blitzkrieg was predicted by the full moon, or detected by radar, the British knew what the Luftwaffe plans were. They were also prepared to assist them into battle.

Prior to WWII the Germans had been having problems with their aircraft's fuel injection and coughing during turns. In the late 1930s, under MI-6 advice, Rolls Royce invited German officials to visit their factory where MI-6 had got them to turn their engines upside down. According to MI-6, the meeting was designed to lead the Germans up the garden path, but 'engine inversion' solved the German problems, and many others besides. As a result, German fighters were superior to British Spitfires . . . totally by accident of course, old chaps.

As a German-British agent, Goering was opposed to any genuine peace talks and he supported a stitch-up against the gay married-for-cover Hess. Hess was queer for Hitler but had a devoted wife. Goering phoned Leutnant Colonel Adolf Galland, the Gruppe Kommandeur on the French airstrip at Abbeville, the most north-west airstrip in France, and requested that he intercept Hess and shoot him down. Goering had good cover to do so as Hitler had grounded Hess.

"Early in the evening of May 10th Galland got an extraordinary telephone call from Goering, who sounded 'very agitated' and ordered Galland to take off immediately with his entire wing. When Galland pointed out that there were no reports of any enemy aircraft flying in, Goering shouted, 'Flying in? What do you mean flying in? You're supposed to stop an aircraft flying out! The Deputy Führer has gone mad and is flying to England in an Me110. He must be brought down.'"[1]

Leutnant Colonel Galland failed to accomplish the mission. Hess was not shot down over France or Holland and made it to Scotland.

Once the real Hess had established the three escort planes, the four Messerschmitts flew over the English Channel towards Scotland. Hess (with Karl Horn) flew above doppelgänger Hess for the rest of the journey. They turned north-west until the Hesses found the signal from their night navigation radio direction signal. Both Hess planes had been specially fitted with a Kleve Knickbein radio night navigation receiver positioned for the pilot rather than gunner-navigator control. Hess's Me110C and doppelgänger Hess's Me110D were both fitted with two 66 gallon drop tanks for the final leg of the journey.

It was a clear moonlit night with little or no cloud cover and the planes were clearly visible from any ships below. Doppelgänger Hess continued to fly very closely below the real Hess, protecting him from any seaborne assault. Southern England was far better protected by fighters than northern England and there was even less threat during a blitz.

If the Hesses had been intercepted before they were able to enter the Duke of Hamilton's airspace, Heydrich and his decoy were there to lure away interceptors in their Me109E's. According to the British version on 11 May 1941 Hess's plane was spotted by eye and radar just after the blitz in the well-lit full-moon sky as it flew towards Scotland. "But even as the bomber streams made their way toward the burning capital, to their north flew a single Messerschmitt 110 fighter flown by the Deputy Führer of the German Reich, Rudolf Hess. The single aircraft was detected by British radar. British nightfighters were sent up to intercept and shoot it down, but they failed to make the intercept."[2]

[1] The Murder of Rudolf Hess, p. 47 and The First and the Last, pp. 108-9.

Heydrich and his special SS-flown Me109E escort protected the Hesses Me110's halfway across the North Sea (north of the English Channel) and then split off. The Me109E's didn't have the necessary navigation equipment or fuel capacity to fly all the way to Scotland. The Hesses then banked, travelling north at about 220 mph (350 kmph) climbing slowly to 15,000 feet (4500 m).

There four planes flown by Heydrich, the SS pilots, Doppelgänger Hess and real Hess were all 350 km away and well out of British airspace. Hess's plane had no ability to fire, as it had been stripped of extra weight for the long journey, and when doppelgänger Hess's plane was investigated after the crash it was discovered that all of the guns had been greased up. Neither Hess nor doppelgänger Hess could shoot at each other if they caught on to what was going on, nor could they retaliate against any fire from the British.

As it turned out, the Hess Me110 planes were allowed to pass with overriding orders given not to shoot them down (shades of 9-11). It was Scotland's highest-ranking Freemason, the Duke of Hamilton and Brandon who called off the Bolton-Paul Defiant Nightfighters sent from London. This allowed the real Hess and the doppelgänger Hess to land safely in Scotland.

The winner of the war always writes the dominant history. "To their north flew a single Messerschmitt 110 fighter flown by the Deputy Führer" was just British propaganda – confusing the truth, as is commonly found in victorious history books. This was another layer to the British part of the Hess cover-up and the British sabotage of peace. The blitz had stopped the real Hess and his escorts from being spotted just hours earlier.

Hess had no idea that the plane flying closely below him was his doppelgänger. Doppelgänger Hess remained close and out of view so as not to be seen by Hess or spotted by radar. At the time, radar was in its infancy and two planes flying close, one over the other, appeared as one plane.

[2] The Secret Servant, p. 343.

This can still be done today as long as the planes have the same radar signature. The 'two planes become one' by flying to the edge of the radar screen, aligning their paths and then re-emerging onto the screen. In this way a fighter plane can be introduced to airspace under cover of a passenger plane. When Heydrich and the SS escort parted, the two Me110's flown by the Hesses banked north off the radar screen.

The Hesses proceeded north with the real Hess closely above doppelgänger Hess until they intercepted the Stavanger Knickbein radio direction signal at 9.24 pm. They then banked sharply to the west and headed towards RAF Acklington. They had a tailwind and it was perfect flying weather. The moon was reflecting off the water and they were able to recognise coastal features.

Approaching Scotland the Hesses dived for cover amongst what clouds they could find until they reached about 5000 feet (1500 m). They crossed the coast at 10.25 pm and flew off the Knickbein and circled around the visible Holy Island showing all the world that they were not concerned about the Bolton-Paul Defiant Nightfighters. This is a Secret Operations and doppelgänger signature.

Doppelgänger Saddam Hussein did the same thing when he touched his jaw with the fingers of both hands on the night of his capture, 13 December 2003.

The Hesses then headed for the Duke of Hamilton's Dungavel Castle and overshot it as they headed for the glistening waterways on the west coast of Scotland. Doppelgänger Hess had overshot Dungavel castle by 60 km to purposely escort Hess and Horn to the Liberator flights at Preswick (35 km from Dungavel Castle and 5 km north of Ayr). They were travelling at 238 mph (385 kmph), so this would have taken another 5 minutes there and 7 minutes back.

Karl Horn, the gunner in the real Hess's plane, was an Olympic long-distance runner from the previous Berlin Olympics (1936) where the Duke of Hamilton had attended. Karl Horn parachuted out before they circled West Kilbride, landed and made his way to a rendezvous with an American General and caught a Liberator flight to America in an attempt to plead his case for peace there.

Hess and doppelgänger Hess then flew around West Kilbride below radar. The real Hess slowed down, peeled off, and landed at the Liberator landing strips at Preswick under cover of a mass of planes leaving for America at exactly the right time. Hess's landing had been precisely coordinated with the Americans.

This confused the radar and no one was alerted by the noise. Hess landed safely and was detained amidst secrecy, then interrogated with as much information as possible extracted from him before he was killed. His execution was kept secret.

Rudolf Hess (26 April 1894–13 May 1941).

"The radar noted that at a certain point over Scotland – near Dungavel, Stratheven, Lanarkshire, seat of the fourteenth Duke of Hamilton, premier peer of Scotland [and very high ranking Freemason] the aircraft began to spiral and then disappeared. It was thought at the time that it had been intercepted by a nightfighter, a Defiant [Bolton-Paul Defiant Nightfighter], and shot down."[3]

The Secret Servant does not note that the plane circled around Holy Island, that there were two planes, that they circled around West Kilbride and that one plane landed at Preswick. The winner of the war always records the war, with history rewriting interference, and always omits the details of its double agent dealings.

Doppelgänger Hess maintained his speed, made a chaotic circuitous route in order to sight Hess' landing, then followed the Scottish landmarks and glistening railway lines over Western Scotland finding his way back to Dungavel Castle (near Glasgow).

King George V's fourth son, the Duke of Kent (39) was waiting with a group of Polish officers at Dungavel Castle. Special Operations 1 (SO1) had all the correct players in place just in case there was a double agent leak. The Duke of Kent then flicked on the runway lights. Doppelgänger Hess realised the runway was too short and he'd crash into the trees at the end, so he overshot it and looked for a field to land in.

Doppelgänger Hess did not have enough avgas to make it back east 160 km to the RAF airstrip at Acklington. Not finding a suitable field and having already accomplished half of his mission, he flew another 20 km north to Eaglesham Moor, where he ran out of avgas, flipped his plane upside down and bailed.

The Hesses flew Messerschmitt Me110C & Me110D (above), which the Germans called Bf110. Below, a Liberator B-24.

As doppelgänger Hess bailed out he chipped a bone in his foot on the plane's tail. He landed by parachute on a field not far from Floors Farm in the Eaglesham Moor. His plane crashed and exploded at 11.09 pm, 20 km from Dungavel Castle. It was close enough to walk through the night, but his foot was a problem.

"Hess had abandoned the aircraft by parachute, hoping to land in the grounds of Dungavel where he might have a conversation of a highly secret nature with the duke, a man Hess admired. But Wing Commander the Duke of Hamilton was on duty that night at an RAF base in Scotland [Preswick] and was not at Dungavel. In parachuting, Hess also failed to land on the grounds of Dungavel estate – the only mistake he made in what was otherwise a technically remarkable and flawless flight, especially in regard to navigation. Hess had flown from an airfield near Munich to a pinpoint near Glasgow, a distance of some seven hundred air miles in which he traversed two heavily defended airspaces and steered his way through major bomber streams proceeding both east-west and west-east."[4] This was hardly a stroke of luck for the second in command of Germany.

Doppelgänger Hess was a test for the real Hess to see if the British really did want peace. With two Hess's one had to go, so they killed the real Hess as the capture of a doppelgänger is always more valuable (Saddam Hussein's doppelgänger is a case in point).

The secret death of the real Hess and the capture of the doppelgänger Hess was a minor victory for the British. Doppelgänger Hess was never sure of the fate of the real Hess and was placed into a deconstruction programme as soon as the original interviews were over. This was designed to make him believe he was the real Hess.

Peter Allen's The Crown and the Swastika suggested that Hess was killed in Britain by intention, or in an aircraft accident with the Duke of Kent and a doppelgänger was brainwashed into being Hess.

In Canada the OSS (the CIA from 1946) developed a method of brainwashing using electrical shock and drug treatments capable of changing a personality. This would explain doppelgänger Hess's strange behaviour and different appearance at the Nuremberg Trials (30 September 1946).

[4] The Secret Servant, pp. 343-4.

Doppelgänger Hess, wearing the name tag Alfred Horn on his brand-new uniform, had been trained to imitate Hess by the Germans and was trained to believe he was Hess by MI-6 who had been sharing data with the OSS. As a coping mechanism, to avoid revealing the true plans of Hitler and what he knew about the war (a Freemasonry stitch-up) he pretended to be mad, lost focus, complained of being poisoned and made fake suicide attempts.

The madness was partly real due to his German doppelgänger training and OSS subconscious personality alteration. The poisons were very likely real and designed to stop doppelgänger Hess thinking clearly. Doppelgänger Hess was eventually murdered in a fake suicide. It really was a horrible life being the fake Hess, the fake gay lover of Germany's ruler – the world's most feared 5'9" bisexual coprophiliac.

The fact that Churchill kept doppelgänger Hess hidden from public view lends weight to the theory that the real Hess was dead and doppelgänger Hess (Alfred Horn) was being altered for limited viewing. That a tailor was ordered to replicate Hess's uniform strengthens this. The 'replicated Hess uniform' was stolen from Spandau Prison in the 1970s.

At the same time as the real Hess and the doppelgänger Hess were flying to Scotland, the Luftwaffe were bombing London at low tide. This meant the British couldn't use the Thames to put out the more than 2000 fires from the incendiary bombs (which explode into fire on impact). Amid the mass of confusion more than 3000 people were killed or injured and the British House of Commons was destroyed for years to come. This was hardly a day for peace, but it was a perfect day to sabotage peace. Peace was sabotaged by both the British and the Germans on 11 May 1941.

All the incendiary bombs dismantled by the London Fire Brigade were made in Illingford, England and carried a manufacture date of 1938.

Spymaster: "The Fire Brigade were in charge of dismantling any-incendiary bombs that failed to explode. MI-5 then monstered the Fire Brigade, silenced all the fire-engineers and swore them to secrecy. It was essential to MI-5 that the manufacturing identity of the exploded and unexploded incendiary bombs remained secret.

"MI-5 then leaked a cover story that Germans recovered the British-made incendiary bombs from an RAF bomb dump in France. This was a lie as all of these incendiary bombs were thoroughly demolished.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

"The RAF were fastidious about destroying ordnance and the record of their demolition was well and truly noted. The government story was a cover story. The Fire Brigade were asked not to say anything as it would be considered unhelpful."

A third of the square mile of London was destroyed, but the British monarchy's many palaces were rarely hit, many of them not at all. A British monarchy/German alliance for sure!

"Landing in a field, Hess was captured by a farm-hand. He was still wearing the blue uniform of captain of the Luftwaffe [a set-up]. Hess was handed over to the assistant area controller of the Royal Observer Corps, Major Graham Donald."[5]

Major Graham Donald was complicit to the German subterfuge and German–English Freemasonry agreements. Major Graham Donald looked at the doppelgänger Hess with the name tag Alfred Horn and said, "You look exactly like Hess."

Doppelgänger Hess replied, "That is nothing new to me. It's a fact which has embarrassed me often enough."

From then on Major Graham Donald acted as though this was the real Hess, although he knew otherwise. This was part of the stitch-up, as was confusion over the name Horn, when Horn was on the other flight. Major Graham Donald remained complicit to the German–English Freemasonry agreements and SO1 operations. When he met with the next interrogator, Major Graham Donald once again identified 'Captain Alfred Horn' as "Rudolf Hess" when he knew damned well he was the doppelgänger Hess they had been expecting.

"At the outset, [doppelgänger] Hess told Donald that 'he had a secret and vital message for the Duke of Hamilton, and that he must see the Duke at once'. Donald then asked the German where he expected to find the duke, and [doppelgänger] Hess replied, 'At Dungavel house', producing a map with a red ring drawn around the estate.

"After the brief interrogation, Donald reported to his duty controller and asked him to contact Wing Commander the Duke of Hamilton. 'After this . . . I came to the conclusion that the safety of the realm was now securely in other hands and no longer the sole responsibility of our Group. So I went to bed [as I was told].'"[6]

When doppelgänger Hess was being interviewed, he requested the British send a telegram to the real Hess's wife, Ilse Prohl (m. 1927) saying that he was okay. He didn't speak to her as voice recognition would reveal him as a fake Hess, and he refused to meet with Hess's family for another 28 years (until 1969).

This message comforted Hess's wife, but when it was passed on to Hitler it meant that doppelgänger Hess had arrived at Dungavel Castle and not the real Hess. It also meant that the real Hess and Karl Horn (in his regular service uniform) had landed safely at Preswick where the Liberator Flights left for America.

Doppelgänger Hess had confirmed the landing during what appeared to be a chaotic circuitous route. He was, in fact, dropping his wing for better sight and ensuring radar picked him up over and above the mass of planes leaving Preswick.

This telegram was the way in which doppelgänger Hess (whom Hitler knew about), contacted Hitler saying that the Reichsführer (Deputy leader and occasional lover) had landed safely. If Hitler knew Hess was dead, he might have become disheartened and not attacked Russia in six weeks' time.

Hitler usually lay in bed until lunchtime. He was a lazy administrator who left much of the administrative work to Hess. However, on the morning of 11 May 1941, after sending both Hess, Karl Horn and Hess's doppelgänger (under the name Alfred Horn) to England to plead for peace (or an unobstructed war) Hitler was up and dressed at 7.30 am and was able to officially receive the letter from Hess' Adjutant Pintsch which read, "And if my Führer, this project . . . ends in failure . . . simply say that I was mad".

Doppelgänger Hess's telegram to Ilse Prohl was a 'successful mission to date' signal but Hitler was never to see the real Hess, Karl Horn, or the doppelgänger Hess (Alfred Horn) again.

Hitler had publicly grounded Hess from flying. This was designed to make Hess's peace mission look like a rebellion against Hitler in case it failed. However, as firstly a British agent and secondly a German agent, Hitler was right behind the mission from its inception. It was in fact his idea, as he was already tired of the war.

Hitler had tried to commit suicide two months earlier on 10 March 1941 and it was Rudolf Hess who had saved him.

The Rudolf Hesses.

The war was only supposed to go on for 18 months (9 September 1939–9 March 1941) after which the secret agreement between Britain and Germany, the British and German Freemasons, and Churchill and Hitler began to fizzle and the real war began. Hitler reacted to this by attempting suicide on 10 March 1941.

Lt.Col. Scotland: "This much, however, is in my view certain. There could be no question of Hess having flown from Germany on his own initiative. It is highly improbable that he could have taken his aircraft without the express knowledge and concurrence of three men: Adolf Hitler, Hermann Goering and Field-Marshal Kesselring or some equally high-ranking air force officer.

"Hitler, in short, would have to grant Goering permission for the trip, and for a machine, with extra tanks, to be made available. This work could only be done with the knowledge of someone like Kesselring (then Air Chief of Staff). And Goering, also, would have to issue precise instructions not only for the aircraft's route and planning, but for the temporary abatement of the German anti-aircraft units while Hess was on his way out."[7]

As it turned out, all three were British Agents. Adolf Hitler, Hermann Goering and Albert Kesselring.

The dates of 10–12 May 1941 are regularly confused by both sides as part of the ongoing cover for the Hess and Hess mission, which was both a peace mission and a mission to sabotage peace. It was a propaganda exercise acted and counteracted by both sides.

Hitler punished Hess's astrologers, whom he knew had been compromised by the British, but he did not punish Willi Messerschmitt (Mr Smith) who had helped doppelgänger Hess obtain and fit a brand new Messerschmitt Bf110D with a Knickbein radio night navigation system positioned for pilot rather than gunner-navigator control. Hitler also failed to punish the ground crew at Augsberg or Cologne. Nor did he punish Heydrich who guided the Hesses over the North Sea.

This is completely at odds with Hitler's standing orders about Hess not being allowed to fly. It shows that the Luftwaffe had official sanction to guide and assist Hess, using the biggest air raid ever as cover – the blitzkriegs over London. It shows Hitler's total complicity in the peace mission, and from his British training, the designated failure of that peace mission.

Hitler knew that in the writing of history, this would make him look good and also allow him to get rid of 'Fraulein Anna', the nickname of his gay lover Rudolf Hess. Hess was beginning to make the Third Reich look like a 'Gay Reich', and the 'mean Hitler' look like a 'gay Hitler'. "Not self-seeking and unswervingly loyal, he [Hess] was promoted by Hitler to posts of increasing importance: Deputy to the Führer in 1933, Minister without Portfolio . . ."[8]

Rudolf Hess saved Hitler's life on 10 March 1941, and two months later Hitler repaid him by sending him on a suicide mission. His British agent status had taken hold. "The war, however, eclipsed his importance, which his meagre talents in any case scarcely justified, and in 1941 he flew on a self-appointed mission to Scotland to negotiate peace."[9]

If Germany knew Hitler was suicidal, Germany would lose its spirit to fight. The British goal was to extend the duration of the war, expand the fronts and get more countries involved. Hitler had no option but to obey his British Tavistock training. In his subconscious, he knew the war was expanding and he was heading north to Russia.

Secret Service: "To further cover this up and add confusion, essentially the name of the game, when the British got to Augsberg in Bavarian Germany they insisted on taking it ahead of any other Allied force. They burnt all the factory werke nummer [work number] records of the Messerschmitt Me110's. To this day, the records of the Me110's are an area of confusion unto themselves. There is no way to work out when they were manufactured or how many there were. The same thing happened in Austria.

"Russian Polikarpovs used to dive on the tails of the Me110's, chew the rudders up, and the Me110s would fall out of the sky. Records were destroyed to thwart any research confirming any double-dealings."

Doppelgänger Hess provided cover for the murder of the real Hess, who actually did want peace, and may have had enough charisma to make others question the war. The apparent capture of Hess appeared like a minor victory for the British. The doppelgänger Hess may have been unaware of the murder of the real Hess and probably believed Karl Horn had made it to America.

At the time of the blitz, Churchill was at his retreat at Ditchley Park, near Oxford, at the estate of Sir Ronald Tree, a place he went on moonlit nights – blitz nights. Churchill was watching a Marx brothers movie at the time and when he was advised that the Duke of Hamilton wanted to speak to him on the phone regarding the arrival of Hess in Scotland, Churchill said, “Will you kindly instruct the Duke of Hamilton to tell that to the Marx brothers . . . Hess, or no Hess, I’m going to see the Marx Brothers.” Churchill knew in advance that Hess and a doppelgänger Hess were arriving and that the real Hess was already being interrogated and would be killed.

The Duke of Hamilton then flew to Oxford that night and met with Churchill who appeared after the movie had finished and began grilling the Duke. Doppelgänger Hess had come fully loaded with proof positive of Hitler’s previous attempts to create peace in September 1940. Churchill received the Duke, swore him to secrecy and then dismissed him.

The Duke of Hamilton was actually sworn to secrecy the moment he became Scotland’s leading Freemason, and was further sworn to secrecy when he was pre-briefed on how to carry out this scenario. His flight to Oxford to see Churchill was partly for show.

Churchill then selected three people to interrogate the doppelgänger Hess: Roman Battaglia; the Duke of Hamilton; and Lord Simon.

Alfred Horn (doppelgänger Hess) was then taken to Maryhill Barracks in Glasgow where he emptied his pockets for the Duty Officer. One of the items was a letter from Hitler to the Duke of Hamilton. This letter was removed by Major Graham Donald and never reached public records. The war could not continue if there was written record of Hitler trying to create peace.

Major Graham Donald (Observer Corps) was a Freemason and Special Operations insider. First to meet with Alfred Horn, he instructed all the interviewers Alfred Horn was Rudolf Hess.

The first person to interrogate Alfred Horn/doppelgänger Hess was Roman Battaglia, an interrogator and language expert from the Polish Consulate. This following day it was the Duke of Hamilton’s turn.

Doppelgänger Hess was then interviewed by Lord Simon who was Chamberlain’s protégé. Chamberlain, the naïve fop used to secure war with Germany, had died six months earlier (9 November 1940).

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

The interview was conducted under the supervision of ‘C’. ‘C’ was General Sir Stewart Graham Menzies who was one of the many illegitimate son of King Edward VII.

Many of King Edward VII’s closest relatives believe he arranged WWII, despite the fact that he had died in 1910.

This is very similar to the interview of Saddam Hussein being conducted under the supervision of the CIA on 15 December 2003. It meant that no useful information would be gained, all scenario-information would be colluded, the war would continue to be justified and expanded, and huge profits would continue to be made. It was war and lives were as dispensable as writing them off as ‘collateral damage’. It could not have been a bigger set up.

Doppelgänger Hess’s offer for peace was completely at odds with real Hess’s offer for peace. Doppelgänger Hess’s offer for peace was that ‘England would return all of Germany’s ex-colonies, stay out of the war and allow Germany to take over Europe, including Russia [in 41 days’ time]. In return Germany would not touch the British Empire. This ‘Peace Talk’ was straight out of Hitler’s British deconstruction.

England decided Germany needed another enemy to weaken its attacks against England, so they encouraged Germany to attack Russia. Germany kept its part in the bargain. The blitzkriegs of Britain stopped and Germany attacked Russia under Operation BARBAROSSA on 22 June 1941. Britain had an agreement to warn Russia, but they failed to do so. This strained British/Russian relations – but what did it matter, Stalin was also a British agent and had been since his 1907–1911 British training.

Britain did warn Russia but warned them in such a way that they didn’t take it seriously, as they knew they wouldn’t. The British used letters and diplomatic notes. Stalin was so deluded that he even ignored a warning from the German Ambassador to Moscow. The German Ambassador said he felt he had an admiration for Bismarck, the German Chancellor in the mid-1800s. What was unsaid at the time was that Bismarck was an admirer of Russia and never wanted war with Russia. Bismarck wouldn’t even contemplate war with America.

Bismarck was in favour of exhibitions of force close to German borders. He had been a keen intellect and used to call the generals a bunch of dummkopfs, calling Kaiser Wilhelm II the biggest dummkopf of them all.

Bismarck: "All you have to do to understand what German strategy ought to be is to take a glance at a map of Germany and it immediately demonstrates three given truths:

1. Germany is placed geographically to attack in all directions.
2. Germany is also placed geographically to be attacked from all directions.
3. So obviously Germany should only fight with very limited war aims and not get involved in any war protracted beyond a year and a half.

Because dummkopfs could not read a single map, you had to watch them like a hawk."

At the end of the meeting, doppelgänger Hess said that Germany would not negotiate with Churchill. The interviewer's reports were never made public.

After the takeover of France, Hitler moved his headquarters to the Black Forest near Freudenstadt. WWII was designed to bring all the neutral WWI countries into war. The desire for oil crosses all national boundaries and national deaths are of no concern to oil companies. As such, Royal Dutch Shell asked Hitler to launch his armies into Russia for oil. In the Black Forest, in July 1940, Hitler agreed. Almost as soon as Hitler made a decision the British knew about it and acted accordingly. This little pearl was quietly recorded by Hitler's Dr Morell in his diary. The operation was first named 'Fritz', then 'Directive 21', then 'Barbarossa'.

Hitler's intelligence reports were actively compromised by the British. With British assistance Germany concluded in early 1941 that unless Russia was attacked within the year, she would arm and prove to be too strong to defeat. Hitler therefore decided that his July 1940 decision to attack Russia was a good one and he launched Operation BARBAROSSA with 121 German divisions, 19 armoured divisions, three air fleets and summer in mind.

Doppelgänger Hess's offering was hardly a peace talk. It was more of a finger pointing skite and a declaration to create a 'howling wilderness' everywhere but Britain and its colonies. It is hardly likely that Hess would negotiate for peace with Britain in earnest, by blitzing Britain just hours before. Doppelgänger Hess's peace mission was intended to fail and leave no room for success. After all, the British prided themselves as rescuers and there was no way they would let Western Europe fall to the Germans. It just wasn't in their blood.

The real Hess was on a peace mission whereas doppelgänger Hess was pleading with England not to support Russia so that Germany could expand WWII. It was the same peace agreement Hitler tried with Neville Chamberlain prior to the invasion of Eastern Europe – Germany would help protect the British Empire as long as Britain did not oppose Germany in Europe. Britain and Germany would take over Europe without war between the two 'cousins'.

This is why the British Freemasons killed the real Hess and supported the doppelgänger Hess. Germany did attack Russia and the British did not come to a physical rescue. The British only supplied support on paper, which, in war, is as useless as tits on a bull.

In an attempt to limit the PR damage of a captured Hess on the German psyche, Ribbentrop advised the world that "Hess suffered from gallstones and through the pain he had become an 'astrological faddist' and was mad. The German underground movement took this to mean that the man Hitler had been promoting for years was partly or completely insane."

The truth of the matter was that both Hitler and Hess were bisexual and occasional lovers. Hitler had been promoting his lover Hess. They were not the first politicians to invent this strategy.

This encouraged more German High Command to become double agents, which then secured their freedom after the war. Some of them were even decorated by the Allies.

Eight days after Hess's landing Hitler sent two SS officers to parachute into the same location as doppelgänger Hess (19 May 1941) with the same maps, and with the same locations circled. They were interrogated, then executed, with no mission statement ever revealed. The war had only been going 19 months and the British were already furiously sabotaging peace talks and silencing everything around this effort.

The American President Franklin D. Roosevelt remarked, "I wonder what is really behind this story?"

Doppelgänger Hess was then placed in the Tower of London, Aldershot, Mychett Place (Camp Z), the Nuremberg Trials and Spandau Prison for a life sentence and eventual assassination 46 years later. For the last 21 years of his doppelgänger life, Hess was the only prisoner at Spandau Prison.

"He was indeed brought to Nuremberg apparently suffering from amnesia but was judged fit to plead and later recovered his memory. He was indicted on all four counts, convicted on counts 1 and 2, and sentenced to life imprisonment, and refuses all contact with his family."[10]

During his confinement in Britain (1941–45), the RAF guard asked doppelgänger Hess where he had learnt chess. "When I was in hospital in France after Cambrai" came the answer. In 1917 the real Hess was elsewhere on the Eastern Front.

In the 1980s when doppelgänger Hess began mumbling to his guards about being on a peace mission for Hitler, WWII being a British and German Freemasons' war against the French Freemasons, and a war to create 'ORDER OUT OF CHAOS', his execution became imminent. Germany, America and England intervened and doppelgänger Hess was assassinated in the Summerhouse of Spandau Prison by strangulation on 17 August 1987.

There is sufficient evidence to say that this is so. Freemasons dominated all positions of influence right through Britain and Germany. At the beginning of 1930, Germany had 75,000 Masons. Two-thirds of these refused to allow Jews to join and one third, the humanitarian lodges, allowed Jews to join. In 1922 these two lodges separated, with one-third of German lodges supporting Jews and two-thirds not.

> "There is a border which strongly differentiates humanitarian from Old Prussian national Freemasonry. We, the three Old Prussian Grand Lodges refuse to take part in the general humanitarian fraternization movement between people in the world."[11]

This was acknowledged by the Nazis who gave protection to the Old Prussian Grand Lodge Freemasons and treated the Humanitarian Freemasons with contempt.

On 28 March 1933 the unrecognised 'Clandestine' Freemasons resolved to dissolve and become dormant. In their final resolutions they also resolved to support Hitler, as did the National Mother-Lodge, 'The Three Globes'. In late March 1933, the three (Berlin) Grand Lodges sent a congratulatory address to the Reich Chancellor Hitler, and The Grand Lodge of Saxony (Dresden) sent a telegram expressing its faithful support to Dr Goebbels.[12] By 31 March 1933, all German Freemasons were in support of Hitler.

Hitler was actually worshipped by the P2 Masonic Lodge Grand Master Licio Gelli, as well as a host of other Freemasons including Juan Peron and Thule Society cult founder, Rudolf Blauer (alias Rudolf Freiherr Von Seboottendorf).[13]

> Omega Files: "The Freemason's Scottish Rite can be traced back to the Jesuit college of Clermont in France, and at the core it advocates a global government and the destruction of all national boundaries, sovereignties and cultures; the dissolution of all traditional 'family' structures making all children the wards of the world state;[14] and the destruction of the idea that man has a soul, or rather that humans are merely evolved animals having no spiritual nature and therefore no need for God. In other words a homogenized collective society which does not tolerate individual expression but instead enforces absolute conformity to the controlling establishment."

In 1950, Masonic Brother C. William Smith wrote the article 'God's Plan in America' which gives some insight into Freemasonry's goals.[15] There are three plans in action today and they all have different purposes:

1. God's non-sectarian plan.
2. The Roman Catholic denominational sectarian plan.
3. The anti-Capitalist Communistic plan.

God's non-sectarian plan is dedicated to the unification of all races, religions and creeds, to the new order of things, to make all things new – a new nation, a new race, a new civilisation, a new non-sectarian religion, 'The Great Light' (which already exists) and a 'New Age' (Novus Ordo Seclorum).

Great light non-sectarian Masonic Brotherhood Monarchs include: King George VI of England (1936–52), King Gustav V of Sweden (1907–56), King Haakon VII of Norway (1905–57), and the late King Kristian X of Denmark (1912–47).

The Nordic people are not church worshippers, but avid readers of the Bible. The Nordic-Anglo-Saxons make up 95% of colonists, were the first people to print the Bible in great quantity, were known as the people of the book, and are the great Bible-reading people of the world today. [With six-month long nights and no TV in the Arctic Circle, there was only sex and the Bible.] In Norway there has been no illiteracy for more than a hundred years. The Nordic people [with Greenland's Thule as their centre] are bringing a new order to the world.

At the time, the British thought Hess's history of WWII being a battle between the British and German Freemasons in order to create ORDER OUT OF CHAOS was dead and buried and wanted to keep it that way. Hess's guards at Spandau Prison were rotated every month and the murder occurred under US tenure.

On 17 August 1987 Hess's male nurse Abdallah Melaouhi passed two strangers in the Summer-house. They were British SAS assassins dressed in American Army uniform. According to Wolf Rudiger Hess, his (doppelgänger) father was murdered by British SAS assassins dressed as American soldiers, sent by MI-6 and his death was made to look like a suicide. (See Doppelgänger Hess's Murder, Appendix 5)

According to Dr Seidl, doppelgänger Hess could not have committed suicide in this way because the 93-year-old could not lift his arms above his head. The suicide came complete with fake note, expertly forged by a specialist organisation, but not convincing to anyone who knew Hess.

Hess was never allowed to meet anyone from the public. If either the real Hess or the doppelgänger Hess had met with the public either may have told of how:

1. The British organised a fake peace treaty to flush out the German peace activists.
2. Britain could have accepted peace and saved the mass deaths of the Jews.
3. Hitler was encouraged to attack Russia to take the pressure off Britain.

4. If Germany had continued to attack Britain, Britain would have folded and lost the war within two years of its inception.
5. The British sabotaged Hitler's attempts at peace.
6. Hitler, as a British agent, sabotaged his own peace mission and extended the war to Russia. This meant he was fighting on two fronts. Even Hitler said he would 'not repeat this mistake of WWI', but he did.
7. The deaths of the Jews had been a British goal since Nathan Rothschild took over the Bank of England on 21 June 1815 using homing pigeons. (See The Bank of England Heist, Appendix 6)
8. Any of this information coming from doppelgänger Hess would have eroded any justified propaganda against Russia and would have delayed the Berlin Wall coming down 27 months later (9 Nov. 1989).

According to the Cambridge Dictionary, "In June 1941, on the eve of Germany's attack on Russia, Rudolf Hess flew alone to Scotland to plead the cause of a negotiated Anglo-German peace. He was temporarily imprisoned in the Tower of London, then placed under psychiatric care near Aldershot. At the Nuremberg Trials (1946) he was sentenced to life imprisonment, and remained in Spandau Prison [just west of Berlin] until his death."

The truth of the matter is that both Hess and doppelgänger Hess flew into Scotland on 11 May and landed within 35 km of each other. The real Hess landed his plane safely at Preswick and the doppelgänger Hess crashed his plane at Eaglesham, near Dungavel Castle. The real Hess was then killed, while the doppelgänger was detained, written off as mad, had his personality altered, was placed in prison and then assassinated 46 years later.

Karl Horn, the companion of the real Hess, parachuted out of Hess's plane and went on the very dangerous mission of 'doing the same thing' as Rudolf Hess, but with America. Karl Horn made it to America and pleaded for peace.

Karl Horn was someone the Americans would recognise and who had the highest connections in Germany. He was a Hauptmann or German Captain in the Luftwaffe, Knights Cross holder from the Battle of Britain (August–September 1940) and 1936 Olympic long-distance runner. His uncle was Colonel General Karlheinz von Horn, who later led the German Army in the Ardennes offensive of 1944–5. Karl Horn was a pilot from a famous flying lineage who would be respected by the American military.

It was not uncommon from WWI to WWII for athletes to also be agents and for their names to be suppressed or confused. The agent might get a medal in the event, while another stood on the podium and was photographed. The name, sex and image of agents in the Olympics was regularly obfuscated between the wars. In this way the prize was awarded to the country, with the true identity of the agent remaining secret. There were even men competing in women's events.

It is not untypical for the Polish to look transgender. Stella Walsh, born Stanislawa Walasiewicz, won the 1932 100m Olympic gold medal and came second at the 1936 Olympics at Berlin. It wasn't until she was shot in 1980 that it was discovered she was a man. But these transgender types have a way of using the media to their advantage and she had a Polish reporter accuse the winner, Helen Stephens, of being a man.

In this way, the closest official record of Karl Horn being a 1936 Olympic long-distance runner is Karl Hein who won the gold medal for the hammer with an Olympic record of 185' 4". Erwin Blask (Germany) got the silver for 180' 6.5" and Fred Warngard (Sweden) got the bronze for 179' 10.5". Such is the nature of military-Olympic competitors and the obfuscation that surrounds their public achievements.

Secret Service: "Karl Horn made it to his rendezvous with an American General that had been sent to England and negotiated a flight to America on the 'Liberator Transports of the American Ferry Command' from the Scottish West Coast. These Liberator flights were flying in and out of Scotland all the time, transporting planes to Britain and munitions to both England and Nazi Germany, courtesy of Prescott Bush – grandfather to the current US president.

"Karl Horn made it to America and tried to approach the big-wigs in the United States but instead was hunted down by a joint British MI-6 and FBI firing party which included his British Olympic long-distance competitor. The FBI troop included a sadistic, homosexual, ex-Austrian serviceman who used to beat people to death. The cross-dressing blackmailed director of the FBI, J. Edgar Hoover, used the former Austrian when he didn't care if the subject died."

Karl Horn, a man negotiating for 'world peace', the end of Germany's advancement in WWII, and Hitler's escape to America, was hunted down as a forerunner to the psycho-thrillers that were to come. Exhausted, Karl Horn eventually committed suicide by swimming out from the New England coast into the Atlantic Ocean and drowning. If only he had made it south to Yaphank, Long Island. There, the 'potato-field fascists' would have covered for him and even given Hitler a bed for a decade or two.

When the fake Hess was on trial at Nuremberg (from 30 September 1946), the Germans High Command smirked and accommodated him as a retard. The real Goering laughed and ridiculed him because he knew he was a doppelgänger and a British agent. After all, Goering had ordered the death of the real Hess at Abbeville and had given approval for both flights to arrive simultaneously in Scotland.

At the Nuremberg trials, the Russian judge dissented and found Hess guilty of 'Crimes Against Humanity' but the British and other judges were extraordinarily lenient and did not. The British judge refused to get into matters of politics and Secret Operations. It would have placed Churchill in a bad light and been an embarrassment to the British monarchy, aristocracy and government. As a result, Hess was not found guilty.

Over 99% of those charged with war crimes were not convicted. Because of double agent dealings, most of the war criminals had fake deaths (Hitler), had doppelgängers at the trial (Hess), were Anglophiles (Schellenberg), had turned up to the trial under British cover complete with plastic surgery to witness their own sentence in absentia (Martin Bormann), or had been compromised during the war and had become British double agents (most of the German High Command).

The Nuremberg trials quickly turned into a farce and the judges were powerless to act with such military/intelligence interference.

In the 1970s the medical officer Hugh Thomas, a Welsh surgeon treating the doppelgänger Hess, noticed that the prisoner did not have the same dunchesse, the chest scar from the through-and-through gunshot wound from the Russian Nagant rifle that almost killed the real Rudolf Hess in Romania on 8 August 1917, after which he was hospitalised for four months.[16]

[16] Leutnant Rudolf Hess's military service record is held in the American Mission (the Berlin Document Centre) which houses several hundred thousand captured German WWII documents. It was formerly the fortified headquarters of Hermann Goering; The Murder of Rudolf Hess, pp. 28–29.

When Hugh Thomas pointed this out he got monstered by British Intelligence. Nevertheless, doppelgänger Hess was detained and executed 46 years later in 1987, when he was some 93 years old. He maintained silence for almost all of that time.

When doppelgänger Hess did finally speak out, he was executed: "The war is a war of secrets. I knew you would come for me. I alone won the war. My family are all grown up now." This was delivered to the SAS assassins in fluent English.

The information doppelgänger Hess could reveal would have been bad for the justification of the Cold War against Russia and Britain wanted to look like a top dog with clean paws while it lasted. The death of doppelgänger Hess became the long fuse for the end of the Cold War and made the Russians a little happier about their lot. It also maintained their ignorance.

The 'Progrom' was to maintain the Berlin Wall until 30/31 December 1999, once Helen Clark and her minder Vladimir Putin had got into power. Helen Clark is the KGB operative 'IE', pronounced 'E'. "She trained in St Petersburg"[17] from 1968 and worked with Vladimir Putin from 1978–91 in an attempt to launch a nuclear strike on American property (Canberra, Adelaide, Sydney, Taupo) from a Russian nuclear-armed submarine in the deep New Zealand waters. This was known as the "Trawler Wars".

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

Vladimir Putin lived in Wellington for two years as a Fisheries Inspector (between 1980–82) and returned for the sinking of the Lermontov (16 February 1986). At least some of Putin and Clark's clandestine meetings were held on Wellington's Wharf No. 3 in the early hours of the morning and these were recorded. These records were then read and discussed on a political level, but did not reach the public domain due to ideological similarities.

Through Fred Winterbotham (Air Force Intelligence) the British knew the SS were running doppelgängers. The British knew the second pilot was not the real Rudolf Hess and they knew the real Hess had been tortured to death. To avoid retaliation and looking like 'peace saboteurs' the British sustained the mystery of the real Rudolf Hess for 46 years after his death. Both Britain and Germany and the British and German Freemasons have kept up the pretence that doppelgänger Hess was the real Rudolf Hess to this day.

If the British thought the captured doppelgänger Hess was the real Hess he would have been executed at the Nuremberg trials in 1946. Because various levels of the British and German command were uncertain, or knew otherwise, he was kept alive to live out most of his days.

Rudolf Hess's guards at Spandau Prison all knew that he was a fake Hess, a doppelgänger, because he (Alfred Horn) had spent time in Cambrai in 1917 when the real Hess was in Romania from 1916–18. The real Hess had been nearby in Ypres and Artois in 1915, but in Romania from 1916 where he was shot and then trained as a pilot from March to November 1918.

Secret Service: "All of the Air Force personnel who guarded Hess were swished out to New Zealand on a boat and they didn't know why they had been moved here until I interviewed them. The last Nazi in New Zealand was a wheelchair-ridden invalid nursed to death in 1973. The spy Garbo was also smuggled out to New Zealand."

The truth of the matter is that the British military had trained both Hitler and Stalin. They had both been gifted their countries with ample MI-6 support and the British wanted to watch Russia and Germany fight it out to the bitter end. It gave the British and their secret societies a sense of command to watch two nations battle to the death. By destroying Russia and Germany completely, it made England comparatively stronger.

The British wanted the secrets the Nazis had plundered from the French Freemasons, the direct descendants of the Knights Templar who had invaded King Solomon's tomb in 1127AD. Raiding King Solomon's tomb brought untold riches, wealth, knowledge and style to France. This was followed by envious wars from other countries and retaliatory invasions from the Catholic Church.

The British royalty and Freemasons had this to say to Germany and Russia: "As you depose our royal cousins from the monarchies of your countries, we will introduce new leaders (whom we control) and turn them against you, turning your country into a 'Howling Wilderness'."

The British monarchy's removal of the European monarchies was full of cover ups and arranged events shrouded in the mystery of new ideologies. The deaths of the Czar's family were faked. They didn't die at Yekaterinburg in Russia in 1918 as was popularly believed, but were removed from power and swished out to Southern Ireland (Eire from 1922) by Lieutenant Colonel Meintzerhagen.

[17] The author announced this on televisions on 29 November 2005, replayed on 8 February 2006. There have been no law suits, and worse still, no contact from any media. This includes the Head of Television who has a copy of the first edition.

Germany's Kaiser wasn't killed either, but removed to Harlem in Holland a week after WWI ended. The British royal family was related to both of these families. They were prepared to depose them, but they were hardly going to have them killed. The ties between Britain and Russia, and Britain and Germany, were so strong at the time that the Russians were referred to as 'uncles' and the Germans as 'cousins'.

Germany and the Soviet Union signed the Molotov-Ribbentrop Non-Aggression Pact on 23 August 1939 (with British approval) but secretly planned to divide up Eastern Europe between them. As soon as the Russo-German Non-Aggression Pact was signed, Germany knew it was going to war with Russia. As Germany overran Poland, Russia overran Finland and the Baltic States. Both countries were expanding under British instruction in order to create an excuse for World War II. Both Stalin and Hitler were British agents and shared Poland by splitting it down the middle.

With the peace plan with Britain thwarted, Hitler broke the Non-Aggression Pact with Russia and invaded the Soviet Union at Lithuania, Belarus and the Ukraine on 22 June 1941. This placed St Petersburg under a siege for a famous 900 days, to February 1944. A bitter four-year Russian-German war was created that Britain sat back and watched. The Russo-German war lasted from the German invasion of Russia, to the Russian invasion of Berlin in April 1945. As a result, more Russian blood was spilt in WWII than by any other nation and both Britain and America fought against a weakened German side[18] . . . and when the Cold War began they fought against a weakened Russian side.

Literally, as kindergarten children playing war on maps with tin soldiers and toy tanks, in libraries containing the great histories of 'propaganda and paedophilic heroism', the British watched as Germany, having been given France, went to war with Russia.

Both Stalin and Hitler had similar backgrounds, were British Psych-Ops trained, and trained using the same methods. Stalin's training in Britain began in 1907 and Hitler's training in Britain began in 1912. Both were used as Britain's retaliators.

[18] The Wind, June 2003; 26 million Russians died in WWII.

Prior to WWI, London, St. Petersburg and Berlin were opulent cities of equal wealth. After WWI, WWII and the Cold War, London was by far the wealthier city. The battle between these countries continues in the realm of WAR-IN-PEACETIME. It is now fought around the distribution of drugs and the induction of feminism into each other's societies.

Feminism was invented in Russia as a method of war, and during the Cold War feminists in Russia were deported to the West. Feminists break down the family, reduce breeding and create infighting.

War-in-peacetime is the war of family attrition. Vladimir Putin's agent Helen Clark is a feminist and lesbian. She became Prime Minister only after another female PM lost to her, so there was no choice. Clark has taken the feminist motto, "If it works, break it" to the nth degree and in just six years of her communist/fascist leadership, NZ has become a country without an identity where the citizens fear and distrust the police and paedophiles have been elevated to the highest office.

Like Marilyn Monroe and Jackie Bouvier-Kennedy-Onassis, Hitler and Stalin were each other's admirers and competitors, and all four were after the same thing – enough attention to compensate their earlier years of an absent father.

Hitler came to understand what WWII was about and made three attempts at "Peace for Our Time", sending his top men to get the message across. Most of the upper echelons of the SS had several doppelgängers, as did the Reichsführer and pilot Rudolf Hess. Hess was invited by the British to rendezvous and discuss peace on 11 May 1941. The German attempt to shoot real Hess down came via double agents in the German High Command, namely Goering, who was acting on British orders.

The previous Reichsführer, the gay Captain Roehm, was also murdered. He was a British agent and Hitler's Psych-Ops minder but he was still killed on Hitler's orders during the Night of the Long Knives (30 June 1934).

The German-instigated peace negotiations of September 1940 and May 1941 were sabotaged by both sides under British Freemasonry orders. The Freemasons were out for war. They had created enough of them and lived and died by their motto 'ORDER OUT OF CHAOS'.

This historical event, the Hitler/Hess-instigated peace talks, is fraught with cover-ups on a scale only found in war. The cover-ups included the Luftwaffe air raid resulting in the misconstrued dates for the London blitz, (10 May, 11 May or 21 June 1941), fake Hess plane sightings, the use of doppelgängers, doppelgänger Hess being named the real Hess, doppelgänger Hess being altered to believe he was the real Hess, the deaths of British and German players, and history rewriting interference, employing the best writers, in which two-thirds of all history books ensure 95% of the information is false – after which there has been six decades of complicit silence.

The two Hesses flying to Britain was a cover-up to make Britain look good while sabotaging peace, encouraging their German cousins' war expansion into Russia, thus weakening both Russia and Germany while saving Britain and extending the war.

World War II was an English and German Freemasonry stitch-up against the French and Russians. Britain and America won the war by extending it and ensuring that it took place (predominantly) on others' soil. The British monarchy barely got touched and America suffered little damage at home.

In all its forms, peace had everything to fear in the face of a profitable war and the transfer of power to the West. America was out of the war but selling arms to both sides. It had also remained out of WWI until it was drawn in by the organised sinking of the American passenger ship, the Lusitania. This pissed the Americans off no end, but it was the Zimmerman telegram that brought them into war.[19]

British Intelligence Officer: "During the First World War, the British were at desperation point. By 1915, they had virtually sold all their invisibles[20] in America and the Amis now wanted cash up front. The British were absolutely bled white and they came up with the idea of sinking the Lusitania to bring America into the war.

"War has a history of inciting its allies into battle by bombing them and blaming the enemy. The ship was loaded with American passengers, arms and munitions, and the hull was lined with gun cotton in the size and shape of bricks. The Lusitania had an auxiliary status as a fleet reserve, so she was a naval ship and the Germans were quite within their rights to sink her as it was carrying war cargo.

"Churchill knew the gun cotton was stacked around the hull below the water-line and that a glancing blow from a torpedo would blow the gun cotton and then the whole ship. When Nobel was discovering dynamite in the 19th century, gun cotton was one of the variations – an explosive and charge in one.

"The Lusitania went on several voyages with this gun cotton stacked up around the hull, and as First Lord of the Admiralty, Churchill was consulted as to its removal. 'Do the British remove it each time, or do they remove it in England or America?' The British were paranoid about it. The potential of the gun cotton lining the hull split British loyalties between America as a trading partner versus bringing America into the war.

"Churchill didn't want the Lusitania to sink on the way to America as it would have British cargo and passengers on board and wouldn't bring about the required retaliation. He wanted it to sink on the return journey from America while loaded with Americans, in order to swing tax-free America into war.

"In the Port of New York, the Chief of German Naval Espionage, Von Rintelen (who called himself 'The Dark Invader') boarded the Lusitania to see if she was indeed carrying war cargo. It was very important that the facts be verified before she was sunk. Von Rintelen passed the information back to Germany in code that the ship was indeed carrying gun cotton, ammunition and explosives. The Lusitania left New York from Qunard's Pier on 1 May 1915 and sailed towards Liverpool.

"In a naval cipher the Germans could understand, Britain broadcast instructions to the Navy in Queenstown in Ireland to withdraw their escort cruiser in the Irish Sea, while at the same time telling the Germans what course the cruiser was taking.

"Eyewitnesses talk about a huge explosion. The German torpedo hit the ship and ripped the bottom out of it. The Lusitania was a very fast ship and she was travelling at 15 to 18 knots. As soon as the torpedo hit, the gun cotton blew out the bottom of the ship and she ploughed under. It would normally take 1–2 hours for a ship like this to sink, but because gun cotton lined the hull, she sank in 18 minutes. That's why the death toll was so high. If it had just been ordinary cargo she may have remained afloat and even been towed to an Irish Port.

"This act of enemy-informed Allied sabotage was designed to bring the Americans into the war, which it did for the most part. Six days after the Lusitania sailed with 1,959 passengers (including 123 Americans), she was sunk by a German submarine (U-boat) in the Atlantic. It was 7 May 1915."

[19] The Zimmerman telegram was manufactured by the British to infuriate the Americans into WWI.

[20] 'Invisibles' are income generating shareholdings, shares, loans, insurance payments, payments for services, bonds, IOUs, interest and any non-finite goods.

Secret Service: "When divers started diving on the Lusitania, British Intelligence got really jumpy. They decided around 1998 to blow the rest of the ship up, to hide the fact that there was Naval gun cotton lining the hull of the ship and that nearly 1200 had died in an informed enemy attack on an allied ship, in order to bring America into the war. The sinking of the Lusitania was enemy informed Allied sabotage (EIAS)."

"The anti-German feeling that this event generated in the US was a factor in bringing that country into the First World War."[21]

The British then used the same tactic against the Zamzam in WWII, which was carrying a lot of American passengers. In April 1941 it was intercepted by the Atlantis, a well-informed German commerce raider. Commerce raiders often carried English-speaking Intelligence Officers to tune into Allied radio channels which forecast the locations of the ships hunting for them. These Intelligence Officers were often ex-merchant officers who had dealt with English passengers before. The Germans knew about the Lusitania, caught on to what was happening, secured the passengers of the Zamzam and then scuttled her.

Then in 1941 the British bombed the Dutch submarine that had prior knowledge of the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. Ironically, the attack on Pearl Harbor was based on the British Bywater Plan that the British had given the Japanese over a drinking session some 16 years earlier. Pearl Harbor worked and America joined WWII. Rather than supply both sides with arms and munitions, America joined WWII in earnest with full navy, army and air force involvement.

As more profits were made by the munitions factories, and more fathers died, orphaned children were becoming more and more common and available. Paedophilia and the military would be in bed forever.

As it turned out, there was no need for Hitler to send his best deputies and most convincing doppelgängers to negotiate for 'world peace'. It all turned out okay for Hitler. What he hadn't counted on was that once an agent of war you are always protected by those who profit from it most. "Blessed are the war-makers."

The most serious threat to Hitler's power had been the Stennes Rebellion. After 1945, Walther Stennes said: "Hitler might be dead (he was not even sure of that at the time) but it seemed that his spirit was very much alive . . . his next and highly characteristic step was to investigate the truth of the various stories of Hitler's death . . . He soon succeeded in tracking down an old friend who had served in Hitler's personal bodyguard and this veteran assured him that, although the direct evidence of his death was inconclusive, his physical and mental state when Berlin fell had been so bad as to make it certain that he could not have survived."[22] This was essentially a fob-off to a friend, saying, 'If he ain't dead, he soon will be, and don't bother looking'.

Jimmy Byrnes: "While in Potsdam at the Conference of the Big Four [7 July–2 August 1945], Stalin left his chair, came over and clinked his liquor glass with mine in a very friendly manner. I said to him: 'Marshal Stalin, what is your theory about the death of Hitler?'

"Stalin replied: 'He is not dead. He escaped either to Spain or Argentina.'"[23]

In August 1945, Stalin personally accused the British of "concealing the real Adolf Hitler". "A new feature in this belief was where Hitler was supposed to be hiding. In the summer of 1945 I had been told Hitler was in Spain or South America."[24]

Secret Service referring to the conversations with the IRA undercover 'Cuchullain': "Similarly the British also hid the fascist sympathiser King Edward VIII and Wallis Simpson in Portugal five years earlier in July 1940. Spain and Portugal have for centuries been in the hands of the British Secret Service and their compliance is guaranteed. Portugal is still referred to by the British as 'our oldest allies'."

There is another theory that Hitler died in the mid-1970s but this involved another doppelgänger. It was the same scam the British used with Martin Bormann allowing a reclusive doppelgänger to appear after Bormann's death. The illusion was always to be the denial of truth, with no timescale disregarded, and no expense spared.

As early as September 1944 orders were issued concerning the storage of papers belonging to Special Operations 1 which was linked with Ian Fleming's Naval Intelligence. The four rules, 'A', 'B', 'C' and 'D', lay down specific guidelines pertaining to the destruction of files belonging to SO1. Only category 'A' states anything to do with the files surviving. This resulted in most of the evidence being destroyed. No files containing sensitive material would reach the Public Record Office. As a result, there is little or no chance of any correspondence between key players surviving.

Crashing the Duke of Kent

Flying Boat's Holy Ghost

King George VI installed his younger brother, the Duke of Kent as Grand Master Mason in 1939 and he became the Hereditary Grand Master of Anglo-American Freemasonry. The fourth son of King George V[1] married Marina, the Princess of Greece and Denmark (1906–68) and they had two sons.

The Duke of Kent was addicted to cocaine, morphine and sex, both with men and women. He didn't care which. He had a long string of affairs before marriage and continued these during his marriage making his wife one of the most cuckold women in history, next to the Queen.

His better known female partners included Ethel Margaret Whigham who became the Duchess of Argyll, Indira Raje, the Maharani of Cooch Behar, banking heiress Poppy Baring, musical star Jessie Mathews, black cabaret singer Florence Mills, and American socialite and drug addict Kiki Preston (née Alice Gwynne) with whom he had an illegitimate child. Parenthood didn't slow them down and they had a ménage à trois with the bisexual Jorge Ferrara, son of an Argentine ambassador.

The Duke of Kent also had affairs with his distant cousin, Louis Ferdinand, Prince of Prussia, his half-bother Anthony Blunt (making him an incestuous homosexual) and actor Noel Coward for 19 years, explaining why so many of Coward's plays were inflicted upon us. (Whoever gets to root the most royals for the longest gets the patronage). The Duke of Kent wrote love letters to Noel Coward and these were stolen from Coward's house in 1942. He also wrote love letters to a male prostitute who responded by blackmailing him.

The Duke of Kent's eldest son, Prince Edward, was the son of a cocaine and morphine addict and was born with a face like sin in a silly mirror. Lacking the required looks for royal acceptance, the family moved from London to Buckinghamshire in 1936 to keep all male members out of the public eye.

[1] The fifth son of King George V, Prince John (1905–19) was retarded and largely ignored. All were the half-brothers of the treasonous spy Anthony Blunt.

The Murder of Lord Erroll

Josslyn Victor Hay was the 22nd Lord Errol. He was the son of the British High Commissioner in the Rhineland, had a photographic memory, was an excellent public speaker and was part of the Clivedon set.

Lord Erroll came to see both sides of the war – the British side, the German side . . . and the bankers side. He understood Hitler's fascism to be a front for the communism that was to come and he had enough connections to understand the occult links between Churchill and Hitler. Erroll was aware of how the Crown bankers had used Hitler to create a war of profit and social change to their liking and he said as much within earshot of MI-5.

> Little did Lord Erroll know, > the privately owned Crown bankers, the Rothschilds, > had also grown and developed Hitler.

MI-5's primary role was protecting the national status quo and any insightful revelation was an unwanted revelation. Churchill was advised and Errol had to go.

Churchill discussed this with the Duke of Hamilton and they colluded to murder the 22nd Lord Errol, Josslyn Victor Hay. On 7 September 1940, the 14th Duke of Hamilton met with others to discuss the murder. Five days later the contract was handed over to the Special Operations Executive from where it went to Cairo under the name Operation HIGHLAND CLEARANCE.

Lady Diana Broughton had a penchant for forcing men to perform cunnilingus on her at gunpoint and she literally came with a bang. Sir Henry and Lady Broughton were two MI-5 assets. In November 1940 they travelled to Happy Valley, north of Nairobi, in Kenya and involved Lord Erroll in a love-triangle.

The following month, in December 1940, an SOE couple entered Kenya and late on the night of 23 January 1941, Lord Erroll dropped Lady Broughton off at her home and then drove past the SOE couple who were pretending to have engine trouble by the side of the road. Lord Erroll gave the female a ride back towards town. With two radio-controlled MI-5 teams following, she pointed the gun at Erroll who stopped the car. She had him kneel in the passenger foot-well of his car. It was close to midnight on 23 January 1941 and she shot him in the back of the head execution style.

Lord Erroll was wearing his army uniform at the time and up to the point of death, the whole experience was not dissimilar to the way Lady Brougthon had treated him.

Diana's husband, Sir Henry 'Jock' Broughton was charged with the murder. MI-6 usually fit people up, but because 'both were MI-5 assets and party to the intelligence hit, and Jock had been knighted, the trial was a distraction so that any real evidence by the real killers was never followed up. Jock was found 'not guilty'.

Even before this information came out, it was widely accepted in intelligence circles that Lord Erroll's murder was an intelligence hit on the orders of Winston Churchill – one of many for Winston. In this case he used the 14th Duke of Hamilton to come up with the plan and have it executed.

The Duke of Hamilton was a homosexual occultist. He was having an affair with Albrecht Haushofer, the son of Rudolf Hess' mentor, Karl Haushofer, who had originated the concept of lebensraum. This gave Churchill leverage over Hamilton who was a higher-ranking Freemason than Winston.[2]

Such cause célèbre (big fuck ups) were common and this one was illustrated in the movie White Mischief in 1987. The movie makers brought it to our attention, but they still muffed it.

Flying Boats

Most large cities were on the coast or rivers and in the late 1930s runways didn't exist. Airfields were short, often rough, and before retractable wheels, planes were no faster than flying boats. Nevertheless, Sunderland flying boats were not the best of planes. They were much loved but underpowered, slow to take off, had limited range, were sabotaged by their manufacturers and their service crews, and were involved in every political machination of blind patriotism, royal anarchy and overt sabotage. As a result Sunderlands were in a constant state of ever-changing non-development.

Sunderlands appeared to be capable and threatening, had plenty of small .303 weaponry and were known as "Flying Porcupines".

[2] Kevin Abrams & Scott Lively, The Pink Swastika. See the chapter 'Homo-Occultism'. The remainder of this 'White Mischief' section was updated using the 30 April 2006 article posted by Henry Makow PhD, "The 'Ugly' Cause Of World War Two, The Murder Of Lord Erroll".

However they were large and slow, fuel and explosives were stored together, they were prone to self-sabotage, sabotage, forward radar detection and attack.

Sunderlands were “Flying Turtles”. They were much loved flying death traps and those who survived even reconnaissance missions were lucky to survive reconnaissance missions.

Arthur Gouge, Sunderlands and Saunders-Roe

Oswald Short and Francis Webber designed the first metal-hulled flying boat, the diminutive Cockle which first flew on 18 September 1924. Arthur Gouge then succeeded Webber as chief designer and designed the Singapore I from which the Sunderland emerged. The Seaplane Works at Rochester built 27 flying boats of eight different designs from the launch of the Singapore I flying boat on 17 August 1926 (a bi-plane flying boat) to the first Sunderland/Empire/C Class flying boat in 1936.

In 1934 the British postmaster general declared that all first-class Royal Mail should go by air.[3] This effectively subsidised air travel and led to a contract for long-range flying boats which went almost immediately to the Short Brothers of Rochester, England. It was an inside job, but their only competition was the Supermarine and they were busy with the Spitfire.

The head of the design team, with a huge influence over research and development, was Arthur Gouge (later Sir Arthur Gouge) and he ensured that underpowered and overtaxed British engines were used for as long as possible. This led to slow and expensive travel, a high turnover of engines, many unnecessary crashes, many failed rescues and many failed escapes.

Saunders-Roe Ltd believed flying boats were going to be the next big thing after the war so they took over Shorts in 1943 in what was as close as you could get to a company takeover during wartime. At the same time Oswald Short resigned as Chairman of Shorts to become Honorary Life President and Arthur Gouge become Vice-Chairman of Saunders-Roe Ltd. This meant that Arthur Gouge had taken over from Oswald Short and was now in charge of design and construction.

The first thing Saunders-Roe did was sell Americans the idea that German flying boats were aiding German communication and escapes. The Americans then shot down German flying boats and this eliminated much of Saunders-Roe’s post-war competition. The only competition left was American and mainly the Spruce Goose.

As Vice-Chairman of Saunders-Roe, Arthur Gouge’s main responsibility was to direct the design and construction of the Shetland R 14/40 flying boat. It was assembled in October 1944 at the Short’s factory at Rochester and weighed 56,700 kg, three times the size of an early Sunderland.

The Brabazon committee met in 1944 to establish the shape of British post-war commercial aircraft and were considering flying boats for the South Atlantic and Pacific routes. Saunders-Roe had detailed proposals for large flying boats up to 150,000 kg, three times the size of the Shetland and nine times the size of the Sunderland. The huge passenger aircraft was designed to steal all passenger travel around the world. The Saunders-Roe SR 45 Princess was launched on 29 August 1952. The second Princess never received any engines. It was launched on water on 13 February 1953 and towed straight to storage. The third Princess never received engines and all were scrapped by 1967.

The Princess (top) and the Spruce Goose flying into oblivion.

The Princess, which turned out to be a flying pig, was smaller than Howard Hughes' Spruce Goose flying boat. The US Government was on Hughes back and denied him the use of aluminium so he built his 180,000 kg plane out of birch wood and flew it a short distance on 2 November 1947. Other than that, it too went into storage, as did much of flying boat history.

Howard Hughes

Howard Hughes had made himself as rich as God during WWII and had multiple world air-speed records. He was a truth talker and had no feelings for anyone else in the American Aviation Industry. Hughes became too much of a problem for the American Military Industrial Complex and the Mafia, so they had the Mafia kidnap him in the late 1950s during post-war manoeuvring. The Mafia then gave Hughes to the Mormon Mafia who guarded him on contract, blacked out the windows of any penthouse he was living in and turned him into a heroin junkie.

Officially "Hughes only had his hair cut and nails trimmed once a year, was addicted to codeine and valium, was surrounded by Mormons because he trusted them, had contracted syphilis as a young man and had obsessive-compulsive disorder." In November 1966 Hughes moved Las Vegas and within two years he bought the Desert Inn and lived on the ninth floor. He then bought Castaways, New Frontier, The Landmark Hotel and Casino, Sands and the Silver Slipper. All of these hotels were purchased off the Mafia, essentially for the Mormon Mafia. This suited the FBI down to the ground as it severed Mafia ties to Las Vegas. The Mormon Mafia committee mainly consisted of Latter-day Saints.

> The FBI, via Hughes and the Mormon Mafia, were buying up Las Vegas.

Howard Hughes' kidnap was covered by a marriage to Jean Peters on 12 January 1957, although the whole relationship was carried out by phone. He spent the last twenty years of his life as a prisoner and was then killed on "5 April 1976".

In 1970 the Mormon Mafia sold Clifford Irving a copy of the computer-generated biography of Howard Hughes before it was published. Clifford published it as the co-author and made a fortune out of Autobiography of Howard Hughes. The biography was denied by Howard Hughes on television on 9 January 1972. Hughes denied it by telephone conference by talking to seven journalists he'd known prior to his kidnapping. Hughes did not appear on the TV. Irving claimed "the voice was probably fake". The Mormon that sold Irving the computer-generated manuscript was hunted down and killed and Irving had to go to prison for 17 months (from 16 June 1972) which really pissed him off.

Autobiography of Howard Hughes appeared on the net in 1999 and it is the most truthful account of Howard Hughes' life. Lies and cover ups are not limited to any media or any time frame and filming for The Hoax began in July 2005. The Hoax is based on Clifford Irving writing Autobiography of Howard Hughes as a hoax. It wasn't. Meryl Streep's daughter Jane Gray stars in the movie. That should give The Hoax all the kudos it doesn't deserve.

When Hughes died in 1976 he only weighed 41 kg (90 pounds). He was such a changed man that the FBI had to resort to fingerprint identification. His real death occurred much later in the 1980s. I spoke with someone who was contracted to kill him, but he was removed from the job due to benevolence on a previous contract.

Sunderlands/C Class/Empire Flying Boats

Sunderlands were collectively known as 'Empire flying boats' from a Short Brothers self-promotional letter dated 25 May 1935, a year before the first was launched. Use of the word "Empire" helped to sell them as a luxury and justify the expense of the flights. Sunderlands were way behind the Boeing Clippers and Sikorsky transatlantic flights and this was a huge embarrassment to the puffed-up British. American Clippers were flying from San Francisco to Hawaii in 1939 whereas the Sunderlands needed refuelling every 800–965 km. The British compensated for this by loving their flying boats, all 42 of them.

"All the 42 Empire 'boats were built in the main assembly shop – No. 3 Shop – of the Seaplane Works at Rochester, beside the River Medway in Kent. The first s.23, Construction number S. 795 G-ADHL CANOPUS, went down the famous, and still existing, slipway outside the Shop in July 1936 and the last S.1026 G-AFRA CLEOPATRA, in May 1940 . . . 12,000 drawings were needed to construct the first Short Empire flying boat. It seems that all the originals were later destroyed . . . All the original tracing masters and stress calculations have been destroyed. The fact that nearly every single print has completely disappeared is difficult to believe but seems to be true . . . none of the aircraft themselves have survived."[4]

[4] Brian Cassidy, Flying Empires, Short 'C' class Empire flying boats, Queen's Parade Press, 2004.

The first Sunderland model, the s.23 flew on 4 July 1936 and was named CANOPUS. It weighed 16,846 kg and took 17 seconds to leave the water. They were commonly known as Empire flying boats. Imperial Airways Limited (IAL) that flew them called them the 'C class'. The names were always in full capitals and all began with the letter 'C'. They were also prefixed with who they were flying for, like RMA (Royal Mail Service, 1936–40), TEAL for New Zealand, and QEA for Qantas.[5]

As with the development of all war planes, the pressing into military service of civilian planes, the names of the planes and even the drawings of those planes were an area of confusion, sabotage and self-sabotage. The CANOPUS was the name of the first Sunderland, but it was also the common generic name of the shorter flying boats made before the Sunderland, both of which were made by a company called "Short". Hence a short Short Sunderland was a Canopus and the first Sunderland was a long CANOPUS made by Short.

In order the Sunderlands were named CANOPUS, CALEDONIA, CENTAURUS,CAVALIER,CAMBRIA,CASTOR,CASSIOPEIA,CAPELLA, CYGNUS, CAPRICORNUS, CORSAIR, COURTIER, CHALLENGER, CENTURION, CORIOLANUS, CALPURNIA, CERES, CLIO, CIRCE, CALPYSO, CAMILLA, CORINNA, CORDELIA, CAMERONIAN, CORINTHIAN, CHEVIOT/COOGEE/VH-ABC, CORIO, COORONG, CARPENTARIA/G-AFBJ, COOLANGATTA, COOEE/G-AFBL, CHAMPION, CABOT, CARIBOU, CONNEMARA, CLYDE, CAPTAIN COOK /AO-TEA-ROA/AWARUA, CANTERBURY/AUSTRALIA/CLARE, CUMBERLAND/AWARUA/AOTEAROA, CATHAY, CLIFTON, CLEOPATRA and another never named, but referred to as G-AFRB.

The last three planes (CLIFTON, CLEOPATRA and G-AFRB) were ordered on 7 June 1939 by which time at least 7 Sunderlands had crashed.

This last Sunderland was registered on 27 January 1939, the hull was stored on 12 April 1940 and it was scrapped in 1943. It was never flown.

[5] Names beginning with 'C' was repeated by TEAL and BOAC when the Boeing 377 Stratocruisers were delivered in 1949 and they even used the same names: Caledonia, Caribou, Cambria, Canopus, Cabot, Castor, Cathay, Champion, Cleopatra, Coriolanus, Cordelia, Cameronian, Champion, Clio and Clyde. This was repeated again in 1963 when the US named their de Havilland Comet 4C XS 235, Canopus. This helped to maintain confusion over the names of pre-WWII planes, WWII planes, post-WWII planes, British planes, American Planes and Australian planes. When it comes to planes, confusion is the name of the game before, during and after war and identifies long-term allies.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -

With a shortage of aeroplanes during WWII this was pure sabotage, but there was purpose to this sabotage. Almost all salvaged parts were attributed to this last stored unflown plane.

Name Changes

Eight flying boats had their original names changed. Three of these were delivered to New Zealand and another three to Australia. The other two name changes are not listed.

Sunderland produced three boats (Construction No.s S.884, S.885 and S.886) and named them CAPTAIN COOK, CANTERBURY and CUMBERLAND. All of these names were changed and they were changed in the most confusing fashion. New Zealand and Australian flying boats had a second use covering for anything and everything Britain wanted covered up. Flying boats were also paid for by New Zealand, were not delivered, and were retained, flown and destroyed by the British.

S.884 CAPTAIN COOK was registered as G-AFCY CAPTAIN COOK and delivered on 21 April 1939. Strangely its much celebrated entrance onto Auckland's Waitemate Harbour was four months later on 28 August 1939, just 12 days before WWII officially started. It had flown 20,000 km from Southampton and done the Horseshoe route, but this would only take four days. CAPTAIN COOK was sold to New Zealand as AO-TEA-ROA with the New Zealand registration ZK-AMC, but the New Zealand government protested over the hyphenated name and it was renamed AWARUA. It was broken up in Auckland after 1953.

S.885 CANTERBURY became G-AFCZ AUSTRALIA, but never reached Australia or New Zealand who had paid for it. It was 'delivered' on 24 April 1939, retained by IAL and BOAC, ran aground at Basra on 10 August 1939 after 4 months service and was renamed CLARE. CANTERBURY/AUSTRALIA/CLARE was destroyed by fire on 14/15 September 1942 off Bathurst, West Africa.

S.886 CUMBERLAND was launched as G-AFDA AWARUA and delivered on 25 May 1939, arriving four months later. It had the New Zealand registration ZK-AMC (the same registration as S.884). It was then renamed AOTEAROA (the same name, but without the hyphenation) and re-registered as ZK-AMA (a new registration). "This became the first of the TEAL flying boats" and "was broken up in Auckland after October 1947".

CAPTAIN COOK changed its name to AO-TEA-ROA and then AWARUA.

CANTERBURY changed its name to AUSTRALIA then CLARE.

CUMBERLAND changed its name to AWARUA and then AOTEAROA.

Both CAPTAIN COOK and CUMBERLAND had the same New Zealand registration, ZK-AMC and both were called AOTEAROA and AWARUA, but in a different order.

ZK-AMC AWARUA and ZK-AMA AOTEAROA criss-crossed the Tasman countless of times and were used countless of times to search for enemy vessels. Both were fitted with bright Leigh searchlights.

CANTERBURY/G-AFCZ AUSTRALIA/CLARE never made one flight over the Tasman Sea and never landed in New Zealand waters. Britain owes New Zealand £36,200 for this Sunderland they never delivered – NZ$ 2.5 million in todays money. I'll take a 5% finders fee.

Strange Goings On in Australia

The CARPENTARIA was delivered to Australia on 3 December 1937. It was broken up in Hythe in January 1947.

The COOEE was delivered to Australia on 30 March 1938 and was broken up in Hythe in February 1947.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

The COOGEE was officially delivered on 3 January 1938 and was named CHEVIOT by the British, with construction number S849. It officially crashed in Townsville on 1 March 1942 after 4 years service. In reality (not the faked record books and press releases), it was delivered to Australia in February 1942 (4 years after it was officially delivered) and underwent a 50 hour inspection.

COOGEE was parked on the water outside the Queens Hotel in Cleveland Bay, Townsville and the Australian pilots were about to take it on its maiden test flight, late on the Friday summer afternoon.

The British were there and they wanted the plane back after having not delivered it for four years, so the British did a Scottish marriage number on the Aussies.

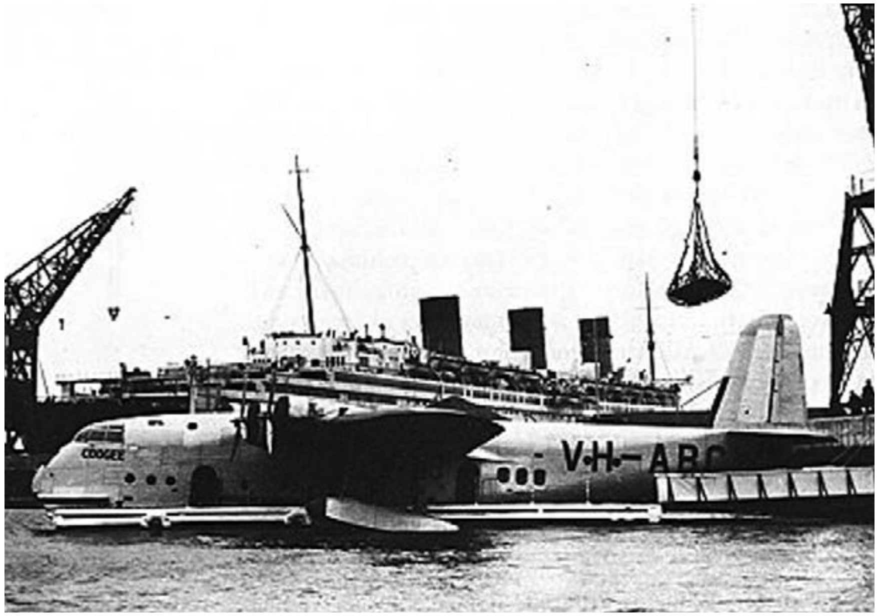
A Scottish marriage is when the bride's father gets the groom-to-be drunk before the wedding and marries him to the wrong daughter. The son-in-law then elopes with his intended bride and the married daughter keeps his land and titles, with the Scottish father effectively in control.

Drinking before a flight during wartime warrants a court marshal. Townsville is tropical and February is peak summer, so the British invited the pilots and crew for a celebratory drink on the Friday afternoon. The COOGEE Sunderland crashed during takeoff at 6.02 pm on Friday 27 February 1942 and of the 11 pilot-and-crew, six of the crew were officially written off as "missing believed killed".

The crewmembers were picked up, advised of the impending court marshal, and hidden under canvas. Half of the crew (those that were not injured) were given fake funerals and commissioned to work Sunderlands for secret wartime missions. In return the injured crew were not charged (the pilot was seriously injured) and their places of burial are given, but the dates are not.

COOGEE was only partially submerged. The British salvaged it from the water and returned it to Britain. It was repaired and returned to British service under an unlisted name, probably with the same name as another plane.

The COORONG was delivered on 26 February 1938 and stranded at Darwin 10 months later on 12 December 1938. It was rebuilt at Rochester (UK) and reverted to British registry in 1939 as G-AEUI. It was broken up on 10 February 1947.



The COOGEE VH-ABC being loaded.

The COORONG is not present in Brian Cassidy's Flying Empire list of crashed or stranded Sunderlands. The book published by the Queen's Parade Press, lists downed Sunderlands. This included planes holed while taxing to shore, but does not include planes stranded during take off.

After the repair, the COORONG was effectively unnamed (except as G-AEUI) and became involved in special work under British tenure. A plane with letters not read as a name was all the more difficult to follow.

The CORIOLANUS was 'delivered' on 17 June 1937, although it officially reached Australia in 1942. It was broken up in Sydney at the end of 1947.

The CAMILLA was 'delivered' on 13 September 1937 and crashed 5 miles west of at Port Moresby on 22 April 1943, although it officially reached Australia in 1942.

The CLIFTON was 'delivered' on 17 March 1940 and crashed in Sydney on 18 November 1944, although it officially reached Australia in 1942.

The CORIOLANUS, CAMILLA and CLIFTON had three to five years of British service before they officially reached Australia in 1942. When they officially reached Australia in 1942, the CARPENTARIA and the COOEE were re-registered in Britain as G-AFBJ and G-AFBL. Before and after 1942, the CARPENTARIA and COOEE appeared on both British and Australian registries.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March

COORONG changed its name to G-AEUI.

CARPENTARIA changed its name to G-AFBJ.

COOEE changed its name to G-AFBL.

These Sunderlands were not given any further names and were moved to British registry for use in special work. Due to Short's self-sabotage, this was no work at all followed by crashes in place of more memorably named planes.

Changing plane names to a previous plane's name, registering planes with the same number, registering planes with the same name but not hyphenated, registering planes with the same name but in a different order, changing plane names after repairs, changing plane names to letters only, changing plane registries, having planes registered in two countries, exchanging planes between countries and naming a plane after a country for another country again and then retaining it under British command, official delivery years after actual delivery, using salvaged parts and attributing them fixed to an unflown plane . . . all helped to confuse the Sunderland registry. This was common practise amongst the British both before, during and after WWII and the British continued this with the Messerschmitt manufacturing records when they took over Germany and Austria in April 1945.

Short Self-Sabotage

Shorts also modified Sunderlands to client requirements and gave them ordered names like Mark I, II, III, IV when little of that order existed. The second flying boat off the Short Shop line, CALEDONIA, is cited as both a Mark I and Mark III.

Constantly "upgrading planes" in non–effective ways, and disregarding all beneficial requests for effective upgrades (often at the last minute) meant that it was diabolically difficult to follow the progress of the Sunderland – if indeed there was any. Even the Australians request for 20 mm cannons was sabotaged at the last minute.

It appears that any 'effective progress' made by Shorts on the Sunderland was immediately withdrawn. Any progress on the Sunderland, or any progress by Shorts was either stopped, sabotaged, or shipped to Germany for Germany to have as 'their invention', to be used to 'their advantage' during WWII.

Short, Saunders-Roe, the Sunderland and the Mistral were heavily sabotaged against the British for the benefit of the Germans and the British royal family. The Mistral, for instance, was invented by Shorts and then shipped to Rechlin, a small remote village in Mecklenburg-Vorpommern, Germany, from where many of the British royal family originated, including Princess Luise, Prince Albert's mother.

Sunderland Crashes

The Sunderland flying boats were an icon. Every country wanted one as it pegged them in the 'modern' age just as sky towers and EFTPOS did in the 80s. Sunderlands were a symbol of pride and they were bought by countries. Shorts made a lot of money out of their sabotaged Sunderlands and when they crashed, countries simply bought another one . . . at £37,000 . . . and these crashes were frequent, sometimes occurring within days of service.

1. CAPRICORNUS crashed at Ouroux in France on 24 March 1937 after 8 days service.
2. COURTIER crashed in Athens on 1 October 1937 after 5 mth serv.
3. CYGNUS crashed at Brindisi on 5 December 1937, 9 months serv.
4. CALPURNIA crashed at Lake Habbaniyah, 27 Nov. 1938, 17 mth serv.
5. COORONG stranded at Darwin on 12 December 1938 after 10 mths service but is not listed as a "down plane" in Flying Empires.
6. CAVALIER crashed in the North Atlantic on 21 January 1939, 3 yrs serv.
7. CAPELLA was holed in Batavia harbour on 12 March 1939, 26 mth serv.
8. CENTURION crashed in Calcutta on the Hoogly river at Calcutta on 1 May 1939 after 2 years service.
9. CHALLENGER crashed at Mosambique on 12 May 1939, 2 yrs serv.
10. CONNEMARA was destroyed by fire in Southampton water on 19 June 1939 after 3 months service.
11. CANTERBURY ran aground at Basra on 10 August 1939 after 4 months service.
12. CARIBOU was lost between Bodo, Norway and an undisclosed location on 4 May 1940. Because nothing was found, it was not listed as downed. Its crash is debateable and is not counted as "downed" in Flying Empires. CARIBOU was swished for special work including the back up plane for 'Crashing the Duke of Kent'.
13. CABOT was destroyed off Mauren Island near Bodo, Norway on 5 May 1940 (14 months service). It is debateable whether it was the CABOT or the COORONG/G-AEUI that was destroyed.
14. CLYDE was wrecked by a hurricane while at anchor on the Tagus river in Lisbon on 14 February 1941 after 23 months service. CLYDE was not counted as "downed" in Flying Empires.
15. CLIO was modified September 1940–March 1941. It did one patrol and then crashed on its test flight at Loch Indal, Islay Island, Argyllshire on 22 August 1941. Test flights could last up to 400 hours. CLIO's effective service was 3 years.
16. CASSIOPEIA crashed at Sabang on 29 December 1941, 4 yrs serv.
17. CORIO was shot down near Koepang on 30 January 1942, 4 yrs serv.
18. COOLOANGATTA crashed at Sydney on 2 February 1942, 7 yrs serv.
19. CIRCE was lost without trace between Broome and Tijlatjap (seaport on Java's southern coast) on 28 Feb. 1942, 6½ yrs serv.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

20. COOGEE (not the COOEE) crashed in Townsville on 1 March 1942 after 4 years service.
21. CENTAURUS was destroyed on its moorings at Broome on 3 March 1942 after 3 years service.
22. CORINNA was also destroyed on its moorings at Broome on 3 March 1942 after 3 years service. Flying Empires did not list this plane.
23. CORINTHIAN crashed at Darwin on 22 March 1942, 4½ yrs serv.
24. CALYPSO crashed at Daru, Papua New Guinea, 8 Aug. 1942, 3 yrs serv.
25. The Duke of Kent's Sunderland crash on 26 August 1942. This was not listed in Flying Empires probably because it was published by Queen's Parade Press. The plane was either the CABOT, CARIBOU, COORONG or COOGEE.
26. CANTERBURY/AUSTRALIA/CLARE destroyed by fire off Bathurst, West Africa on its way to Lisbon on 14/15 September 1942 after 2 years service. Four crew were never recovered. It was owned by New Zealand, but never delivered.
27. CERES was destroyed by fire at Durban on 1 Dec. 1942, 5½ yrs serv.
28. CAMILLA crashed 5 miles west of Port Moresby on 22 April 1943 (1–5½ years service). Although it crashed in shallow water, the wreck has never been recovered, not even by recent divers.
29. CLIFTON crashed in Sydney on 18 November 1944, after 2–4½ years service.

In the authoritative Flying Empires, Short 'C' class Empire flying boats, Brian Cassidy does not list the crash of the Duke of Kent's Sunderland on 26 August 1942, nor whether it was a Mark I, Mark II, Mark III or Mark IV; what s. number it had, what Construction No. it had, its registration number, modifications, the name of the plane, the time or date of the crash, nor where it crashed. To all intents and purposes, the Queen's Parade Press does not acknowledge that the Duke of Kent died in a Sunderland flying boat. Ipso facto, nor does the Queen.

Swishing the Duke of Kent's Plane

The Duke of Kent's Sunderland may have been the Mark II listed as "special". That is, with modifications that were not specified, like a starboard door or an escape hatch through the floor of the cabin. All doors and hatches could be opened from the outside.

The 'special' plane is identified as CABOT from its production schedule and was ordered ten months into King George VI reign. George VI was the Duke of Kent's brother.

Both the CABOT and the CARIBOU had two passenger doors and both were capable of refueling in flight. Both were s.30s.

The CARIBOU was built to replace the COURTIER that crashed in Athens on 1 October 1937 after only 5 months service. CARIBOU was a Mark III, construction No. S.881. CABOT was construction No. S.880 and also a Mark III. "It is thought the unspecified Mark II (S.880) boat ended up in New Zealand"[6]

Although flying boats that ended up in New Zealand and Australia were an area of confusion unto themselves and Australasia was the blaming ground for flying boats, S.880 CABOT did not end up in New Zealand, nor did S.881 CARIBOU. The two New Zealand boats were both Mark IV. Brian Cassidy's remarks are a lost leader that comes straight from the Queen's Parade Press/the Queen.

Further on Queen's Parade Press has another crack at confusion.

"The standard s.23 'boats were known at Rochester as Mark I aircraft, the two 'Bermuda' 'boats as Mark IIs and the two first generation 'Atlantic' 'boats, as Mark IIIs. The first s.30 – a replacement for G-ADVC COURTIER with Construction Number S.879 – was known as Mark I. [It was a Mark III.] The Mark II s.30 is listed as 'unspecified' [It had a starboard door.] The four second generation 'Atlantic' 'boats – Construction Numbers S.880 to S.883 – were known as Mark IIIs [correct] and two 'New Zealand' 'boats as Mark IVs [correct]. It seems that the 'unspecified' Mark II became the third 'New Zealand' 'boat – on the British register as G-AFCZ AUSTRALIA."[7]

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

Big ruse – the third New Zealand boat was the S.886 CUMBERLAND which changed its name to AWARUA and then AOTEAROA and had the British registration G-AFDA and the New Zealand registration ZK-AMC followed by ZK-AMA.

This may seem as dull as dishwater, but war was full of lies and it is important to expose the lies from every angle to ascertain which side your royal family was gunning for.

There was no great sequence to the order of Sunderlands. "The first order was for one Mark I 'boat – the 'prototype' (Construction No. S.759) and one Mark III 'Atlantic' 'boat (S.804). The first production batch comprised one Mark II 'variation on the Bermuda' 'boat (S.811), the original 'Bermuda 'boat (S.812), the second 'Atlantic' 'boat (S.813) and nine standard Mark Is (S.814–822) . . . The second production batch of fourteen Mark I s.23 'boats (S.838–851) was covered by the third order, placed on 2 September 1935. This batch brought the total fleet to twenty-eight aircraft.[8]

Equally, either one of the returned Australian planes could have been used to 'kill' the Duke of Kent including the COORONG/G-AEUI, CARPENTARIA/G-AFBJ, COOEE/G-AFBL, or COOGEE/VH-ABC. If asked to do so, the Australians would have supplied a Sunderland to kill the Duke of Kent, just because he was queer. That he didn't die in the crash didn't bother the Aussies, as long as they didn't know about it.

Sabotaging the Duke of Kent's Flying Boat

The s.30 is touted as being a heavyweight long-range Mark III. The CABOT, CARIBOU, CONNEMARA and CLYDE were the long-range Sunderlands. They had a Short and Medium wave receiver, a D/F receiver, a telephone control unit and a Type 240A On-off switch. Some of the s.30 were fitted with voice-pipes between the Captain's seat and the Navigator's position, but not all of them.

The Persus engines of the CABOT and CARIBOU were fitted with Graviner fire suppression equipment which operated automatically at 60 degrees Celsius and sprayed the engine surface, especially the manifold pipes and inside the cowling. Initially oil from the Sperry oil supply leaked on the discharge heads rendering them useless. This sabotage was noticed and these were replaced.

Nevertheless CABOT was still sabotaged and had a reconditioned starboard propeller off the salvaged CAPELLA (12 March 1939) or CHALLENGER (12 May 1939). Records attributed these to an s.33 when the CABOT was an s.30 – this is more sabotage, this time, records sabotage.

CARIBOU was originally fitted with Bristol Perseus engines (Serial No. 20505–20508) and de Havilland 5000 series constant-speed propellers (Serial No. 55997, 55998, 50008 and 55996). The port inner airscrew 50008 out of sequence and probably off the COORONG/AEUI.

[8] Brian Cassidy, Flying Empires, p. 54.

Three of the s.33 boats were equipped, partially or completely with reconditioned airscrews. This included the CABOT. In some records the CABOT is a Mark II special. In other records it is a Mark III s.30 and in other records it is a s.33. This is even more record sabotage.

De-icing equipment was fitted to the planes after production in 1938. CARIBOU was fitted with the latest de Havilland equipment and CABOT was fitted with the oldest equipment, the old Dunlop slinger rings.

Late in April 1940 V3137 CABOT and V3138 CARIBOU (RAF numbers) were stripped of their ASV radar and converted as transport aircraft for special missions to Norway. CABOT and CARIBOU were armed with seven Vickers .303 K guns with 4500 rounds and a fake gun made of a broomstick painted matt black installed in the tail's refueling cup – as shonky as shit. It was well-known at the time and reeks of self-sabotage. A working gun would have sufficed and a cannon would have been much better.

Many of the flying boats originally fitted in 1937 were re-equipped in 1939. Even this was sabotaged. On 10 September 1941 Modification 10141 referred to "the fixed fittings of complete Lorenz equipment, but actually received the 1124A only". Even some of these modifications didn't happen as the boats were sold back to BOAC on 19 September 1941 without the changes being made.

Defective parts within the first year or first 1000 hours of travel were to be replaced by Shorts. Disagreements were subject to arbitration by the Air Ministry. At Safety for Flight certificate inspections, the boat was swung and compass corrections were made.

Just before the summer trans-Atlantic season was to begin CABOT and CARIBOU were involved in a dispute over ownership (April 1940). BOAC assumed they were to be handed back for trans-Atlantic mail service and the RAF assumed they could do what they wanted with them. CABOT and CARIBOU were then sent to Hythe for their first 200-hour check. The War Cabinet then wrote a memo: "The two planes were to stay in military service and the mail service was cancelled". The trans-Atlantic mail service was only resumed after both planes were 'lost'.

> It was obvious the RAF and War Cabinet had special plans for these two planes and needed to 'protect' them.

Swishing a Plane for the Duke of Kent

CABOT left Hythe on 3 May 1940 heading for Invergordon. At midnight they left Invergordon to Harstad in the Lofoten Islands. With the long northern twighlight they could search for landing strips while darkness gave them some cover and they landed at Lofoten at 8.21 am. They slept through the day and searched for more fuel.

At 8 am on 4 May 1940 CABOT departed Harstad for Bodo, 248 km to the south and arrived in the middle of an air raid alert so the plane changed its flag to a Norwegian national flag and landed, or rather alighted on the water and moored up next to some Norwegian float planes and fishing boats and began to unload.

On 4 May 1940 CARIBOU left Hythe for the quick flight to Invergordon arriving at 8.05 pm adding three RAF gunners to their crew and a Norwegian translator. CARIBOU then left Invergordon and arrived at Harstad at 8.30 am on 4 May 1940. The 3 RAF gunners and the Norwegian translator then disembarked.

At 9.30 am CARIBOU departed [it doesn't say where to] and became a total loss at 9.45 am on 4 May 1940. CARIBOU was the 12th Empire boat and second s.30 to be written off.

CABOT was then moved out of Bodo harbour by two motorboats (including M.V. Sissy) during the long twilight. CABOT was moved 6.5 km north up the coast and moored off Mauren Island with the help of anchors borrowed from boats. The roundels were covered with blankets and the plane was covered with brush. The electrical system was to be repaired onboard the CABOT and the Vickers K guns were to be given ground mountings to ward off any Luftwaffe planes, but none of this happened.

All the RAF crew returned to Bodo with the Norwegian seamen who had helped them.

A Luftwaffe Junkers Ju 88 'discovered' CABOT the next day and destroyed it with incendiary bombs. The plane caught fire and sunk in the steeply shelving seabed. It was the 13th Sunderland and third s.30 to be written off.

The reports say there were no crew on board and also that the crew on board were injured and lay up in hospital listening to the radio salvaged off the CABOT.

Sabotaged Post-Swish History

CLIO and CORDELLA were then purchased by the Air Ministry from BOAC to replace the CARIBOU and CABOT lost at Bodo in Norway. CLIO and CORDELLA were then flown to Queen's Island in Belfast in September 1940 for much more extensive conversions. They were equipped with two Bolton-Paul four-gun power-operated turrets and internally stowed depth charges stored inboard as well as ASV radar (Anti-Surface Vessel) making them look like an Asian apartment.

CLIO and CORDELLA were ready in March 1941 (which kept them useless for 10 months) and delivered to 119 Squadron on Islay off the west coast of Scotland. CLIO flew one convoy protection patrol on 27 April 1941 and then crashed on its test flight near Bowmore on 22 August 1941. It was the 15th Sunderland to be written off and was the only plane that showed the ladder connection between the control deck and the lower deck.

119 Squadron was then disbanded and CORDELLA was given to 413 Squadron and then sold back to BOAC to be converted back to a standard s.23.

This effectively tied up four planes as useless from May 1940 to August 1941.

CARIBOU was lost, 'CABOT' was bombed, CLIO crashed in a test flight and CORDELLA went back to BOAC and was broken up at Hythe in 1947.

> After this string of loses, no one wanted to look at these planes, nor the history of these planes. That was the plan.

How the Swish was Done

Here's what really happened.

At midnight on 3/4 May 1940, CABOT was swished for a lesser Sunderland – the G-AEUI, previously Australia's COORONG. It was not uncommon for the CT & MGT (Colonial Trash and Machine Gun Thieves) to swap planes at midnight. This being the pattern, they were used as such. They also doubled for each other, stole and traded weaponry and mucked about with whatever was loose on any plane.

> Colonial Trash recognised the stupidity of the British and broke any and all rules to survive, which they did a whole lot better than the British. The British utilised this to their advantage on important missions.

At 8 am on 4 May 1940 'CABOT' (COORONG/G-AEUI) left Harstad and landed on nearby water at Bodo, Norway in the middle of an air raid alert, so they changed their display flag to a Norwegian flag. Due to the air raid alert, people were running for cover and no one had a good look at the plane. The air raid alert was arranged by the British.

On 4 May 1940 CARIBOU left Harstad (close to Bodo) at 8.30 am (half an hour after CABOTat 8 am) and was never seen again. There was still post air-raid alert panic about which took the attention off other plane details – like where CARIBOU was heading.

On the night of 4 May 1940 'CABOT'/COORONG/G-AEUI was towed 6.5 km north to Mauren Island and sunk, officially by Luftwaffe incendiary bombs. The fire destroyed any identifying aspects of the plane, including markings and modifications and the Sunderland sunk on a steeply shelving seabed. The Germans had been alerted to the location of the CABOT and sunk it. 'CABOT' was easy enough to spot. It was covered in brush, the roundels were covered in canvas, it had too many anchors, it was moored in a remote hideaway location . . . and German spies at Bodo harbour would have seen it towed out of the harbour at twilight.

The British had intended to move their guns off 'CABOT' and install them on a cliff top and had intended to repair their radio equipment, but none of this happened.

A result both the CABOT and the CARIBOU were swished.

CABOT was swished at Invergordon at midnight on 3/4 May 1940 and replaced with the COORONG, renamed G-AEUI. For its final trip the name on the side was painted "CABOT". COORONG had been returned to Britain in December 1939 and underwent repair work over 11 months. It was renamed G-AEUI and officially broken up in 1947 along with about fifty other Sunderlands at the same time. Even the breaking up of these planes had muffed records.

CARIBOU flew into secret work oblivion at 9.45 am on 5 May 1940.

CABOT was swished at midnight on 3/4 May 1940 and hidden under the control of the Duke of Hamilton. It was probably towed ashore in Argyllshire where Simon Fraser was still unpopular. CABOT was hidden until service on 23 August 1942 at Oban.

The service included final maintenance and checks which officially included "compass correction" and "refueling". In reality they included remote control devices, sabotage of the magnetos and maintenance on the starboard door (referred to as the "second hatch") that the CABOT and the CARIBOU both had. CABOT was then flown to Invergordon on 25 August 1942 for the Duke of Kent's flight on 26 August 1942.

CABOT and CARIBOU then became the plane and the seconder for the Duke of Kent's crash on 26 August 1942. They were modified to engineer the Duke of Kent's escape and crash afterwards.

CLIO and CORDELLA were then purchased as replacements and both were sabotaged. After that, no one wanted to look at the saga in any meritous detail.

So why go to such enormous trouble to hide two planes. The CABOT and the CARIBOU both had two passenger doors either side of the fuselage and were the only recorded Sunderlands to do so . . . so they needed to be lost. Manufacturing and fitting the second door was too risky. Someone would mention it in their memoirs.

When the Duke of Kent walked into the portside door of the Sunderland into the promenade cabin he gave instructions to the Flight Steward and then walked out the starboard door, complete with his entourage of homosexual cross-dressing royal party, all of whom would become his sexual partners in the after life. The Master Mason was about to become the Golden Dawn coven's new Holy Ghost.

> The Holy Ghost mission was so important no resources were spared. The CABOT s.30s Mark II "unspecified" was the 33rd Sunderland made and it had modifications that were not made known. This was ordered on 21 October 1937, five months into King George VI's official reign[9] and it was ordered to engineer his brothers disappearance. After all his brother was second in line to the throne and even the thought of a drug addict transvestite King of England made the retarded King of England blush and run for cover.

Eventually modifications to the CABOT and CARIBOU included radio control ability, complete with override. Radio control had been used since 1918 by Jewish British and was redeveloped by Shorts as the Mistral and gifted to the Germans as the Mistel. This was done publicly on the suggestion of a German pilot and then successfully used by the Luftwaffe from 1943. The Americans also went public with it in January 1947.

The date of the Duke of Kent's crash is given as both 25 August 1942 and 26 August 1942. The earlier date could have been for the official photographs. On 26 August the Duke of Kent and his royal party simply walked out the starboard door onto the tender or the refuelling vessel. This done under cover of running the plane through its tests. These tests were noisy and everyone moved off.

Sabotage at Refueling

Sunderlands were the first British planes to use 87 Octane gas. This was mainly used by the Germans and showed extreme German leanings on the part of Arthur Gouge. The 87 octane aviation spirit, derived from crude oil in Mexico, required tetra-ethyl-lead additive, aromatics or both.[10]

In hot weather at over 1500 metres (5000 ft) the fuel system suffered from vapour locks as the 87 octane gas was highly flammable with a boiling point anywhere between 50–180 degrees Celsius. If two engines died the speed dropped below 240 kmph the loss of height was over 100 metres per minute, a straight course was difficult to maintain due to rudder flutter, and flap adjustments caused the plane to stall from 142 kmph. When flying over deserts a static discharge built up around the fuel tanks and this was also of great concern during refueling as the plane could explode.

In 1937 Shell ordered 27 self-propelled steel refueling barges for the Empire/Sunderland routes. These refueling barges were all named MEXSHELL, followed by a number. MEXSHELLs were 15.25 metres long (50 foot) and 3 metres wide (10 foot) and sat 1.45 metres (4 foot 9 inches) above the water. They were 15.5 tonnes empty and 27.6 tonnes[11] full and had a speed of 7 knots.

Each Sunderland took 11,250 litres in four tanks and the MEXSHELL pumped 9 litres per second through a Kent indicating meter (30 minutes to fill). Oil was also delivered through a flexible hose-line. Multiple pump lines could be used, but this proved dangerous as it required more than the usual three hands plus British Officer.

[11] The metric ton equal to 1000 kg or 2204.6 lbs is the only form of legal trade. The metric spelling is 'ton' and the European spelling is 'tonne'. The Imperial ton or long ton is 1016 kg or 2240 lbs and is used to measure aviation fuel and the capacity of ships. This was not used in the conversion of weights for the flying boats. With flying boats a ton/tonne is 1000 kg or 2204.6 lbs.

The test bucket was knocked over on the CONNEMARA on 19 June 1939 and it caught fire and sank resulting in one death and one serious burn victim. The plane had only been in service for three months.

On the MEXSHELL was the Coxswain, Pumpman and Deckhand. The Coxswain was in charge of the barge and seamanship. The Pumpman was responsible for refueling and the Deckhand was responsible for mooring the barge, casting off and assisting with refueling.

In important and remote locations a British Officer was also on board. In some instances he used his First Officer to replace him. Occasionally this First Officer was replaced with an ingénue, especially when 'accidents' occurred, either because of him, or to be blamed on him.

Refueling was done through the side or over the top. In sheltered harbours like Hythe or Invergordon it was done through the side via the refueling cock on the starboard side of the aircraft. In fast flowing harbours it was done over the top directly into each fuel tank. In rough weather it was done by cans directly into the tanks on top of the wing.

At each refueling the tanks were dipped to check the levels. At this point it was easy enough for the Pumpman to place a petrol pill in two of the tanks on one wing. These are usually wrapped in some form of plastic broken down by petrol. Today glad wrap is used.

This was not the method used on the Duke of Kent's Sunderland as refueling would have occurred through the starboard side and not over the top. A petrol pill could have been placed through the starboard side refueling cock, but this would not have provided enough control for the accident as it panned out. That is, the Duke of Kent's Sunderland crashed in a specific remote location, with a specific fall rate and not during the flyover farewell salute at Invergordon which would have caused the plane to lose altitude over water, thus enabling landing. The fall rate had to be swift and over land, preferably over recently traversed high ground.

It was the Coxswain, Pumpman and Deckhand's job to take the Royal party on board the MEXSHELL (hidden under canvas), or to cause distraction and cover while the tender did it. It was not the MEXSHELL's job to sabotage the plane.

Passengers were not allowed on board the Sunderland or the MEXSHELL during refueling. Refueling took place before passengers boarded and if refueling was to occur once passengers were on board, they were taken off on the designated tender. In tourist flights these were IAL tenders that brought passengers onto the flying boat when they were anchored rather than docked. So if the MEXHSELL was around for a fuel top up, there was an excuse for the tender to be around as well. The two worked hand in hand.

Heavily laden refueling barges were cumbersome vessels. Away from the main bases, seamanship was not the best and MEXSHELLs were known to hole Sunderland floats. At Hythe and Invergordon, seamanship was the best and both were sheltered harbours. The refueling of barges was left to the professionals and only the Coxswain, Pumpman and Deckhand were on the barges, although a British Officer was likely on board during important refueling as with the Duke of Kent.

When refueling through the side [normal] the supervisor opened up the mail loading hatch on the starboard side of the control deck. A bucket was placed inside the plane with a chamois over the top. Two litres of fuel was then pumped into the bucket to check for water. Fuel passed through and the water stayed on top of the camois. This was a perfect time for various forms of sabotage and "the aircraft's main electrical switchboard, the fuel gauges and tank cocks were all within his easy reach."[12]

Refueling was a perfect place for last minute sabotage, like replacing switches with faulty switches or adding remote control devices. There was 30 minutes for the Pumpman, Coxswain, Station Officer or First Officer to act, but all up, refueling took around an hour and was prone to sabotage, explosion, escape and swish.

> As long as the MEXSHELL crew and British officer were in on it, any passenger on any refueling Sunderland could be swished on or off. A starboard passenger door just made it easier. For tenders and MEXSHELL's this was not uncommon practise. The author even did it as late as 1990, lying on top of airmail bags, avoiding the one's marked FRAGILE. All that was required was a phone call to the right person.

In the Duke of Kent's case, the MEXSHELL refueled, stayed alongside, the royal party boarded the flying boat, the pilots boarded and the royal party disembarked with the help of the tender and MEXSHELL, which motored off as the Sunderland underwent its rather noisy pre-flight checks.

> Official records show the Sunderland refueled at Oban, but all offical records relating to the Duke of Kent's flight were faked. Due to the swish in progress anything went.

This was a military operation with military precision and had support from on shore (the Duke of Hamilton), on board the Sunderland (via instructions to the Flight Steward and base instructions to the pilot) and on board the tender and MEXSHELL – from the Duke of Hamilton, premier peer of Scotland, uncrowned king of England, leading Freemason, Wing Commander, and the Duke of Kent's lover.

> The Sunderland flew off without the royal party. If the royal party were caught, it would have been laughed off as a joke. There were no repercussions for getting it wrong.

The Duke of Kent becomes the Holy Ghost

Sunderlands had a history of self-sabotage. The British loved the planes but they rarely returned home. With this in mind, on 26 August 1942, Air Commodore HRH the Duke of Kent was reported to have taken off in a Sunderland and crashed 40 miles from take off.

Prince 'George' Edward Alexander Edmund of Great Britain and Ireland (20 December 1902–26 August 1942), 1st Duke of Kent (1934–42) and Grand Master Mason in (1939–42) was the fourth son of King George V, half-brother of lover Anthony Blunt, and a transvestite.

As Air Commodore HRH Duke of Kent, he was reported to have died in the crash of the Short Sunderland W4026 flying boat of 228 Squadron on 26 August 1942. His capacity was as the Inspector-General of RAF Welfare and he had intended to meet senior members of the US Military in Iceland as well as isolated RAF stations where bottles of whiskey would have been welcomed . . . other's say he was fulfilling his intelligence role and heading to Sweden for secret peace talks with Germans.

The Sunderland took off from Invergordon at 1.10 pm on 26 August 1942 bound for Iceland carrying a royal party of four plus a crew of 11. (Three of the four have never been named). It was heavily laden with fuel, ammunition, depth charges, whiskey, supplies, four royal party passengers and their kit (which was bulky and heavy), as well as the 11 crew.

The takeoff was lengthy with a slow climb due to the weight of the royal kit. When it reached its required altitude of 2000 feet it returned to Invergordon for a flyover farewell salute.

On the day of the crash the weather conditions were mild. It was summer. For the first part of the journey there was cloud at 1000 feet, clouds at 300 feet at Wick and bright skies North of the north coast of Scotland, but the Sunderland never got to Wick.

Flying north-east the Sunderland turned North 27 miles before it should have and crashed 18 miles south of Wick and only 40 miles from take off.

The flight crews instructions were to remain East of the east coasts of Scotland and one of the ways this 'mistake' could have occurred was by remote control. Remote controlled aircraft had been used since late 1918 when David Ben-Gurion used a Farman biplane against German artillery positions on top of Mount Kilimanjaro. It was the first flying bomb.

The crew did their pre-flight checks and duties in base HQ while the royal party boarded. They were the only passengers. The crew boarded and the Sunderland took off just a few minutes later. There was no chance of passing the pre-flight checks drunk and no time to start drinking before taking off.

The four final systems checks were the airscrew pitch controls, the engine fuel pumps, the magnetos and the engine boost. These were either done while the plane was stationary or while the flying boat taxied for take-off. In this case, they were done while the plane was stationary. The noise moved everyone away and made for an easier escape.

When the First Officer moved each of the four pitch levers from fine to coarse, it would cause a drop in engine speed. If any of the pitch-levers got stuck on coarse, it would cause one wing to drop on take-off. If this happened, take-off was abandoned.

The magnetos (On/off button for the engine) were also tested. The magnetos controlled the park plugs and there was one magneto for each spark plug with two magnetos and two spark plugs per engine.

In flight magnetos could be switched off by remote control and this would stop the engine. If two magnetos were switched off a Sunderland flying at 142 kmph with ¼ flap open at 380 feet over the new high ground would fall for 1 minute 16 seconds and crash 3 km from descent. If the Sunderland went into a dive, this would increase the height from descent and decrease the horizontal distance travelled.

With control over the two engines and flaps a Sunderland flying at 1000 feet could be crashed within 3 km in under 45 seconds. The Flight Steward would have been thrown about and possibly killed before the plane crashed. The noise in the cabin would have exceeded 60 decibels and the crew would have had difficulty hearing each other even when shouting.

The favourite method of communication from the Sunderland to base was by morse code. This was not possible when the plane was diving.

Drinking alcohol in the hours before flying warrants a court martial, so drunkenness can be dismissed as the cause of the crash, as can incompetence.

In the No 1 seat was commanding officer Wg Cdr Moseley and in No 2 seat was Flt Lt Frank Goyen, a highly experienced and competent pilot. The Duke of Kent was the commanding officer on the plane and "Everybody on board came under his orders, as the entire crew and the royal party must have known full well."[13]

Spymaster: "Before take off the Duke of Kent was standing between the two pilots which meant he was in a position to pressure them. The usefulness of this tactic varied in proportion to the colonial origin of the aircrew. New Zealand pilots would politely tell any interfering passenger to 'go boil your head'. Australian pilots, on the other hand, were quite rude."

> The plane was flying fine and "The crash must have occurred as the result of a navigational error, as almost everyone who is competent to comment on such matters agrees."[14]

As is common with 'destiny' air crashes, like Erebus in 1979, the plane had just been serviced. A few days prior the Sunderland had been serviced, checked and refuelled at 228 Squadron's base in Oban from where it was flown directly to Invergordon. Its navigational equipment had been reset. The bearing of the flight was correct, it's just that the turn north was made at 40 miles instead of 67 miles. How much the plane was refuelled was not stated, nor whether there was a top up at Invergordon.

Immediately after takeoff it was the role of Flt Sgt Andrew Simpson William Jack (the only survivor) to go the rear turret, close the steel doors behind him, face backward and turn the turret from side to side only communicating if there was something vital to be said, like, "enemy air traffic".

The navigator and pilots could talk directly to each other, but the rear gunner was only connected via intercom and he had no view of the interior of the plane. There was also no communication with the passengers on the lower deck.

British planes were also peculiar in that the gunners could not look down. The Germans knew this and always did their best to attack from below. The rear gunner could not see below him, or what was happening in the plane on the upper deck, the lower deck, or if someone had parachuted out over the sea just before the plane crossed high ground.

These were all possibilities and due to the Freemasons draconian rule over Scotland, especially during WWII, many witness accounts have proved contradictory and many 'respectable' accounts, 'official' accounts and 'authoritative' accounts have been the work of down right liars working towards an agenda. Even the servicing records of the Sunderlands differed from what actually occurred.

Part of that agenda was avoiding the British royal family's shame at having the King's brother being a number carrying Abwehr agent, rampant homosexual, cross-dresser and drug user. The Duke of Hamilton assisted in this cover up using his role as Commander of the Air Training corps responsible for the defence of Scotland, Head Freemasons, premier peer and uncrowned King of Scotland . . . because he was one of the Duke of Kent's homosexual lovers and he wanted him all to himself.

The big flying boat had two decks – an upper deck for the flight crew and a lower deck with luxury passenger accommodation. When the Sunderlands were converted to delivering mail (stored on the upper deck), it is not clear how many passenger seats were left, but most importantly for this story, the Flight Clerk's office was moved down to the lower passenger deck, with no clear indication of either a direct ladder to the pilots or the normal circuitous route with stairs.

Extensive photos showed a ladder between the Flight Clerk on the lower deck and the pilot mail area on the upper deck, but no one who worked the flying boats has any record of the ladder. Thus there is a dispute over whether the Flight Clerk could access the pilots quickly and easily. The Flight Clerk/Steward did have intercom but it was 60 decibels inside the lower cabin, so shouting was common and even intercom conversations with the pilots were difficult, although it was quieter in the pilot's cabin.

CLIO crashed on 22 August 1941 and it was the only plane that showed the ladder connection between the control deck and the lower deck.

The s.23 could seat 7 in the Forward Cabin, 3 in the Centre Cabin, 8 in the Promenade Cabin and 6 in the Aft Cabin – a total of 24. Each cabin was on a different level and each rose two steps (0.5m) towards the rear. The pilot sat above and forward of the forward cabin in a completely enclosed area. The mail sat behind them.

Despite the pilots vast experience, and with no prior warning, the 'newly serviced' Sunderland banked 27 miles too early. It crashed 32 minutes after takeoff at 1.42 pm on Eagle's Rock, the highest rock in the area. Three miles inland from Dunbeath in Caithness, Eagle's Rock also had the advantage of being very remote.

This was exactly 15 months, 15 days, 15 hours an 15 minutes after Hess and doppelgänger Hess had cirlced Holy Island. Who says the occult wasn't involved? In Golden Dawn coven language '15.15.15.1.5' means "occult master (of themself) cheating death four times".

Arranging the Crash

Plane crashes are usually arranged via first hand knowledge of the plane. Sunderland crashes are no different, except that the technology of the planes were quite simple and methods of sabotage were also quite simple, frequent and not widely recognised. It appears that there were a dozen or more Sunderland 'practice' crashes prior to the Duke of Kent's crash.

Sunderlands were usually flown by automatic pilot in fine weather. When the weather got rough the passengers in the Aft Cabin were thrown about with the planes continual pitch, bank and yaw and this upset even the most hardened travelers. In rough weather the automatic pilot was disengaged and both pilots flew the aircraft together using combined maximum force. The normal arrangement when flying manually was for each pilot to fly for 20–30 minutes before handing over.

In the Duke of Kent's flight it was fine weather so they were flying on automatic pilot.

Stall Speeds

The lowest possible speed for take off (alighting speed) was 109 kmph.[15]

The minimum flying speed was 112 kmph.

Stalling speed with the flaps unextended was 116 kmph.

With FULL flap, the stalling speed was at 120 kmph.

With $^3/_4$ flap, the stall occurred at 129 kmph.

With $^1/_2$ flap, the stall was at 131 kmph.

With $^1/_4$ flap, the stalling speed was 142 kmph.

The flaps were not fully extended over 184 kmph.

The maximum range cruising speed in still air was 211 kmph.

Against the standard 35 knot head wind, the optimum speed was 223 kmph.

The Sunderland's natural cruising speed was 236 kmph.

At 10,000 feet the economic cruising speed was 237 kmph.

Over 21 772 kg the maximum permitted speed was 304 kmph.

The maximum speed in level flight at 5 500 feet was 316 kmph.

The maximum speed with an automatic pilot engaged was 313 kmph.

The maximum speed of the Sunderland was 320 kmph.

Sunderlands could dive without vibration or instability up 320 kmph. With the throttles $^2/_3$ open they would pull out easily and quickly. However with a full fuel and cargo load it was difficult. With one engine down, low fuel levels and no cargo the Sunderland could not pull out of a dive. If one of the flaps were stuck it just got worse and if two engines were down, the plane simply fell out of the sky.

A Sunderland loaded to 21 772 kg could not maintain height on three engines and could not pull out of a dive. The Duke of Kent's Sunderland had a full load of fuel, was heavily laden and noted as "slow to take off". There was not enough time to throw the cargo and the ability to jettison fuel did not come about until the Mark IV TEAL s.30 'A' 'boats were fitted with fuel jettison pipes. The New Zealand boats had them but the Duke of Kent's Sunderland did not.

Climbing

The maximum rate of climb for a laden s.23 Sunderland from 1000 to 10,000 feet was 920 feet per minute taking 12½ minutes. When the weight was increased by 9 500 kg of cargo the climbed was reduced by 40% to 575 feet per minute.

Sunderlands had a quirk. If the throttles were opened to increase speed during the climb, the flying boat would simple level off until the increased speed was reached, and then resume its climb. This made life difficult for pilots who needed to climb fast, especially if they had just flow over high ground and had just lost altitude.

At a height of 400 feet and climbing, the override was taken OUT and the mixture control levers moved forward through the gate to the NORMAL position and the flaps brought IN. As the engines changed from the FULL throttle (FULL boost condition to NORMAL boost) the engine note dropped to more normal sound levels. The variable blade propellers were then changed from FINE to COARSE pitch. It was at this point that the Sunderlands had a second quirk – they dropped 50 feet before climbing again.

If one magneto went out at this point the plane would crash.

As the plane flew over high ground towards Eagle's Rock, the override taken OUT and the airscrews were changed from FINE to COARSE, if the two magnetos went out of action on one engine, a fully laden plane would crash. Lack of flap control would only add to the disaster.

Flaps

Flaps control the drag of the plane. The more flaps are opened, the more drag the plane has and the more control the pilot has over take off, landing and turning, even creating level turns.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

The three most commonly used flap settings are 8 degrees ($^1/_3$ OUT), 12 degrees ($^1/_2$ OUT) and 25 degrees (Full OUT). The extended flap at any setting did not interfere with the efficiency of the elevators and the drag was low. At a take-off the flap setting was $^1/_3$ OUT. Just before leaving the water it was $^1/_2$ OUT.

However in certain situations, if the flaps are stuck in the wrong position, there was less control over the plane and disaster could strike, especially at take off, when the override was taken OUT, when the propellers changed from FINE to COARSE, or while trying to pull out of a dive.

On the first official flight the flaps got stuck on CANOPUS while approaching the Seaplane Works at Rochester and the plane landed without the use of flaps. This resulted in recommendations which included a ladder to the flap motor. This ladder also gave access to the elevators, magneto/starter motors and the engine speed indicator generators.

The flaps on standard s.23 flying boats were moved by a single small electric motor, which took a full minute to wind to full flap and a minute and a half to retract the flap. This 90 seconds provided plenty of time to crash the plane without the extra stability flaps provided.

The flap operating motor is not mentioned in the Production Chart which is very curious. However "the standard equipment was a Rotax split-field series-wound 0.373 kW electric motor, mounted in the storage space over the forward end of the promenade cabin. [These were underpowered at only 0.5 Hp/0.373 kW.] The flaps could be operated manually by disengaging the clutch on the port side and winding the flap in or out by means of a winding handle inserted in the starboard side of the gearbox. The torque tubes that drove the flaps extended from the gearbox to the wing roots."[16] In the Duke of Kent's case, having recently flown over high ground, there was not enough time to do so.

Rotax were not the best flap motors and some s.30 were fitted with Delco-Remy flap motors. These weren't that great either and in January 1940 1 kW motors with an extra battery were considered . . . but not installed. As a result flap operating motors were a third the desired size.

A 4 amp fuse was used for the flap indicator, a 15 amp fuse for flap motor changeover switch and a 50 amp fuse for the flap motor. It was simple enough to swap the 50 amp fuse for a 30 amp fuse to cause a delayed blow out. Alternatively highly acidic acid could be dripped on the fuses and/or cables causing a delayed blow out. Passengers with know-how could access the flap motors, elevators, magneto/starter motors and engine speed indicator generators if the Flight Steward had been sent to the upper level.

When the nose of the plane went up or down, the pilots had a manual control on the underside of the coup, which could be worked by either pilot. A handle was turned 6.38 turns to trim the elevators through its full movement.

The flap, elevator, magneto/starter motor, engine speed indicator generators wiring and batteries were all in the same area, in the terminal block in the wing-root. These were accessed through the compartment over the centre cabin, between the wings (spar booms).

The manual override operator (Flight Steward) had to clamber into the compartment, de-clutch the motor and insert the winding handle into the gearbox, to move the flaps IN or OUT.

[16] Brian Cassidy, Flying Empires, pp P. 77.

The saboteur only had to climb in and drop acid on the Telefex cables or fuses to the flaps/elevators/magneto/engine speed indicator generators or replace their fuses with faulty fuses or smaller fuses.

> "The engine starter solenoid circuit wiring and the starter circuits, were connected through the junction boxes in the wing-roots in 35/012 copper core cable to the Rotax N5CP solenoid switches, which energised the starter motors."

The control wiring was only single core copper cable and the limit switch gearbox drove both the flap-angle indicator and extension indicator, but these applied to the port flap only. This meant that the starboard flap could be faulty without causing alarm.

The flaps, elevators, magneto/starter motor and engine speed indicator generators could all have been sabotaged by access to the wing-roots and this could have been done by any of the unnamed three in the royal party by distracting the Flight Steward (which he was) and opening the cover plates. With practice this sabotage can be done very quickly. Equally the sabotage could have occurred while in service during the previous few days.

The sabotage could have been done during servicing, on the plane or as a back up to remote control. The possibilities were not limited.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

> The magneto/starter motor was sabotaged on two of the four engines and there was a remote control override to the magnetos, rudder and communications just in case they were needed.

A Sunderland Crashing

A simple method of crashing a Sunderland was to turn off the magnetos on two engines, reduce the speed to 142 kmph and open ¼ flap. This would cause the flying boat to stall and fall 300 feet per minute. Having just flown over high ground, it wouldn't take long to hit the ground, certainly less than 90 seconds. This could have been done as soon as the propellers had moved to COARSE and the plane had just dropped 50 feet.

Once the plane had stalled and begun to fall the magnetos could be turned on again. The pilots would have the engines on full throttle as they tried to pull out of the dive. If this occurred under 116 kmph the plane would continue to stall and continue to dive, at best levelling out. If the pilots judged they were too close to ground to pull out of a dive they would have gone to throttle off and waited for their demise.

The Usual Method of Sabotage

Sabotage was also taught by taking apart and reassembling the fuel-monitoring unit. This would have been looked for, however, since MI-5 and MI-6 were well in on the act, it was simple enough for them to destroy this small piece of evidence.

Remote control was not widely known and was not looked for. Those MI-6 agents on the inside would have looked for any evidence of sabotage and removed them as soon as they arrived at the crash site.

The Unusual Method of Sabotage

In Burma, India and Assam planes were downing in 1943–45 like there was no tomorrow. This included passenger air craft. The British checked this out and found the Japanese were lacing chewing gum with hashish and giving it to the native ground crews to put in the pilot's cabin. The pilots were chewing the gum, getting stoned and crashing.

The hashish was discovered when some erk (Ground Crew) pinched the chewing gum and dived off the 50 foot control tower injuring himself.

This was how the plane crashes got solved in reality, but it only became public knowledge when the Royal Flying Corps veteran and editor of Popular Flying magazine, Captain William Earl Johns attributed it to Captain James Bigglesworth in the Biggles novels. Biggles was so big he influenced wallpaper.

Remote Control and Instructions from Inside

To steer the plane from inside, all that was needed was control over the rudder. This was done by command from inside the plane, from the cockpit, from outside the plane, or by remote control over the rudder. The steward could easily have been given instructions from the Duke of Hamilton prior to boarding:

> "If the Duke of Kent gives you any instructions, follow them. He is the commanding officer on the plane."
> Once on board the Duke of Kent's instructions may have been: "We are going to the Aft Cabin. Do not disturb us until we have passed Wick. Have the pilots fly over Eagle's Rock. I hear the scenery is spectacular."

After this the Duke of Kent and his party made their way to the Promenade Cabin and climbed out the starboard door of the Sunderland Special, directly onto the waiting craft, no steps required.

The North Sea is largely fed by the Baltic which has no tide at all. It is also partly fed by the Atlantic which does have tides. Rochester had small tides. No ramp or stairs were required from the Sunderland to either the dock, tender or MEXSHELL refuelling craft.

MI-6 to the Rescue

Eagle's Rock was 18 miles from the small town of Wick which meant MI-6's rescue team were assured to be the largest number of people first on the scene.

There were 15 officially on board. MI-6 had done a 'coffee run' and visited the morgues in Britain in search of bodies. It was preferable they had died as the result of car crashes, plane crashes, or by fire. They needed a body for the Duke of Kent, the other three in the unnamed royal party and a spare. It's always good to have a spare body when you're MI-6.

MI-6 arrived in their Army lorries converted into ambulances with their best canned meat ready to place. The bodies were often preserved with ice. This idea was first put forward by Squadron Leader O'Reilly – MI-6's serial murderer until the Russians got him.

The five bodies were all dressed in appropriate uniforms and pre-stressed in a manner commesurate with a plane crash. MI-6 failed to adequately stress the Duke of Kent's uniform and his body was found thrown well clear of the plane and not too far from the Army lorry loaded with the canned meat. This meant that MI-6 found little reason to carry the Duke of Kent's body double very far. The smashed face must have been something horrible. His briefcase was found near the body and it was 'his' uniform and briefcase that identified the body. The face did not.

> The body was not that of the Duke of Kent. It was a canned meat body brought in by MI-6.

When Flt Sgt Andrew Simpson William Jack turned up alive, "The reported additional and unexplained body at the scene was [erroneously] attributed to Rudolf Hess." It was not Rudolf Hess, but was a canned meat spare attributed to rear gunner Flight Sergeant Andrew Jack. Andrew Jack was not meant to survive and MI-6 had planned on there being no survivors. Andrew Jack was discovered after the bodies had been counted and placed and was lucky not to have been executed on the spot as part of MI-5's tidy up.

Given something of a silent mythical status as 'surviving hero', it was unwise to kill Andrew Jack, but it was necessary to silence him. Part of this has involved discrediting him, even after his death. Officially known as 'boiler-plating', this is often employed against low-ranking survivors of incidents.

There were meant to be no survivors. Either the pilots had managed to slow the plane down, or the Oban saboteurs had not taken into consideration that under 240 kmph (150 mph) there was a chance of survival, especially for the rear gunner. The tails of Liberators and Sunderlands were known to snap off and if the tail gunner said the bolts were coming lose, the pilots headed the plane for home . . . so whenever the tail gunner wanted to go home, he would tell the pilots via intercom that the bolts were coming loose.

The tail of the Sunderland snapped off and rear gunner Andrew Jack was badly burnt, but survived. Having an understanding of the British from his family background, he escaped the scene as quickly as possible and staggered to a crofter's (farmer's) cottage.

Jack did not alert anyone and was discovered the next morning exhausted and burnt. The rescue party did not know he had survived until the following day. As a result an extra body found.

Spymaster: "Stinks of MI-6."

The 16th body, explained as Rudolf Hess, was a car crash/burn victim who had died days earlier and was picked up during the MI-6 coffee run and packed in ice.

Once Flt Sgt Andrew Simpson William Jack had identified the Duke of Kent's back as he stood between the two pilots, the Duke of Kent walked down to the passenger level to see his unnamed royal party of three. The Flight Steward had been instructed not to go to the Aft Cabin until after passing Wick (after the crash). Curtains between cabins and the royal party luggage blocked his view. At 60 decibels (as loud as shouting) the Flight Steward could not distinguish whether or not there was any conversation coming from the Aft Cabin. Just prior to flight, the Duke of Kent opened the seaward starboard door in the Promenade Cabin and simply walked onto the tender.

This was a Holy Ghost operation.

MI-5, Air 3 and Jack

The Duke of Kent was MI-5 as of right. Another in the royal party was most likely an MI-5 officer proficient in sabotage and intelligence operations and from Air 3.

Since three of the ‘four’ passengers in the royal party remain unnamed and were at a level below the crew, there was no communication between the crew and royal party during flight and no way of ascertaining who the royal party were.

Having survived, Andrew Jack went to the East Grinstead hospital for burns, retired as a flight lieutenant on 6 June 1964 and worked as a telephone engineer. He had vast scarring, and officially “suffered from depression and was a changed man”.

Documents were released by the Public Records Office under the 30-year rule around 1972. (His brother King Edward VIII/Duke of Windsor had died on 28 May 1972.) The PRO records shed no light on the matter, such that they contradicted Andrew Jack’s reports – the only eye witness.

Flt Sgt Andrew Simpson William Jack (8 May 1921–22 March 1978) died at Brighton General Hospital, officially of bronchopneumonia, pancreatitis and cirrhosis of the liver.

Considering MI-6 had probably been threatening to kill Jack for 36 years, with veiled threats and hints, it was no wonder Jack was depressed. The MI-6 rescue team were very concerned that there was a survivor and would have preferred there were none so they spent the next four decades ensuring that rear gunner Andrew Jack did not have a voice.

Spymaster: “The liver diagnosis is typical of MI-5/MI-6 boiler-plating and is completely in line with how MI-6 treats people even after death. Citing alcoholism at death provides another avenue for deniability.”

Britain – a Liar’s Paradise

The substance of the Court of Enquiry is encapsulated on the Aircraft Accident Card held by the Ministry of Defence. Based on this, the Secretary of State of Air, Sir Archibald Sinclair made a statement six weeks after the crash in the House of Commons on 7 October 1942, yet a diligent search at the Public Records Office (also by its director) has confirmed in writing that the original Court of Enquiry cannot be found in either the "open" or "closed" files and the Royal Archivist has also confirmed that these have never been sent to the Public Records Office.[17]

> This indicates that, regarding the circumstances of the death of the Duke of Kent, the Secretary of State of Air made his statement in the House of Commons based on information that did not exist.
> This also indicates that all enquiries into the Sunderland crash were stopped by the British Royal Family, in particular, by the Duke of Kent's brother, King George VI.

Spymaster: "King George VI happily cooperated in all these cover ups because he was virtually retarded, and was guided by more worldly military figures who pretended to advise him beneficially. His only genuine friend was the New Zealand VC Charlie Upham who treated the King like one of his own men and never called him George."

The King of England, the British Royal Family, the House of Commons, the Ministry of Defence, the Court of Enquiry, the Secretary of State of Air, Commander of the Air Training corps, the Duke of Hamilton, the Freemasons of Scotland, MI-6 and all embedded historians were complicit in the cover up of the death of Air Commodore, Inspector-General of RAF Welfare and Grand Master Mason, the cross-dressing Duke of Kent . . . and his new role as the Holy Ghost.

> King George VI was not very bright and Princess Elizabeth had been attending war meetings since she was 13 (1939). If the Duke of Kent were to have survived, Elizabeth may not have been queen until after his death. The Duke of Kent had been cited for King, but was considered too similar to King Edward VIII.

Based on the Duke of Kent's homosexual and occult practises, his cross-dressing, his cuckolding and his snobbish Nazi wife demanding she was "the most blue-blooded royal of them all", the Duke of Kent was removed from the public picture and his death was framed.

This is backed up by the hushed and rushed funeral and the royal family's near complete lack of mourning for their brother and uncle.

[17] In Golden Dawn coven/Thule Society language, 'six weeks' is "all 6s and 7s – all madness", with the '6' referring to death and the '7' referring to heaven, meaning it was "a heavenly death surrounded by madness". This too was part of the Holy Ghost operation.

The 'Duke of Kent' was originally buried at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, but once the real Duke of Kent had died (morphine and cocaine overdose post-1968, the same as his father, King George V), the canned meat Duke of Kent was removed and the real Duke of Kent was buried at the royal burial ground at Frogmore. It was here that the real ceremony took place.

Homosexual Lovers raise Prince Edward

The Duke of Hamilton was born Douglas Douglas-Hamilton (3 February 1903–30 March 1973) and became the 14th Duke of Hamilton and the 11th Duke of Brandon upon his father's death on 16 March 1940.

Previously the Duke of Hamilton had worked in coalmines as 'Mr Hamilton', although the coal was on their property. He served in the Auxiliary Air Force as Squadron Commander (1927–36) and was the first to fly over Mt. Everest (1933). He was a prominent Conservative MP (1930–40) and made friends with several prominent Nazis during the 1936 Olympics in Berlin. He was also Lord Steward of the Royal Holyroodhouse (1940–64) and during WWII, Commander of the Air Training Corps responsible for the defence of Scotland.

The Duke of Hamilton and Brandon was also a German agent with an Abwehr V-Mann number and was referred to in both British and German occult circles as Brandon – yet after WWII he was styled GCVO (1946) and KT (1951) for services to Britain.

After the 'death' of his lover the Duke of Kent (39), the position of Duke of Kent was filled by the Duke of Kent's six-year-old son, Prince Edward George Nicholas Paul Patrick, born 9 October 1935.

As a six-year-old, Prince Edward could not fulfil the role of his future titles so these were carried out by his father's close friend and lover, the Duke of Hamilton . . . with his lover, the surviving Duke of Kent, living at Dungavel Castle with him, often in a dress. The Duke of Hamilton wore the pants.

The Duke of Hamilton acted as mentor to Prince Edward for the quarter of a century from 1942–67 when he handed over his Freemasonry titles. Whenever Prince Edward and the Duke of Hamilton met there was an opportunity for Prince Edward to met with his father who often dressed as a woman for sexual preference as much as for disguise.

Stalwart wives look upon their sons and wonder – what have I done?

> A transsexual cocaine and morphine addict as of King of Great Britain.
> The current Duke of Kent looks nothing like his father and was probably conceived during a Golden Dawn coven ritual – a gang bang with the males acting as the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost. Conception took place 33 days after their marriage at 1.30 am on Christmas Day 1934 at exactly half-waned moon. Feeble and illegitimate royals are often conceived in the first half of the waning moon. It was the same for King George VI's illegitimate son conceived near the bottom of New Zealand's South Island and born on Christmas Day 1927. Let's call him Harry.

The most likely fathers were the Duke of Kent, his lover the Duke of Hamilton, and his lover Albrecht Haushofer. Albrecht Haushofer was the son of Rudolf Hess' mentor Karl Haushofer. Karl had originated the concept of lebensraum, something the British royals absolutely needed.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

The current Duke of Kent has Albrecht Haushofer's hairline, eyes, nose, ears and jaw. Albrecht Haushofer could well be the Duke of Kent's biological father . . . although his unfortunate looks can also be explained by his father's cocaine and morphine addiction. The Duke of Hamilton, who specialised in magnanimous vanity, looks nothing like Prince Edward/Duke of Kent.

Royal Titles

As Queen Elizabeth II's cousin, Prince Edward eventually became Field Marshal, KG, GCMC, GCVO, ADC. Upon joining the Masons he immediately became a 33 degree Mason and The Grand Master of the United Grand Lodge of England and Hereditary Grand Master of Anglo-American Freemasonry – all in 1967.

Indicators of the real Duke of Kent's death are his son's elevation to Grand Master Mason in 1967 with the deceased father in the galleries role playing the Holy Ghost; his wife's death on 27 August 1968; and his reburial at Frogmore, the date of which seems to be protected.

Royals have got away with giving each other titles and post-nominal letters for a long time, so let's look at what the post-nominal letters mean.

The Knight of the Garter (KG) is given to the Sovereign (themself), his eldest son and 24 nobles, which included his third son. Its motto 'Honi soit qui mal y pense' – 'Shamed be the person who thinks evil of it' – brought about the Age of Chivalry. Of all the orders it includes the most degraded knights. These include King Charles I (appointed in 1611 and beheaded in 1649); James Butler, Duke of Ormonde, Viceroy of Ireland (appointed 1689 and executed for treason 1716) and over thirty other Garter Knights executed from 1388, after which the government took over their appointments from the late 1700s to 1946 when the royal family reclaimed the right.

The Order of the Garter is also given to foreign monarchs "as a means of marking and securing alliances" including Emperor Nicholas II of Russia in 1893 (we're going to swish you and end your monarchy); King Alfonso XII of Spain in 1902 (we won't help you against the Germans); the Shah of Persia in 1903 (we want your oil); the Emperor of Japan in 1929 (we don't want you to fight alongside Germany);[18] the King of Sweden in 1954 (thanks for rejecting Hitler's Non-Aggression Pact) and King Olav V of Norway in 1959 (thanks for rejecting Hitler's Non-Aggression Pact while allowing him to take over your country and really getting the war in Northern Europe under way).

The Order of the Garter has become an order for complicit cover utilising those from lower down the ranks such as Lord Kitchener (KG). "You deny for me and I'll deny for you." The Order of the Garter has come to symbolise closeted homosexuality, wife cheating, paedophilia amongst royals and peers, and trading in countries' fortunes.[19]

The Knight of St Michael and St George (GCMC) is the 'Spies and Traders' knighthood and is given to those who have dealt with delicate British foreign matters. Anyone with the letters GCMG, KCMG or CMG after their name should be treated as a British spy, whether retired or not. Part and parcel of being a British royal is dealing with delicate British matters overseas. As such, many honorary members are royals. Its motto 'Auspicium melioris aevi' (We are doing this for a better Age) may as well refer to the Masonic New Age – Novus Ordo Seclorum.

[18] Hirohito, Emperor of Japan was appointed Knight Garter on 3 May 1929. This was removed in 1941 and reinstated by warrant on 22 May 1971. That he was allowed to survive after WWII amazed all historians and points to complicity in war.

[19] King George VI qualified in all these areas.

The Royal Victorian Order (GCVO) is given to family members and servants of the royal household among others. There is no limit to the number given and its really just the home-help award.

The Aide de Camp to Her Majesty (ADC) is just that. It signifies that the ADC carries out the will of the monarch without question.

The Duke of Hamilton and Brandon/Douglas Douglas-Hamilton was a pro-Nazi conservative MP who travelled through Germany returning to nobble the British Government into not supporting France over the re-militarisation of the Rhineland (1936). He also encouraged the British Empire to "come to an understanding" with the New World Order of Nordic-Anglo-Saxon colonising and advised King George VI on the advantages of Naziism.

The British monarchy took this on board and Queen consort Elizabeth (King George VI's Scottish wife) said: "I don't care who wins the war, as long as we retain the monarchy".

> As "the uncrowned King of England" this was the Duke of Hamilton's gift to the Nordic-Anglo-Saxon coloniser Adolf Hitler. He had the British monarchy on board with Hitler and they tasselled between supporting Hitler and retaining the monarchy. As it turned out, they did both.

The 14th Duke of Hamilton (GCVO, KT) was doing the work of the KG, GCMC, GCVO, ADC – the work of 'shameful delicate British foreign matters that directly serve and aid the British monarch and trade in countries fortunes'. As the uncrowned King of England, the uncrowned head of Freemasonry, Scotland's premier peer and a German V-Mann agent, the 14th Duke of Hamilton ensured the Freemasons did everything they could to ensure German Freemasons had every assistance in taking over England.

> Of many knights, you could comfortably say, they were "creating mass crime behind a veil of dignity".

Each Knight provides a reference for the other and justice is never done. Delaying the charge of treason and making those look stupid who would lay the charge is common to 80% of knighthoods. It also puts the knights completely in the pockets of those in power to do their bidding, both up and down the elevation scale, developing and sustaining the British monarchy's New World Order goals.

Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 Mar

The 14th Duke of Hamilton, Douglas Douglas-Hamilton was a homosexual and a lover of the transvestite, cocaine and morphine addict, the Duke of Kent. He was also the occultist 'Brandon' and used the surviving Duke of Kent as the Holy Ghost in all Golden Dawn coven occult rituals.

> Whenever you have a high-ranking homosexual fronting as a married heterosexual, you have a malleable spy who will go to any treasonous lengths and use all their resources just to maintain one or all of their positions.

Many homosexual Freemasons use Freemasonry and marriage as a form of cover. Freemasons have a high rate of child-sex abuse, paedophilia and incest, with accounts suggesting that Freemasons sexually abuse a third of their daughters and granddaughters.

> Paedophiles control Freemasons, because Freemasons consider paedophiles to be close to royals. Royals use their illegitimate children for supply and control for paedophiles. Police are a Freemasonry organisation and serve the British Crown. Thus Police cover for paedophiles and expect promotions when they do so. Freemasons admire paedophiles and a Freemason will do anything a paedophile asks them to do. This does not exclude dropping the Berlin Wall.

Because the Freemasons control the police and judiciary, Freemasons are rarely charged for their incest, child-sex abuse and paedophilia. When they are discovered, the first step is to cover up. When it becomes too obvious they are often murdered. Sometimes these murders are real and other times they are fake with new identities established elsewhere. In the case of really important secret society members, they are retained, hidden and used for ceremonial purposes. One of those purposes was to act as the 'Holy Ghost' in Golden Dawn coven occult rituals. In Germany these were called Thule Society rituals.

and rituals with a manifest secret have more power.

On 11 September 2004 the Freemasons opened their doors to the public for membership in order to spread the blame of an increasingly exposed history. (See Spreading the Blame, Appendix 4)

Frogmore

Frogmore is named after the preponderance of frogs in this low-lying ground in Berkshire. The British royals are usually buried at Frogmore, St. George's Chapel in Windsor, or Westminster Abbey.

Frogmore refers to Frogmore's burial grounds and includes the Royal Mausoleum containing the graves of Prince Albert and Queen Victoria (only), the Duchess of Kent's Mausoleum (Queen Victoria's mother only, slightly smaller but close by), and the royal burial ground.

Frogmore is 33 acres of private gardens which adjoins Home Park grounds of Windsor Castle, Berkshire. It was purchased by King George III for his African Queen Charlotte, for use as "a country retreat". They had 15 children, and in real terms, it was a place to get rid of the kids. Frogmore House is therefore a former royal residence. Lord Louis was born in this large white mansion.

Queen Victoria set Frogmore House aside as the royal burial ground a few days after Prince Albert died in 1861. This was on the advice that the usual and more public Westminster Abbey would, at some point in the future, make it easier to ascertain whether a royal was of illegitimate parentage. The other royal burial ground is St. George's Chapel at neighbouring Windsor.

The mausoleum at Frogmore was designed, not by a Britisher, but by the German architect, Ludwig Gruner, in the form of a Greek Cross. Work began in 1862 and the mausoleum was finished in 1871.

There was grave robbing at Frogmore. This removed all non-royal graves from the site and some royal ones too. King George III's body would have been swished by the Freemasons so his poisoning could not be analysed and Queen Victoria would have organised the site with the words "prepare the site". Some grave robbing was organised by the victims to cover for more disingenuous activities, especially when pride was a part of history.

The royal burial ground, behind Victoria and Albert's Mausoleum contains the bodies of "most" members of the royal family (1861–1928), although it only includes three of Victoria's nine children: Princess Helena (d. 1923); Princess Louise (d. 1939); and Prince Arthur (d. 1942). Prince consort Albert was the father of Arthur, but the parentage of the two daughters is suspect. King Edward VIII (d. 1972) and Wallis Simpson (d. 1986) were also buried at the royal burial ground.

1861 to 1928 was a period when a lot of illegitimate high-ranking British royals were dying and buried at Frogmore. Consequently the royal burial ground at Frogmore is only "open six days a year". This includes 17–19 May (Mausoleum and garden), 25 May (Mausoleum only, closest Wednesday to Queen's Birthday) and 27–29 August (Bank Holiday, House, Gardens and Mausoleum).[20] This means the royal burial ground can be viewed over a fence only 5 days a year from 10 am–6 pm. This excludes casual DNA testing.

Consider Frogmore the Pharoh King's sealed crypt. The Duke of Kent was buried there because his death was delayed for over a quarter of a century. The DNA in Frogmore hides the secrets of the British royal family, their illegitimate origins, their murders including MAD (medically assisted death) and their delayed deaths.[21]

Before Marina, Duchess of Kent married she was a princess of Denmark and Greece (the Greek bit was by invitation and was quickly followed by exile). When Marina married on 29 November 1934 she became the Duchess of Kent, Countess of St. Andrews and Baroness Downpatrick. Just before her son married, she changed her title to HRH Princess Marina, Duchess of Kent as she was entitled to do. Her son, the new Duke of Kent then married the violinist Katherine Lucy Mary Worsley on 8 June 1961 and Katherine became the new HRH Duchess of Kent.

The new Duchess of Kent suffers from depression and chronic fatigue syndrome. (No wonder, look at what she married.) "I do love guidelines . . . I have wanted that all my life. I like to know what's expected of me. I like being told: 'You shall . . .'" In 1994 she converted to Roman Catholicism, the first senior royal to publicly do so since the 1700 Act of Settlement (touted as 1701) and in 2002 she voluntarily gave up the style HRH (Her Royal Highness) to become publicly known as Katharine, Duchess of Kent and privately as Katharine Kent.

The 1700 Act of Settlement has been interpreted with every form of excuse and the Duke of Kent did not lose his place in the line of succession to the British throne because his wife converted to Catholicism after they were married. Similarly a King could marry an Anglican and she could become a Catholic Queen and no one would do anything effective about it. Sure there would be the usual discussion in the papers, but what has that ever achieved. The Duchess of Kent became a Catholic and gave up her succession to the British throne, although her children are still in line to the throne by way of their Anglican HRH father.

[21] King George V was killed by MAD as was the Duke of Kent.

Her predecessor, HRH Princess Marina, Duchess of Kent died from a brain tumor at Kensington Palace on 27 August 1968. She was a 61-year-old Nazi and Colonel-in-chief of the Essex and Kent Scottish Regiment. She was originally buried at St. George's Chapel at Windsor, but was later reburied at the royal burial ground at Frogmore to be next to her husband, fellow Nazi-in-a-dress, the Duke of Kent.

The date of his reburial is not given, but is post 1968 and probably within a week of his actual death.

Fleet Air Arm: "I was in the desert arming and maintaining Beaufighters, but ended up receiving everything – South African Kittyhawks, Hurricanes, Mark V Spitfires, Free-French Baltimores, Free-Greek Baltimores and every other thing that could fly. The joke amongst ourselves was 'If anything came in and it was flown by a complete and utter Kraut and it had some variation of RAF markings that looked like the Krauts had painted it; and if they had a uniform that looked like it had been put together by a shoplifter working at Madam Tussaud's wax works; and if he couldn't speak English and all they could tell you was "Ya flieger, schnel schnel" ("I am a flyer, hurry, hurry")' – they were probably all right.

"All these foreigners were usually dripping in guns, nearly all German, and Luftwaffe flieger watches. A sure case of suspicion was a foreigner with a Mark V Webley in its correct holster and a Pommy watch."

The Webley was British. The German guns were better, so any one dripping in British guns was either a German spy or a dumb British and if a dumb British returned twice, he was a German spy . . . No one carried a British watch because they didn't work in the desert.

Fleet Air Arm: "They called on me one day saying, 'We are bringing you these Commandos and we need to teach them how to sabotage aircraft'. I tried to teach them how to attack the fuel-monitoring unit by taking it apart and reassembling it. The Commandos, the Marines, Popski's Army, NZLRDG (NZ Long Range Desert Group) – they could all understand, but the SAS couldn't and even the SAS Officers couldn't.[22]

"You could try to teach them how to stuff a rag under the sump and set fire to it and that was too complicated. SAS never understood anything that wasn't accompanied by a big bang. Anything else was an anathema to them. They really were the dumbest bastards in the whole of the Western Desert.

"There was this 10-year-old Bedouin kid [desert-dweller] everyone called 'Farouk'. He was thin and skinny and used to coat himself in a mixture of grease and tyre black and he' go around German aircraft and drill a hole with a corkscrew stolen from Shepherds and given to him by a New Zealand Army officer. Farouk probably got more Germans in the Western Desert by drilling holes halfway through the landing wheel than the rest of us.

"When the Me109G came out Farouk transferred his attentions to drilling a hole halfway through the supercharge inlet. He's believed to have downed Joachim Marseilles – the famous German pilot Ace. Marseilles certainly fell victim to an engine fire.

"We asked Farouk why he did it and he told us, 'I'm just here for the money'. He was Tunisian. He was paid in British pounds into an account in Switzerland and he'd been promised resettlement into his own restaurant in a British colony in South America.

"If he survived it would have been a miracle. The kid lived for the day he would be able to sit in his restaurant in a clean white shirt and be able to handle a white menu and not leave black marks everywhere. He'd been recruited by one of Popski's men working on Italian aircraft in his native Tunisia with a thorn from a bush called the Jerusalem Thorn. 'The vital thing was not to go to far with the thorn so the tail-wheel only gave out when the plane landed.'

"The trickiest thing in the Western Desert was sorting out the Allied aircraft from the German aircraft and Farouk told me that the markings had nothing to do with it. You actually had to go and listen to the pilots in order to tell which aircraft were targets. Farouk said, 'A lot of the high up pilots in the Luftwaffe actually spoke English together and were German aristocrats. I'd been told by British Intelligence to give them a wide birth. It was only the low class that spoke German together.'

[22] All Czechs during WWII wore Polish uniforms and Polish titles but spoke Czech. All wearing Czech uniforms during WWII were Poles. All of Popski's Army were Czechs who spoke Czech, but didn't wear the uniform or carry the title of a Czech or a Pole. The desert was full of Catch 22s.

"We took Farouk into town once, into Cairo and dressed him up. When we were passing Gray Pillars we were challenged by an MP. I was asked 'What are you doing with this boy?' I became nonplussed and didn't know what to say and then Farouk said, 'He makes me wash his socks and bums me every night' and the MP turned to me and said, 'You'd better hire another to wash your socks. You have to treat these Wogs right, after all Egypt is there country.' I wandered off admonished and Farouk led the way from behind."[23]

Spymaster: "I was told this story by another army officer who had been in intelligence and the only spies that were any good and wouldn't rob you blind were whores and they were Jewish whores that worked for MI-6, the Mossad and God knows who else.

"They befriended me and looked after me all the time I was in the UK. They told me some amazing things. They told me that the whole place was run by Prince Philip but they were right because they knew what he liked.

"The only ones you had to watch out for were the KGB and Jews and some of them could be quite nasty. They told me that New Zealand was regarded by all British and American military personnel as 'The Dump' and anything that was no longer of any use went there, and in Britain's case, at a huge expense to the New Zealand taxpayer.

"One night two of these ladies came up to me and told me to watch out for this British Admiral. He was particularly nasty and was getting backhanders from all directions including Vickers and was intent on getting rid of some Leander Class frigates.

"The particularly nasty Admiral was told by the First Sea Lord at the party, 'Any luck getting rid of those Frigates Old Bean?' and the Admiral said, 'No, even the Indians don't want them. They know they're clapped out.' Whereupon the First Sea Lord said, 'Have you tried the Kiwis?' and the Admiral replied, 'No, I haven't. Never thought of them', and the First Sea Lord replied, 'Do try them. Their money is just as good as anyone else's and they're still as thick as the bulkheads on the Bismarck.'

[23] Gray Pillars was a distinctive building owned by Omar Sirry. It was the British Headquarters located at 10 Tolombat, Garden City, Cairo and was headed by Ministers' Oliver Lyttelton (July 1941), Richard Cassey, then Lord Moyne. The locals called it 'Assicurazioni' and believed the British, war or no war, had overstayed their welcome. The British set up a football field and a cricket pitch around Gray Pillars and the locals used this to stage quick Sieg heils (gun shots) before they dived for cover in the undergrowth.

"Of course I reported my knowledge back through the chain of command to Wellington [NZ]. Not long after I received a rocket [telling off]. On the day I received the rocket for sending half-arsed information through service channels, I noted two things in the British papers the next day. My ladies of the evening had disappeared to Israel and New Zealand had purchased a number of Leander Class frigates."[24]

Of course Kiwi Keith had been dipping his 'keel' in a bowl of 'rice' and the only people using their real names in London in the 70s were the guys stealing cars for London TV.

Spymaster: "Sunderlands couldn't land on choppy water. They used to land in Wellington (NZ) at Evans Bay, to the side of Shelley Bay on an RNZAF Base. It was still in use after WWII until at least 1969. They used to fly up and down the Bay two or three times before they'd come in and the water used to plane off the hull beautifully and the pilot used to make it look comparatively easy to set down. The reason it was so easy landing was the sheltered bay. This big bow wave would come off the hull and pour salt water all over the tail of the aircraft. Being RNZAF aircraft the engines used to perform like Swiss watches – they were maintained up in Hobsonville. The other RNZAF base was Lualatha Bay in Fiji. New Zealand Sunderlands were all white, whereas WWII aircraft had all white hulls with grey and green across the tops.

"The RNZAF would add Molybendum Sulphate to the engine oils and get 10–20% more power. The Americans developed this for use in Flying Fortresses flying at extreme heights for the attack on Germany. It was shipped out to New Zealand in May 1945 for the attack on Japan. The RNZAF had big drums of it at Hobsonville and would share it with the civilian flown demilitarized Sunderland s.45, known as the Solent.

"A Warrant Officer/mechanic at Hobsonvillle knew all the interchangeability of Sunderland parts. Officially he was meant to be retired, but was retained and worked on operating Sunderlands until 1970. He managed to blackmail the RNZAF so ended up with a commission rank as Wing Commander which is not bad for a mechanic.

"The first to fly a small fighter attached to a long-range bomber were Shorts of Sunderland fame. It worked so they stopped doing it. The next to do it were the Luftwaffe. The Germans called these 'Mistel' [Mistletoe – probably a reference to kissing cousins]. This was always treated like a top secret aviation programme of the Third Reich, but in actual event the idea came from England and was first developed and trialled by Shorts.

"I have had high-ranking Luftwaffe personnel tell me 'this is a fact' and could not understand why the British didn't continue with it. It was in common use in Germany and was considered to be the ideal end for a number of worn-out aircraft. Germans filled them with explosives and sent them into attack in heavily defended locations – most of which happened to be on the Eastern Front."

> "The original concept was proposed to the RLM in 1941 by Siegfried Holzbauer, a Junkers test pilot. His idea was to make use of 'tired' Junkers Ju 88 airframes by packing them with explosives, fly them near a target and crash them into the target after the fighter had released itself. The fighter pilot would control the missile after release by remote control. The first conversion flew in July 1943 . . . a further 15 conversions, with the code name Beethoven . . . an eventual thickness of 60 feet of reinforced concrete was breached . . . over 250 Mistels of various combinations were built . . ."[25]

Spymaster: "I know the KG200, the elite bomber Geschwader [organisation] of the Luftwaffe used these aircraft and that at the end of the war, they were used in an attack on Russian bridges on the Western Rhine which was captured in tact by the US Army.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

"At the end of the war, the British held a famous air show at Farnborough where they exhibited a number of new inventions from Germany. Nearly all these aircraft had hastily applied British roundels and hastily applied Air Ministry numbers on the tails blocking out the Swastika.

"No one noticed apart from MI-6 entourage that the upside down engines in all German aircraft were courtesy of MI-6 and that the revolutionary Mistral design had been stolen from Shorts. [The Mistel was gifted by Arthur Gouge to the Freemasons who then gave it to Nazi Germany].

"The latest German-fighter ejection seats were not exhibited because they were busy being stolen by the executives of Martin-Baker who were touring the Luftwaffe base at Rechlin[26] [and Lärz] with an assortment of tools, stealing many things and intent on bringing them back to be discovered anew in the United Kingdom.

"No doubt there was similar activity from Rolls Royce and the Russians who stole early Rolls Royce designs of jet engines, among them the Rolls Royce Nene which turned up on a MIG-17 bearing a striking resemblance to a Messerschmitt fighter. In the 1980s the Russians ended up paying manufacturing rights to Rolls Royce for the use of these stolen designs.

"Similar things were happening down at Vickers with the Vampire. This is all just post-WWII and the gun ports had just gone cold."

British Intelligence Officer: "Confusion in wartime is the result of the British being as bent as a dingo's hind-leg whereas confusion in peacetime is the result of the British government's arms and drug dealing – euphemistically called 'Black Velvet" – organised by MI-6 and covered by the Air Police.

"One could delve into the history of any type of British aircraft and find a mass of confusion. Whenever a plane is pressed into or out of military service there's an opportunity for confusion.

"MI-6 and MI-5 got very excited in the early days of WWI when they suddenly realised that mastery of the air provided them with a whole new environment in which to stage accidents. No longer would they have to rely on people falling down gang-planks, poisoned by a Chief Steward, crushed by a cistern falling off a ship's toilet wall, or eaten by a shark. Now there was a whole new environment brimming with possibilities, completely at their beck-and-call.

"The RAF used to have huge rows about how someone had supposedly died in the air, but they found Winterbotham hugely accommodating and never looked back. A special section of the RAF was formed to master this new environment – Air 3 – and F. W. Winterbotham became Wing Commander responsible for the distribution of Ultra intelligence.

"All the museum historians are picked solely for their ability to swallow the bullshit from the officially embedded historians as they die off. In Short/Sunderland's case, none of their buildings remain at Rochester – there is no plaque and no museum, only a ramp going into the sea and a new motorway. In extreme cases museum historians are left uninstructed and in highly secretive cases they are left without a museum."

[26] Rechlin is a small remote village in Mecklenburg-Vorpommern, Germany – an area closely related to, and heavily influenced by the British royal family. Rechlin was a testing ground for aircraft from 1916 and was the main testing ground for new Luftwaffe aircraft during the Third Reich, up to 1944/45 when Lärz was included. Plane construction was carried out by forced labour from the nearby Ravensbrück concentration camp.

Sabotaged Sunderland Development

The Sunderland model s.23 had a maximum speed of 320 kmph with a cruise speed of 265 kmph, a laughably small range, an empty weight of 10,900 kg and a loaded weight of 18,400 kg meaning it could carry 7500 kg. It had four 686 kW engines, a length of 27 metres and a wingspan of 35 metres.

The Sunderland model s.23 (4 July 1936–38) was a very slow and heavy plane with a laughable payload and range. This made it next to useless, which made it all the more loved by the British and utilised by the British monarchy. It was a flying turtle.

In 1937 the second and third C-Class flying boats were stripped down and given additional fuel tanks to make the transatlantic flights, but its payload was minimal, maintaining its overriding characteristic – Sunderlands could fly, but little else.

In 1938 the Sunderland model s.30 was delivered with Pegasus 22 engines providing 753 kW each. This was a 10% improvement in engine output, but only eight were built.

In September 1939 three bigger-and-better Sunderland s.26 G-Class flying boats were built powered by four Bristol Hercules engines providing 1030 kW – 50% up on the first model. This increased the range to 4800 km and could carry a combined weight of 34,000 kg – 85% up on the first model. The plane was starting to become useful so it underwent a name change.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

When WWII started in September 1939 these flying boats were pressed into military service for ocean patrol with four 7.7 mm guns (.303).

When the slow and cumbersome s.23 Empire boats were pressed into military service, the RAF called it the s.25. With much love and little quality they became "one of the most famous flying boats ever built" and the first Sunderland Mark I flew on 16 October 1937 (15 months after the first s.23).

The new Pegasus XXII engines with 753 kW were not ready and the planes were fitted with Bristol Pegasus X engines 709 kW making them 10% less powerful. This required a new wing design. The new Pegasus XXII engines were ready on 7 March 1938 with 21 production models on order dating back two years.

The modified military version, the A.33 was delayed for 5 months to October 1938. The new flap system shortened the length of takeoff. It was fitted with three .303 guns which meant it could kill in all directions but do little damage to other aircraft. Due to the heavy .303 machine gun tail turret, the wings were swept back 4.25° which meant the engines and floats had to be canted slightly. This was tinkering without forethought. The A.33 suffered structural failure during taxi trials and was scrapped – never to fly.

The new thicker wings carried four Pegasus XXII engines, six drum fuel tanks with a total capacity of 9200 litres. Four more fuel tanks were later added behind the rear wing spar giving 11,602 litres. This could then carry 900 kg of bombs, mines and later depth charges. Ordnance was carried inside the fuselage (the body of the plane) and winched out under the wings through wide hatches on each side of the fuselage.

Originally the number of crew was 7, but this increased to 11 and later to 13. The Sunderland Mark I had six bunks and a galley with a stove for cook-ups. The first Sunderland Mark I was delivered in June 1938. By September 1939 at the outbreak of WWII the RAF were operating 40 Sunderlands. The Sunderland had no ability to land on land and could only take off from water. If it landed on land, it was a crash.

The Sunderland quickly proved themselves to be inadequate against German submarines and U-boats. They were adapted with depth charges which would bounce off the water back up into the air and hit the tail of the Sunderland and explode. With sufficient embarrassment the depth charges were designed to sink before they exploded (Torpex depth charges from early 1943), but this was countered by a new form of self-sabotage, early warning-to-the-enemy radar.

In October 1941 Sunderlands were fitted with Anti-Surface Vessel radar (ASV Mark II) meaning it could only detect vessels on the surface. This was a primitive form of low-frequency radar with a wavelength of 1.5 metres and featured 22 stickleback aerials dotted all over the plane making it look like an Asian apartment.

The ASV Mark II radar (and not the plane) were picked up by the German radar warning system, Metox. This reversed the kills from German to British for the 18 months from October 1941 to early 1943. The British fitted ASV Mark II radar downed a lot of British planes.

German U-boats and submarines with longer range and more powerful weapons could detect the Sunderland crawling along the sky and would fire while the flying turtle was still out of its range. The Sunderlands had become completely useless against German submarines and U-boats and any British who went out in Sunderlands from October 1941 to early 1943 went out as cannon fodder. This was a crucial turning point in the war.

> The Sunderlands would have been more effective without the radar as it was their ASV Mark II radar that made them detectable and not the plane. For this their British CEO of design and development, Arthur Gouge, was cited for a knighthood.

A total of 75 Sunderland Mark Is were built – around 30 by Short's factories in Rochester, England, 15 by Blackburn at Dumbarton, and around 30 by factories in Belfast in Northern Ireland. The Irish did not like the British and equally supported the Germans. This meant that up to 40% of the Sunderland Mark I were up for sabotage and it only takes one sabotage to make history.

Short knew this and vetted all the Irish workers ensuring they were all Protestant, British loyalists and loyal members of the Lodge. It was a well-known Protestant boast that "It was harder for a Cattle Dog [Catholic] to get a job at Shorts than it was for a camel to squeeze its way through the eye of a needle."

After 18 months of pro-German/anti-British kills and with the loss of many Sunderlands, the new barely-improved Mark III was fitted with ASV Mark III centimetric band antennas.

Production had moved to the Sunderland Mark II for a short period (August–December 1941). The Mark II featured Pegasus XVIII engines with two-speed superchargers providing 794 kW each and a high turnover of engines. This was an improvement on the Pegasus XXII engines of 5% and a reduction in power on the September 1939 Bristol Hercules engines of 30% – providing a new version that was underpowered from 2 years prior. The near useless .303 rounds were maintained, but with twice the ammunition capacity – 4000 rounds. 43 Sunderland Mark IIs were built (5 by Blackburn at Dumbarton, 15 miles downstream from Glasgow in Scotland).

In December 1941 production moved to the Sunderland Mark III with improved seaworthiness – less water inside and a new hull step that allowed the plane to come unstuck from the water in a smoother curve as opposed to an abrupt separation. Happy with this, a total of 461 were built; 170 by Blackburn (Scotland) and the remaining 291 by the Short Brothers in Rochester (England), Belfast (Northern Ireland) and a new plant at Lake Windemere in the Lake District (north of Manchester).

A Mark I Sunderland in war colours belonging to No. 210 Squadron. The Pegasus engines were massively underpowered and the engines would fail on a regular basis, sometimes three on one trip. Ocassionally the crew had to run up and down inside the cabin space to try and break the suction from the water. The Mark I could take off on one engine but it took up to 10 miles to leave the water. This Mark I Sunderland had side blister guns prior to the dorsal turrret.

The Sunderland Mark III had a maximum speed of 340 kmph, a range of 4800 km, an empty weight of 14,970 kg and a maximum load weight of 26,130 kg meaning it could carry 11,160 kg. It was 26 metres long, 9.8 metres high, had a wingspan of 34.4 metres and a service ceiling of 4575 metres (15,000 feet).

This was supposed to be an improvement on the Sunderland s.23 which first flew five years earlier. It wasn't. It was still a flying turtle.

After more than five years of British improvements the maximum speed had increased by 10 mph, the length had decreased by 1 metre, the wingspan had decreased by 0.3 metres, the empty weight had increased by 4070 kg and the range was the same as the G-Class built in September 1939. The only improvement after five years was that it could carry 3600 kg more, but it still had a laughably small range.

The Sunderlands stemmed from a competition for long-range aircraft and they struggled to make the distance, only doing so with additional fuel tanks. With these designs and self-sabotage in mind, designer Arthur Gouge (1890–1962) was knighted and promoted to President of the Royal Aeronautical Society. Neither now exist.

Some of the Sunderland's were only used for search rescue and on 21 September 1939 two Sunderlands rescued 34 crew off the torpedoed merchantman Kensington Court in the North Sea. All Sunderlands were available to be fitted with a bright Leigh searchlight to make night rescue possible. These Leigh searchlights were fitted to very few Sunderlands thus ensuring any British shot down in the afternoon had a maximum chance of drowning. The Leigh searchlights were not rare as both New Zealand Sunderands had them. It was just that they weren't fitted to the British flying boats.

Propaganda was high and all records of kills were well kept. A Royal Australian Air Force Sunderland (RAAF) managed its first kill, a U-boat on 17 July 1940, after which the new early warning-to-the-enemy ASV Mark II radar was installed. This sabotaged every Sunderland opportunity from October 1941 to early 1943.

On 3 April 1940, a Sunderland operating off Norway was attacked by six German Ju88 fighters (exactly a month after the CABOT and CARIBOU incidents). The Sunderland shot one Junkers down, damaged another and drove off the rest. The British then said the Germans named their Sunderland the "Fliegende Stachelsweine" (Flying Porcupine) referring to its abundance of small short range fire and lack of big firepower (cannons). The Sunderlands were well built and could take many hits, but it was better named the 'Flying Turtle', or 'Show Pony'. It was only luck if a Sunderland downed a plane and only luck if it returned home – 93 % of them didn't.

On 2 June 1943 an RAAF Sunderland Mark III did battle with eight Ju88 long-range fighters. There were nine Australians on board and only two British. They were under the command of Australian Lieutenant Colin Walker, so they had a better chance.

The Sunderland was searching for the remains of the actor Leslie Howard whom they were told had crashed in the Bay of Biscay the day before (1 June 1943), but Leslie Howard was covering for his homosexuality by doubling for Winston Churchill and was shot down over the English Channel after his 'location, departure time and direction' were leaked to the Germans through known double agents.

Eight Ju88s were spotted so the Sunderland immediately dropped all its depth charges (making it useless against German submarines and U-boats) went to full revs (which all the earlier models had to fly at normally) and did corkscrew evasive manoeuvres. One engine got knocked out. On the fighters' third pass, the top turret gunner managed to shoot one Ju88 down and on the fourth pass a second was shot down.

On the fifth pass most of the crew were hit and one was mortally wounded. Only two Ju88s made it back to base. The others were nicked and faltered. The Sunderland Mark III crew threw everything overboard and nursed the flying boat back to the Cornish coast, beached it in the surf, waded to shore, then watched the waves break it up.

Lieutenant Colin Walker got a DSO and a ground job, sick of the Flying Turtle. The surviving nine crew went up in another Sunderland and were shot down by six Ju88 two months later. There were no survivors.

What makes this tale all the more interesting is that there were no Sunderlands listed as downed in August 1943. The closest was the CAMILLA which crashed at Port Moresby on 22 April 1943, followed by the CLIFTON at Sydney on 18 November 1944.

Throughout the entire six year war 749 Sunderlands[27] managed to destroy 28 U-boats and assist in sinking 7 more. To say that they were a reconnaissance aircraft and not a defensive or attack aircraft is a cop out. This was the worst ratio of any aircraft in the history of WWII.[28] By the end of the war less than 50 Sunderlands in service had survived.

[27] Some say approximately 600 Sunderlands.

The circumstances of the demise of most Sunderlands were not listed as flying boats were a matter of public pride. Sunderlands were lost leaders.

In early 1943 the new centimetric radar completely baffled the German's Metox radar at first, which meant the British Sunderlands could see German surface vessels before the Germans could shoot them down.

The Germans reacted by increasing the size and range of their firepower to two 37 mm and eight 20 mm flak guns. This was far bigger than the British 7.7 mm guns and Sunderlands that were hit then tried to crash into the German submarines, but only one Sunderland managed it. With no improvements coming from the government, the crew adapted their own Sunderlands with 12.7 mm (0.5 calibre) machine guns.

This was officially frowned upon and was usually resorted to only by Colonial Trash and Machine Gun Thieves (the CT & MGT). Quite often they doubled for each other and swapped places at midnight. It was quite common in the early part of the war to see Italian 20 mm Breda Machine Guns fitted to British aircraft under Colonial control. The Greeks and the French preferred German weaponry.

A Maori Warrant Officer received over thirty warnings that his mounting German machine guns on a Bren Gun carrier was illegal and action would soon be taken against him. As a good Maori he wrote back saying, "As I'm planning to be killed soon, I won't be taking this seriously". He was eventually sent home. This was simpler and less painful than shooting himself in the leg.

The Sunderland Mark IV was then developed with more powerful Hercules XVII 1253 kW engines (a 66% improvement), seven 12.7 mm machine guns and a twin 20 mm cannon. Two prototypes were made and 30 production models were ordered with Hercules 1720 Hp XIX engines (1283 kW, a 70% improvement). These Sunderlands were so different and so vastly improved they were redesignated the s.45 Seaford.

[28] There were minor exceptions, mainly British.

The s.45 Seaford was finally an effective and far superior flying weapon, equal to the improved German Junkers Ju52/3m g10e. Intended for the Pacific, it did not see any combat and was sabotaged by production too late to see any action, creating yet another period of self-sabotaged British development. Even the prototypes were not used in action. The first Sunderland Mark IV/s.45 Seaford's flew in April 1945, just weeks before WWII ended, so it was too little too late.

The s.23 Sunderland/s.25 Sandringham engines suffered from overheating. This caused them and their successors' engines to be replaced more than any other plane's engine, and this was on a very regular basis. The Sunderland V developed out of crew concerns for the engines which had to be run on full combat power at all times.

Australian crews were not self-saboteurs and refused to love things that didn't work to capacity, so they demanded the Pegasus engines be replaced with Pratt & Whitney R-1830-90B Twin Wasp engines. These 14-cylinder engines provided 895 kW each, were an improvement on the high-maintenance Pegasus XVIII supercharged 794 kW engines by 12% and the 753 kW Pegasus XXII engines by 18%. The main advantage of the American engines was vastly reduced maintenance and the ability to fly when two engines were down on the same wing.

If two Pegasus engines on a Sunderland got hit, it steadily lost altitude and crashed dead in the water, or very dead on land.

To produce the Sunderland Mark V, two Sunderland Mark IIIs were taken off the production line in early 1944 and fitted with four American Pratt & Whitney engines. The plane could now maintain altitude with two engines down on one wing and could cruise without the engines running in combat mode, and the range was the same. This was the first development of the Sunderland that was not self-sabotage, but it was also too little too late.

The first non-sabotaged Sunderland made it to operation in February 1945, two months before the end of the war, but were still fitted with near useless .303 machine guns and the new centimetric AV Mark VIC radar which had been used on the Mark IIIs for some time. The 12.7 mm guns and 20 mm cannon on the Mark IV were dropped for no apparent reason other than the British sabotage of Australian crews.

155 Sunderland Mark Vs were built and 33 Mark IIIs were converted (which meant changing the British engines to American). The last Mark V was delivered in June 1946 with a total production of 749 Sunderlands since their inception.

In 1940 the British Air Ministry requested another four-engined flying boat, this time for long-range reconnaissance with heavy defensive armament and an offensive war load of 1815 kg. The first prototype was flown on 14 December 1944 with dummy nose and tail turrets and no guns. The Shetland was substantially bigger, had a greenhouse cockpit for better vision and twice the takeoff payload. It was powered by four Bristol Centaurus XI 18-cylinder radial 1865 kW engines and 4-bladed propellers. Its range 7100 km, speed 423 kmph and service ceiling 5180 metres (17,000 ft) made it far superior to the Sunderland, but it never made it into production and caught fire on its moorings on 28 January 1946.

A second passenger carrying prototype was made and flown on 17 September 1947, flown several more times and then scrapped, never to fly a commercial flight.

> All the Sunderlands, Shetlands and Princesses were sabotaged, either by using under-powered high-maintenance engines that if two failed the plane crashed, early warning-to-the-enemy ASV Mark II radar, using .303 machine guns, not using or removing 20 mm cannon, by the timing of the improved models, and by delayed production.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

To increase the sabotage, six Sunderland Mark IIIs were stripped down and used as mail carriers by the BOAC (British Overseas Airways Corporation) and another 29 were refitted as mail carriers and passenger liners carrying (wait for it) 24 passengers. Another form of sabotage, this removed 35 Sunderland Mark IIIs from wartime service.

> This was such a shameful period in British aviation history that it was covered up by the most impractical of last resorts – 'love'. In war, love is as useless as tits on a bull. It is the equivalent of expecting a sexually bent Air Commodore, Inspector-General of RAF Welfare, or Commander of the Air Defence of Scotland to act in the best interests of their country.

AOTEAROA

CUMBERLAND/AWARUA/AOTEAROA (G-AFDA/ZK-AMC/ZK-AMA).

According to Shorts this Sunderland was delivered on 25 May 1939. Other official records show it arrived in August 1939. The newspapers note its first flight was Auckland to Sydney on 1 May 1940. Pictured is the return maiden voyage over Auckland on 2 May 1940.

ZK-AMA AOTEAROA was replaced in 1947 and then broken up. The replacement was a complete failure and was replaced again in 1950 with the Mark IV variant specifically built for TEAL (Tasman Empire Airways Limited) with a steeper inset hull. The Mark IV/Solent final service was on 14 September 1960. It was then stored at Hobsonville, officially until May 1966 and then onto the Auckland Museum of Transport and Technology.

KIWIs recognise there was a flying boat, but not that there were three different types. They also note Sunderlands still skimming Wellington waters in 1969.

Post War Refitting

After WWII, a number of Mark IIIs were refitted as Sandringham Mark I and a number of Mark V were refitted as Sandringham Mark II.

In 1946 the second production of Sunderland Mark V/Seafords were loaned to BOAC for evaluation as a civil airliner and 12 were converted into Solent Mark 2. Most of the early RAF Mark V were rebuilt as Solent Mark 3s. These were then sold to the civilian public as Solents and not Sunderlands. A Solent is a demilitarised Sunderland with the front and rear gun turrets removed and the nose and tail reshaped.

Sunderlands continued to be used by the RAF after the war in 1948, landing on Hitler's ill-famed Lake Havel. They then resupplied the British Greenland expedition (1951–54) and were then phased out.

In 1951, 19 Sunderlands were recondition in Belfast for Aeronavale (French naval air arm) and 16 were reconditioned in England for the RNZAF (Royal New Zealand Air Force). France used theirs until 1960 and New Zealand until the early 60s.

The New Zealand flying boat was actually launched in Belfast (not England) by Queen Elizabeth II in 1949 (not 1950) which helped to sell it to New Zealand as a new Solent with no mention, ever, that it was a converted Sunderland with altered nose and tail.

> The Sunderland was used until 1970, not the early 60s and always drew a crowd of Kiwis – Keen Interest Without Intelligence.

But what's worse is that this was done three times and each series of flying boat sold to New Zealand was sabotaged. The first two Sunderlands had the same two successive names but in reverse order (AO-TEA-ROA/AWARUA/AOTEAROA). These were both replaced twice and the new planes retained the same name and serial number so when the civilian and military talk about a Canpous, Sunderland, Solent, Empire class or C class and how to differentiate between the planes, it was all wrong. One flying boat could be all of these things. This ruse was backed up by the RNZAF who still teach-to-confuse onto all matters Sunderland and Solent. The RNZAF do not even complain that one of their planes never arrived.

> Getting ripped off by the British was akin to getting sodomised by the British, so for the RNZAF, Mum's the word.

More Colonial Confusion

In 1938 Union Airways placed an order for the three Empire class flying boats to be delivered to New Zealand. "Certificates for work carried out were presented by Short Bros. to Imperial Airways Limited, to be honoured within seven days. The final certificate, when the aircraft was handed over at delivery, was due for payment within 14 days."[29] Often this delivery took place months later, or not at all.

Twelve days prior to WWII Britain delivered two of the three planes to New Zealand which arrived four months after the official April delivery date on 28 August 1939. These were s.30 Sunderlands romantically referred to as Empire class and operated until 1947. The third boat never arrived, but New Zealand still made all the progress payments. Three years after the official delivery date this third Sunderland was destroyed at Bathurst off West Africa on 14/15 September 1942 while still under British command.

"Four larger 30-seat Short s.25 Sandringham class flying boats replaced the two smaller Empire Class craft in 1946, but these proved unreliable through overheating engines and were replaced by s.45 Solent flying boats."[30]

> The s.25 Sandringham suffered from overheating engines, but New Zealand stuck with them from 1947–50. The s.23 Sunderland/Empire boat was the same was the s.25 but with military applications. When these were removed the s.23 and s.25 were the same. The Sunderland Mark IV, s.45 Seaford and Solent were also the same plane. Their difference was in the romantic attachment placed on them.

Solent Mark IV flying boat ZK-RMA ARANUI was built by Short Brothers and Harland Ltd in Belfast and delivered to TEAL on 30 November 1949. It was the last of four Solents to be built. Its inaugural flight was from Wellington to Sydney 5/6 October 1950, 11 months after it was officially delivered. The last officially recorded flight was Cook Islands – Samoa – Fiji – Auckland on 15 September 1960, but it was still flying in 1969 between RNZAF bases in New Zealand and Fiji.

Zealand in 1953, they walked 7 metres apart with another standing between them. (Wing Commander George Gudsell in full fruit salad.) Their sexual relationship was already over. They entered into a portside door 0.6 metres above the tide, the same level as the dock. One could step straight from the dock into the cabin door and down to the lower level. Any ramp was just for tidal convenience. The portside door sill was at the same level as the lower level window sills.

> Eleven years earlier her uncle had walked in the portside door and out the starboard side door. This is how history is made for the oligarchy and confused for the masses.

Sabotage by Salvage

The British have a way of writing history that puts them in gentlemanly stead and none of the crashed Sunderlands were attributed to have any salvaged parts. The G-AFRB was retained as unfinished and never flown because almost all of the salvaged parts were attributed to it, yet it always remained 75% complete. Salvage was expensive. Little of the salvaged planes was ever put to use and crashes were never blamed on salvaged parts.

Parts of the crashed CYGNUS (December 1937) were used in the G-ARFB that never flew. The mainplanes were stored in the open and when High Duty Alloys came to test spar boom extrusions, they were under strength and had to be scrapped. The tail unit, engine nacelles and rear section of the hull were most likely reused, but this plane never flew.[31]

The CAPELLA was salvaged almost entirely and shipped back to Rochester. The wing floats, some of the control surfaces and the anchor were re-used. Salvage and recovery cost £2100, 20% of the price of new Sunderland, so salvaging was “scrapped”, but in reality continued. The date of the CAPELLA crash is given as both 12 March 1938 and 12 March 1939.

When the CHALLENGER was salvaged after only three days immersion in the sea, a knife could be pushed through the magnesium alloy reduction gear casing of the engines. The alloys were that bad. Regardless, the airscrews, with their bent blades, mainplanes, tail unit and engines were salvaged in May 1939.

The CENTURION crashed on the Hoogly river at Calcutta on 1 May 1939 (or 12 June 1939). The aft end of the hull, the tail planes, the fin and rudder, three engines and airscrews and the fuel and oil tanks were salvaged.

The CLYDE flipped over in a hurricane and four engines and airscrews, oil tanks, the two elevators, one aileron, the port wing float and the radio equipment were salvaged. The Relunit fuel tank valves were reconditioned and officially used in the tanks of the G-AFRB that never flew.

The engines of CONNEMARA were brought up from the bottom of Southampton Water and stripped down.

Many of the flying boats were ordered as replacements for the ones that had crashed. Many crashed, so there were many orders. Obviously there was collusion with the insurance companies, so Lloyds was probably involved and salvage was probably demanded. The last order on 7 June 1939 was for three s.33 hybrid aircraft, the CLIFTON, CLEOPATRA and G-AFRB (Construction No. S1025–S1027). Work on the 43rd boat was stopped when it was about 75% complete and it became the blaming ground for all salvaged parts. The G-AFRB was never flown and never attempted to fly.

Sabotage of Sunderlands was prolific as the Queen’s world expert Brian Cassidy states in Flying Empires:

> “Why was CAPRICORNUS descending in a snow storm with the engines throttled back, just before it struck the ground? How many of the Horseshoe route ‘boats were re-engined with Pegasus XXII engines? Some of the Horseshoe route ‘boats had their fuel tankage increased from 650 gals. to 1010 gals. What effect did this have on the mainplane spars? Indeed, how many spar designs were there? There is reference in the Type Record of a Mark II. Why was the hull of the forty-third ‘boat kept in its crate in the Barge Yard until as late as 1943? How did CORSAIR get so far off course before setting down on the River Dangu? And what really happened to CIRCE and CLARE, both of whom disappeared over the water with their passengers and crews? Traces of CLARE were found but nothing was heard or seen of CIRCE.”[32]

Nothing was heard of the CARIBOU either.

PAN AMERICAN

The rare starboard side passenger door as shown in Raiders of the Lost Ark (1981). The real China Clipper crashed in 1945 and none of the American Pan Am Flying boats survived past 1946.

This Raiders flying boat was British built and found in a museum in San Francisco with one engine still working. The Pan American logo was added and the plane was superimposed at Treasure Island Naval Base by Industrial Light and Magic.

The Raiders flying boat is the surviving CARIBOU – the back up for the CABOT. Some things are best hidden in plain sight and the homosexual occult is full of such jokes.

Filming for Raiders of the Lost Ark began in the summer of 1980. This points to the Duke of Kent dying before this date, otherwise the CARIBOU would not have been used.

The Duke of Kent's lover, the Duke of Hamilton flew to the west coast of America in 1946 for no formal or declared reason. Perhaps it was to offload the CARIBOU. His landing was noteable in that one landing wheel failed to open and he walked away unharmed.

Dunkirk

Operation DYNAMO

19 May–4 June 1940

Early on in the war, it was evident that Goering and Hitler were both British agents, although they may not have known each other were. Doentiz, Raeder, Milch, Canaris and Oster were also British agents, as was Rosenbaud who was codenamed 'The Griffen'. Most of them were accessed after WWI when they were POWs in British hands. Canaris had many heart-to-hearts with British Interrogating Officers as did Doenitz, who was under psychiatric care in Manchester (October 1918–July 1919).

Rosenbaud was an Austrian Army Officer captured by the British. He was turned around by a lowly British Regimental I.O. in Italy at the end of WWI. Rosenbaud went on to report to British Control Officers right through the 20s, 30s and 40s and was ultimately taken over by the Americans. At the end of WWII Rosenbaud was awarded the American Medal of Freedom, while his ex-wife became the chief of the Stasi. Whoever said spying wasn't in the family.

A huge number of other German officers would rewrite reports, fudge documents and not work in Germany's interests. Defeatism was rampant right through the entire German Armed Forces and played a part in nearly all battlefield loses, including Dunkirk. The loss of the four German battleships is a case in point.

Every loss was accompanied by a massive breach of standing orders and procedures. In virtually none of these cases was the offending officer prosecuted and someone else always became the scapegoat. This was controlled warfare on an enormous scale that breached both sides to the point of musical chairs.

British Captain Liddel Hart (Ret.) was renowned as a newspaper columnist and military strategist for the press. He had written several books on armoured tactics which the German General Guderian praised as giving him all his ideas. Liddel Hart ran around with a suitcase containing groceries and pad paper and was well-known by German officers in every Allied holding camp as a virtual shop steward for German Generals. He was on very friendly terms with most of them and practised the time-honoured ritual of feeding them from his picnic basket disguised as a suitcase. Then he got down to the details. Hart had no secretary and was not worried by keeping notes as the conversations were taped.

At all times Hart denied anything other than academic interest. He wrote letters for German Generals complaining about their treatment, their wife's treatment and even the schoolwork of their children. He got American camps to hand over their German Generals and accomplished tasks with such ease, that he was very obviously connected to the higher rungs of SIS and Army Intelligence.

When denied favours, he would say, "Do you mind if we just ring George or Trevor [his handlers back in Britain] and I'm sure everything will be all right" . . . and it always was. Moments later all obstructions were cleared and Captain Liddel Hart (Ret.) could do whatever pleased him or the German General he was either feeding, supporting, interviewing, or influencing.

Spymaster: "British Intelligence was a monumental fuck up. There were so many different outfits doing exactly the same thing that nobody could figure out what they did, what was going on, or what the outcome was supposed to be. Working with them were the Czechs, the Poles, the Greeks and the Free-French, the Danes, Norwegians and even the Free-Finns, so it was an orgy of malconstructed misnomers and faux pas of intelligence gathering. As such, British Intelligence was the Keystone Cops of misconstruction and indeed the Keystone Cops were films based around intelligence gathering.

From 15 to 22 May 1940 the Germans made their famous sickle-stroke move (Sichelschitt) sweeping southwards into France and then northwards towards Dunkirk and Calais. The French and British who had advanced into Belgium found themselves separated by the German Panzer tank corridor.

On 19 May 1940 British Commander Viscount Gort considered withdrawing the British Expeditionary Force (BEF) to the coast for escape by sea, but the British government refused. The same day Admiral Bertram Ramsay was ordered to prepare for an evacuation. The person who gave this order is left out of the history books. "On 19 May, had ordered Admiral Bertram Ramsay to prepare for an evacuation [sic]."[1]

[1] WWII, p. 15.

Mistakes and omissions in history are the strongest indication of where the real history lies.

By 22 May 1940 the French and British were threatened with encirclement. All the Channel ports were taken by the Germans except for Dunkirk and all the Allied hands withdrew to Dunkirk in hope of a sea rescue. British Commander Viscount Gort realised he was running short of supplies and ammunition and ordered the British to fall back towards the coast. The Allies set up their final line of defence at Canal d'Aire outside Dunkirk.

On 24 May 1940 the Germans broke through this final line of defence and 340,000 British and Allies were trapped. Two-thirds of them were British and their most experienced troops. Another 220,000 Allied troops were trapped at Cherbourg, Saint-Malo, Brest and Saint-Nazaire. In three weeks the German army had taken more than one million Allied prisoners and trapped 560,000 British and Allied troops, while sustaining only 60,000 German casualties.

Goering promised Hitler he could finish off the British and Allies at Dunkirk with the Luftwaffe alone. But Hitler ordered the German troops to stop advancing and to stop attacking.

Germany could have been 1.5 million men ahead in the first ten months of the war but they decided to let 560,000 British and Allied men escape to fight again.

History notes that Hitler's reasons for this are unclear.

Under Operation DYNAMO the British and Allies escaped by sea from 26 May to 4 June 1940 on 848 British, French and Belgium craft. Destroyers, private motor cruisers and everything in between picked up 560,000 men off Dunkirk's ten-mile stretch of beach during eight days of disorganised and panicked evacuation. Even British Naval crews mutinied because it was too dangerous to go.

The Germans had every chance to kill the British and Allies and they did strafe the beaches, but not as much as they could have. All the Germans had to do to increase the body count was to use their usual air-dropped contact-fused or pressure-switched airburst munitions which were absolutely lethal to unprotected men on the ground, but the Germans even failed to do this in great numbers.

The only excuse that this was not done in abundance was that the Germans had run out of the correct munitions and resorted to using delayed action devices that went 3–4 metres into the sand. Many of the German warheads were purposefully changed from contact and airburst explosives to delayed-action devices before the attack. This resulted in spectacular vertical explosions. They were good for the cameras but caused minimal damage.

The history books say that the Luftwaffe held back because of the RAF. At this point in time the operating RAF had very small numbers, but it was their first use of Spitfires and the Germans were expecting a cakewalk.

The Spitfires were flown aggressively, mainly by Colonials, each carrying eight machine guns. German air-gunners weren't expecting Spitfires to pop up out of nowhere and shred them. The German Me109 and Me110 crews were all huddled together in the front cockpit and they had to decide between self-defence or strafing and bombing the beach. As a result, the few Colonial-flown Spitfires managed to draw the larger number of Messerschmitts away from the escaping Allies, but even this was still not enough to engineer the relatively peaceful outcome.

Hitler and Goering's Luftwaffe had the opportunity for eight days of near unobstructed bombing and total annihilation but they let the opportunity go. Of the 41 destroyers only 6 were sunk. Of the 807 other craft, only 19 were damaged.

The British press had instructions that discouraged them from photographing dead bodies at Dunkirk, soldiers with torn and missing clothing, and soldiers who had stripped their own clothing to swim out to the Allied rescue craft.

The British authorities are renown for making out they did everything to a plan after the war was over. Their numbers of dead men, rescued men, rescue craft and aircraft should be considered (at least in part) one of the casualties of war. When German spies inspected the British hospitals afterwards, many of those on the stretchers were already dead and many of these were nearly dead by the time they arrived at Dunkirk. It is presumed the British counted these as injured.

As soon as Viscount Gort was gone Hitler resumed his attack on the remaining Belgian Army (27 May 1940). The British did not evacuate the Belgians with them and they were left to face the German army and Luftwaffe alone. The Belgians were left for slaughter, surrender and annihilation. King Leopold of Belgium saw this and surrendered unconditionally the same day (27 May 1940).

This left eight days of attack opportunity on Operation DYNAMO with no land resistance, little or no sea resistance, and a small contingent of RAF aircraft 'having a go'.

As an extra present to the Germans, the British and Allies left all their equipment behind, which aided the German occupation of the low countries throughout the war.

Hitler and Goering had given the British a 24-hour window, which was extended to an eight-day window and 560,000 Allied troops were set free with only minor harassment.

By this time the French had lost 45% of their divisions and to all intents and purposes the Battle of France was lost 12 days later on 9 June 1940.

The Italians finally decided to side with the Germans in 'The Pact of Steel' on 22 May 1940, the same day the Germans encircled the French and British. Bu that time the Germans had taken all the Channel ports except Dunkirk.

The Italians weren't out to win the war, but they wanted to be on the winning side. Many Italians couldn't give a rat's arse about the war, hence the sensible Italian Book of War Heroes being the shortest book in the world – 'sensible' because the heroes died and the cowards survived.

When the Italians finally got around to attacking the French frontier on 20 June 1940, they made little progress and Hitler soon realised they would be of no strategic importance. The French and Italians swapped recipes at their WWII frontier and cooked their way through the war, boasting as to who were the greater lovers.

The French and Italians differ from the English and Germans in that they are romantic and enjoy living. The English and Germans, on the other hand, seem to enjoy dying. To them, death justifies the hero. To the French and Italians, making love justifies the hero.

WWII could not have been set up better. Germany had Belgium, France and much of Eastern and Northern Europe. The British had been stung and were now willing to fight, but they lacked the military might.

“Controversy still rages about why Hitler stayed his hand and allowed the British Army to get away. It may have been one of the several key mistakes he made during the Second World War, though some believe that Hitler still wanted to make peace with Britain and thought that this might be more easily achieved if the British Army was not forced into a humiliating surrender.

“Although the action at Dunkirk was a retreat, it was hailed as a victory by the British. In the long run, it proved decisive. The bulk of Britain’s most experienced troops had been saved.”[2]

The war could now continue in force. Without this British-influenced move by Hitler, England would be speaking German today, America would have never got into the war and WWII would have been between Germany and Russia with Britain watching handcuffed, rather than with a ruling pen.

Dunkirk’s Operation DYNAMO is the most blatant example of organised war extension and double agent activity the world has ever seen. It screams so loud, it gives historians a headache and makes the Freemasons blush and run for cover.

James Bond

Enter the cult figure – James Bond (18), morphic resonances' main man of the twentieth century. All hail Bond, for through him, we shall bond. His name is laced with British and European history: James, Jesus' brother, second born in AD1 (or AD0 for the pedantic), conceived in the first week of December 1BC, and born to set the clocks on the 15 September AD0, having the highest qualities of integrity and investigative intuition, the Joseph of Aramathea, the Prince of Aramathea, deposed King David and leader of the exiled Davidic teachings, head Druid, tin trader, the original creator of Westminster Law and deposer of Roman Law, Jesus Justice, magic-mushroom eater who sought health and life extension through mineral-rich cunnilingus with virgins of royal lineage, the ladies' man, the holder of secrets, the true spiritual teacher, the second son of Joseph and Mary, the former prince and priestess of the Davidic and Zadoc lines; James, the original acknowledged parent of the monarchies of Europe, the man who brought culture to babarian Britain – yeah that guy, James, for through him we shall all bond; either that or Ian Fleming actually did pick up the classic ornithological book on his first trip to the Caribbean in November 1944, Field Guide to Birds of the West Indies, written by one James Bond.

On 14 October 1963, Ian Fleming, author of the James Bond books and inspiration of the James Bond movies, wrote to John Ainsworth-Davis: "Without any doubt, you and your operation were my secret inspiration for all that followed; a secret that I have never revealed to anyone else."[1]

John Ainsworth-Davis was also known as Lieutenant-Commander C. J. J. Creighton RN, Christopher John James Creighton, Chris Creighton, Christopher Ainsworth-Davis, Christopher Robin, C.R., with a nom de guerre of 'Leading Seaman John Davis'.

He was born on 13 March 1924, is 6' 2½", did his first mission at the age of 15½ in 1940 and became Lieutenant-Commander at just 21 years of age. He was the second leader of Operation JAMES BOND in April/May of 1945 into Berlin. He wrote this up in his 1996 book,

OPJB under his given name – Chris Creighton. He was undoubtedly the inspiration for the James Bond series.

His father, John Ainsworth-Davis, went to school at Christ's College with Lord Louis Mountbatten, Prince Henry and Bertie, the future King George VI. John Ainsworth-Davis was a gold-medal winner at the 1920 Antwerp Olympics for the 4 x 400 relay[2] and later became a doctor specialising as a genito-urinary surgeon. He raised Chris Creighton at 69 Harley Street, London until he was eight years old. Harley Street was a spies paradise.

One of his 'uncles' was Joachim (von) Ribbentrop, the German 'Champagne General', a close friend of his father. He took the young James Bond (5) to rugby matches including the All Blacks/Lions game at Twickenham in January 1930. By 1936, this same man was the Nazi Ambassador to London who had sex with Wallis Simpson once a week and passed the British and French secrets on to Hitler.

Ribbentrop was later condemned at Nuremberg to die by hanging. His sentence and execution confirmed he had too many MI-6 connections. If his story got out the entire view of WWII would have been more like this one sixty years earlier.

When he was eight, Chris Creighton's parents separated and he moved in with his mother onto Winston Churchill's estate. There, Winston Churchill (1874–1965), Lord Louis Mountbatten (1900–79) and Major Desmond Morton (1891–1971) took the young Christopher Creighton under their wing – as one of their own.[3]

With their paternal guidance, he entered the Royal Navy College at Dartmouth (close to Tavistock) in September 1939, aged 15½. During his training the young Chris Creighton was given German POWs whose records had been fabricated with atrocities and was encouraged to kill them. He was given a licence to kill but there wasn't a tuxedo in sight. Almost immediately he went on his first mission and was issued with a silent single-shot Wellrod pistol. His cover was often as a boy pushing a bicycle and most German officers didn't give him a second look.

[2] He ran with Cecil Griffiths, Robert Lindsay and Guy Butler in a time of 3:22.2. This is an av. 400m of 50.55 sec. with the world record set in 1912 (av. of 49.15 sec). Speed was something John Ainsworth-Davis II/Chris Creighton inherited.

[3] During his wilderness years (1929–39) Winston Churchill also took on the Paladin, who was then 12–13 years old.

Ian Fleming (1908–64) had been the victor ludorum (champion athlete) at Eton for two years, went to the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, became an agent, worked with Reuters in Moscow (1929–33), learnt German in Austria and further studied languages at Munich and Geneva Universities (1933–39) and was a banker and stockbroker as cover.

Ian Fleming had the luck of the Irish. Part of his brief was intelligence gathering from POW camps and one of these was at Grizedale Hall in the Lake District which he used to visit from London in his open-tourer Bentley. Early in 1941, using leather laundry hamper straps, the German POW, Dieter von Hassel, strapped himself underneath the Bentley. Fleming drove off, got lost on a country road (most road signs were taken down during the war) and got stuck in a wide stream.

As Fleming went for help the stream flooded, and the German officer, one of the Luftwaffe's greatest escape artists, drowned. Fleming knew nothing about it until he was towed out of the stream and back to Grizedale Hall by a woman on a horse.

Fleming was quite upset and said, "It's absolutely tragic to have killed a chap in such circumstances." The Guard Sergeant replied, "I wouldn't worry about that Sir. He's still dead."

The horsewoman had been hiding German prisoners of war (Leutnant Herbult Shultz and Leutnant Victor Molde) using them as concubines and farm help. The last escaper surrendered to police in 1949 not knowing that the war had ended or that Hitler had reportedly suicided. He was being used as a sex-slave long after everyone else had gone home. He was reportedly gutted by his own discovery that he had stayed on four years after the war. He wanted the horsewoman arrested but the police declined amid great mirth.

Mrs William Heelis was the tea lady at Grizedale Hall and she got more out of a German serviceman with a cup of tea than interrogators could with pincers (tongs used in torture). She illustrated and published books under the name Beatrix Potter.

The German officer in charge of the POW camp, Commander Otto Kruger, was in contact with Germany and ran the camp as an intelligence-gathering exercise and was very annoyed that the Luftwaffe officer had even tried to escape. Grizedale Hall was a Hogan's Heroes in reverse.[4]

[4] A Cage of Eagles.

Kruger's spectacular coup was offering to repair the roof of the Hall. This was undertaken by German labour and closely supervised by British Guards. A year after it was completed a young RAF pilot, who had got lost earlier that day, contacted the British Commanding Officer and thanked him for the directions painted on the roof of the RAF base. The roof was painted (RAF →) for the benefit of the Germans.

By 1943, Ian Fleming had distinguished himself in at least five top-secret operations and became Lieutenant-Commander Ian Fleming of the Royal Navy Intelligence Division. He was also the personal assistant to the Director of Naval Intelligence, Rear-Admiral John Godfrey.

Fleming was always ahead of the game and operated with such style and ease that he was referred to as 'the Chocolate Soldier'. He was a master spy with great connections. His father was Valentine Fleming who was an MP and close friend of Winston Churchill. Ian Fleming was the first 'James Bond', if only for a day, and he too took Christopher Creighton under his wing.

Major Desmond Morton created 'M' in 1932 as 'Special Secret intelligence operations' and was financed and protected by successive monarchs: King George V, King Edward VIII, and King George VI etc. M was directed from Morton's home in Crockham Hill, near Westerham in Kent, with the enthusiastic support of Winston Churchill, who lived below Desmond Morton's house in Kent, two miles south of Westerham, in the Vale of Chartwell.

Churchill took all the credit for M and it was written up that Churchill, in his 'lost years' set up a private intelligence network in his home in 1929. However, Churchill was substantially Morton's public cover and confidant. M meant 'mother', and as art imitates life, 'M' is still the name of the governing agency both in the British Government and in the James Bond movies, as in "REPORT IMMEDIATELY HQ M".[5]

Major Desmond Morton, or Morton as he was known, was the Supreme Chief of the Special Secret intelligence operations (M) and his role was pitched above the Prime Minister and his secret circle. It was above MI-5 (Internal), MI-6 (External) and the military. It was the monarchy's special force.

M had free reign, not being controlled by any outside body other than the reigning monarch – and when it reigns, it pours. Rather than patriotism, 'M's role was to ensure that the larger events of WWII went according to plan. Such larger events were:

1. Conflict was to be prolonged until the profits were made and the power structures were in place for the next sixty years of social policy.
2. All peace negotiations were to be sabotaged.
3. America was to be drawn very publicly into WWII with America's full knowledge.
4. Britain was to control all the assets of Nazi pillage.
5. All double agents were to be returned to safety with their deaths faked.
6. Doppelgängers to be released as dead, living in other countries, or alive posthumously.
7. Any incriminating evidence against Britain or America was to be destroyed.

Three such incidents were Pearl Harbor in Hawaii, Dieppe in France, and Operation James Bond in Berlin. A study of these OPs gives us a clear understanding of 'Special Secret intelligence operations', the transfer of power, the pointlessness of battle, and the games secret societies play.

Pearl Harbor

1921–7 December 1941

Pearl Harbor took 16 years to plan and it was either a masterstroke or a complete cock-up. Either way, all sides knew about it at the time. One method of drawing an ally into war is to give the mutual enemy (Japan) enough information to attack the ally (America) without retribution, thus giving the country attacked (America) a clear mandate to join the war. Pearl Harbor was just such a mission and it occurred with full British and American Chief of Staff knowledge.

Britain started planning its next war in 1919 in order to utilise its existing military and to prevent them from getting restless and turning in on themselves and the nation. Britain planned a war with America and it was due to start in 1927. The conflict was based around ‘naval tonnage’, but was eventually settled with diplomacy and the Washington Treaty.

However, a plan to attack Pearl Harbor was commissioned by the British Admiralty and awarded to the consultant Hector C. Bywater, who came up with the Bywater Plan which involved dropping torpedoes from planes into Pearl Harbor. It was believed at the time that the harbour was too shallow at 12 metres, but Bywater correctly forecast that adapted torpedoes could be dropped safely and efficiently into the shallow harbour.

Hector C. Bywater (21 October 1884–17 August 1940) was an English and American journalist, author and spy who could hold a packed pub room in rapt attention when he told anecdotes. He wrote Sea Power in the Pacific (1921) and The Great Pacific War (1925) and knew more about the navies of the world than a roomful of admirals. He published numerous articles on Pacific strategy as the European naval correspondent for the New York Herald, the Baltimore Sun and the New York Times.

When Bywater wrote Sea Power in the Pacific: A Study of the American-Japanese Naval Problem (1921), it was an immediate sell-out among Japanese and American Navy General Staff who studied it line by line. The US Naval Institute’s Proceedings magazine called it “the most important recent estimate of the situation . . . in the Pacific”.

It was so 'considered' that it set a special 5:5:3 tonnage ratio between America, Britain and Japan on 15 December 1921 at the Washington Disarmament Treaty.

"What Bywater wrote powerfully influenced Admiral Isoroku Yamamoto, the architect of the Pearl Harbor attack . . . who served as a naval attaché in Washington in the late 1920s. At least once Bywater and Yamamoto met face to face and wiled away an evening discussing the prospects for peace and war over a bottle of Scotch."[1]

Hector C. Bywater was killed 16 months before Pearl Harbor at the age of 55. He was supposedly found in bed alone at his home in London, some time between 16 and 17 August 1940, and was declared the victim of acute alcoholism. The physicians didn't check for any other cause and he was immediately cremated. Modern investigation techniques and circumstantial evidence suggest he was murdered by poison.[2] The order came from the Japanese High Command and was administered with British complicity.

Churchill had already been involved in many assassinations and Hector C. Bywater had a very good chance of sabotaging Churchill's efforts to bring America into the war, all the more so if he were alive. The one man who knew all of Japan's plans for Pearl Harbor, and America's dedication to ignoring it, was killed in the build-up to Pearl Harbor.

With Bywater dead, Yamamoto adapted the Bywater Plan, increasing the attack on the Philippines and British possessions and grafting them onto the original attack plan against Hawaii. The adapted British Bywater Plan became the plan for Japan's December 1941 attack on Pearl Harbor that brought America into WWII.

The Lusitania, Pearl Harbor and 9-11 all get protection under the umbrella of American self-sabotage – DENY, OBSCURE, COVER UP – 1915, 1941 and 2001 are all very questionable years for US patriotism.

Hardly had WWII started when President Roosevelt (Freemason) wrote to Britain's First Lord of the Admiralty, Winston Churchill (Freemason), suggesting they work together via a secret system of communication.

President Roosevelt, 11 September 1939: "What I want you and the Prime Minister to know is that I shall at all times welcome it, if you will keep me in touch personally with anything you want me to know about. You can always send sealed letters through your pouch or my pouch."

Churchill responded enthusiastically: "I am half American and the natural person to work with you. It is evident that we see eye to eye. Were I to become Prime Minister of Britain we could control the world."[3] This happened eight months later.

In January 1941, the Japanese sent an amazingly generous offer to the Americans to retire from the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Axis (Italian, German, Japanese alliance) in return for peace with the United States. President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Cordell Hull rejected it.[4] British and American joint-staff conferences were then held in Washington DC (January–March 1941) to arrange a plan for military collaboration called the ABC-1.

It was thought that Pearl Harbor was too shallow to launch torpedoes. The anchorage was only 12 metres deep and torpedoes dropped from planes sunk to 20 metres before beginning their run. But the Japanese tested torpedos with wooden fins at Kagoshima Bay and this gave them extra buoyancy. The strike rate reached 70% and the British knew of these successful torpedo tests.

The key to Pearl Harbor became the long-lance torpedo 21" warhead. It was quiet, fast, straight running, could out-distance everyone else's torpedoes by 2–3 times and the warhead always blew. It was far better than American or German torpedoes which were prone to misfire. American torpedoes failed as much as 90%, partly because crews were constantly on a hunt for alcohol and would drink the torpedo juice after they'd filtered it through bread.

On 27 March 1941, the Japanese spy Takeo Yoshikawa arrived in Honolulu and began studying the American fleet at Pearl Harbor.

Prior to Pearl Harbor, American ships were immune to attack, despite their cargo, or who they were delivering it to. During the spring and summer of 1941, in Europe and the Atlantic, Roosevelt did everything he could to provoke Germany and Italy into producing some "act of war" against an American ship. He even convoyed supplies and munitions to Britain and Russia illegally and with full advertisement, but neither Germany nor Italy would take the bait. They remembered the Lusitania well and weren't about to repeat that mistake.

[4] Cordell Hull (1871–1955) received a one-year law degree in 1891 and was made a judge in 1903 (aged 31). After this, he was nicknamed 'Judge' by all and sundry. He served as Secretary of State from 1933–44 and then retired due to ill health.

"One of the [British] XX-Committee's first and most important double agents was a thirty-year-old Yugoslav businessman named Dusko Popov. [Ian Fleming described Dusko Popov as the perfect British Intelligence recruit]. A member of a well-to-do royalist family, Popov had been approached by the Abwehr at the outbreak of the war [he regularly had lunch with the chief of Paris Gestapo] with the suggestion that his family's political ambitions might be enhanced if he worked for Germany as a spy against the British. Popov agreed – and promptly informed the MI-6 representative in Belgrade of his Abwehr connections.

"He arrived in England on December 20, 1940, and made a 'most favourable impression' when closely questioned by the British secret intelligence services. [He was suave and sophisticated, enjoyed wine, women and song and could talk his way in and out of anything]. He was then passed on to the XX-Committee and rechristened 'Tricycle' [his German codename was 'Disco'], and he opened up secret communications with the Abwehr in Lisbon.

"He established himself as a highly placed agent in England; and in the next several months he supplied the Abwehr with a great deal of information fabricated by the XX-Committee that beclouded all German estimates about British strength for the remainder of the war.

"Then in June 1941, the Abwehr, pleased with Disco's [Tricycle's] performance in Britain, instructed him to go to America on an espionage mission to investigate in detail, among other targets, the air, military and naval installations at Pearl Harbor, which the Japanese had asked the Abwehr to reconnoitre because of the difficulties that ethnic Japanese agents in Hawaii were encountering.

"Popov informed the XX-Committee of his assignment and, through the American Embassy, the XX-Committee informed the FBI . . . But [when] Popov arrived in the United States . . . on August 24, 1941, he encountered the full wrath of the director of the FBI, J. Edgar Hoover.

"Hoover did not want agents of any foreign power working in America. At their only meeting, he treated Popov with disgust, and declared . . . 'I can catch spies without your or anybody else's help.' He accused Popov of being 'Like all double agents. You're begging for information to sell to your German friends so that you can make a lot of money and be a playboy.'

"Popov, who had taken a woman friend to Florida for a holiday, would find himself threatened with prosecution under the Mann Act [the illegal transportation of women across a state line for the purposes of sexual intercourse], and agents of the Internal Revenue Service were also set on him.

"The British extricated him . . . with the IRS hot on his heels . . . and the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor. Although the American government had some foreknowledge from other intelligence sources of the impending attack, notably from its naval cryptanalytical bureau in Room 1649 of the Navy Department on Constitution Avenue in Washington . . . The United States declared war upon the Axis powers, and for Churchill, America's entry into the conflict was the answer to a constant prayer."[5]

Although both British and American Chiefs of Staff knew about the planned attack on Pearl Harbor years beforehand, both wanted America to join the war and were waiting for an excuse. All they needed was a swing in public opinion. Before Pearl Harbor, 60% of Americans did not want to get into the war. After Pearl Harbor, 99% of Americans wanted to get into the war.

Spymaster: "When the US started advertising for pilots with multi-engine experience to fly Lockheed Hudsons, the Japanese became alarmed and started to cast around America to see what was on order in the American defence works. They uncovered a large contract to manufacture incendiary bombs, paid for by the British.

"The Japanese then checked the runways in North China and concluded that the Chinese were going to launch an attack against Japan from these new runways, with British and American backing. The Japanese concluded that the date of the attack was to be January 1942. From this they knew they had to attack Pearl Harbor beforehand, so they attacked in early December 1941."

America had advertised for pilots and built runways knowing that it would force the Japanese hand to attack before January 1942.

The wisdom from all sides was that making a surprise attack against Pearl Harbor some 6500 km away was virtually impossible. The only way this could be done was with complicity from all sides – so Japan was given complicity from all sides.

[5] Bodyguard of Lies, pp. 60–61.

What is even more shameful is that President Franklin D. Roosevelt could decipher the Japanese diplomatic code faster than the Japanese Embassy in Washington. Pearl Harbor was deliberate self-sabotage to draw America into the war.

On 17 November 1941 Joseph Grew, the US Ambassador to Japan, cabled the State Department stating that Japan had plans to attack Pearl Harbor, but his cable was ignored. This gave the US twenty days' warning.

On 26 November 1941, a fleet of six aircraft carriers commanded by the Japanese Vice-Admiral Chuichi Nagumo left Hitokapu Bay for Pearl Harbor under strict radio silence. Twelve days later the Japanese Navy were to launch their surprise attack on Pearl Harbor on 7 December 1941 (6 December Japanese time). The only surprise was to those patriots who had not been warned.

To achieve this end, M was used. The British contribution to the cover-up of events leading to the Pearl Harbor attack was called Operation SUBEND. Ian Fleming (33) was the naval control officer and Chris Creighton (17), with the nom de guerre 'Leading Seaman John Davis', was the sole boarding operative.

Espavo S020 - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Since Germany's invasion of Holland, the Dutch submarines in the Pacific were acting as a proxy for the British Royal Navy. They were doing tasks for the British and were under British control. The Dutch submarines were essentially a picket line watching for the Japanese battle fleet.

One of these Dutch submarines saw the Japanese battle fleet head towards Pearl Harbor and wired a storm warning to the British. The 17-year-old Chris Creighton was immediately flown to the Far East, plonked into a naval uniform and made a Brevet junior officer.[6] He boarded the Dutch submarine delivering explosives disguised as gifts and delaying devices for torpedo warheads. These blew up the Dutch submarine with all its crew. This prevented the Dutch from warning the Americans that the Japanese fleet was about to attack Pearl Harbor.

[6] 'Brevet' signifies that it is an elevated title in use only for the duration of the Special Op. Chris Creighton's first job was to destroy French and Belgian supply dumps (specifically fuel) in the path of the German army, but he failed to act as he was overwhelmed by the speed of the German attack. The Germans were dependent on stolen fuel for their advance.

Ian Fleming: "Five minutes after midday on 28 November 1941, Dutch submarine K-XVII, commanded by Lieutenant-Commander Besançon, approaches a position in the Pacific, latitude 43° 30' north, longitude 155° 20' east, approximately 280 miles off north-east of Japan's Tankan Bay. There she sights a fleet of Japanese warships. They've been making a three-leg zig-zag course. Commander Besançon correctly calculates this to be a course-made-good – a direct track – of 88° (true). This will bring them to Hawaii and Pearl Harbor eight hundred miles ahead."[7]

Chris Creighton: "In November 1941 I alone had wiped out the entire ship's company with two tiny cylinders of cyanide inserted into their oxygen supply, and a box of high explosives, disguised as whiskey, both timed to release their venomous contents when I was safely away. Those Dutch submariners' only sin was that they had seen, and reported, the Japanese fleet sailing toward Pearl Harbor: news of it had to be suppressed, to ensure the attack went home and America came into the war, and it was deemed essential that the Dutchmen and their secret must die.[8]

"I related how I had witnessed the destruction of K-XVII and all her crew, whom I had come to know well over the previous few days. I related how fused canisters of cyanide gas and high explosive had been taken aboard at my direction, disguised as Christmas gifts of food and drink from Queen Wilhelmina and our Admiral, Submarines, Sir Max Horton. From the safety of a Berwick flying boat I had watched as the aircraft suddenly shuddered, and an enormous explosion vomited out great spouts of water, together with broken-up crates of stores, bits of men, oil and oddments of equipment. It was as if a colossal underwater creature had swallowed a submarine, chewed up its human and mechanical contents, and then been violently sick.

"Above all, I wondered what they would say or do if they knew that their valiant submariners had been sacrificed simply because the highest authorities in Britain and America did not trust them to keep their mouths shut."[9]

James Bond (Chris Creighton) then flew back to Britain in a clean-up operation to supervise and assist in the murders of the Royal Navy signals staff who had sighted the Dutch submarine's K-XVII signals. One of the woman was attacked by a sex-criminal specifically paroled from His Majesty's prison for this purpose. Under police control and supervision the criminal was allowed to have his way with her before she was murdered.

Spymaster: "Hilda Murrell met with a similar fate in the 1980s during the hunt for the missing pages of the log of the HMS Conqueror which sunk the Argentine heavy cruiser, the Belgrano, as it attempted to surrender during the Falklands War."

This is called an 'intelligence-involved coup' – not dissimilar to 9-11. Complicit enemy-attacks are the usual method of bringing a third party ally into war. Operation SUBEND was a British 'war-escalating exercise' as was the sabotage of Hitler's peace initiatives of May, June, and July 1941. Conflict was to be prolonged and up-scaled and America was to be drawn into the war. This was a British secret intelligence operation run by M.

In order to further hide these 'Cover-Up Operations', the true identity of James Bond is being misconstrued and applied to lesser entities who could not have been involved in the Cover-Up Ops. As such, Buckingham Palace is dishing out press releases that apply the James Bond identity to others with such squeaky-clean records that they appear to be under-achievers, such as "Commander X" and the "Bond Inspiration Dies".

"A British war hero said to have been the inspiration behind secret agent James Bond has died age 90. Former Royal Navy Lieutenant Commander Patrick Dalzel-Job [1913–2003] carried out a series of daring exploits behind enemy lines during WWII including some while serving under Bond author Ian Fleming. Fleming had told him he was the model for the spy. In 1940, Dalzel-Job disobeyed orders in order to rescue all the women, children and elderly residents from a Norwegian town just before it was destroyed in a German bombing raid."[10]

"Commander X , a real-life Bond . . . Ernest Bond was . . . a tough founder member of the Special Air Service, he was known to the press in the 1970s as 'Commander X' (for security reasons Scotland Yard did not release his name) . . . and on the outbreak of WWII . . . he joined 'L Detachment' of the embryonic SAS."[11]

"No top military or civilian authority in Washington on December 7, 1941, should have been surprised at either the place or time of the Japanese attack on the Pacific fleet at Pearl Harbor. The only element of surprise, if any, should have been over the damage that the Japanese planes delivered to the fleet."[12]

What happened to British Prime Minister Chamberlain in the beginning of the war happened to American President Roosevelt at the end of the war. Both were killed with the complicity of their own sides. Chamberlain was killed after he was successfully used to start WWII and Roosevelt was killed three weeks before the end of WWII to ensure he did not write his memoirs about his part in bringing America into the war . . . or face questioning about how American Intelligence failed so badly at Pearl Harbor.[13]

> "The government of Britain was forced to aid the international bankers' plan for the Bolshevik revolution in Russia in 1917 in order to obtain their promise that they would bring America into the war on the side of the Allies. It can be assumed that SS Lusitania was sunk to provide the necessary incident to justify the change of American policy, just as Pearl Harbor was used as an excuse for America to enter World War II."[14]

Similarly, 9-11 was used to start WWIII. This too was, according to the writings of Adam Weishaupt, the agenda of the Illuminati, and the military industrialists who make their money selling FEAR AND SECURITY.

The entire Pearl Harbor scenario was repeated in 9-11 and the 2003–06 Iraq war. But this too won't become public knowledge for another hundred years, unless America's Vice-President Dick Cheney admits to meeting with Saddam Hussein on 20–22 April 2003 during Saddam's three-week sojourn out of Iraq – Kuneitre, I presume.[15]

Dieppe

19 August 1942

Dieppe was another devious distraction designed to establish 'Leading Seaman John Davis' (Chris Creighton) as a British traitor in the eyes of Germany's military elite. Creighton could then pass false data to the Germans with credibility.

In order to achieve this, sacrifices needed to be made. These were not to be British, or American, but a third party, the Canadians – second-rate allies whose only crime was excessive belligerence.

In Ireland, Chris Creighton, under cover as 'Leading Seaman John Davis', revealed to General Canaris that Canadian Divisions and some minor Allied forces were going to attack at Dieppe on 19 August 1942.

Both Canaris and his 2IC, General Hans Oster, were German double agents and had supplied Dutch, Belgian and French forces with the dates of their German attacks. Creighton appeared to be doing a favour in return. Canaris took the information at face value and alerted his troops.

Chris Creighton (18) was then detained and tied to a gun emplacement above Dieppe from where he was made to watch the slaughter of 4000 Canadians and tertiary allies.

Chris Creighton's 'uncle', Lord Louis Mountbatten was a paedophile,[1] adulterer and homosexual incestuous lover for 10 years with his pro-Nazi cousin, the former King Edward VIII.[2] Born in Windsor Castle as 'His Serene Highness Prince Louis of Battenburg', he was a British Admiral, First Sea Lord, uncle and mentor to Prince Philip. When the German styles were dropped in 1917, he became Louis Mountbatten in exchange for further elevations, making him instantly Lord Louis Mountbatten, later elevated to viscount and Earl.

[1] This was confirmed in November 2003 when Mick P tracked down a sailor off the HMS Kelly whose job it was to second children for Louis Mountbatten. MICK P is a 'Member of the Intelligence Community Knowledge Pool'.

'Dickie' Mountbatten was the driving force behind the Dieppe raid. It was an ill conceived raid and even his fellow paedophile Montgomery told him it was ill conceived from the start. Despite this, Mountbatten did not act entirely independently of Creighton and even confirmed his 'nephews' message to the Germans.

As such, Dickie remained a favourite of Churchill (they were related) and Churchill promoted him to Supreme Allied Commander of South East Asia in October 1943, where he was largely self-publicised "as gifted as Eisenhower, Montgomery and Churchill". Dickie was further elevated to Knight of Justice of St John (KJStJ, 1943) and Viceroy of British India.

As the Viceroy of British India, Mountbatten couldn't keep it together. His wife Edwina Ashley was shagging his best friend, Jawaharlal Nehru, as Mountbatten watched India collapse into a Partitioned Independence, assisted by British sabotage resulting in appalling carnage (1 million dead) and the largest migration in history – 12 million were relocated across new borders. Both Louis and Edwina were frequent adulterers[3] with Mountbatten preferring sex with those too young for sex.

After his failure at Dieppe and India, Louis Mountbatten was further promoted to Chief of Defense Staff (1959–65) and in 1967, he was invited to stage a coup and take over Britain's government. When it was pointed out that this was treason, Mountbatten stuck to his knitting, failing in the style to which he had become accustomed.

Lord Louis Mountbatten (Chris Creighton's 'uncle') was truly troubled by the revelations that he too had betrayed the Canadians to the German Army (the Abwehr), resulting in the open slaughter of those 4000 men. The Royal Canadian Legion went to great lengths to distance themselves from him and the rest of Canada soon followed suit, even distancing themselves from Britain, which lead to Canadian Independence and Canadian citizenship in 1949.

Mountbatten was troubled by what other's knew and showed signs of coming unglued and seemed about to blunder and confess.

After a lifetime of personal/professional failings and public promotions 'Dickie' became isolated spending his days fishing in Donegal Bay, near his summer home in Mullaghmore, Ireland. He managed to publicly deny his role in Dieppe until Brian Garfield raised it, leaking his response prior to release of The Paladin (1980), a book about Chris Creighton's exploits leading up to Operation JAMES BOND.

Almost immediately the British monarchy arranged MI-5 (Internal Intelligence) to blow up his boat (1979), happily covering their trail by fitting up four IRA men who were jailed for 10 years before being released due to lack of evidence. They kept staunch because they thought some other IRA men had done it.

The tactic of blowing up one of your own leaders to cover up any incriminating evidence on Britain or America was a face-saving device to distract from even more damaging intelligence about the British monarchy working for the Germans, against peace, and for a prolonged war. This covers point '7' of 'M' in which: "Any incriminating evidence against Britain or America was to be destroyed."

When the adulterous paedophile Earl/Viscount/First Sea Lord/Lord Louis 'Dickie' Mountbatten was killed (aged 79), he had six knighthoods and was the last of Morton's fellows, the last of the M senior staff.

In exchange for these titles Prince Philip selected his uncle 'Dickie' as the authority to rebut Anastasia's claim to 'her' father the Tsar of Russia and all that was hers and not theirs.

'Dickie' is remembered for inventing 'Mountbatten Pink',
a naval camouflage that allowed homosexuals and paedophiles to blend in with ships and remain unnoticed.

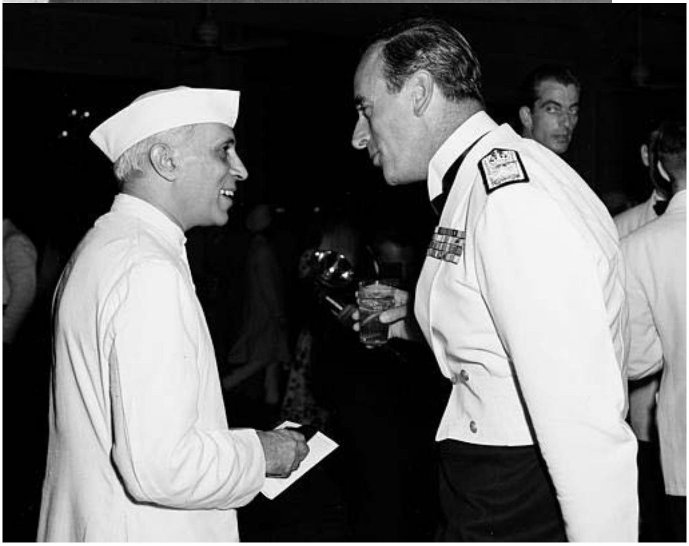
[3] This was confirmed quite openly by their daughters.

Nehru seduces Lady Edwina Mountbatten and cuckolds Lord Louis. An agreement is reached. In exchange for having an affair with his wife, Nehru will turn a blind eye to Mountbatten's penchant for young Indian boys. Meanwhile one million die.



Anthony Blunt

Anthony Blunt's mother was Hilda Master. She was the daughter of a magistrate in the Indian Colonial Service. She married beneath herself to a poor Anglican Priest named Stanley Blunt, who achieved his role through zealous preaching and his ability to blind and deceive others – a talent much valued by spying, double-handed, sly-rooting monarchies.

Three-and-a-half years before his coronation, the future King George V had an ongoing 'sex-for-dress' exchange programme with Hilda Master. The sponsor was his wife Mary of Teck, (daughter of 'Fat Mary') and future Queen of England (m. 6 July 1893).[1]

Mary of Teck would have dresses made for A-List occasions. She couldn't be seen wearing them twice so she gave them away. King George V would do the giving away in exchange for sex. One of the recipients of the future Queen-consort Mary's dresses and King George V's armours was Hilda Masters and, after many A-List occasions and many dresses, they conceived a child together.

He was 41 at the time and his wife didn't particularly mind. Sex for them was a matter of facing ugliness and dim-wittedness, only since found in the realm of Boy Scout masters.

During one of these sex-for-dress exchange programmes, the Prince of Wales from 9 November 1901, the Vice Admiral of the Royal Navy from 1903, the sailor prince and future King George V showed Hilda Master his large blue and red dragon tattooed on his right arm. They then conceived an illegitimate son a fortnight before the Christmas of 1906. The illegitimate child's name was Anthony Blunt (26 September 1907–26 March 1983) and he was to become a royal spy.

Anthony was gay, as is so common with those who grow up without their biological father. His housefather was penniless, a religious replacement in denial, and none too bright. It was virtually impossible for them to bond.

[1] Mary of Teck (Victoria Mary Augusta Louise Olga Pauline Claudine Agnes) was previously engage to her husband's brother, the Duke of Clarence, but "he died six weeks after the engagement from a mysterious illness" . . . "pneumonia".

As a ranting proselytising priest Stanley Blunt was well capable of self-deceit and believing his far-less sporting and far-more intelligent son was actually the product of the Holy Ghost – Abracadabra.[2] As is common with priests, anything too hard to confront is left to the realm of mystery.

If the Blunts were not married, the children would have carried the pre-name Fitz, meaning the illegitimate child of royalty. This would have made Anthony a 'FitzBlunt'. Fitzes were usually given a small parcel of land in Ireland, called a 'cunt', an Anglo-Norman word meaning 'a small parcel of land too small to farm', hence the saying 'It's a cunt' meaning 'there is no way to work it'. If they were of German farming stock, their chosen trade would have made them 'Fuckers', making them the FitzBlunt-FuckerCunts, an entirely appropriate surname for Anthony.

Instead the family were given a religious posting to France.

In 1912, two years after the coronation of his biological father-in-denial, when Anthony Blunt was 5 years old and becoming recognisable (the resemblance was remarkable), the family were changed from poor to rich and given a posting in Paris, Stanley becoming the Anglican vicar at the British Embassy. This posting-in-exile stopped the English public from 'noting, pointing and laughing' at Anthony Blunt's astonishing resemblance to King George V, more so than his acknowledged sons, the future King Edward VIII (18, David to his peers) and the future King George VI (17, Bertie to his peers).

Anthony and Edward in particular, were from the same physical, social and moral gene pool – that of languid, non-ideological homosexual – easily manipulated by both sides. These two were Freemasonry in the making.

In the 1920s and '30s Anthony Blunt proudly wore a red tie, continuing the long association between gays and Marxism. He maintained contact with Moscow until the 1930s, and despite obvious qualities and ideologies of 'everything England did not stand for', he was recruited into Britain's Internal Secret Service – MI-5.

MI-5 was more of a 'Freemason's protectorate' than it was an organisation that gathered intelligence and disseminated it for the benefit of the country. When Anthony Blunt became a member of MI-5, he was reapproached by Moscow to hand over security documents. He did this is in such abundance and in such gay abandon that even the KGB described him as "ideological shit".

King George V's full son, the future King Edward VIII, as Duke of Windsor was willingly used by the Nazis prior to WWII. After the war, this became a hangable offence. He was attending a diplomatic party when the Abwehr alerted him to the derailment of a freight train in Switzerland. The Germans were trying to make out that they were abiding by the Treaty of Versailles, yet a German railway carriage derailed and illegally acquired 15-inch Italian naval shells fell out. The Duke of Windsor was then asked to keep the British ambassador at the party and to entertain and distract any and all ambassadors who might react to this. The next day they played golf. There were no mobile phones.

Just before Churchill declared the end of WWII on 7 May 1945 (for 0.01 am on 8 May) Anthony Blunt was sent to Germany as a British spy. He was entrusted by the monarchy with the delicate task of destroying all trace of the treasonous activities of Edward VIII and the other British traitors. To do this, he had to go into the ruins of Nazi Germany and recover all communications between Edward VIII (his half-brother, 13-years-his-senior) and the Nazis at Schloss Kronberg, a castle near Frankfurt.

Blunt was part of the British monarchy backing the Nazis and was a German Army Intelligence agent. He had been assigned a 'V-Mann number' meaning he was a registered card-carrying member of the German forces and was actively passing information on to them. While he did this he also stole the Kaiser's crown jewels which Queen Elizabeth II returned only recently.

As is so common with traitors, Britain's most notorious spy was knighted for services to the British Empire (1956), and then spent his Christmases in the 1960s with Dick White, Head of Britain's internal/external Secret Services (MI-5, MI-6) and Victor Rothschild.

Nathaniel Meyer 'Victor' Rothschild was a secret society leader who profited enormously from WWII. He was the principle shareholder of the Central Banking System, 'the Fifth Man' of the Cambridge Five spy ring and the primary supplier of British secrets to Russia from 1935 to 1963.

Anthony Blunt was also very, very good friends with his Queen consort sister-in-law (1936–52), whom the current generation knows as the Queen Mother (4 August 1900–30 March 2002) and her daughter, Queen Elizabeth II.

[2] Abracadabra is supposedly Arabic for 'Father, Son and Holy Ghost'.

The Queen consort and Anthony Blunt were both privy to the previous king. One's illegitimate father was the other's father-in-law. It was a case of one non-ideological spy talking rings around Queen 'Liz-nice-but-dim', who was the wife of one 'George Dunce', to those who worked under him. The intelligence community and much of the public considered King George VI to be one IQ point above retarded (66 + 1 = ?).

Anthony and the Queen could talk frankly of their lineages' sexual secrets, and the state secrets poured out as easily as the tea. As is so common with straight, gay and paedophile traitors, Blunt was knighted in 1956 for services to Queen and country. The knighthood stood between him and a charge of treason (1973). This worked for 24 years until he was stripped of his knighthood by Margaret Thatcher in 1979. He died four years later on 26 March 1983. Three weeks later the fake Hitler Diaries became public.

Despite being gifted everything required in life, Anthony Blunt spent his entire existence in psychological torture. He was never allowed to say who he was or what he wanted. He was a highly valued, yet unwanted pawn, despised by all authority and used by all authority. Like most of the royal family, all Blunt wanted was to be a little more intelligent and a little less ugly – the curse of the Windsors.

Anthony Blunt was a major trader in a 'homosexual, non-ideological, secrets-trading, spyring' and his greatest value was to Freemasonry and the Illuminati who so desperately wanted to continue the managed wars for continued profit – wars that would make them wealthier than all of England and all of Europe.

Wallis Simpson and King Edward VIII

Sex and German Spies in the British Monarchy

The Oxford Dictionary, which takes final editorial input from the monarchy, describes “Wallis Simpson (1896–1986) as the American wife of King Edward VIII [26 June 1894–28 May 1972], who reigned for 11 months in 1936 after King George V. Her relationship with the king caused a national scandal, and her second divorce forced the king’s abdication. They moved to France. He died and she remained a recluse until her death.”

In late 2003 the author was interviewing the Spymaster who said: “I spoke with a British Intelligence officer who told me this story . . .”

> “Wallis was the subject of a round robin in 1930. A round robin is where all intelligence are circulated with a request. They were asked if they could provide a woman that might revive the future king’s jaded sexual appetite. This was Edward VIII, later famous for his 11-month reign, gay fashions, the Windsor knot and abdication.
> “Somebody remembered having sex with an American naval officer’s wife in a Chinese brothel in the Forbidden City in Peking, China. She was learning the secrets of ‘Chinese amour’ while working for free, and it was this ‘free’ aspect that drew British Intelligence attention. They knew they were dealing with a lifetime actress who survived on attention rather than food.
> “The agent replied back to London and London said, ‘That’s just what we need; we’ll be coming straight out to get her’. The woman was Wallis Simpson, the future partner of King

> Edward VIII, and the gym instructor to his jaded, disinterested sexual appetite. She was brought back to England and the King liked her. She had sexual relations with David, the future King, but she also had sex with Ribbentrop, the Nazi German Ambassador to London, an American car salesman, and pretty much anybody else who could come up with the required attention. Flowers, a keen interest, and some form of status were generally enough.
> “Just as Prince Charles was another Edward VIII (his grand-uncle), Diana also survived on attention more than food. Both Diana and Wallis Simpson were ‘sexual-bulimics’ in a pattern of desiring and denying; and both Charles and Edward were social misfits, incapable of being employed in the ordinary world. Both women were primarily concubines to disinterested, incompatible, and incompetent sexual partners.
> “She [Wallis Simpson] introduced him [King Edward VIII] to homosexuality and photographed him in the process.”

The First market ‘Petite Camera with matching lipstick holder and compact’, from Kodak, was available to the elite from 1930, some four years earlier. Photographs of royalty and politicians in compromising sexual positions immediately became the most valuable piece of intelligence any secret service or hostile country could obtain. Cameras became big business, the smaller and the more hidden, the bigger the business.

Wallis’ role, as far as the Germans were concerned, was to enmesh the weak future King Edward VIII into a sexually perverse world and then threaten to reveal reports of his sexual habits to ‘high society’ and the British public at large, via American newspapers if necessary.

The conscious and unconscious illusion he adhered to was that he was successful in bed for the first time and this made him want to marry the woman. Wallis encouraged the future King to vent every pro-German/anti-English sentiment he could. The future King of England was being bribed by his mistress. These bribes were so successful he became completely dependent on the illusion she provided, despite all outward appearances to the contrary.

The truth was that Wallis was cheating on him left, right and centre and the future King was completely useless in bed and preferred prostitutes, the greater the actress the better. Having a sexually-based ego for the first time in his life, the future King was foolish enough to buy Wallis’ husband out of bankruptcy and the three of them were living in the same house for several years.

Wallis was half-American, half-German and actively spied for the Nazis. The sessions photographed included the future King of England having a ménage-à-trois with another man. Wallis would get up from the bed, put on her lipstick, and at the same time take a photo from her ‘Kodak compact’ make-up case. This petite camera became a main agent for WWII and the invasion of France, which astounded even its inventors.

As many British secrets as possible were passed from the British Monarchy to Germany, obeying the Prince of Wales crest ‘Ich Dien’ (‘I serve, Germany’), honouring the family name, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, their origins, and David’s uncle, the Kaiser of Germany. To King Edward VIII, revealing the British secrets to Germany was akin to sending a letter to his relatives.

Wallis Simpson’s German contact was the German Ambassador to London, Joachim von Ribbentrop, the Champagne General. He would read the state secrets, then check the homosexual photographs of the future King as proof of the information’s authenticity.

Ribbentrop would send Wallis roses every day, 17 being a reference to the number of times they had exchanged information and had sex – about once a week for four months, from August 1936 until the King abdicated four months later on 10 December. Wallis was having sexual relations with the King six days a week (for secrets) and rooting the Nazi ambassador one day a week while passing them on – that’s a lot of secrets and one of history’s most successful sexual-information highways.

Wallis and Ribbentrop were two hysterically horny international spies, laughing at the British monarchy as they made way for the invasion of France with the joining of their libidos. This was pure knife-edge fun. They had the monarchy by the balls, and the fact that they both got away with their reputations intact during their lifetime showed total complicity from the British press, MI-5, MI-6, Freemasonry and the gay community – all to the country’s detriment, but for the expansion of war.

Spymaster: “The British Monarchy should have fallen. Almost every other European monarchy fell in the 1920s, but the British monarchy survived because it had become such a non-nationalistic spy network that it virtually condoned the bleeding of sensitive military information to countries like Germany and Russia. This ensured the monarchy survived, Britain was severely damaged and the war lasted longer.”

The British monarchy's spy network took rule only from the British Freemasons, the highest-ranking Freemasons being the King and currently the man with the world's lowest EQ (emotional quotient), HRH Prince Phillip (33° Mason) who is married to his second cousin, the current Queen. Both are the great-great-grandchildren of Queen Victoria.

The British monarchy was not serving its people, it was serving its secret societies, its Freemasons, its Illuminati, its Mercer's, the Livery Companies, the Anglican Church, the Boy Scouts, the paedophiles, and the creation of orphaned children as playthings for all of the above. The proof of this is in the near complete preservation of royal buildings during the war, while a third of the square mile of the City of London was completely destroyed.

The bribed King of England collected British secrets and passed them to his concubine, Wallis Simpson, who passed them to the Nazi Ambassador, in another sexual encounter, who then passed them to Hitler, who sniffed cocaine, snorted speed and masturbated over them. It was an orgy of information and one giant blowjob of secrets and it served to keep the Freemason's war going. France was invaded at all its weak points (including its Prime Minister) and virtually without resistance. It fell within two weeks while Britain stood back and watched, fiddling over paperwork.

Prince Edward (later King Edward VIII) "regarded WWI as futile and stupid and a result of unnecessary conflicts between his grandfather King Edward VII and his father's cousin Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany."[1] Reasons for WWII were equally vain. More than one secret service agent has mentioned that WWI and WWII were managed wars and WWII was a battle between the French and English Freemasons, or British royalty and French royalty.

Edward VIII, King of England, was surprisingly stupid and Wallis Simpson was surprisingly clever. She had spent most of her life entertaining two or more lovers at the same time and 17 yellow roses received daily from the Nazi Ambassador, was a lot to ignore – still, the constantly inebriated King Edward accomplished this with even more alcohol.

Abdication was a solution that saved the monarchy from certain extinction and prevented the King of England from being executed. Can you imagine a treasonous, bribed, homosexual king – surely that is a dead thing, except he was a Freemason which meant there would be no fall from grace in his lifetime and his true history would be covered up for generations to come.

Britain's King Edward VIII was so entrenched in the German Nazi movement that the German Military Intelligence's Abwehr even issued him with a 'V-Mann number' giving him special German military status. After 11 months as King, Edward VIII abdicated, retaining his title as Duke of Windsor (10 December 1936). As is so common with those on the sexual fringe, Wallis and Edward were actively destabilising their own family-based societies.

During WWII, the abdicated King Edward VIII and Wallis Simpson were both placed as far away as possible from Europe, its allies and from America. Consequently, a position was invented for them and they were made 'Governors of the Bahamas Islands' from 1940–45. Here they were both under strict surveillance.

Spymaster: "Wallis Simpson was investigated by the FBI in 1941 for passing information to Ribbentrop, the Nazi Foreign Minister in London, for being his lover, and for their involvement in the murder of the Canadian millionaire, Sir Harry Oakes, who inspired the private purchase of Spitfires for the RAF in 1940. When the Duke and Duchess of Windsor (Edward and Wallis) were accused of manipulating currency in France after WWII, the Labour Government had to step in and save them both from prosecution."

No action was taken against Wallis Simpson; however, Ribbentrop, her German lover, was hanged on 16 October 1946, primarily for his knowledge of the Duke of Windsor's sexual proclivities. At the end of WWII they were both asked to leave the Bahamas. This was a slap in the face with a wet bus ticket, but a shameful one nevertheless.

Wallis Warfield-Spencer-Simpson-Windsor was a woman primarily interested in her own sexuality. She was born in 1896 and died in 1986. Her father died when she was five months old. She (20) married a navy Lieutenant pilot, Earl Winfield Spencer Jr in 1916. He was an American-born Briton who was 'Earl' by Christian name only. They divorced in 1927. During this time she had an affair with Ernest Aldrich Simpson and they married in 1928, changing her name to Wallis Simpson (32). They divorced in May 1937.

Between 1922 and 1928 Wallis and her first husband Spencer were separated. In 1928 he suggested reconciliation and she sailed to China to join him. He then suggested she accompany him to a few Chinese brothels. They soon separated but she remained in China for a year, "haunting brothels by herself, enjoying close male friendships and a heady social life, refining her already considerable social/sexual skills". Of this time she wrote: "without doubt the most delightful, the most carefree, the most lyrical interval of my youth – the nearest thing to a lotus-eater's dream any young woman could expect to know".[2]

She still wore fashion influenced by the Chinese brothel to the end of her days. British Intelligence later claimed she had learnt techniques in Chinese brothels that helped her snare a king. They should know, they arranged it. "The [famous China dossier] file contained interviews with brothel madams confirming that Wallis had entered into perverse practices in the singsong houses."[3]

Wallis met the future King Edward for the first time in January 1931 and again in May. By January 1932, Edward, Prince of Wales was staying at Wallis and her second husband's house in London. By 1934, Edward was a frequent visitor to Wallis' home and she slept with both Edward, the future king, and her second husband, who didn't move out for another two years. Prince Edward (David) and Wallis were a couple of swinging bisexuals. It was four years later, and six months into Edward's reign (July 1936), that Ernest Simpson finally moved out of the marital home.

By January 1936, Edward, although King, was obsessed with Wallis. Despite Edward's several more available mistresses, Edward was characterised as Mrs Simpson's lapdog and their relationship, "sadomasochistic", he, "relishing contempt and bullying", and she finding him "dependent, burdensome and claustrophobic".

Edward's relationship with Wallis Simpson was now being reported in the foreign press; however, the British government had instructed the British press not to refer to the relationship. The British monarchy controlled the British press to the country's detriment.

Wallis Simpson was described by the Queen Mother as "the lowest of the low", presumably because she was conceived out of wedlock, from a solo-parent family that begged for survival, developed flirting as a survival skill, was a drug-dealer and gambler, trained as a sex-concubine in Peking's Forbidden City at no charge, was twice divorced, falsified her own divorce papers, had affairs in each marriage, one of which began as a cuckolding affair, was involved with a high-powered group of society lesbians, had communist connections, spied for the Russians, was a Nazi sympathiser, and was having an affair with Ribbentrop, the Nazi foreign minister to London, and a married American car salesman (Guy Marcus Trundle[4]), while dating the King, whom she got to abdicate, married him in Nazi Germany and then cheated on him with a homosexual.

Wallis Simpson was no beauty, but she was seductive. All of her relationships revolved around her being in control of the new man, while destroying the masculinity of the live-in partner. She was as successful at attracting men as she was at fleecing them and rebutting them. (See Was Wallis Simpson A Man, Appendix 13)

When she got sick of men, she had affairs with bisexual women like the German Marlene Dietrich (1904–92) who acted in The Blue Angel (1930), The Devil is a Woman (1935) and, rather ironically, Judgement at Nuremberg (1961). In his autobiography, Laurence Olivier writes of the two of them dancing tit-to-tit with their hands up each other's pants. Marlene Dietrich was a Nazi spy.

From 1949–53, while still married, she (53–57) began another affair with the gay playboy grandson of Woolworths. Twenty years her junior, it lasted four years, and Edward the Duke of Windsor (55–59), fully aware, trailed along behind. Edward, once King, had been usurped by a gay man. As the Duchess of Windsor once rebutted: "You can't abdicate and eat it."

You'd think by now that her given surname 'Warfield' meant something. She still wore fashion influenced by the Chinese brothel, her most cherished moments, till the end of her days. She remained, until her death in 1986, the Step-Aunt to the current Queen of England.[5]

"He was not skilled in doing anything physical."[6] Despite the fact that Prince Edward was a failure at everything – education, sports, relationships, sex (including erections), reproduction (no children), sleep (he was an insomniac), sobriety (he was a lush), family (they shunned him), public relations, the press, politics, service at war, kingship, and was vain to boot, the press still managed to maintain a level of popularity between Edward and the public.

Edward was a poor student and after two years of failed study it was decided he should be given a commission in the British Army. On the insistence of King George V (3 June 1865–20 January 1936) and Lord Kitchener (24 June 1850–5 June 1916), Edward was excluded from any discussion on political issues and restricted to serving as a courier (staff appointment) during WWI.

As Prince ‘David’ Edward, he had a gay liaison with his Oxford tutor Henry Peter Hansell. In 1918 he had an affair with the wife of the Liberal Whip, Freda Dudley Ward, then a homosexual liaison with Louis Mountbatten during the Empire Tour (1927). By 1930 Prince ‘David’ Edward was lingering in the Tate Gallery picking up boys and men. Six years later he was king. “He was an unsatisfactory lover with homosexual leanings.”[7]

His father King George V encouraged him to find a wife and start a family. “In January 1923 it was announced in the press that the future King Edward VIII would marry Lady Elizabeth Bowes-Lyon.”[8] On discovering his penis was so small as to be impractical, that he was bisexual, liked to be dominated, could not maintain an erection and was an insomniac, Elizabeth went with his brother Bertie instead, despite his bad stammer and shyness. “A week later her engagement to his brother Albert was announced; today she is the queen mother.”[9]

The future Queen of England and Queen Mother became engaged to his brother Prince ‘Bertie’ Albert even though Bertie (the future King George VI and the current Queen’s father) had already an affair with a black actress and a homosexual affair with a young Parisian boy who later blackmailed him.

King George VI followed this up during his marriage to the Queen with an illegitimate son named Michael Canfield (1926–69). He was brought up by Cass Canfield of Harper & Row Publishing and was the half-brother to the current Queen. Michael ‘Fitz’ Canfield later married the Duchess of Marlborough and ‘died’ soon after the wedding. There was no way he was going to be allowed to have children.[10]

[10] King Edward VIII tried to pass this off as the Duke of Kent’s illegitimate son.

But even this was pre-empted in the colonies and became known as New Zealand’s worst kept secret. Recently married and on Royal Tour with his wife (Elizabeth), newborn child (Elizabeth II) and homosexual incestuous partner (Louis Mountbatten), the future King George VI conceived a child with a Maori woman in March 1927.

As an adult, he was in charge of DoRAs (Defence of the Realm Acts) for British paedophiles on holiday in New Zealand, especially in Rotorua. He would cover for those who were caught or who had complaints against them, ensuring that there was no police record and that “the British tourists” got out of the country safely. His job was to cover up for British paedophiles, but it was also to ensure there was a ready supply of young Maori boys available for paedophilia who were encouraged to swim naked in the Priest and Radium pools.

Secret Service (NZ): “King George VI’s illegitimate son was an effeminate housebound homosexual who looked like a British royal who had been nuggetted. He was the Queen’s half-brother and 18 months her junior. She spent five days with him at Moosewood Lodge in Rotorua during the Royal Tour from 23 December 1953 to 30 January 1954. The previous Royal Tour in 1927 had sired the child.”[11]

The author has a bakelite cigar case stamped “·ROYAL VISIT··N·Z· 1949·”, but this was made in anticipation. The Royal Tour was delayed as King George VI became ill with a strange form of lung cancer called syphilis. He died of lung cancer/syphilis on 6 February 1952 and the newly crowned Queen Elizabeth II and her husband/second cousin Prince Philip went on the Royal Tour instead.

The former King’s doctor then came out to New Zealand, made child introductions to King George VI’s illegitimate son and was then promoted and elevated to Governor-General. Elevations and paedophilia go hand in hand, especially when the little hand meets the big hand.

After the future King Edward VIII’s week-long engagement to the current Queen Mother, the monarchy did a ‘round robin’ amongst the secret service, chocolate soldiers and diplomats. They searched high and low for a woman to revive the sagging libido of the inheritor of the British Empire. They tried the American Thelma Furness, but David rejected her. (She was normal, he was not.) The best they could find for ‘the most eligible bachelor in the world’ was a divorced American woman working at no charge, in a Peking brothel, in the Forbidden City of China – Wallis Simpson.

The King's challenged sexuality was confirmed by Wallis Simpson who told guests at a Paris party: "The duke is impotent and although he had tried sexual intercourse with numerous women they had been unsuccessful in satisfying his passions." "The duchess in her own inimitable and unique manner has been the only woman who had been able to satisfactorily gratify the duke's sexual desires."[12]

The 5' 5" (1.65 m) King Edward VIII had a small penis, could not maintain an erection and preferred to wear nappies and be dominated by Wallis Simpson.

Countess of Romanones: "The techniques Wallis discovered in China did not entirely overcome the Prince's extreme lack of virility. It is doubtful whether he and Wallis ever actually had sexual intercourse in the normal sense of the word."[13] It was a sadomasochistic relationship in which she had total control. She despised him and he adored her.

Wallis was considered unsuitable for the monarchy by the public and this caused Edward's abdication. After abdicating in December 1936, they both confirmed their Nazi sympathiser status by visiting Germany in October 1937 and being entertained by Hitler and other senior Nazis. Edward VIII: "Dictators are very popular these days."[14]

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 Ma

Edward VIII had supreme influence over the Freemasons and the Masonic Lodge. It becomes increasingly obvious to all who read history that control of the press is the key to allowing secret societies like the Freemasons to carry out their own agenda for war (British/German versus French Freemasons), while the monarchy's reputation is left untarnished.[15]

Control of the press always leads to some form of civil unrest. It may maintain stability at the time, but 'essential delayed knowledge' is always detrimental to history. It is an expression of an 'affective power vanity' which always results in an 'effective power vacuum'. It is the stuff of double agents.

On colonial visits Edward drew large crowds and his obvious popularity made him increasingly vain. As one observer noted, he had "difficulty in understanding the symbolic nature of his position and tended to assume that the attention focused on him was a direct consequence of his own particular gifts".

Edward had no children, thank God, but his father, George V, had given him a few half-brothers and sisters, the most famous of which was Anthony Blunt. His younger brother Bertie became King George VI, whose daughter became the present Queen (QEII).

A sexually bent King and a prostitute/sexual compulsive for a prospective Queen made Britain an invaders' paradise. War was planned and happened within three years.

It was essential for invading countries to find weaknesses in the key figures of opposing countries and then exploit those weaknesses. Embarrassment was something that was delayed as long as possible and, not surprisingly, the cover for such a plot always came from the country's own media under government instruction. Edward VIII had weaknesses to be exploited in abundance and his shortcomings made England a spy's paradise.

It was Edward's weaknesses as a king, his naïvety around politics, his lack of sexuality, his liking for prostitutes, and his continual intoxication, making him 'non compos mentis' most of the time, that almost brought down the British monarchy and perhaps should have.

With the British media's continual suppression and virtual blackout of anything 'Edward and Wallis', Edward VIII maintained his cover and provided an easy source of information for WWII's most competent and ingrained spy, Wallis Simpson, the Duchess of Windsor, and the King of England's partner. "Edward VIII turned to Wallis for advice in doing everything."[16]

By August 1935, Wallis was surrounded by French and British special agents and a detective from Scotland Yard. In order to pass secrets she employed a lawyer (Gregoire) who was also the lawyer for Ribbentrop (Nazi Ambassador to London) and Otto Abertz who soon became the German Ambassador to Paris. When she couldn't get through to them, she sent crucial secrets to Berlin via Italy.

Anna Wolkoff, the daughter of Admiral Wolkoff, was a Nazi spy sending crucial secrets to Berlin via Italy and was considered a leading figure in British fascism. She was the dressmaker to Wallis Simpson and Princess Marina of Greece (the widow of the Duke of Kent). Five associates of Anna Wolkoff were listed by MI-5 as being Nazi sympathisers. This list led right into the household of the British royal family.

For Pro-Nazi suspects, MI-5 had divided the country into regions, and when they were released 60 years later (October 2004) all but the central region of London involving British establishment figures were released, though the more obvious ones, the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Windsor, Sir Oswald Mosley, Sir Barry Domvile (the former head of Naval Intelligence) and Lord Rothermere (owner of the Daily Mail) were included. These leading British fascists were quoted as saying “A victorious Nazi invasion would place the Duke back on the throne”.[17]

None of their spying or sexual secrets made it to the British press as there was a media blackout on anything to do with Wallis and King Edward. Only overseas papers dared show the stories. Viscount Lord Rothermere,[18] fascist sympathiser and owner of the Daily Mail, often published pro-Hitler messages:

“In England, many people imagine Hitler as a cannibal; but I would like to say . . . he conveys good comradeship. He is unpretentious, naturally and apparently sincere . . . There is no human being living whose promise on important matters I would trust more readily. He believes that Germany has a Divine calling and that the German people are destined to save Europe . . . No words can describe his politeness . . . He is a man of rare culture.”[19]

“Hitler’s political aim and policy is directed toward attaining his goal without loss of blood. He succeeded in ascending to the highest power position in Germany with very little spilling of blood or loss of human life in a land of 68 million inhabitants. Austria was annexed without one shot being fired.”[20]

King Edward and Wallis Simpson were a couple of swinging bisexuals. She divorced in May 1937 and they married on 3 June 1937. Their official wedding photo in France showed Herman Rogers and Major Edward ‘Fruity’ Metcalfe. Wallis had had a ménage-à-trois with Herman Rogers and his wife and ‘Fruity’ was a bisexual in a front marriage. These were sexually incompetent bisexuals and gays in show marriages attending dinners sponsored by German and Italian Fascists.

As his father King George V put it: “My son has not a single friend who is a gentleman and does not see any decent society.” Wallis was also sexually involved with “Thelma and Gloria Vanderbilt in a high-powered group of society lesbians”.[21]

Snubbed by the royal family and the British establishment, the Duke of Windsor was forced into exile in France, Spain, Portugal and the Bahamas. He was considered a drunk and she obnoxious. Despite their exile, Wallis Simpson continued to provide Ribbentrop (the Nazi Ambassador in London) with the information required for the invasion of France in 1940.

The former King Edward VIII, abdicated and reduced to the Duke of Windsor, was posted to France to liaise between the British and French armies; however, “the Duchess of Windsor was in constant contact and communication with Ribbentrop . . . Because of their high official position, the duchess obtained a variety of information concerning the British and French official activities and passed this on to the Germans.”[22]

With this information, the Germans invaded northern France in May 1940 with virtually no opposition. The couple then fled to Biarritz in the south of France. Wallis Simpson had informed Ribbentrop where they were going, and arrival to their secret hideaway was simultaneously announced on German Radio, along with their room number. This lifted German war spirits to new levels of hilarity not enjoyed since.

Within a month they travelled to Spain and communication with Ribbentrop was facilitated through Spanish Fascists. A month later they travelled to Portugal where the Duke made indiscreet remarks that Britain stood little chance of resisting a German invasion and may as well try to settle for peace with the Germans.

Edward VIII was allowed to leave Spain under the direct intervention of Walter Schellenberg, the Nazi Intelligence Officer. For this favour, Schellenberg was not prosecuted for War Crimes in 1946, but 1949. He was placed in British custody and made to sleep on a mattress with radioactive material inserted. He died soon after from stomach cancer (1952).[23]

Schellenberg had managed the Venlo Incident for Germany but was never forgiven by the British for ‘acquiring possession’ of the Prince of Wales’ homosexual secrets. For this, in the end, he was ultimately condemned to die. The Intelligence Officer’s comment that often appears on British files and believed to be penned by ‘M’ read:

“Well done, true and faithful servant”.

The Duke and Duchess of Windsor spent the month of July 1940 in Portugal, during which time Winston Churchill arranged for the Duke to become the ‘Governor of the Bahamas’ from August 1940. The Bahamas were selected to prevent the Duchess from coming into contact with any British officials and from “establishing any channel of communication with Ribbentrop”.

FBI memo: “It was considered absolutely essential that the Windsors be removed to a point where they would do absolutely no harm.”

> London Guardian, 2002: “When the Duke and Duchess of Windsor sailed into Palm Beach, Florida, on the SS Berkshire from Nassau on April 18 1941, they were looking forward to enjoying three days of relaxation at the Everglades Club, playing golf and drinking and gossiping with American high society. Little did they know that the previous night instructions had gone out from President Roosevelt to FBI chief J. Edgar Hoover to launch what was to be an extraordinary covert intelligence exercise that had to fool both the exiled royals and the US secret service agent who was guarding them.
> “The exercise was launched after the FBI had been passed intelligence that the Duke and Duchess were being used by the Nazis to obtain secrets which could wreck the Allies’ war effort. The US investigation became even more lurid when FBI agents interviewed a Benedictine monk in a Franciscan monastery in the United States; Father Odo had once been the Duke of Wurttemberg, a minor German royal with connections to Queen Mary, the duke’s mother, and her brother, the Duke of Athlone, then governor-general of Canada.

> “He told them that a prime suspect in the investigation – Joachim von Ribbentrop, then the Nazis’ foreign minister – had been the Duchess’s lover when he was ambassador to Britain in 1936. The minister was already thought to have been supplied with information by the Duchess during the German invasion of France in 1940. Now it was suggested that there was a far closer arrangement.
> “A year after war broke out, the FBI sent a memo to President Roosevelt outlining the agency’s worries about the couple. It stated: ‘It has been ascertained that for some time, the British government has known that the Duchess of Windsor was exceedingly pro-German in her sympathies and connections and there is strong reason to believe that this is the reason why she was considered so obnoxious to the British government that they refused to permit Edward to marry her and maintain the throne.
> “Both she and the Duke of Windsor have been repeatedly warned by representatives of the British government that in the interest of the morale of the British people, they should be exceedingly circumspect in their dealings with the representatives of the German government.”[24]
> From their base in the Bahamas, the couple made frequent visits to the United States during WWII. After tailing the Windsors, on 2 May 1941 an FBI agent wrote to Hoover: “The Duchess of Windsor had an intense hate for the English since they had kicked them out of England . . . and he [FBI agent] had definite proof that the Duke of Windsor, former King of England, had reached an agreement with Hitler’s deputy, Herman Goering. After Germany won the war, Goering, through control of the army, would overthrow Hitler and reinstate the duke as King of England.”[25]

This pipedream of Goering’s was sympathetically treated in the higher echelons of MI-6, but was only for the consumption of Goering and the Prince of Wales.

This saga was not only circumstance, but also hereditary. Edward’s father, King George V, was described by his biographer Robert Lacey:

[24] Chris Jones, BBC News Profiles Unit, 29 January 2003; Rob Evans and David Hencke, Wallis Simpson, the Nazi minister, the telltale monk and an FBI plot, London Guardian, 29 June 2002.

[25] Ibid.

"As his official biographer I felt compelled to admit, King George V was distinguished by no exercise of social gifts, by no personal magnetism, by no intellectual powers. He was neither a wit nor a brilliant raconteur, neither well-read, nor well-educated, and he made no great contribution to enlightened social converse. He lacked intellectual curiosity . . ." and it was these qualities that King Edward VIII inherited, as did his brother King George VI, the father of the current Queen Elizabeth II.

King George V had the perfect parenting style for creating sexual repressives and moody ne're-do-wells. He was a remote and stern figure who treated his sons like cadets on a battleship – they were always on parade when in his presence. He reprimanded them with savage anger and employed a succession of nannies, at least two of which were sadistically cruel. The children were raised by an unavailable, angry father, for whom they had to perform. Both Edward (David) and George (Bertie) grew up to be effeminate, non-performing, easily bribed bisexuals whose sperm had no morals.

King George V was killed by his doctor, Lord Dawson, who injected him with a mixture of morphine and cocaine so his death announcement could make the morning papers. He died within 15 minutes at 11.55 pm on 20 January 1936 at Sandringham, Norfolk, England. Hitler sent a message of sympathy and his entire cabinet attended a synchronous memorial in Berlin on 28 January 1936.

Hitler was infatuated with Wallis Simpson and assigned a German agent to film Wallis at the funeral procession. Both Hitler and Eva Braun were mesmerised by Wallis's hair, make-up and severe, classic, timeless clothes. Hitler deeply admired Wallis and giggled uncontrollably in ecstatic pleasure when he viewed her on film in Obersalzburg.

Something drastically changed between 1936 and 1939. The continued use of hard drugs began to tax high society. Hitler was a speed and cocaine addict and the elite of Britain and Berlin were in a white powder epidemic. Cocaine (snow) was widely used in the 1920s and from 1933 the Nazis campaigned against their use.

Despite this, from April to December 1939 German soldiers were supplied with 29 million pills of Amphetamine Pervitine (Benzedrine, or speed) designed to keep the paratroopers awake. From 1942, Adolf Hitler's personal physician (King George VI's agent, Dr Theodor Morell) injected him daily with methamphetamine or 'speed', very similar to 'P' which caused Hitler's premature ageing and charismatic dementia.[26]

[26] Wolf Kemper, Nazis on Speed, 2003.

Many Nazi servicemen of all kinds took emergency packets of supplied drugs. A paratrooper who jumped on Crete in 1941 said: "It was as if someone had boiled my blood. I suddenly had superhuman strength and could not sleep. I was capable of superhuman feats."

Allied Officer: "I was assigned to guard a German 'naval commander' – a ship saboteur. He had dangerous knowledge but was not physically capable. He showed me shots of his children and I pretended to relax. He talked to me in English and one night when I came on duty, his eyes had changed. His pupils had got a little bigger and he moved a little more quickly. He suddenly tried to grasp my throat and it took a full magazine from a Lanchester SMG4 in .45 calibre to bring him down. He was dead on the deck before he fell. If I had engaged the safety he would have killed me. I have no doubt the previous guard had missed him taking something."

The use of drugs and alcohol was a major feature of the life of Wallis Warfield-Spencer-Simpson-Windsor and her greatest supporter was the drug addict Lady Emerald Cunard. Wallis suffered from recurring bleeding ulcers from her ever-increasing alcoholism which resulted in delusions, and in the last 10 years of her life she would pick up objects and talk on them as though they were a telephone.

The ambition of the British monarchy from 1837–1910 had been to exert political influence (Queen Victoria, 1837–1901; King Edward VII, 1902–1910) in the tradition of Queen Elizabeth I (1558–1603). However, King George V (1910–1936) did not have the sufficient IQ required to manipulate the destiny of nations. As such, his royal perspective was considerably more humble, understandable in that he could comprehend little. Instead, George V chose, or rather, it was chosen for him, that he would do whatever he was capable of. This was limited to embodying qualities which the nation was to see as its greatest strength – "diligence, dignity and duty". This involved being seen parading in a glorified uniform and little else.

These new traditional values were to march men into war as proud cannon fodder. It was a well-dressed borderline retard leading the impoverished into deaths of glory and risking their lives for medals made of brass and silk.

Despite the lack of intellectual status assigned to King George V, even less was assigned to his son King George VI.[27] Queen Elizabeth II is no bright spark either. Her lack of intelligence and inability to spell her own name correctly during signing is often confused with her not being amused. She is not amused because she does not get the joke. "She is a child in a woman's body, does not understand murder and has little concept of Emotional Quotient."[28] In that regard, she is well matched to her husband/second cousin, Prince Philip.

[27] King Edward VIII was assigned a little intellectual kudos, but this was mitigated by his inability to grasp 'cause and effect' and his sexually libertarian antics.

As a result, Buckingham Palace is described as a sterile emotional void, and yet another generation morbidly waits on her passing the crown and the couple dying their way out of the history books. For such honoured people, at the end of their lives, we have to ask ourselves: "What have they done?"

More importantly, historians have to ask: "What have the royals done that the public generally don't know about?" This usually takes 50 years or so to uncover, but in the case of Prince Philip's tour of South America it is passed the the 50-year rule and still not released.

Prince Charles' servant, George Smith, claimed he was anally raped in 1989 by a royal servant and had seen Prince Charles in a compromising position with the same servant. Diana recorded Smith's affidavit and died within the year. Smith went public in 2003 dying two years later, apparently of post-traumatic stress disorder following military service in the Falklands War, 23 years earlier (1982). His illness was acquired soon after accusing Prince Charles. George Smith died 'ex-military fit' aged 44 on 24 August 2005. Unfortunately his late-detected long-time illness proved fatal.[29]

By no means is this history a good look. It looks more like a low grade American soap, a kind of super-rich Days of our Lives without the daily toil. The public at large can be justified in saying: "We are not amused".

Operation JAMES BOND
1–10 May 1945

From the very beginning of the war, the British ran German Army Intelligence and had insight into what the General Staff were doing. This made the war a very planned war which Britain continually expanded and prolonged. Essentially Britain trained Hitler and Stalin, gave Hitler Germany, and Stalin Russia, and then ordered Fascist Germany to attack Communist Russia, watching as they destroyed each other.

In the last days of WWII, America halted outside Berlin allowing Russia to destroy the Germans and many voluntary Scandinavian fascist units. At the same time, Britain pulled out its double agents from the inside.

America and Britain had this inside/outside thing going on the whole time. The British and American High Command were making decisions that troops on the ground could not understand. America could have taken Berlin two weeks earlier, but the British had not yet extracted their agents Martin Bormann and Adolf Hitler.

All the characters from Operation JAMES BOND took their names from Winnie the Pooh. Winston Churchill had been known as 'Winnie' since WWI. Ian Fleming was 'Pooh'. Adolf Hitler was 'Rabbit' and Eva Braun was 'Ms Rabbit'. Admiral Canaris, a British agent in the German High Command, was 'Eeyore'.

Hitler had Admiral Canaris killed on 9 April 1945 and by the time OPJB came into action he had been dead three weeks. "If Canaris was not actually working for the British, it is clear that he was working against Hitler."[1]

Operation JAMES BOND was designed by 'M' and consisted of:
Director of Special Secret intelligence operations, Major Desmond Morton;
Prime Minister and 2IC of 'M', Winston Churchill;
Director of Naval Intelligence, Rear-Admiral John Godfrey; and Lieutenant-Commander of the Royal Navy Intelligence Division, Ian Fleming (Godfrey's personal assistant).

[1] Bodyguard of Lies, p. 816.

The operation was sabotaged by King George VI using his half-brother, Anthony Blunt, who was also a KGB operative.

In OPJB Chris Creighton claimed his mission was, according to its subtitle, The Last Great Secret of the Second World War. Churchill referred to the mission as 'The Operation that never was'. What was not acknowledged about OPJB was that there was another mission tacked onto it. The Lieutenant of OPJB, Ian Fleming, only knew about it when he was switched to the second, and even more secret, mission on 1 May 1945.

Germany was losing the war and Britain needed to control all the assets of Nazi pillage (M's, point 4), get its double agents out (M's point 5), and remove any incriminating evidence on Britain or America (M's point 7). To achieve this they had to pluck Martin Bormann, Hitler's secretary and head of the Nazi Party Chancellery (the money) to England in exchange for the Nazis' Swiss Bank account numbers. Britain would thereby become the hero of WWII's surviving victims, especially the Jews.

This had been pre-negotiated with Martin Bormann. Training had started four months earlier in January for a mission date in May 1945. Those in Operation JAMES BOND were trained at Birdham Military Camp near Portsmouth in a large country house in Hampshire for four months.

Christopher Creighton (21) led Operation JAMES BOND out of Berlin on 1–10 May 1945. He was the real inspiration for Ian Fleming's James Bond books (1953–64) and the cult movies that followed (1963–2006). In Chris Creighton (alias James Bond) we have one of the luckiest men alive. Luck was his nursery rhyme, his star, his life's work, and like the Fraud Squad, he was simply never suspected.

Operation JAMES BOND was of such a nature as to be considered unpatriotic. Therefore every measure of cover was put in place for the British agents.

"Extended cover was therefore put in place to show that for the duration of OPJB, from early January to early May 1945, he [Ian Fleming] had been either in the Far East, liaising with intelligence divisions of the Commonwealth navies, or else in Jamaica, where he had visited Sir William Stephenson (head of British Intelligence in the Americas and referred to as the 'quiet Canadian') at the end of February. So thoroughly was the deception planned" . . . he flew between England and Jamaica between training just to keep his alibi intact.[2]

Christopher Creighton's record was also continually altered and the record of his alias 'John Davis' was continually blackened making him appear as a convincing traitor.

Christopher Creighton was called to the underground war-room in London. King George VI "confided that he was worried about correspondence lodged in Schloss Kronberg, a castle near Frankfurt belonging to the Hesse family, of which Mountbatten was a scion[3] . . . Worse, he feared other letters might contain embarrassing evidence that his brother, the Duke of Windsor, formerly King Edward VIII, had shown pro-Nazi leanings. Unfortunately, he said, there were valid reasons for believing this to be true, and he was extremely anxious that the correspondence should not fall into the wrong hands. Anthony Blunt [KGB spy] had been assigned the job of finding the letters and bringing them out."

Christopher Creighton: "I could see he did not want to believe what he had just admitted."[4] Other officers who were contemporaries of George VI were amazed that he even enunciated such a difficult and complex sentence. They suspected that a double was used.

The Duke of Windsor, the abdicated King Edward VIII, was a V-Mann with an Abwehr number. This meant that he was an active German agent passing vital information to the Germans.

King George VI acknowledged this but failed to reveal his half-brother Anthony Blunt as a communist sympathiser and numbered Soviet operative. Anthony Blunt joined Operation JAMES BOND.[5]

While training at Birdham Military Camp over the next few days, Anthony Blunt copied the plans for Operation JAMES BOND and gave them to the Russians who were desperate to stop all top Nazi brass leaving Berlin, as they too wanted everything the Nazis had looted – money, gold, paintings, artefacts, Freemasonry war plans and occult secrets. Anthony Blunt was removed from the mission for being lazy, insolent, refusing to train, and stealing documents. If less connected, he would have been shot on the spot.

[3] Hesse was an area of Germany formerly under British control. As such, the Hesse family never closed their doors to the British. A 'scion' is a descendant.

[4] OPJB, pp. 136–37.

[5] Prior to Stalin's death in 1953, the KGB was called the NKVD.

Martin Bormann was Hitler's secretary and head of the Chancellery. A doppelgänger was found for him and was only ever referred to as 'Günther'. Doppelgänger Bormann was given plastic surgery and matching dentalwork in England. German dentalwork was completely different from that practised in Britain and MI-6 had long used Continental dentists in specially equipped British clinics.

Doppelgänger Bormann was then taken back to Berlin where he accidentally protected the real Martin Bormann from a bomb blast during their escape on 1 May 1945. As he lay dying, the real Martin Bormann put his mouth close to his, virtually kissing him as he thanked his doppelgänger for saving his life. This allowed him to finish him off with a phial of potassium cyanide poison stored in one of his teeth.

Operation JAMES BOND then kayaked down the River Spree and Hitler's chief deputy Martin Bormann was taken back to Britain, given plastic surgery, and taught how to speak and walk differently. He was given a life in London, and when that got hot, life in a country town as Herr Martin Schuler. Becoming depressed, he was given a fake death in 1956 and on 29 April 1956 flown to Paraguay in central South America where he died in February 1959.

At the time of the real Martin Bormann's death, Peter Broderick-Hartley, a doppelgänger in training for the previous eight years, surfaced in the south of England and took Martin Bormann's place in 1960, dying in 20 June 1989. He specialised in overacting in public and giving German/Jewish relations a bad name.

Even after the real Bormann's death (1896–1959) British Intelligence still faked his life with doppelgängers in England, Italy and Germany. 'The Martin Bormann illusion' became a competition for the longest-running doppelgänger (44 years) and the longest-running unnecessary doppelgänger (30 years) and was recognised as a secret intelligence coup over the media and the masses.

In 1946 rumours were put out that SS men were guarding Martin Bormann in the Alps near Hitler's old retreat at the Berchtesgaden on the Austrian/German border. Later in 1946 the hideout was bombed by the Americans in a rather public display and they captured one of the SS 'actors' who confirmed they had been protecting Martin Bormann.

Then a motorcade, apparently carrying Bormann, drove through Austria and Italy followed by a British war-crimes investigator

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

The Bormanns.

(forerunner to the pitifully useless UN). He was to follow at a distance and was repeatedly denied permission to arrest the fake Bormann.

> "When they reached the Italian port of Bari, the dummy Bormann and his vehicle were hoisted in cargo nets aboard an unmarked ship which sailed away to an undisclosed location, 'rumoured' to be South America."[6]

This was the Rat Line – many rats used it. It was jointly funded by the US Army and the Vatican and when they arrived in South America they were protected by Vatican documents. This is why there were reports of Bormann in Argentina ten years before he actually arrived . . . and by then the search was over.

The Argentine documents released in the 1990s state that Bormann got through Italy by moving from monastery to monastery by way of Lake Garda and left Genoa on an Italian ship, landing at Buenos Aires. However, this is the fake story of his doppelgänger and made it all the way to Argentina as the official story. It even duped the spy ace, Ladislas Farago, author of Aftermath (p. 333) and at least 15 other books.

The lengths the Secret Service will go to, even in a foreign country, to hide the identity of a doppelgänger are endless. But their real mission was to hide, for as long as possible, the story that follows.

treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

Just as Operation JAMES BOND had got Martin Bormann to the edge of the River Spree in central Berlin, on the evening of 1 May 1945, and were scaling down the river walls into their kayaks, Susan Kemp (who later became Director of 'M') gave Ian Fleming, the Commander of OPJB, "an urgent but totally unexpected order. He had been recalled to London immediately. No reason had been given, but he was to return upstream to Müggelsee [south-east of Berlin] as soon as the escape party was safely away. At 0200 a Lysander would come in to land on the disused road along the south-west shore of the lake, and pick him up . . . an order had been given. Fleming was recalled: that was it. Caroline Saunders had come downstream in one of the motorboats: in a matter of moments, Fleming [37] had gone down over the wall on a rope and was aboard it. As they pulled away, I [Chris Creighton, 21] called out, 'Good luck!' Fleming's reply was typical: 'Don't go and ponce up all our good work now, Christopher."[7]

Chris Creighton then became commanding officer of Operation JAMES BOND. Soon after, they received a signal directly from General Donovan of American Intelligence saying that "Anthony Blunt belonged to a homosexual Marxist secret society called The Apostles at Trinity College in Cambridge, and that he had been a member of the Communist Party for the last nine years."

These facts were all covered up by MI-5, generally run by the Anglicans (British Catholics) and Freemasons. The head of all three was King George VI – Anthony Blunt's half-brother. King George VI was sabotaging M's mission and the James Bond operatives.[8]

Spymaster: "George VI would not have understood what he was presiding over and would have been used merely as a rubber stamp."

As a favour to Morton and Churchill, MI-5 did a back-room deal and pulled Ian Fleming out, but not James Bond (Chris Creighton) whose mission was paddling straight into alerted Russian fire. The only thing that saved them was a Russian-speaking beauty on board, who was one of their agents.

Ian Fleming didn't go straight back to London. He was being shifted to another mission that had been tacked on to Operation JAMES BOND. After the Führer had faked his death the day before, he made contact with his British opposite (Winston Churchill) and confirmed as much. He also reminded Churchill, in perfect English, that he was a British double agent, trained in Tavistock[9] from February to November 1912, gave his British military number, and confirmed that he had completed all missions (and then some), and requested to be evacuated to the "pre-negotiated safe haven".

Winston Churchill complied. It gave him the excuse to save one of his best friend's sons, the personal assistant to the Director of Naval Intelligence, Lieutenant-Commander of the Royal Navy Intelligence Division, and commander of Operation JAMES BOND, Ian Fleming.

What Ian Fleming experienced in the next 24 hours was an even bigger mind-bender and one that drove him to drink and bank debt for the next eight years.

[8] From 1940 the 14th Duke of Hamilton (Nazi) had huge control over the Freemasons. MI-6 is currently run hands on by QEII and MI-5 is controlled by Prince Charles.

[9] The Psych-Ops school was called Tavistock from 1920/21 after the school in Ireland was closed down due to civil war and new land was gifted by the Rothschilds.

If OPJB was 'the mission that never was', then the secret mission tacked on to it would be the most secret, shredded, and disavowed mission ever, and bound to remain secret until all parties were dead and even after that. Ian Fleming had already got all he needed from Martin Bormann and the JAMES BOND mission was about to paddle for 10 days into a Russian trap instigated by the communist sympathisers, Anthony Blunt and King George VI.

OPJB paddled during the night and camped under cover during the day in the Wannsee near Pfaueninsel Island where Goebbels gave his phenomenal party during the 1936 Olympics for two thousand guests, with huge fireworks many thought predictive of war. The next day, on the afternoon of 2 May 1945, under no German fire, but under heavy Russian fire, something really interesting happened.

> James Bond (Chris Creighton):
> "Now the Pfaueninsel [an island in Lake Havel, south-west of Berlin] was again under intermittent bombardment, this time from Soviet armour, which had advanced into the suburbs of Kladow, on the western shore of the Havel. During the afternoon a Junkers sea-plane came in to land on the Wannsee, close to the big island [Pfaueninsel]. We speculated that this might represent a last-minute attempt to lift high-ranking Nazi to safety, and sure enough, two small boats, one a motor yacht, the other a gaff-rigged yawl, came out, apparently to make contact with the pilot. No sooner had they appeared than the Soviet gunners took up target practice on both. The motorboat headed away at full speed and made good its escape. The Junkers took off, also unscathed. But the slow-moving yawl was less lucky: a direct hit blew it to pieces, and it went down, so far as we could see, with all hands. For us professional sailors, at action stations and highly trained in search-and-rescue techniques, it was terrible to have to stand by and watch helplessly as people drowned in front of our eyes. The incident shocked us, and made us all too well aware of what would happen if one of our kayaks were hit by a Soviet shell.[10]

Plane Sailing

This is a point of history that's worth looking at in detail. If Hitler was to escape out of Berlin by plane, he would have put a great deal of effort into selecting the right plane, or planes, to escape in.

Hitler would have debated between three categories of plane. The first choice would have been the most capable VTOL evacuation seaplane (the German version of Short Take Off and Landing) and that would be the Heinkel 115. The second choice would have been an easily recognised unarmed passenger plane, unlikely to be seen as a threat, the least likely plane to be shot down and with as big floats as possible. The third choice would have been whatever was available.

Any of these three choices should have been able to fly the 1500 km from Berlin to Barcelona in one stretch at a minium speed of 190 mph/300 kmph to match the Lysander he was eventually to fly with.

Although the point of view of the James Bond team was very distant and obscured, they were all trained in plane spotting and reported a Junkers landing on Lake Havel. According to The Last Days of Hitler it was a JU52. I don't disagree, but there were scores of Junkers planes of which many could be mistaken for other aircraft and there were at least 28 different models of JU52s.

WWII aircraft expert: "The first choice of plane for the VTOL on water would have been a seaplane that was: (a) available with spares so as to be readily employed by the RAF version of KG200, which operated captured British and American aircraft; (b) fast; (c) capable of diving; (d) able to stop and start in a short distance; (e) relatively quiet; (f) able to carry heavy loads like gold; and (g) proven as the best aircraft in the fleet.

"Seaplanes are weighted differently from land planes and land horizontally with their weight over the wings. Land planes tend to land with the tail wheel first and have their weight behind the wings.

"Seaplanes have a higher torque for take-off and a lower cruising speed, so they tend to have three or four propeller blades. The JU52 had two propeller blades and its single engine was underpowered which made water take-offs unreliable to say the least.

"For the JU52 to be adapted as a seaplane, it would need greater torque for take-off. It would have to have been the 3-engined version, the JU52/3m, and most likely with the propeller blades increased from 2 to 3. This still left the problem of the weighting of the plane and this was compensated for with very large floats.

"No one with half a brain would try and land a twin-blade propeller single-engine JU52 on a lake (especially in rough weather) and if they did, no one with experience would expect to take off again. The JU52 was too risky to use on such an important mission. The later three-engined JU52/3m was a better bet and had the advantage of being recognised as a non-fighter transport aircraft.

"Junkers never made Catalina-type planes that landed on their bellies, planes with roof-mounted wings, or bi-planes. Junkers did make the twin-engined glass-nosed JU88 from December 1936 and these matched with the Dornier Do17 and the Heinkel 111 quite closely.

"They were all similar length (14.2–16.6 m), similar wingspan (18–22.6 m), similar height (4.2–4.7 m), similar speed (440–510 kmph) and all had enough range (2108–2150 km).

"The problem with all of them was they were known to be combat aircraft carrying 1–2 tonnes of bombs and machine guns. This made them a target and ruled out the more modern JU88 as a possible EVAC seaplane."

The Heinkel He115 (August 1937–44) was also similar in that it had a glass nose, twin engines, was 17.3 m long, had a 22.2 m wingspan, a height of 5 m, a slower speed of 349 kmph and a range of 2100 km. The Heinkel had 9-cylinder BMW radial engines while the Junkers had 18-cylinder BMW radial engines. The wingspan, dimensions and height, as well as the engines and look of the plane, were very similar.

The Heinkel He115 had an aluminium and rope ladder and the Heinkel He115B had a torpedo belly that could be modified with a retractable harness falling out to lift two people with ease. This would have been very difficult to see from a hidden low-level position.

The Heinkel also had six struts per float which would have further obstructed the view and these may well have been modified with bulletproof side walls. It would have been simple enough to drive right under the Heinkel and for the passengers to be transferred without getting wet.

The Heinkel He115 was described as "a wholly outstanding machine in all respects. It was tough, beautiful to fly at speeds down to 75 knots and carried a substantial load at relatively high speeds. In 1938 the prototype was specially streamlined as the A-1 to set class records.

"By 1939 the long-range B models were in production which could carry 1420 kg at 240 km/hr for up to 3300 km. They were also used by the British RAF for secret agent dropping between Scotland, Malta and North Africa.

"The 141 E-models were built in 1944 to bring the total past 400. They were used for armed reconnaissance, shallow dive bombing and casevac [casualty evacuation]."[11]

WWII aircraft expert: "The Heinkel He115 was a reliable seaplane with plenty of spare parts. The KG-200 squadron used special Allied aircraft and also German aircraft, which they dressed up to look like foreign aircraft. JU88 'fighters' were also painted to look like JU88 'bombers' with the bomber's glass noses painted on. This was done to lure the RAF into attacking from the front, the most lethal part of the JU88 'fighter'."

The Heinkel He115 would have been the perfect choice for Hitler as an escape plane because it was more than capable of flying the return trip from Berlin to Barcelona (3000 km) without refuelling and was considered one of Germany's most solid fighting aircraft.

The problem with the He115 was that it was too good an aircraft and was known to carry one tonne of bombs, plus machine guns. The He115 was the best plane for the job, but it was too much of a target.

The second choice, the easily recognised unarmed passenger plane, unlikely to be seen as a threat, was best satisfied by the Junkers JU52/3m.

Single engine Junkers JU52 were built from 1930 with two propeller blades and a top speed of 250 kmph (155 mph). They were poorly armed and slow so many were shot down. As such they always needed an escort and weren't considered a threat without one.

From April 1931 these were upgraded and fitted with three engines (BMW 132T Radial Piston Hornet engines, 725 hp each) giving the JU52/3m a maximum speed of 316 kmph (195 mph) and a range of 1300 km (808 miles). These were built as seaplanes from 1932–45 with the later models having three-bladed propellers.

The JU52/3m had a length of 18.9 m, a wingspan of 29 m and a height of 4.5–6.0 m, depending on wheels, skis or floats. But most importantly they had very large floats, 12 m long by 1 m high. This was enough to hide the top of a conning tower from a rising submarine.

The JU52/3m were reliable and had plenty of spare parts, but had little else going for them. They were not fast, great divers, VTOL, or quiet, and could only carry moderate loads off the water. They were considered an unthreatening transport aircraft and people had affection for them. This was their main advantage.

The JU52s were variously nicknamed the 'Iron Annie', 'Auntie Ju' and 'The Corrugated Coffin' because of the corrugated iron fuselage that protected a very solid airframe.

During the Spanish Civil War[12] the Junkers JU52/3m ferried more than 10,000 Moorish troops from Morocco to Spain as well as dropping 6000 tonnes of bombs. They generally carried 2 x 7.92 machine guns and could be fitted with a variety of bomb brackets. They were commonly used by the Condor Legion in Spain (German troops) and would not attract any special attention there.

The JU52/3m entered into service as troop transport and bombers. They were used by Lufthansa and served Madrid as airliners, which was slightly embarrassing when the same German planes were used to drop bombs less than a mile from the airport during the Spanish Civil War essentially a practice war for WWII.

From 1937 the JU52/3m were purportedly withdrawn from their bomber role and used for transport and bomber training only. By 1939 over 1000 JU52 were in service and eventually 5415 were built. As a Lufthansa airliner they could carry (only) 17 passengers and travel from Berlin to Rome in 8 hours, which at the time was considered fantastic. They also served as airliners in Finland, Spain and Sweden, as mail carriers in China, and hauling lumber in Canada.

In delivering mail, carrying lumber, passengers, troops and doing bomber training, the JU52s developed a friendly and unthreatening reputation. After 1939, JU52s were recognised more and more as a civil transport plane.

During WWII the JU52s dropped paratroopers into the Netherlands, Ardennes, Crete, the Mediterranean, North Africa and the Baltic States. The 'Iron Annies' were popular, reliable, generally recognised as an unarmed plane and became the most famous German transport of WWII.

Top: Heinkel 115.
Middle: Condor Focke-Wulf 200C-1 Condor, SG+KS.
Bottom: Junkers JU88.

The JU52/3ms were continually improved upon and not all of these improvements were made public. Later models were powered by 3 Pratt & Whitney Hornet radial engines with a maximum take-off weight of 10 tonnes.

The JU52/3m g5e had interchangeable ski gear with an exhaust that de-iced, and even later JU52/3ms had three cells capable of carrying 1.5 tonnes of bombs in the fuselage and 3 x 7.92 mm MG15 rearward-facing guns with a total of 1800 rounds. Improved versions had more modern radio equipment, upgraded bomb-release mechanisms and a take-off weight of 10.5 tonnes with an economical cruising speed of 210 kmph.

The JU52/3m g10e was an improvement on this again with wheels, skis or floats and was powered by 3 BMW 132Z radial engines, a glider tow coupling and strengthened landing gear for a maximum take-off weight of 11.5 tonnes.

The final production version of this was the JU52/3m g14e with additional armoured protection for the pilot, 13-mm MG131 guns to the rear, 7.92-mm MG 15 guns in each beam position and another over the cockpit in the low drag cupola position.

By manipulating public perception Hitler had transformed a successful bomber plane into a much-loved transport aircraft. The appearance of the plane was not improved upon from 1930 and their latest improvements were largely kept out of the public eye so that by the end of the war the JU52/3ms were the aeronautical version of a hotrod – highly powered, strong on take-offs, able to carry huge loads, well protected and defended, but still an ‘Iron Annie’ – all affection and no threat. The plane was also in common use in Spain so landing there was not of any particular note. This was the perfect plane for Hitler’s RAPWI (Recovery of Allied Prisoners of War and Internees).

In addition to these general improvements, the belly of the JU52/3m g14e seaplane could be modified into two long trapdoors as was common to many planes. The 12-m-long floats on the JU52/3m seaplane tapered from 1 metre to 0.6 metres and sat about 0.5 metres above the water. The distance from the top of the float to the belly of the plane was another 1.5 metres. With two trapdoors 1 metre wide, this only left a gap of 0.5 metres from the top of the float to the bottom of the doors and this gap was further obstructed by eight struts each side.

If the conning tower of a submarine rose to 0.5 metres above the surface there was no way to sight it and if it rose to within 1 metre of the belly of the plane there was no way to sight who travelled between. This was near perfect protection that only the bombing of the plane could have destroyed, and Hitler had organised German bombing on the Russians just for this occasion.

The Junkers JU52 was selected for the very reason of all its failures. It was recognised as a slow passenger aircraft, had not carried bombs in many years, was known to have the minimum of machine guns, was a relatively old and easily recognised design and was not considered a threat by anyone[13] . . . but the vastly improved JU52/3m g14e was capable of travelling at over 316 kmph (195 mph), had a range of 1300 km (808 miles), and additional mileage could be supported using fuel bladders inside the aircraft. Most importantly the JU52/3m g14e could keep up with a Lysander on a trip to Spain.

The Junkers that landed on Lake Havel was a JU52/3m g14e, with 3 BMW 132Z radial engines, a maximum take-off weight of 11.5 tonnes, 13-mm MG131 guns to the rear, two 7.92-mm MG 15 beam guns, a 7.92-mm MG 15 cockpit gun, armourplated cockpit, 12 metre x 1 metre floats, an opening belly with 1-metre wide doors, oxygen, and a typewriter. There were no reported shots hitting the plane and it left Lake Havel “unscathed” at 4.24 pm on 2 May 1945.

It appears that Hitler had planned the history of the Junkers JU52/3m with this escape in mind. ‘Iron Annies’ had drawn on the affection of almost everyone. They were not considered a threat and their ‘hotrod’ improvements were not noted. As such they became the best escape aircraft from Lake Havel on 2 May 1945.

Hitler’s destination to Barcelona was pre-empted 11 days earlier on 21 April 1945, the day after his birthday celebrations. In the process, many of his Berlin staff were killed and many of Hitler’s secrets died with them. This terminated links with his new destination and meant that Hitler arrived in Barcelona as a disempowered individual rather than a world dictator.

[13] Most JU52s were destroyed at war’s end, but a small number were still manufactured in Spain (170 by CASA in Getafe) and France (400) after 1945 and most of these were fitted with 3-blade propellers. Some JU52/3m g4e were used by the Swiss air force as transport until 1981.

> “The last flight made by a Fw 200 Condor (and also the last flight of any great distance by the pre-war Lufthansa) was on the evening of 21st April, 1945. The plane, hastily loaded with the luggage of the Berlin head office staff, was to fly the staff to Munich, and then on to Barcelona. The plane was to be flown by Flug-kapitan Kunstle. It is known that the plane duly took off for Munich, overloaded in the confident knowledge that no enemy plane would appear in such bad weather. The Condor was never seen again, although enquiries were made and continued for years, in Germany, Switzerland and Spain. But it was not until ten years after the war had ended that any explanation was forthcoming. Then traces of a four-engined aircraft were discovered near Munich, just outside a place called Müldorf. The plane had burnt out, but investigation showed that the surviving wreckage was of the last German Condor.”[14]

Pommie Spies: “The Fw 200 Condor was carrying the Führerbefehl [the Führer command], the colonels, majors, captains and leutnants – all of Hitler’s high staff that did not want to stay in the bunker with Hitler. Hitler treated this act as somewhat treasonous.

“The Fw 200 Condor had ‘D-ASHH’ over-painted on its side indicating that it was a C-3 Condor manufactured before 1939. Still fitted with its seats, it had been used for VIP transport throughout the war and was now being used to transport the Führerbefehl to Barcelona.

“It was important that this plane exploded. It had the escaping Führer command, all their documents, and contained evidence of many high-level meetings during the war, including those with British, American and Russian high command. This terminated any leaks they may have provided after the war and was a vital connecting piece that needed to be destroyed for official history to remain unchallenged.

“When the Fw 200 Condor D-ASHH landed in Munich for refuelling, a time bomb was put on the plane. It exploded in the air soon after, with its remains scattered over a Bavarian pine forest, just as planned.

“If the aircraft had crashed intact then it would have gouged a landing strip through the pine trees, the fuel would have incinerated everything on the plane and the forest would have caught fire. This would have been a crash without mystery.

“It was essential that the plane blew up in the air so that everything was scattered far and wide with no tell-tale gouge through the pine trees or the forest catching fire. It was essential to delay discovery until as much of the evidence as possible was destroyed and for the event to remain a mystery. This worked and the plane was not discovered for another nine years, in 1954.”

Esparo Sope - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

Spymaster: “If one walks in that Bavarian forest today, it is a place of deadly quiet. There are the odd bird sounds, but no major animal noises. The pieces of Condor are scattered widely. Most are small pieces from around the rear spar [aircraft part]. The rear spar was always a problem and those with extra fuel tanks for Atlantic flight had their spars extensively strengthened. This was one of the early Condors whose rear spar may not have been extensively strengthened.

“It would not have taken a huge charge to destroy the aircraft and would have been quite easily accomplished with a British barometric bomb, with an incendiary included for good measure. One of the pieces I picked up from the forest floor was fuselage, schwarze grün on one side [black green is a Luftwaffe camouflage colour] and charred on the other side. Charring is the sign that the fuel load had been ignited, probably in the air. Whoever said the British weren’t thorough?

“I could find no human remains, but I had no doubt they were there all around me. There would never be a memorial here for these people. In serving their Führer faithfully, they had come to know too much and paid the ultimate price.”

Another top secret KG200 transport was downed in March 1945. The B17 ‘Flying Fortress’ crashed shortly after takeoff from Echterdingen, near Stuggart. It was fully crewed with an American pilot (Oberseld Webel Knappenschneider) and carried ten members of the French ‘Vichy’ Government. All died except for the tail gunner.

When Luftwaffe HQ investigated the crash, one Luftwaffe officer quickly declared the cause as ‘sabotage and probably a British barometric bomb detonated prematurely’.

There was much speculation amongst Detachment Olga (the sub-Squadron of KG200) and the officer was asked for further comment. He declined on the basis that stopping to comment would probably guarantee his death and instead concentrated on perfecting his disappearance.

The lower ranks of the Luftwaffe had run out of rations and the Quartermaster used the luxuries that survived the fire as food to the end of the war. “It was just dumb luck that we never lost all that lovely grub.”[15]

Real Doppelgänger Deaths and Faked Real Deaths

Spymaster: “When Stalin expelled the ethnic Germans out of Russia, some were trained in the GRU Spy Factories in the Baltic Republics. One of these was then infused into the German Army as a driver. He initially drove for the Abwehr, but was eventually transferred into the SS and rose to the equivalent rank of sturmbannführer.

“On 22 April 1945, the first Soviet armies reached the outskirts of the still fiercely defended Berlin. Stalin had organised special teams in his WWII military counter-intelligence service, Smersh, to locate Hitler dead or alive. [See Smersh, Appendix 7]

“Late in the afternoon of 1 May, the Russian SS sturmbannführer walked through the smoke and ruins of Berlin towards the Russian lines where he began whistling a Russian folk song. This was whistled back to confirm their shared origins. The sturmbahnführer then told the Russian troops that Eva had acquired a new blue dress and Hitler had pinned his Gold Party badge on Frau Goebbels dress. He left as the Goebbels children’s deaths were being prepared and walked through the Russian lines with the troops in awe.”[16]

When the Russians invaded Hitler’s bunker they were tired, fearful and on edge, just as the Germans knew they would be. If Hitler was dead, his body must be somewhere. The first bodies they identified were of the Goebbels’ family. Magda Goebbels was wearing the Führer’s Gold Party badge just as the Russian SS spy had told them. The bodies of the Goebbels children were also there as was their father with his easily recognisable clubfoot.

vo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

A body was found with a small moustache and a bullet hole through the centre of his forehead. The corpse looked barely 40, whereas Hitler was 56 and looked 70. One of the men from headquarters of the first Byelorussio Army said, “No, this is not Hitler.”[17] The Soviets then called in some captured Nazis and they all said, “No, no, not Hitler”, but they still photographed the body with a correspondingly aged photo of Hitler placed on his chest. They just happened to have a 17-year-old photo of Hitler aged 39 (1928), which corresponded to the age of the dead doppelgänger and did not use a recent photo of Hitler (56) for identification. The Russians were exhausted, dead keen on capture and susceptible to fooling even themselves in order to please Stalin.

The Fritzes (Germans) were not being difficult as they easily could have been and they led the Soviets to a second proposed Hitler body buried on top of a shell hole near the entrance of the bunker. The crater was filled with loose earth, and when stood on, it sank.

A body of a man and a woman were dug up. Both were scorched beyond recognition but the remains of a blue dress was unearthed with them. The dress helped convince the Russians that the female body was Eva Braun and that the male body next to her must be Adolf Hitler. Being Russians they began celebrating as soon as the Commissar (Soviet Party official) had informed Stalin of the find. The autopsy would be performed the following day.

The next morning, in the cold light of day, things were not looking so good. Fifteen bodies were found in the Chancellery garden including Joseph and Magda Goebbels, their six children, Adolf and Eva Hitler’s doppelgängers and five other Hitler doppelgängers. The Goebbels family deaths on 1 May 1945 were designed to lend credibility to a scene of forensic fraud.

The Soviets placed the bodies in wooden crates and took them to Buch, an old lunatic asylum outside Berlin. The Freemasons love creating wordplay jokes in history and here “It’s madness by the book.”

Blood testing had indicated that neither ‘Hitler’ nor ‘Eva Braun’ had died from the poison inserted in their mouths after death. ‘Eva’ had died from shrapnel wounds and had dental cavities in her teeth. They realised that the cunning Fritzes had tricked them after all.

Spymaster: “They had a vote: ‘Ring Stalin and tell him the truth, or carry on lying.’ They voted unanimously to carry on lying.”

Hugh Thomas’s Doppelgänger (1995) showed that all stories contradicted each other in some way. With the bodies found outside the bunker, Eva Braun’s teeth did not match Eva Braun’s dental records; and the woman had died from shrapnel wounds, not cyanide as the SS had claimed.

With the supposed body of Hitler, all the teeth were loose as if they had been plucked from other bodies. The left leg had been burnt away, “as if to conceal some defect Hitler did not have, while the rest of the body was only lightly torched", but enough to remove all fingerprints. This concurs with the actions of Otto Günsche, Hitler's SS Adjutant, who soaked the fake Hitler and Eva Braun bodies with gasoline in the courtyard and threw an ignited rag on them at 4 pm on 30 April 1945.

The Soviets refused to tell the Americans or British what they were up to, let alone ask for help. The autopsy was not a perfect autopsy. It was crude and carried out under less than ideal conditions between 3–8 May 1945. The teeth were the only clue as to Hitler's identity so the Soviets scoured Berlin looking for Hitler's dentist.

Miraculously they found two people who said they were part of Hitler's dental team. They drew pictures from memory of what Hitler's teeth looked like, and according to the ever-so-keen Russians, the dentists' hand-drawn pictures matched the body on the slab. Hitler's last dental work was seven months earlier, in September 1944.[18]

The chances of Hitler's dental assistants being alive, available and remembering his dental records is absolutely astounding and all too convenient. It was part of a hoax to identify the fake unrecognisably burnt body as that of Hitler's. This worked for a while and fooled a few, but was completely dismissed with the work of Hugh Thomas in Doppelgängers (1995).

> "A medical report dated May 8, 1945, of an autopsy of a severely charred body came to the conclusion that this was 'presumably Hitler's corpse'. Other statements shortly afterwards cast doubt on this assertion. Then again Soviet sources maintained that Hitler had after all been identified on the basis of dental studies; but this statement, too, was questioned, and rumours arose that the British authorities were hiding Hitler in their zone of occupation."[19]

No X-rays were available at the time and Stalin held back the findings on the autopsy, turning Hitler's fake captured body into a State secret.

Hitler had now either shot himself, poisoned himself, been burnt beyond recognition, died at the head of his troops, or escaped. Stalin didn't believe it was Hitler's body and he placed a 7–15-year prison sentence on anyone who revealed the erroneous capture of Hitler.

---

[18] Dental assistant Kathy Frankerman was then immediately removed to a Soviet prison for the next 12 years.

Bormann Dies Again and Again

As for Bormann, there were two bodies found. The doppelgänger 'Günther' Bormann with plastic surgery was found on the night of 1 May 1945, then in 1965 a tip-off was received that Bormann's body could be found at the Ulap Fairground in Berlin, but no body was found at the time. It was not until 1972 that Bormann's real body was found there, 14 years older. That is, Martin Bormann had lived for another 14 years after 1 May 1945. The British knew this as they had arranged his escape, plastic surgery and supply of doppelgängers even after his death.

In the real Bormann (found dead in 1972) the teeth were close but had extra fillings indicating that he had lived beyond 1945 and had visited a dentist. Paraguay clay was also found in the cranium. The body had been brought back to Berlin after being buried in Paraguay for six years from 1959 to 1965.

Spymaster: "Apart from the Russians, the British also went to enormous trouble compromising the Germans. Many of the German nobles, who were related to their royal cousins in England, began to 'turn' during the war. They were convinced by an 'attached' British agent that they were serving a bohemian corporal and should become double agents. This resulted in the British running German officers in intelligence schemes. The proof of this is the number of German officers who were awarded British decorations and resettled in Commonwealth countries after the war. The Americans tended to award German military personnel who served them with a US decoration known as the 'Medal of Freedom', some of which were awarded posthumously."

The Germans issued a coloured book every month and the colour changed from month to month. In it were listed deserters and military personnel gone AWOL; German military personnel involved in the officers' revolt against Hitler (20 July 1944); and those who had been turned by the Allies and reinserted into the German military. The Americans called these people 'Joes' and most of them were recruited from POW cages.

One such death occurred while Hitler was visiting Kiev in Russia, just before the German offensive into Russia in 1943. The anti-Hitler group of Wehrmacht (army) officers that resisted Hitler were supposed to have smuggled a mercury bomb onto Hitler's plane, which would explode at a certain height.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Secret Service: "It was a Courvoisier brandy bottle with a mercury barometer bomb inside. This was wrapped around three brandy bottles and placed in the Focke-Wulf 200 in Kiev that the Hitler doppelgänger unit was flying in. It had a solid nose and no gun turrets. Leutnant von Schlabendorf delivered the bomb to von Treskow who didn't have the stomach to put it on board, so he asked an SS Officer to do it for him.

"The SS Officer was very touchy and refused to load it, but when von Schlabendorf threatened him personally, he relented.

"One theory says that it did explode and the real Hitler was killed. Martin Bormann then brought a doppelgänger in to double for Hitler and duplicated the bomb, returning it to Leutnant von Schlabendorf saying nothing. The new Hitler even changed his routine to make it convincing."

The Russian intelligence viewpoint at the time was that the real Hitler died at Kiev in 1943 and that a doppelgänger replaced him thereafter. This eventually became known as "the theory that was never enunciated".

'The theory that was never enunciated' was considered too hot, too secret, and too confusing for historians, who tend to write to the edges of a pre-defined cube, as opposed to juggling the cubes and letting them fall on the floor.

Spymaster: "The Russians have a completely different view of the history of WWII. They believe Hitler was killed in 1943 in Kiev, Russia, and that a doppelgänger took over Hitler's role and started rooting Eva Braun for real."

Hitler had complete doppelgänger units who were so convincing that their true status would only show up under extensive interrogation. (This is not unlike 'made-for-viewing' Saddam Hussein doppelgänger units.)

The German Intelligence understanding of the Russian belief that Hitler had died meant that the Germans were surprised at the intensity of the Russian defence at Kursk. The Germans had always hit the Russians where they least expected trouble, but the Russians were given ample time to prepare defences at Kursk.

Many of the weapons delivered to the German army arrived full of undisclosed faults and design errors. Self-propelled guns had problems with engines, Panther tanks suffered engine overheating and turret traverse problems. Tiger tanks also had problems with engines. This combination of events, coupled with a Soviet artillery strike on the German attack as they organised, was enough to bring eventual disaster to the whole German operation.

Such a combination had never occurred before on any front involving German arms. This smacks of war sabotage and intelligence sabotage on both sides in order for the bigger picture to remain confused. The Russians believe that it was the real Hitler who died in Kiev in 1943 and a doppelgänger Hitler took over. The Germans believe the Hitler death was a doppelgänger, but thought it convincing enough for the Russians to relax their defences. At Kursk the Germans were expecting a disorganised Russian army and the Russians were expecting a disorganised German army. The result was pandemonium.

Evidence of the death of 'the Hitler' was obscured in battles and war damage. When Hitler was later found to be alive again and again, it gave him immortal status. The same year Churchill used exactly the same tactic with Leslie Howard who, as Churchill's doppelgänger, was killed over the English Channel.

This in turn leads to the question of whether or not this was an elaborate hoax so that Hitler and Churchill could meet in Cyprus. Cyprus remained a backwater during the war, whereas Crete, only a few miles away, was a hotbed of conflict. All of these islands including Kos are in the eastern Aegean, near Turkey.

Secret Service: "Cyprus, under British administration since 1878, is a place where something should have happened, but it is a Freemason stronghold and many of those who arranged the war were on Cyprus at the time. Nothing happened here during WWII. Cyprus doesn't appear in any of the war histories. It falls into the zone of Italian occupation, which is suspicious as it's a place where something should have happened."

Greek Intelligence Officer: "After WWII, Greece was the last country fought over. Britain wanted it the right side of socialist and Stalin wanted it farther left. Since Churchill and Stalin had worked together for over four decades, a compromise was reached. In 1947, 25,000 children, all under 12, were taken to Russia and trained as communists, with the intention that they would be repatriated back into Greece as adults and drive Greece left of socialist.

"Most of the 25,000 stolen children were between 7 and 9 years. At this age, children are most easily reconstructed, or to the Western way of thinking, deconstructed – that is, their subconscious thought patterns were shifted to conform with the Russian State.

"The programme was delayed, and it was 2005 before the former Greek children applied for Greek citizenship. Greece refused. There is no way they wanted communists in their country. In 2005, those Greek children were 63–70 years old, with Russian and Greek wives, children and grandchildren. They weren't 25,000 Greek children any more. They were 80,000 Greek Russians."

After WWII, Cyprus went to arms and virtual civil war, first between the British and the communist-backed Cypriots, then between the Greeks and the Turks. This lasted until 1975. Georgeios 'Costas' Grivas (1898–1974) became head of the underground campaign (EOKA) against British rule in Cyprus (1955–59). In 1971 he secretly returned to Cyprus and directed the terrorist campaign against the Turks (EOKA-B) for the unification of Cyprus with Greece. He died just before victory in 1975 – just as planned.

Archbishop Makarios III, the primate of the Orthodox Church of Cyprus (Mikhail Khristodoulou Mouskos, 1913–99) took over the administration as president of Cyprus (1959–77), and after his death the archbisopric and head of state were separated. It was no longer possible to gift 25,000 Greek children to Russian paedophiles.

Spymaster: "When the Cyprus Civil War finished, the Illuminati (those who organise war for profit and social engineering) moved to Kos between 1976–78. Kos has been a British base for over two centuries with British memorials and graves going back two hundred years. During WWII, Kos was protected by guerrillas prepared to fight to the death for their cause – partisans and the British together. Today it is used for important Freemasonry and paedophile meetings.

"This area is renowned for its war preparations. In the caves about Croatia, Tito stored arsenals, casing gear and military machines capable of manufacturing Mauser 98s, which meant they didn't have to import their arsenal. Tito (Winston Churchill's cousin) built this military manufacturing plant into the hills, expecting the Russians to invade after WWII.

"Bob Hawke, former Prime Minister of Australia, lost his brother in tragic circumstances when Group Captain Hawke, while on leave from the RAF, was accidentally blown up by a bomb flying an unauthorised flight of British ammunition into Croatia for the last round of British-inspired hostilities in the Balkans. When his plane was shot down, the CIA operative, Australian Prime Minister Bob Hawke, kept very quiet about it."[20]

Similarly, one of Martin Bormann's doppelgängers was Stalin's fabled spy 'Der Specht' (The Woodpecker). He faithfully supplied Stalin with information direct from the top for years, to the extent that Stalin believed he was the real Bormann and Kiev flight bomb had killed the real Hitler.

Stalin was a British Agent and had been gifted Russia in order to destroy it and create war with Germany – essentially doing Britain's job for them. The job of the British-run German doppelgängers was to supply people like Stalin with enough correct information to keep them involved, confident and advancing. In this way, the doppelgänger Bormann did a brilliant job, everything the British and German double agents wanted.

This particular Bormann doppelgänger died in Moscow soon after Germany's collapse on 1 May 1945. After the war, virtually all of the doppelgängers were killed. They had become useless curios and enormous security risks capable of inciting the world's most disillusioned people into mass riot. Until now, history has supported their demise and kept quiet about their role.

Ironically, Britain preserved its last doppelgänger until 1987, when he too was murdered for saying wildly true things about WWII . . . "everything was arranged . . . everyone had doubles". When the British SAS death squad, uniformed as American servicemen, came to kill doppelgänger Hess, he was hardly surprised. He probably welcomed death after 46 years in custody under a false identity.

Operation WINNIE THE POOH
26 April–4 May 1945

With the use of doppelgängers, Hitler's entourage were specialists in deception, deceiving each other, themselves, the staff and any witnesses. Any witnesses they failed to control were either killed, ordered to suicide, suicided or swore the dreaded Holy oath of silence on penalty of death to themselves and their entire family. Such was the depth of their oath, secrecy and in-house revenge.

The Germans have Teutonic brains and always planned everything three years ahead and right down to the last detail. On 22 April 1945 Hitler announced to General Alfred Jodl (adviser on strategy and operations) and General Karl Koller (Chief of Luftwaffe Staff), among others, that he was intending to suicide.

Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel (chief of Armed Forces High Command), General Alfred Jodl (adviser on strategy and operations) and Albert Speer (Minister of Armaments) then left the Bunker, with some impetus, and spread the news to the wider world. Once the 'secret from no greater source' got out, everyone was expecting Hitler to suicide and it was a big relief when he evidently did.

Hitler and his entourage had been in the Bunker from 16 January 1945, and from 21 April 1945 there were many permanent escapes out of the Bunker. These occurred on 21, 22, 23, 29, 30 April and on 1 May 1945. The Allies knew about them and did little to stop them, except when there was agreement with the Germans to stop them.

> Operation WINNIE THE POOH deals with Adolf Hitler and Eva Braun's escape from the Bunker on 30 April 1945 and their flight out of Berlin between 4 and 5 pm on 2 May 1945.

On 30th April 1945, there were ample opportunities for Adolf and Eva Hitler to escape from the Bunker. As cover for this, no less than six Hitler doppelgängers were terminated around the Chancellery Bunker. These were later found by the Red Army's mopping-up squads.

As the Intelligence version of history is studied more and more, Hitler's death reveals itself as a 'canned meat' operation. Stalin would have recognised this immediately as he had enacted the same thing on 2 January 1911, some 44 years earlier, during his escape out of the Sidney Street siege.

Both ‘canned meat’ operations came with Churchill’s active complicity.

Many histories have exposed the burnt Hitler and Eva bodies as fake. Anomalies in the bodies prove this well enough. The dead Hitler had no gunshot wound to the skull, although it was first reported that he had shot himself through the mouth. Eva was supposed to have died from poisoning, although the autopsy showed the female body in the blue dress died of shrapnel wounds, was bleeding from the breasts and had abundant dental cavities. If this had been allowed to happen to the Führer’s mistress there would have been courts martial and trips to the wall for everyone involved.

According to the Spymaster: “The use of the blue dress was a case of ‘sheep dipping’. It was a key part of the cover story that Eva Braun was to be wearing a blue dress during the escape, just as the Soviet undercover told the Red Army . . . There were also two skulls of Hitler, one found in the crater/grave attached to the body and another presented prior to autopsy.”

If anything, this points to a higher level of cover-up and the possibility and probability of complicity from all sides.

No war is ever finished and each portion of unsolved war leads to the next war.

From the point of Hitler and Eva’s bodies being brought out of their rooms there was no positive identification. Hitler was identified from his trousers and boots and Eva from her blue dress. In preparation for the exhausted Russians this was a classic case of ‘Keep It Simple Stupid’ – in this case, the KISS of death.

Once Hitler and Eva Braun had faked their deaths in their quarters, Goebbels went in followed by Reich Youth leader Artur Axmann. Axmann had ascended to the heights of the Hitler Youth on the basis of the loss of an arm in combat at the exact time that the previous director’s wife Baldur von Schirach had embarrassed Hitler. The one armed Director of the Hitler Youth was hardly a man to be trusted and more a man to comply with any and every deception.

With Goebbels having himself killed 29 hours after Hitler, Axmann became the most unreliable witness testament could provide.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

The German name for Hitler’s escape plan was “Testament” named after Hitler’s will and those sections of the Bible the Nazis were enacting to make the Bible prophesies come true. For the British it was “Winnie the Pooh”. Neither carried the prefix ‘Operation’ and little of these combined operations ever appeared in writing. As such, both plans could be spoken about openly without raising suspicion.

Sometime after Hitler and Eva’s doppelgänger deaths, the three doors to the Bunker-Chancellery bulkhead passage were locked. (See page 311.) These bulkhead doors separated the Bunker and the bulkhead passage, the bulkhead passage and the Chancellery, and the bulkhead passage and the Foreign Office. This provided ample space for Adolf Hitler, Eva Hitler née Braun and their escorts, SS Chancellery commandant Wilhelm Mohnke and five Hitler doppelgängers to hide while the mourners attended their Viking funeral pyre. This was Plan A.

There was also a 10-minute window for the same group of eight to climb up the round concrete watchtower, out the 0.6 x 0.6 metre (2 foot x 2 foot) opening, onto the reinforcing bars 1.4 metre (4½ foot) below, dropping the same distance to the ground and then making their way east, while all the focus was on their funeral on the southwest side of the building. This was Plan B.

Thus two clear exits were provided after the faked Hitler and Eva suicides. To assist in this, the guards had been ordered out of the Bunker and out of the Chancellery. The telephone exchange workers and the secretaries (Gerda Christian, Gertrude Junge, Elizabeth Schroeder, Johanna Wolf and Else Krueger) were relieved of their duties and took fresh air whenever it was offered. The Goebbels’ were locked in their room, spending their time with their children and mourning their impending murder-suicides. The ordered exit of all the guards, police guards and mourners attending the funeral provided a clear exit through all the Bunker passages.

This was the basic scenario, now let’s look at it in detail.

On 26 April 1945 Hanna Reitsch and her partner Field Marshal Ritter von Greim flew into Berlin and landed at Gatow Airport in West Berlin amongst heavy Russian small arms fire. The Russians were deliberately taught to fire at anything that flew over that wasn’t theirs, as opposed to the Americans that fired at anything that flew. While landing in Berlin, von Greim’s ankle was injured quite seriously and he was unable to fly any great distance, but they managed to change to a small plane and flew into central Berlin landing on the main East-West Axis the same night.

At their meeting that night Hitler 'officially' repeated his suicide plans to them, but this was cover talk. To add weight to this, Goebbels strode about the bunker ranting, "We are teaching the world how men die for their honour" and Hitler talked incessantly about General Wenck freeing Berlin and saving him. This was a message through his radio teeth to the ever-listening British. Meanwhile Bormann documented Hitler's every word creating a false history of his impending doom.

Hitler then stripped Goering of his post and made Field Marshal Ritter von Greim 'General of the Luftwaffe' and Hanna Reitsch 'Commander-in-Chief of the German Air Force'. Hitler then spent much of the next three days consulting with them in infinite detail over his escape flight out of Berlin.

Later that night, 26/27 April 1945, the first heavy barrage of Russian artillery hit the Chancellery and the details for Hitler's flight plan out became more and more pressing. On the night of 29/30 April, less than 15 hours before Hitler's show suicide, Reitsch and Greim flew out of Berlin in the tiny two-seater plane they had hidden near the Brandenburg Gate. Hanna Reitsch was a daredevil pilot and one of the few woman to win the Iron Cross during WWII. Von Greim was injured and she did the flying.

WWII was coming to an end and thousands of Berliners were injured, exhausted, desperate and hungry. Along with their nursing staff they took shelter in their cellars, in tunnels and in the underground railway, which was clearly marked under the Red Cross as a hospital. When the Russians broke into the subway tunnels Hitler ordered (27 April) the locks of the River Spree to be opened (28 April) and the tunnels flooded. Thousands of wounded drowned along with their nursing staff and Russian soldiers.

This was not the first time the wounded had been deliberately killed in the name of the Führer. A military hospital full of wounded soldiers on the Eastern Front had been blown up earlier in 1945. As it was, the River Spree was ready to become a floating mortuary stained red with blood.

Around 6 pm on 29 April the locks to the Upper River Spree were closed and the waters were allowed to recede enough for kayak travel. At midnight on 29 April, Major Bernd Freytag von Loringhoven (aide to army chiefs) and his aide-de-camp Rittmeister Gerhard Boldt[1] (Boldt was also General Krebs' aide-de-camp) and Leutnant-Colonel Weiss left the bunker, got a number of kayaks out of storage, placed them in preparation for the escape teams, then paddled through the tunnels and dead bodies, killing any and all survivors. They then secured the exit and waited for the next escape team. Two groups of three bodies were then tied together and retained near the exit.

The Last Days of Hitler (repeated in Hitler, The Survival Myth) reports that Boldt's escape was down the East-West Axis towards the Kantstrasse under Russian fire and then to the Reich Sports Field where he met up with the adjutants Loringhoven and Weiss and continued south along Kaiserdamm (under more Russian fire), where at Pichelsdorf bridge they jumped in sailing boats (under heavy Russian fire) and sailed down Lake Havel (where the Russians would have seen their sails). But this was another lie for cover. It was a ruse and a nearly impossible ruse at that.

Leutnant-Colonel Nicolaus von Below (Hitler's Luftwaffe adjutant) and his batman Heinz Matthiesing (a resourceful barman) were the next to escape (just short of midnight 29 April). They each used a group of tied bodies as cover and floated down the River Spree using snorkels between the bodies to breathe. They made it to the west bank of Lake Havel by the morning of 30 April. Officially von Below was carrying Hitler's will and was supposed to deliver it to General Keitel, but he left before the official will was finished and only carried Hitler's 'cover will'.

They sent word back confirming their survival, equipment in place, and the best route to take. As such, von Below and Matthiesing were the scouts for Hitler's entourage the following night.

With confirmation of safe passage, at 2.30 am on 30 April Hitler said goodbye to about 20 people in the conference passage, but hardly moved. He mumbled to each individual and then said goodbye en masse, once again announcing that he was going to commit suicide. He mentioned this so many times to so many people that this has to be viewed with suspicion. When someone talks about suicide, they rarely do it, and it is usually a show suicide.

Between 2.30–3.15 am 30 April 1945, Hitler and Bormann conspired in Hitler's rooms. Bormann had already arranged his rescue via the British some four months earlier and Hitler had been a British agent since his training at Tavistock from February to November 1912, some 33 years earlier. They were discussing their codes to alert the British to assist their exit and who could be trusted to support their British rescuers in their escape. Goebbels did not know of this plan, so his telegrams were not in full code.

The pressure of three months in a bunker brings out a lot of cabin fever and cabin fever expresses all sorts of suspicions. Since Bormann had sold out to the British (1 January 1945) and since the Bunker had been occupied (16 January 1945), Bormann had been particularly unpopular. In three months he had made no friends and spent his time documenting Hitler's every word – creating a false history of Hitler's impending doom as final cover.

Bormann's official records of what Hitler said were largely a fabrication so people would believe Hitler was desperate, sick and suicidal and would die even if he had survived the Bunker.

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 Mar

As further cover for this, all the bunker staff were allowed to get regularly drunk. This stopped them noticing anything strange, like an escape plan that excluded them and Bormann's notes being a literary version of Dr Morell.

At 3.20 am 30 April 1945, Bormann sent a telegram to Admiral Doenitz at Ploen near Hamburg in North Germany, but sent it through the Gauleiter of Mecklenburg rather than through ordinary communications. This was picked up by the signals officers on both the German and British sides and alerted the British. The double send meant that the British were especially alerted.

> The telegram read:
> "Doenitz! – Our impression grows daily stronger that the divisions in the Berlin theatre have been standing idle for several days. All the reports we receive are controlled, suppressed, or distorted by Keitel. In general we can only communicate through Keitel. The Führer orders you to proceed at once, and mercilessly, against all traitors. – Bormann.
> PS. The Führer is alive, and is conducting the defence of Berlin."

This was in Open Code, Reverse Code and Aesopian language combined. Open Code meant that it could be understood by knowing the events that were to unravel and with a few key words, like "Testament" meaning Hitler's escape plan. The British version of "Testament" was "Winnie the Pooh", and "Rabbit" for Hitler and "Ms Rabbit" for Eva Hitler née Braun. (They had married at midnight on 29 April 1945.)

Reverse Code meant that one could say, "conducting the defence of Berlin" and it meant, "escaping to save one's arse". "Against all traitors" meant, "pro-war traitorous Allies would assist their escape" and "Lead the way" meant, "the leader was on his way, play your part."

Aesopian Code was a background and refers to family structure and common literary works like Winnie the Pooh, Peter Rabbit or Wagner's writings. "Our cousins are all too quick" would mean "the Russians are advancing on the Bunker. Advance on them and they will fire over the top."

So "Testament against all traitors defending Berlin" would mean "Hitler is escaping with the Swiss Bank accounts and the secrets the Nazis had gathered from 1933–45 with the assistance of Ian Fleming, Chris Creighton, Anthony Blunt, Hanna Reitsch and his primary concern is his own welfare. All positions covered and all equipment functioning. Hitler in position for evacuation."

It is interesting that the Soviets have never released this information before. Stalin, having been through British deconstruction, was the Soviet expert in unravelling Aesopian messages, but ensured the rest of this department was full of babushkas so only he got the message.

To the Gauleiter of Mecklenburg, Doenitz at Ploen and the British linked with Operation JAMES BOND, Bormann's 3.20 am telegram translated as:

> "The British are ready and waiting to complete the rescue and are set up in all their locations. German protection has been in place for several days with no shots fired. The escape route has been tested successfully and is secure. Anthony Blunt has the protection of Keitel and the Russians for Hitler's escape. Keitel is our man on the inside who will obfuscate till the end. Provide flak as cover and flares to light the way. Berlin has been sufficiently compromised for the escape. All doppelgängers and traitors are in place. [Anthony Blunt, Ian Fleming, Chris Creighton – Bormann's evacuation team and Hitler's evacuation team]. The Führer has announced his death and all suspicions have been covered. He is ready to escape into the open from midnight. The criminal Goebbels and his family will really die._
> PS. Despite reports of death, Hitler is alive and ready to kayak through the tunnels, which have been cleared of all survivors. Destination Fireworks Island [Pfaueninsel Island] and flight out."

On 30 April 1945, Hitler took lunch at 2.30 pm. Eva was not present. It is hard to get briefed for such a mission in the wee hours and take it on board for action. Eva was being briefed for her escape and waited for the arrival of her new signature blue dress. After lunch, around 3.10 pm, the secretaries were relieved of their duties.

"In the morning [of 30 April] the guards had been ordered [by an SS Escort officer] to collect all their rations for the day, since they would not be allowed to pass through the corridor of the Bunker again."[2] They were also given arms. This stopped the guards from checking anything going on in the Bunker or from using the Bunker-Chancellery passage. Their focus was to be on external protection and not on the internal workings of the Bunker.

Since their quarters, the "dog-bunker" or "guards' rest room", linked the conference passage with the stairs to the concrete watchtower (Plan B escape), it was essential that this passage be kept free of any witnesses. The watchtower had never been finished and the external protruding reinforcing bars allowed people to climb out of the tower window and onto the Chancellery garden, as was commonly done.

Hitler's personal SS adjutant Sturmbannführer Otto Günsche never let Hitler out of his sight. At 2.40 pm Otto Günsche telephoned Hitler's personal chauffeur Sturmbannführer Erich Kempka to send 200 litres of gasoline to the Chancellery garden. This gasoline had been carefully hoarded and guarded for months just for this purpose. Kempka went to the Chancellery and managed to locate 160–180 litres.[3]

On his return, he passed through the Chancellery-Bunker passage doors, which were still open at 3.38 pm. At Hitler's door he was greeted by Kempka who said “The Chief is dead” and then made a gun with his right fingers and pointed them into his mouth. It was 3.40 pm.

[3] This would require at least 8 jerricans, but the photos only show 6 jerricans, amounting to 130 litres. This would have significantly reduced the bodies combustion.

Kempka carried the jerricans to the emergency exit of the Bunker. All of the remaining guards in the Chancellery were then ordered to leave the Chancellery and stay away from the Bunker. This removed any witnesses capable of defending themselves and opened up the Bunker-Chancellery passage as an escape route (Plan A), as well as the escape route from the watchtower over the Chancellery garden and into the Chancellery (Plan B).

After lunch, Hitler went back to his room, spoke with the newly briefed Eva and emerged for another farewell ceremony (3.10 pm) to his inner circle Martin Bormann (Hitler’s secretary and head of the Nazi Party Chancellery), Joseph Goebbels (Propaganda Minister), Werner Naumann (Goebbels assistant and State Secretary in the Propaganda Ministry), General Hans Krebs (the last German Chief of Staff), Vice Admiral Erich Voss, General Wilhelm Burgdorf (Army adjutant) . . . and to Ambassador Walter Hewel (Foreign Office liaison officer and old-time Nazi), Brigadeführer Johann Rattenhuber (RSD head and chief bodyguard for Hitler’s private police SS guards), Chief Inspector Peter Hoegl, Sturmbannführer Otto Günsche (Hitler’s personal SS adjutant), Heinz Linge (Hitler’s SS Orderly and personal valet), Konstanze Manzialy (Hitler’s Austrian cook) and Hitler’s secretaries Gerda Christian, Gertrude ‘Traudl’ Junge, Elizabeth Schroeder, Johanna Wolf and Else Krueger (Bormann’s secretary). Magda Goebbels remained in her rooms with her children the whole day.

Everyone was then dismissed to their rooms with the doors closed as they mourned the imminent death of their leader. This provided ample opportunity for Hitler and Eva to simply walk through the bulkhead door into the Bunker-Chancellery passage with the door closed behind them, but they returned to their room at 3.20 pm.

At their door stood Bormann and Goebbels. Bormann was a British agent and Goebbels had agreed to kill his family, himself and his wife the following day. Goebbels was in an emotive state, something approaching complete denial and there was no way he was a threat as a witness. Nor was Goebbels in a state to tell the difference between a real Hitler and a doppelgänger Hitler with a bullet through the back of the skull.

Hitler is said to have shot himself through the mouth with a 7.65 mm Walther pistol and Eva is said to have taken poison. Neither were true. The red carpet in Hitler’s room hid the blood and the blood found was of a different type from Hitler and Eva’s. Of the two Hitler skulls found, one had no bullet wound and the other had a 10.5 mm hole signifying a SS-controlled state-sanctioned killing. Eva had apparently taken poison, but the autopsy showed that she had died of shrapnel wounds. The Eva corpse had been removed from the streets and bled from the breasts. This made it a ‘canned meat’ operation.

As if on cue, straight after the complicitly timed shooting, the one-armed Hitler Youth director Artur Axmann arrived at the Bunker and was admitted straight into Hitler’s rooms where Goebbels sat with the two bodies, no doubt torn over the apparent Hitler and Eva deaths, his own impending death and that of his family. It was the Goebbels family deaths that would make the whole scenario appear real. Without them, Hitler and Eva’s deaths would have been exposed as fake in the weeks that followed. This would have led to a results-oriented hunt for Hitler, rather than the wild-goose chase that followed.

The wild-goose hunt for Hitler was the beginning of the Cold War. It allowed all sorts of British and American spy agencies to set themselves up in whatever country they chose to suspect. These were countries where there had been Nazi influence and the locations Hitler had chosen as options to escape to. These included South America, Norway, Greenland, south-west Africa, New Zealand, Antarctica and Spain. Spain was where Hitler went to, so the search teams stayed well away from there and the press always treated Spain as a joke location and diverted attention elsewhere.

If you had a Nazi problem you automatically received the cure whether you wanted it or not. Many of the repatriated Nazi spies went to South America followed by G-Men and to New Zealand followed by MI-6 retirees who posed as Rolls-Royce salesmen and wore cashmere coats and bowler hats up and down Queen Street at to-the-minute lunch hours. We used to watch them as kids, kick their umbrellas and stand on their heels so their shoes came off. “Frightfully . . .”

Antarctica was the place where the most advanced Nazi experiments were held, including their medical experiments, a eugenics society (dead at 45), Foo-Fighters and the attempt to create a new master race

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

– more or less Homo sapien 1.52, that is, a race of technocrats – so Nazi and American military scientists went there . . . say it isn't so.[4]

The communist Russians planned to take over a third of the world and did the same thing with Eastern Europe, although with a different excuse. As communists, they fought fascists and became fascists.

Politics is like a big ship and big ships have big rudders. The ship's gearing is never strong enough to move the big rudder so they have a smaller rudder behind which moves in the opposite direction and this moves the big rudder, which moves the ship of nations. Politics is first guided under the direction of the small impetus and against the direction of the big impetus.

Germany, under fascist leadership, became a socialist country, as was planned. Russia, a totalitarian communist country, became a fascist country (that taught the world the value of freedom) and directed Russia to socialism for the masses and fascism for the oligarchy. This is now the model of America – a fascist oligarchy controlling socialist masses. This too was planned.

Goebbels left and Axmann remained alone with the bodies for a short while, giving the latest briefing to the still alive Hitler and Eva who were hiding in cupboards in the room. He told of von Below and Matthiesing's successful escape down the River Spree, the tunnels loaded with bodies for cover, the kayaks and submarine in position, and Boldt, Loringhoven and Weiss ready to assist the kayak journey to the submarine.

Hitler had been exchanging his life with his doppelgängers ever since the mid-1930s "Gau doppelgänger contest" and was used to hiding – Eva less so.

Hitler's SS Orderly Heinz Linge then entered the room and wrapped doppelgänger Hitler's body in a blanket, completely covering the head, but showing his familiar trousers, the same ones every doppelgänger wore. Two other SS officers then carried the body up the stairs. The exchange occurred at the intersection of the conference passage and the guards' rest room so that it could be seen by the guard in the concrete watchtower.

Bormann (Hitler's secretary) then entered the room and picked up the Eva doppelgänger body and carried it to the passage where he handed it to Kempka (Hitler's personal chauffeur) who took it to the foot of the stairs and handed it to Günsche (Hitler's personal SS adjutant who never let Hitler out of his sight) who then gave it to another SS officer who carried it up the stairs to the garden.

Hitler's orderly, personal chauffeur and personal adjutant were chosen because they were physically closest to Hitler and their ID testimonies were the most likely to be believed. This commotion was seen from the watchtower by police guard Erich Mansfeld who became very intrigued.

The only people to enter Hitler's room after the gunshot were Goebbels, Axmann, Linge and Bormann – none of whom could be trusted to reveal anything of Hitler's Operation TESTAMENT.

Goebbels was dead within 29 hours. Axmann gave the latest briefing to the very much alive Hitler and Eva. Hitler's SS Orderly Linge was familiar with the doppelgänger scenario and had long sworn the Holy oath to secrecy. Still, he was sorry to see one of them go. Bormann was a British agent who planned his escape parallel with that of Hitler and Eva and had been a British agent for the last four months. As such, the immediate witnesses to Hitler and Eva's deaths were all completely unreliable.

As the bodies were taken upstairs, Hitler and Eva had two escape options. Plan A was into the Bunker-Chancellery bulkhead passage to wait for clearance into the Chancellery. This had a four-hour window. Plan B was up the watchtower and down the outside assisted by the reinforcing bars midway, and then into the Chancellery. This had a 10-minute window.

For Bunker security, only the bulkhead door between the Bunker and the Chancellery passage needed to be locked, but the bulkhead door between the bulkhead passage and the Chancellery (southeast), and the bulkhead passage to the Foreign Office Garden (northwest) were also locked. This kept people out, but it also kept the people inside hidden as long as the air lasted. The bulkhead passage was easily capable of holding eight people for four hours, from 3.50 pm to 8 pm.

They made their way through the Bunker passages, through the bulkhead doors, into the bulkhead passage, locked themselves in and waited for the wake, which never came. It turned very quickly into a party. The bunker occupants smoked, drank and danced and the whole atmosphere was very happy.

Once security was lax and there was some promise of darkness Hitler's entourage made their move.

What joy Hitler could detect shamed him somewhat. It is always British practice to humble their agents on their war exit. It reduces the need to make phone calls and write letters to friends and relatives while under exiled house arrest.

In some ways Hitler's escape was reminiscent of the capture of Napoleon in 1815 and the escape of the Kaiser to Holland after WWI. These were also managed by the British, but the biggest British signature was the James Bond movies that were to come – always leaving with the girl, massive destruction behind them. That's Hitler and Eva and it kind of makes Hitler the original James Bond character. Hitler was the best double agent the British ever had.

Hitler's entourage of eight then left the Chancellery, escaped through vaults and tunnels, to the underground station at Wilhelmsplatz and walked along the underground tracks to the Friedrichstrasse and then into the semi-flooded tunnels.

Around 10.30 pm the tunnel's exit floodgates were opened. This let many of the bodies out into the River Spree and would provide advanced cover further down stream.

Hitler's entourage then met up with Boldt, Loringhoven and Weiss (11 pm) who assisted Adolf and Eva Hitler into tandem kayaks. As the tunnels continued to drain, they travelled swiftly with the current.

With the bodies surrounding the kayaks, providing cover and distraction, Boldt, Loringhoven and Weiss then assisted Adolf and Eva Hitler up the conning tower and into the half-sized submarine (11.30 pm), less than 0.5 metres of the which was above the waterline.

With four crew on board, as well as Adolf and Eva Hitler, Major Bernd Freytag von Loringhoven (aide to army chiefs), his aide-de-camp Rittmeister Gerhard Boldt and Leutnant-Colonel Weiss, the submarine submerged (11.40 pm), motored out into the current (11.55 pm) with minimal engine power and then cruised down the River Spree under cover of the recently drowned hospital bodies. Flares lit their pathway from just before midnight.

At the beginning of the kayak journey, SS Chancellery commandant Wilhelm Mohnke waited for the signal that the passage had been successful then marched the five doppelgänger Hitlers back to the Chancellery and executed them around the Chancellery using a variety of guns including the 10.5 mm SS state-sanctioned signature gun on a doppelgänger Hitler whose dental work best matched Hitler's.

SS Chancellery commandant Mohnke then returned to the Bunker at 1 pm to take word back to Hitler's secretary and former head of the Nazi Party Chancellery, Martin Bormann, that the Testament was in force – the fully laden submarine escape was under way.

With no lights and without using sonar, which at the time, went 'beep' rather loudly, they waited until the flares lit the way from 11.55 pm. At midnight, using the engines to start and then principally for direction, they coasted down the River Spree as quietly as possible, using their three-tone grey paintwork and the mass of floating hospital dead as cover. They coasted down to Lake Havel at the same speed as the bodies and directed themselves into the middle of the lake, using their engines when the lake was wide and slow-flowing to catch up to more bodies in front.

By 4.30 am they had positioned themselves off the Schwanenwerde Peninsula and stationed themselves in the shadow of the morning light. From here Boldt, Loringhoven and Weiss were offloaded under cover of darkness and no flares, to be used as the eyes and ears of the submerged submarine. They were also used as decoys and sitting ducks on the water.

By morning the submarine with Adolf and Eva Hitler and four crew lay between the east of Schwanewerde Peninsula and the east bank of Lake Havel. In the afternoon they followed the shadows and moved several hundred metres to the northwest of the peninsula towards the middle of Lake Havel.

Private German boat builders began constructing submarines in 1891 and Germany established a submarine service in 1906 with the U-1. In 1942, the English built the X-craft, a two man mini-sub, part of the X5-X10 series. Even the British WWII magician Jasper Maskelyne built a mini-sub which sunk a German cargo ship carrying heavy water to their A-bomb laboratories. The same year the Germans built a mini-sub called the WK202 and by 1944 they were using Hydrogen Peroxide as an additional fuel source, providing more oxygen for greater combustion (as in the U-791). At the time many people did not believe mini-subs existed, including much of the British Navy.

"During the advance through Southern Holland a German one-man submarine was found washed up on the beach at Walcheren [Westkapelle, after the RAF bombing had turned the dykes into a lagoon]. Ralph Izzard inspected it and then excitedly telephoned Admiral Bertram Ramsay, Naval Commander-in-Chief of the Allied Expeditionary Force. 'Nonsense,' said Ramsay, 'there is no such thing as a one-man submarine.'

"'Very well, sir,' said Izzard. 'I'll have it sent round to your headquarters immediately [early November 1944].' And he had the submarine loaded onto a tank transporter and shipped off like a tiny tin whale. It arrived as the Admiral was finishing breakfast. He was still unimpressed. 'The thing's a toy,' he said.

"'I suggest, sir,' said Izzard, 'that you have a look down the periscope.'

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

"The Admiral did so, and staring at him from the other end was the still open eye of the dead German submariner who had been killed when his vessel foundered."[5]

Germany's 1942 WK202 mini-sub was 36.5 metres long, 6 metres deep, 3.6 metres wide and painted various shades of grey, doing its best to look like a shadow. The conning tower added another 2.6 metres and the breather pipes another 2.3 metres, which could be made retractable. The main chamber was 24 metres long and 3.6 metres high with the cabin 10 metres long. The torpedoes were retained just in case they were required to terminate Operation JAMES BOND as they carried Martin Bormann further down the River Spree.

The WK202 looked like it was straight off the Beatles album and when the yellow, red and green flares and parachute flares exploded over the River Spree from 11.55 pm on 30 April 1945, the grey submarine shone yellow in the murky and bloody waters . . . but then the Beatles were a Tavistock-trained MI-6 cover band and the Intelligence community are not immune to making historical jokes, especially since their lives and work are sworn to secrecy. "Yellow submarine" was also a play on Hitler's submerged Testament scout, Colonel von Below.

Spymaster: "I was told the 'Beatles' name was acquired from MI-6 and the name came from the Pharaohs who considered beetles significant."

Oxford Reference English Dictionary: "Beetle – an insect of the order of Coleoptera [Cleopatra, the last Ptolemaic ruler]; a type of compact rounded Volkswagen [created under Hitler]; British useage, a dice game in which a beetle is drawn or assembled" . . . war has its jokes.

Spymaster: "MI-6 asked me if I was an accountant because they always need accountants.

"I said, 'No, but if I said yes, you'd kill me when you'd finished with me.'

"They said, 'That's true.'

"MI-6 need accountants for transferring all the money away from the successful bands. They make 'em – they break 'em."

Pfaueninsel Island was the perfect regrouping and evacuation point and many of the high-ranking Nazis headed there for RAPWI (Recovery of Allied Prisoners of War and Internees). It lay in Lake Havel and was surrounded by water wide enough to land a seaplane in any direction. It was also downstream from the Bunker. If the submarine had to go upstream against the current its turbulence and extra noise could have become a factor in detection and therefore survival. The submarine went in the opposite direction to Lake Müggelsee and the flares lit its way.

The last German Chief of Staff, General Hans Krebs, had presented a ceasefire plea to the Russians but it had been unsuccessful. ETA on Pfaueninsel Island was just prior to dawn on 1 May 1945 and the first RAPWI plane was expected that night (1 May 1945) but was to be delayed. The flying part of the escapes would now have to wait until the Russians had taken Berlin and were celebrating.

Hitler had ordered SS General Felix Steiner to launch an all-out counterattack in the southern suburbs of Berlin in which "important prisoners were being moved".[6] Adolf and Eva Hitler were those important prisoners and General Steiner's counterattack gave Hitler enough protection for his submarine not to be attacked, not to be detected, but to light its way down the winding River Spree. It was truly a Teutonic plan.

At 3.50 pm on 30 April 1945, Police Guard Erich Mansfeld was in the watchtower. Noticing the commotion and aware that no one was allowed in the dog-bunker (guards' rest room), he climbed out of the tower window (southeast), onto the external reinforcing bars of the unfinished structure and walked to the southwest side of the building to the Bunker emergency exit. The scurrying of men, the shutting of apartment doors and the shutting of the bulkhead doors had raised suspicion, just as it was supposed to do for Plan B to be a possibility.

At the Bunker emergency exit, Mansfeld met the SS officers carrying the bodies up the stairs and saw the unmistakable trousers of Hitler and the unmistakable blue dress of Eva Braun. Behind the SS officers were Bormann (Hitler's former secretary), Goebbels (the new head of the German government, also replacing Bormann as Reich Chancellor), General Burgdorf (Army adjutant), Günsche (Hitler's personal SS adjutant), Linge (Hitler's SS Orderly and personal valet) and Kempka (Hitler's personal chauffeur) but not the SS Chancellery Commandant Mohnke who was noticeable by his absence.

SS ex-adjutant Sturmbannführer Otto Günsche shouted at the Police Guard Erich Mansfeld to get out of the way. He stood back, waited till everyone passed, took in what was about to happen and went inside the Bunker, down the two storeys of stairs (7.3 metres/24 feet), into the conference passage, through the guards' rest room, then up three flights of stairs back to the watchtower (9 metres/30 feet). On the way up the stairs, through a loophole, he noticed black smoke rising from the burning bodies (4.02 pm). Mansfeld was out of the tower for at least 12 minutes.

This gave Hitler's entourage ample opportunity to escape into the bulkhead passage and seal it off (Plan A), or up the watchtower from where everyone had been excluded and down the reinforcing bars, then to the Chancellery from where everyone had been excluded (Plan B).

Russian shelling ensured that the bodies were placed close to the Bunker emergency exit and that the mourners took shelter in its exit. This stopped them from seeing any activity to the east and there was no one in the watchtower. Günsche lit a rag and threw it on the corpses (4 pm). The mourners gave the Hitler salute and then withdrew back into the Bunker as did the High Command who carried on with practical business as though they had just been to a service they knew was fake.

The Bunker-Chancellery bulkhead passage door was now locked and had been since 3.51 pm.

SS men were all reserve police by virtue of their SS rank, but not all police were SS. Historians sometimes refer to the Police Guard when they mean the SS. Such confusion was designed to thwart further investigation.

SS Hermann Karnau, a policeman from the Detective Guard, had been in the Chancellery canteen. Disobeying orders, he decided to go back to the Bunker. He tried to get through the bulkhead door into the Bunker-Chancellery passage, but it was locked. Against orders, he came past the watchtower, ducking the Russian shelling and walked around the corner (4 pm) just as SS adjutant Otto Günsche had thrown the flaming rag on the bodies which combusted right in front of his eyes. "Possibly someone threw a match from the doorway."

This reduces the timing available for Hitler and Eva's Plan B escape out of the watchtower from 3.50–3.58 pm. This was still plausible. Karnau didn't know at the time that Hitler was dead and if he had seen the entourage he could have been variously invited along for further protection, shot, or any scenario in between.

SS Detective Guard Hermann Karnau got to within a metre of the bodies and judged that the bodies were Hitler and Eva because he could recognise Hitler's moustache, trousers and Eva's blue dress. He also noted that Hitler's head was "smashed" and "repulsive in the extreme" which stopped closer investigation, as did the flames.

Karnau then went into the Bunker by the emergency exit and down one flight of stairs where he found Franz Schedle, the commanding officer of the SS Escort distracted with grief: "The Führer is dead. He is burning outside" – but who would believe the word of an SS Escort commanding officer. These were crocodile tears with another successful doppelgänger mission accomplished – three final ones – the death of one of the last doppelgängers; the first part of Adolf and Eva Hitler's escape; and the impending deaths of a further five doppelgängers, whom he had come to know quite well.

This was also the fulfilment of Schedle's mission and his own impending death. An injured foot prevented survivable escape and Schedle committed suicide in the Chancellery the following night (1 May 1945), along with many other officers.

Hermann Karnau then helped Schedle down the emergency stairs.

In the watchtower Police Guard Erich Mansfeld, looking west, watched the bodies burning and noted SS men pouring petrol on them from time to time. SS Detective Police Guard Hermann Karnau joined him, helped Police Guard Mansfeld climb out of the watchtower and then followed him down the tower to view the bodies at close range. By now the shin bones of the bodies were visible (5.30 pm). Mansfeld returned an hour later and was joined by another police guard, Hans Hofbeck, who came up the emergency stairs but quickly returned due to the stench (6.30 pm).

Later that night (30 April), Brigadeführer Rattenhuber, the head of the Police Guard, went to the now packed guards' rest room and requested the sergeant of the SS Escort to report to Schedle. When he returned, the SS Escort sergeant picked three men to bury the bodies who were sworn to Holy secret over the events of the day. Anyone talking about them would be shot.

The bodies were buried around 11 pm.

Brigadeführer Johann Rattenhuber (Chief of Hitler's private police SS Bodyguards) and Heinz Linge (Hitler's SS Orderly and personal valet) claim to have buried the remains with the help of several policemen.

Espayo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

When Police Guard Erich Mansfeld returned to the watchtower just before midnight (30 April), he saw the graves had been dug on top of a bomb crater, that Russian shells were falling and the sky was lit with flares. This would be dangerous for surface travel, but essential for nocturnal submarine travel down a winding river.

In The Last Days of Hitler, Trevor-Roper reports many options for the demise of Hitler including that the bones of Hitler and Eva were never found and were most likely mixed with the bodies of soldiers killed in the defence of the Chancellery, and reports that Günsche said the ashes were collected in a box and taken out through the Chancellery.

The latter was impossible and shows Günsche as a complicit liar because the bodies were never reduced to ashes. Tests show that even 180 litres of gasoline would only melt the fat and drain the bodies of moisture and would not turn them into ashes. None of these stories were true, but they are important to history as they represent an ever-present cover-up.

Trevor-Roper states that the Russians never searched the Bunker properly, pilfered it for souvenirs and then neglected it. He also reports that Hitler's engagement diary was left unobserved on his chair for five months. It is more likely, however, that a fake engagement diary was placed there to assist Trevor-Roper in a misdirected history.

Colonel W. F. Heimlich, an American military intelligence officer in their intelligence service enquiry admitted that it was unlikely Hitler had died in the bunker.

We should keep in mind that the combined British, German, American and Russian Intelligence forces were in on this scam and have supported it ever since.

Hugh Trevor-Roper was promoted and elevated to Baron Dacre of Glanton for writing The Last Days of Hitler. If he had got closer to the truth, his book would never have been published and he would have been shot for heresy. As it was, he survived, wrote eloquently and provided fantastic research material, some of which was a record of hoaxes. As such, he picked the nose, but couldn't pick the face. Trevor-Roper failed to identify the scenarios as he had no magic training, little intelligence experience and he still trusted people on their word.

> To write the grand war tale of our times, you have to trust the worst that training can bring out in people. WWII was an occult hit and one of its goals was to take the Western focus off Jesus and place it onto Hitler. It did that.

The secretary's office and telephone exchange was right next to the diesel generator. Diesel fumes dulled the senses of everyone in the Bunker, but especially the sense of difference. Whenever the telephone and secretarial staff got a chance to get some air, they took it – although with cigarettes.

The secretaries had been dismissed from service at their last meeting with Hitler (3.10 pm) just prior to his death and had surfaced to witness petrol being thrown on the bodies and set alight (4 pm). When they returned from the emergency exit, the atmosphere of the entire Bunker changed, like a magic theatre before and after a trick.

With the deconstructed Hitler now removed, the Bunker moved into party mode. Despite the constant diesel fumes, all and sundry lit up cigarettes, started drinking and began dancing. Banning cigarette smoke is something that deconstructed double agents do.

It was most important that the secretaries were relieved of their duties and absent from their offices as their door looked out onto the conference passage (escape Plan A), diagonally to Hitler and Eva's doorway and the guards' rest room (the entrance to the watchtower), escape Plan B.

If the secretaries were in their office, they would have seen the doppelgänger bodies of Hitler and Eva carried out and then the real Hitler and Eva scurrying out after them. Unlike the other doors, the secretarys' doors could not be closed as they were adjacent to the diesel generator and the fumes would quickly make them ill.

Bormann, Hitler's brown-noser for so long, now had no ministerial post, which removed some of the guilt from the British who rescued him. Around 8 pm on 30 April Bormann sent a final telegram to Doenitz:

> "Grand Admiral Doenitz, – In place of the former Reichmarshal Goering the Führer appoints you, Herr Grand Admiral, as his successor. Written authority is on its way. You will immediately take all such measures as the situation requires. – Bormann."

treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Bormann did not mention that Hitler was dead, because he knew he wasn't. He had colluded with Hitler over their escape earlier (2.30–3.15 am 30 April) and knew that Adolf and Eva Hitler were hiding in the room when he went in to view the bodies.

Bormann's telegram translates as:

> "The Führer's death has been faked. Hitler has left the Bunker and is currently en route with the Testament. Assist where possible. I'm leaving in 24 hours. – Bormann."

Officially Doenitz replied not knowing that Hitler was dead. In real terms, he knew that Hitler was en route and sent a reply to cover for this:

> "I shall do everything possible to relieve you in Berlin. If fate nevertheless compels me to rule the Reich as your appointed successor, I shall continue this war to an end worthy of the unique, heroic struggle of the German people. – Grand Admiral Doenitz."

This roughly translates as:

> "Everything possible is being done to ensure Hitler's safe passage. There is still some luck in it, but all countries are assisting. America is holding back. V-Mann Blunt has the Russians and a small German unit on his side. The Hitler escape takes priority before the Bormann escape and one may succeed the other at the last minute, but delivery of the Testament to the British is paramount. Hitler's rule is over, but British rule isn't. The excuses of this war will create the next British war so the British will assist.– Grand Admiral Doenitz."

Through Hitler's Tibetan occult practices and connections, he had utilised the Buddhist tradition and predicted the time and place of his reincarnation.[7] His last actions in Berlin were an indication of the time and place and this was something the British occultists were interested in for their next cycle of war. So were the Russians, and even the Americans were prepared to counteract it with scholarships. As such it became imperative that Hitler's escape out of Berlin remain secret.[8]

By virtue of Hitler's will and testament, Bormann and Goering were now members of the new government, although Bormann was considered to have no official posting. They could walk as a privileged envoy through the Russian lines and from there travel to the new German headquarters in Ploen, North Germany, but the war had challenged the Russians' manners. They were unpredictable and unlikely to bother with such niceties.

On the evening of 30 April 1945 the remaining Nazi command worked on a treaty with the Russians, but had nothing to bargain with. Bormann, Goebbels, Krebs, General Burgdorf and Axmann were present. Mohnke hadn't yet returned from Hitler's escape and the murder of the five Hitler doppelgängers.

They made radio contact with the Russian headquarters and sent a messenger to enquire whether Marshal Zhukov would receive a representative of the new German government. Krebs, the last chief of the German High Command, had been a military attaché in pre-war Moscow, spoke Russian, had once been publicly embraced by Stalin and was probably a graduate of the secret Reichswehr training camps.

[7] After WWI, 1000 Asian bodies were found buried under Berlin, all well-preserved (poisoned), wearing Nazi SS uniforms and green gloves. Presumably these were Tibetan Monks whose leader was known as 'The Man with the Green Glove'.

[8] These numbers, corresponding dates, place, person and name change of country can be made available – courtesy of a former esoteric Nazi officer, a Tibetan doctor and an intelligence head. "Look for the big and the small" . . . on . . . "the 14th Family Tree".

General Hans Krebs left with a letter from Bormann and Goebbels at midnight. In the letter Bormann mentioned Hitler's death, because he wanted to be sure the Russians would look for a dead Hitler. It also encouraged something of a ceasefire during Hitler's escape down the River Spree and was supposed to provide a long enough ceasefire for Hitler to escape by plane that evening (1 May), but this didn't eventuate and the flight out had to be delayed until Berlin was taken (2 May). This was the primary purpose of sending Krebs as a diplomatic envoy – to create a ceasefire for a few hours (the submarine journey) or permanently (the flight out).

> General Krebs reached Chuikov's headquarters around 4 am:
> "I am authorised to inform the Soviet Command, and through them, the Soviet Government that yesterday on 30th April, the German Führer, Adolf Hitler, voluntarily left this world. In his will the Führer appointed Grand Admiral Doenitz his successor, and Dr Goebbels is appointed head of the new German government. I have the honour to represent this new government, and am reporting to you with a personal message from Goebbels. The German government considers further resistance in Berlin useless and asks that the Soviet Union agree to a one-day ceasefire in order to prepare the conditions of our capitulation."[9]

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March

At the time, all but a few square miles of Berlin was in Russian hands. General Krebs had a second meeting with Chuikov around 6.30 am and asked that the Doenitz-Goebbels government be officially recognised. It was also important to the British that they were not assisting in the escape of the Führer, but the previous Führer and a dead one at that. Chuikov smelled a rat, rejected the ceasefire proposal, and resumed attacks on Berlin around 7.15 am.

Nevertheless, Krebs had achieved a partial success. The Russian ceasefire from 4 am–7.15 am on 1 May was perfect for Hitler's escape. His path had been lit by flares followed by a short ceasefire. This allowed Major von Loringhoven, his aide-de-camp Rittmeister Boldt and Leutnant-Colonel Weiss to scurry out of the submarine, across Schwanenwerde Peninsula and onto Pfaueninsel Island.

Hitler's escape from submarine into a plane was arranged for 1 May because this is the most significant day in the political, occult and social engineering calendar. But it had to be delayed from the 1st to the 2nd May and this really pissed off the occultists. It made them suspicious that this was not the perfect scam and Hitler was not their perfect agent, but merely the best they had developed so far.

By 11 am 1 May 1945 there was no reply back to the Bunker and Bormann agreed to telegram Doenitz that Doenitz was now running things. Once again, Bormann refused to mention Hitler's death. Another coded message, it read:

> "Grand Admiral Doenitz, – The Testament is in force. I will join you as soon as possible. Till then I recommend that publication be held up. – Bormann."
> Translated this reads:
> 'Everything according to plan. Hitler made it to the submarine and the skies were sufficiently lit up with German flares for him to make it to Schwanenwerde Peninsula. The eyes and ears have made it to Fireworks Island. I am leaving at 8.40 pm and surfacing at 9.30 pm. I have told the Russians Hitler is dead so they will be looking for a body. We have killed the doppelgängers around the Chancellery. Don't tell the Germans yet, I still need their firepower for cover as my journey doesn't have a submarine or the Russian protection that Hitler's does. I'll be paddling down the River Spree in open kayaks.'

An hour later, at noon, Krebs returned from Chuikov's headquarters with the Soviet message demanding unconditional surrender. Another meeting was held in the Bunker and they decided on a massive exodus with smaller escape parties when in the open and to relay a message to Zhukov that negotiations were over. This would bring unprecedented Russian firepower towards their Bunker and hopefully bypass Pfaueninsel Island and the British and American zones where they were all headed.

At 3.15 pm on 1 May 1945, Goebbels (with Bormann's coded assistance) sent the last telegram from the Bunker:

> "Grand Admiral Doenitz - Most secret - urgent - officer only. The Führer died yesterday at 15.30 hours. Testament of 29 April [the cover will] appoints you as Reich President, Reich Minister Dr Goebbels as Reich Chancellor . . . By order of the Führer, the Testament has been sent out of Berlin to you, to Field-Marshal Schoerner, and for preservation and > publication. Reichsleiter Bormann intends to go to you today and to inform you of the situation. Time and form of announcement to the Press and to the troops is left to you. Confirm receipt. – Goebbels."

Although Goebbels was not in on everything and was kept ignorant to maintain his status as 'sacrificial lamb', this roughly translates as:

> "Hitler's death was faked at 3.30 pm yesterday and we haven't heard a disbelieving word from anyone who slept on it [the alcohol and hangovers helped]. The illusion was convincing so you can announce Hitler's death as cover for our escape at the time arranged. Hitler is out of Berlin. Bormann has been officially downgraded to a non-existent position and I am now in charge of the money and the government, but will be dead in five hours, an hour before British contact with Bormann, thus ensuring that at the time of the transfer of the Nazi money to the British, there is no Reich Chancellor and no head of the new German government. I take Bormann's place in name only. Hitler is in position to be taken out of Berlin. Use the announcement of Hitler's death to distract, create relief, grief and celebration to provide cover for all survivors."

Goebbels had made no secret of his planned suicide since 4 March 1945 and had published this intention as an appendix to Hitler's 'cover will' and retired with his family to his apartment opposite the guards' rest room. Erich Kempka (Hitler's personal chauffeur) and the one-armed Artur Axmann (Hitler Youth leader) visited, more or less to ensure the Goebbels family were preparing for their murder-suicide. This was essential for Hitler's suicide to look authentic.

Frau Goebbels poisoned all six of her children then, at 8.30 pm 1 May, Frau and Herr Goebbels walked through the Bunker, up the emergency exit stairs and outside where they were immediately shot and burned without ceremony. The Russians found them charred and on the surface of the ground the next day, but still recognisable right down to Hitler's Gold Party badge still pinned to Frau Goebbels' dress – history's greatest sheep dipping.

Spymaster: "Sheep dipping is when you attach something to encourage the other side to positively identify a person, something akin to a bull's-eye drawn on the body. The Party badge on Frau Goebbels was history's ultimate sheep dipping exercise."

SS Chancellery commandant Wilhelm Mohnke, who had been in Hitler's escape party the night before, hastily ordered the conference passage set alight. Everyone then left the Bunker at 8.40 pm on 1 May and walked through the bulkhead door, through the bulkhead passage and into the Chancellery under the nominal command of Hitler's former secretary Martin Bormann, taking the same route as Hitler the night before.

General Hans Krebs (the last German Chief of Staff), General Wilhelm Burgdorf (Army adjutant) and Franz Schedle (Commanding SS Escort officer with injured foot) stayed behind at the Chancellery and shot themselves when the Russians made demands at the door. This also helped to limit suspicion and knowledge of Hitler and Bormann's post-war survival.

The rest made their way through vaults and tunnels, drained of the bulk of their water, to the underground station at Wilhelmsplatz. From here they walked along the tracks of the underground railway station to Friedrichstrasse Station and to the surface around 9.20 pm.

Doenitz drew his radio announcement out for maximum distraction, effect, and escape timing. At 9.30 pm, 1 May 1945, Hamburg radio said "a grave and important announcement would be made". At 10.20 pm Doenitz himself announced that Hitler was dead and that he was his successor. This brought 50 minutes of silence when people withdrew to listen to their radios, rather than fire bullets. They also listened afterwards for more news which was slow coming.

In Munich, Seymour Carmen got it right when he announced on radio: "There is some caution about accepting the German announcement as fact. It might be a trick. It might be a desperate effort by Hitler to disguise himself and escape."[10]

If Doenitz had announced that Hitler had committed suicide then every German soldier would have been relieved of their posts and the Russians would have advanced on the Bunker without resistance and all too quickly.

With Hitler announced dead at 10.20 pm on 1 May, there was still enough last-ditch German resistance to slow the Russians down and provide something of an escape corridor. Doenitz' radio announcement also indicated that Hitler was in place ready to be evacuated by plane at the predesignated location.

[10] Hitler of the Andes, 1 May 1945.

The first radio announcement came 50 minutes into the Bunker escape (9.30 pm) and the second 100 minutes into the escape (10.20 pm). The Bunker party surfaced around 9.25 pm.

SS Chancellery commandant Wilhelm Mohnke headed the first party with Günsche (Hitler's personal SS adjutant), Ambassador Hewel (Foreign Office liaison officer), Vice Admiral Voss and Guppenführer Hansl Baur (Hitler's pilot), three secretaries and Konstanze Manzialy (Hitler's Austrian cook). The entire German Wehrmacht was engaged in a mad scramble to the West to surrender to the Amis (Americans).

The flaming ruins of Berlin made surface travel a real danger for the lead group, so they went back underground and made their way through the recently drained tunnels that Mohnke was familiar with, to the River Spree, crossed it on a footbridge parallel to the Weidendammer bridge and reached Charité hospital. Mohnke, Günsche, Hewel, Voss and the seriously injured Baur (Hitler's pilot) were the only group to make it across the River Spree. They made their way to the Maikaefer Barracks and then underground. Vice Admiral Voss went missing but Brigadeführer Rattenhuber (head of Hitler's private police SS guards) was unexpectedly carried in wounded. The next day (2 May) the Russians demanded surrender of the bunker and the men offered suicide. The four women were set free and made their way to much preferable American surrender.

Former Reich Chancellor Bormann wanted as many people as possible around him to be picked off instead of him, the more the better. He was dead keen on living and was secure in the expectation of British assistance. The rest followed in groups of four or five, with Bormann placing himself in the middle. He carried the last copy of the much-valued Hitler Testament as protection, his part in the British RAPWI bargain. Bormann was an integral part of the Testament. He was its deliverance and back-up along with the Nazi Swiss Bank account numbers.

A second miscellaneous group containing Bormann (former Reich Chancellor), Axmann (Hitler Youth leader), Kempka (Hitler's personal chauffeur), Standartenführer Beetz (Hitler's second pilot), Günther Schwaegermann (Goebbels' adjutant) and SS Colonel Alfred Rach surfaced from the Friedrichstrasse station at 9.30 pm, just as the first "important announcement" was made. It was here that Chris Creighton and Bormann's doppelgänger 'Günther' joined them. Trevor-Roper refers to them as "and one other".

Martin Bormann said to Chris Creighton: "The Führer is dead." Chris Creighton was not convinced. His kayaks were parked very close to where the submarine had disembarked 21½ hours earlier. Suspicions were further aroused 20 minutes later when Ian Fleming took a look at Martin Bormann, put Chris Creighton in charge of Operation JAMES BOND, then left the team.

Chris Creighton, Martin Bormann, doppelgänger 'Günther' Bormann and the others made their way along the blazing Friedrichstrasse to the anti-tank barrier at the Weidendammer bridge where they took refuge from heavy Russian fire. Chief Inspector Peter Hoegl, in another group, was killed here.

When German tanks came to the rescue they ran behind them reaching the Ziegelstrasse about 300 metres ahead. The Last Days of Hitler: "A Panzerfaust then hit one of the tanks, which exploded." If this wasn't Russian ordnance misreported, then this was German war sabotage and may have been prearranged.

Kempka was temporarily blinded. The one-armed Axmann was wounded as was Hitler's pilot Beetz who was never seen again. (Standartenführer Beetz may have been extracted for work in Spain.) Ludwig Stumpfegger, the Chancellery doctor who had poisoned Blondi, was thrown to the ground but not injured. Doppelgänger 'Günther' Bormann was severely injured as he protected the real Bormann from the blast. The real Bormann thanked his body double and virtually kissed him as he transferred the phial of potassium cyanide from his mouth into Günther's. Dr Stumpfegger was similarly poisoned.

Axmann later found doppelgänger Bormann's body lying face up with no apparent injuries and Dr Stumpfegger's body close by. Russian fire prevented closer examination as to whether or not it was the real Bormann, but there were no obvious wounds. Both were cyanide assisted deaths.

Artur Axmann escaped to join the Hitler Youth in the Bavarian Alps for the next six months. Axmann's exit was protected because he had brought the final Testament escape plans to Hitler and Bormann immediately after the death of Hitler's doppelgänger.

Axmann (Hitler Youth), Naumannn (Goebbels' former assistant and Propaganda State Secretary), Schwaegermann (Goebbels' former adjutant) and SS Colonel Rach followed the railway tracks, or what was left of them, to the Lehrter station and went west towards Alt Moabit. Schwaegermann and Rach managed to avoid the Russians and made it into American captivity.

Kempka (Hitler's personal chauffeur) crossed the river by footbridge and hid under a railway arch for all of 2nd May while the Russians celebrated the capture of Berlin. He then swam by night straight into American captivity. This was pretty much the difference between a short prison sentence with food, followed by employment opportunities, versus a long prison sentence without food, followed by endless interrogations.

The James Bond rescue package split up from the rest of the group taking the real Bormann to the banks of the River Spree where they met the rest of Op JAMES BOND and scaled down ropes on the flood banks and jumped into kayaks. As soon as Ian Fleming sighted Bormann and recognised him as the original, he left for Lake Müggelsee and was briefed along the way. Martin Bormann also recognised Ian Fleming, knew something of Hitler's escape plan and their separation ensured no familiar chit-chat.

By the morning of 2 May 1945, Pfaueninsel Island was crowded with escaping Nazis, British rescue teams and no Russians. Leutnant-Colonel von Below and his batman Matthiesing had arrived first, early in the morning of 30 April 1945.

Corporal Hummerich, SS officer Standartenführer Wilhelm Zander (who had Hitler's cover will designed for capture), Heinz Lorenz (Hitler's Bunker news/inner circle) and Major Willi Johannmeier (who claimed to be their bodyguard) had arrived just before daybreak on the morning of 1 May 1945 on kayaks and by floating downstream under bodies. Boldt, Loringhoven and Weiss had stepped off the submarine at Schwanenwerde Peninsula and arrived around the same time. They met and briefed each other, but only claim to have been suspicious of each other's presence. By evening, Operation JAMES BOND were close by on the Wannsee. Martin Bormann would have been aware of the planned positioning of the other seven German players.

Adolf and Eva Hitler and four crew remained on board the WK202 submarine waiting for protection and RAPWI. Boldt, Loringhoven and Weiss were their eyes and ears on the surface as well as their cork duck decoys.

They waited all the next day for a plane. Russian artillery positions were the main factor, hence the Nazi challenge for them to advance on the Bunker as quickly as possible. On the night of 1 May the Russians bombarded the island so Corporal Hummerich, Lorenz and Zander hopped into some kayaks (specially left there for escape groups), paddled out into the lake and boarded a moored yacht where they hid.

The Junkers JU52/3m g14e rescue plane arrived a day late on 2 May. To break continuity, Boldt, Loringhoven and Weiss who had come off the submarine, remained on shore and Hummerich, Lorenz and Zander approached the rescue plane. Major Johannmeier remained on the moored yacht and acted as the signals officer for the plane to position itself over the submarine's conning tower.

Of Hitler's three pilots, Hanna Reitsch was the only one available. She was a test pilot and such a good one that she was the first person to fly a helicopter indoors. She made her famous name infamous by flying a Focke-Wulf Fw 61 helicopter inside the Deutschland Hall in Berlin in February 1938 with only three hours' training. It took another 50 years for this to even make it to the movies.

At 4.15 pm on 2 May a Junkers JU52/3m g14e landed on the water, just as requested from Doenitz. Zander motored out in a yacht and Lorenz and Hummerich went out in a slow-moving gaff-rigged yawl. Johannmeier remained on the moored yacht they had slept on and signalled the plane to position itself over the conning tower of the WK202 submarine – forward stop.

Zander, Lorenz and Hummerich drew their two boats up alongside the plane and attempted a last-minute bargain to take them also, or they might be dead in the water. Any vision of the three-tone grey submarine as it rose up (4.20 pm) was blocked by the Junkers' 12-metre-long floats 0.5 metres above the water, the Junkers 1 metre trapdoors, the eight struts each side and the two boats. To complete the distraction away from the rising 6-metre-long conning tower, Zander upset his boat and Lorenz and Hummerich jumped into the water and onto the motor yacht. Hitler and Eva stepped out of the submarine's conning tower at 4.21 pm and clambered up the clearance distance into the belly of the plane.

For a German soldier reporting this, it would be attributed to the methamphetamine that most soldiers took. For a Russian soldier, it would be attributed to his drunkenness as he celebrated the conquest of Berlin all day – the Russians had been stealing and hoarding alcohol on their way to Berlin.

Such ‘hilarity’ is an old escape trick of the British. It harks back to MI-6 agents like Bunny Aldon, most likely Jasper Maskelyne. Rather ironically, Jasper Maskelyne had designed and built a working submarine that had downed a cargo ship and could easily have been consulted to make this part of the plan work, not knowing that it was going to be used for Adolf Hitler, the British war machine’s most valuable agent. Through his illusions Jasper Maskelyne had been invaluable in winning the desert war for the British. He could make entire divisions disappear and painted materials look like a tank division.

Those Intelligence Officers who did see this realised it was above their station and the next part of their operation, so they were never going to say anything. It would have ended their careers with a bullet. Still it took Chris Creighton 51 years to publish his OPJB story, an essential lead to this.

What sun there was blurred the lines of definition for those on the west bank of Lake Havel. It was the last day of fighting, the war had exhausted everyone, and any soldiers who did see would rub their eyes in disbelief and then it would all be over. The witnesses did not believe what they had seen, let alone report it. No one did and no one survived who did. WWII was the most complete history of doppelgängers, double agents, cover-ups and ridiculous scenarios the world had ever seen.

Standartenführer Zander, Lorenz and Corporal Hummerich all ended up on the motor yacht. The Russians were too far away to see any of this and had their view from the west bank of Lake Havel obscured by the plane’s struts, two boats, the boating incident and whatever sun refracted any outlines. As if on Anthony Blunt’s cue the Russians began shelling around the plane but never hit the plane, submarine or motor yacht. The Junkers JU52/3m g14e flew off with Adolf and Eva Hitler on board and the submarine submerged and headed for the shadows. The vacated gaff-rigged yawl was blown to pieces giving the Russians, many of whom were drunk, a sense of win.

The RAPWI pilot was almost certainly Hanna Reitsch who had been Commander-in-Chief of the German Air Force for six days (26 April–7 May 1945). She then flew Hitler and Eva the 33 km to Lake Müggelsee and landed on the water near the southwest shore (4.36 pm).

Adolf and Eva Hitler then climbed down the aluminium ladder onto the waiting British-held motor launch (4.41 pm) where they were greeted by two Britishers dressed as Russian Army Lieutenant Majors – 2IC of British Naval Intelligence, Ian Fleming and Caroline Saunders, later the first female head of MI-6.

Ian Fleming was fluent in German and the natural choice to accompany Adolf and Eva Hitler to the British safe haven in British Intelligence-controlled Fascist Spain. After all Hitler, with the help of Mussolini and MI-6, had installed Franco as Spain’s leader.

With Caroline Saunders as witness and piloting the boat towards shore, Ian Fleming greeted and briefed their passengers in perfect German without ever acknowledging who they were.

> “Mr and Mrs Rabbit, congratulations on your marriage. I can confirm that Adolf Hitler’s successor, Joseph Goebbels killed himself yesterday and Admiral Doenitz is leading Germany into surrender.[11] Doenitz announced yesterday that the Führer was dead.
> [By the time the announcement was made at 10.20 pm Goebbels had been dead for 110 minutes and six doppelgänger Hitlers had been killed.]
> “The Reich Chancellor is also dead.
> [This meant Goebbels again and also referred to doppelgänger Bormann’s death.]
> “Germany has no Führer and no Reich Chancellor. In the last two days there have been two changes of command in Germany and there is now no trace back to the Führer of WWII. The airfare for the journey out of Berlin is the Testament of Adolf Hitler.”

Adolf Hitler, acknowledged only as Mr Rabbit, signalled to Hanna Reitsch who lowered the Testament down the undercarriage of the plane (4.45 pm). Ian Fleming and Caroline Saunders examined it noting some Swiss Bank accounts, some more with a few numbers missing and the promise of more to come. Like all wars it started and finished with a bank robbery.

[11] Just before the end of WWI, Karl Doenitz was captured by the British (4 October 1918) and placed in a mental hospital in Manchester where he was ‘turned’ into a British Agent, to be activated when required. Once his training was complete (9½ months) he was released (July 1919), seven months after WWI had ended.

After a few minutes (4.49 pm), Fleming confirmed that it would be good for two airfares out of German airspace to British Intelligence-controlled neutral territory and exiled permanent homestay until natural death. No status, nor acknowledgement of whether they were alive or dead, would ever be given to their two passengers. The two rabbits were never to have alive status as humans again. They were to live out their days in Intelligence-controlled purgatory.

Sure enough this did happen. After Adolf Hitler died in 1950 the West German Courts began meeting in 1952 after a request for Hitler's official death certificate was issued. In January 1954 West Berlin's Central Registrar Office reminded the world that:

Hitler was "not officially dead yet".

In 1955 this task was passed on to the Berchtesgaden court and the decision was finally made in 1956:

"Adolf Hitler was dead".

The whole process was drawn out long enough to lose all public interest, but it is interesting that the process started in 1952, two safe years after Hitler had died. Eva Hitler's death was never an issue and no tribunals were set for her.

Ian Fleming and Caroline Saunders had been waiting at Lake Müggelsee since 10 pm 1 May (the night before) and at 2 am on 2 May a British Westland Lysander IIIA had landed on a disused road near the southwest shore of Lake Müggelsee.

These both served to confirm Operations WINNIE THE POOH/ TESTAMENT and saved Hitler flying out of Germany on a German plane with German markings or continuing his journey down the River Spree in the WK202 half-sized submarine and risking the narrow gap between Pfaueninsel Island and the shores of Lake Havel so fiercely dominated by the Russians.

After the pick-up on Lake Havel they could have flown directly to Spain, but for surety, witness confusion and the need for British cover they flew for 15 minutes in the torpedo hold from Lake Havel (southwest of Berlin), to their second pick-up point at Lake Müggelsee (southeast of Berlin) where they were met by two British officers in Russian uniform.

Once they were safely loaded onto the motor launch, had been briefed as to the conditions of their journey and fulfilled their part of the British bargain (4.49 pm) they were driven to the shore and the motor launch was beached (4.52 pm). Ian Fleming then set explosive devices on the boat for 10 minutes and they scurried to the waiting Lysander which, to all intents and purposes was on a RAPWI (Recovery of Allied Prisoners of War). Their Allied prisoners were Rabbit and Ms Rabbit – Adolf and Eva Hitler – the former Führer of Germany (retired for 48 hours, six times dead and replaced twice) and his new wife of 41 hours (who had also died).

When the Special Secret Intelligence Service sent a plane on a top-secret mission they would wax over the plane's serial number and paint over it with another plane's number. When the mission was complete, they would heat up the wax and the paint would drip off revealing the original serial number. Confusion over the identification of a plane, the whereabouts of that plane, and a plane with different markings before and after a mission, were all part of the cover.

The single-engined, high-winged Lysanders were British Intelligence 'Moon Squadron' aircraft with excellent low-speed handling and capable of short-takeoff-and-landings (STOL). The MkI were built from 1936 and the MkIII built from July 1940. Their British markings gave them some protection from Russian and American fire. They had been used by the RAF's Special Duties squadrons delivering and collecting Allied agents in occupied territory, usually in the dead of night, during full moon periods, when the mist rising over the lakes and boggy ground gave cover. These landings were minimally guided by three battery-powered hand torches in a 140m L-shaped pattern.

"These Lysanders differed from the norm in several respects. Their undercarriage spats no longer carried winglets for light bombs, all the machine-guns had been removed, and a streamlined 700 ltr fuel tank was carried under the fuselage which gave the plane a range of 1,780 km; however, it took 40 km/hr off the speed [reducing it from 370 kmph/230 mph to 300 kmph/190 mph with the time to reach 5000 ft a little over 4 minutes. Post 1940 some were produced with rear cockpit winches].

"German military opposition to the flights was negligible. The Luftwaffe had other overwhelming priorities, and the location and interception of low-level flights by single, slow, highly manoeuvrable aeroplanes did not figure large in their thinking . . . By the end of the European war, Lysander special operations had made 323 sorties, 1,074 passengers successfully transported to France or England.

"The main problems were betrayal (10%), pilots killed (6), being shot down (4) and landing in bog (2). In the last year of the war, operations were widely mounted to Germany for RAPWI, the Recovery of Allied Prisoners of War and Internees."[12]

The RAF's Special Duties Lysander squadron was located about 100 km north of London at Tempsford in Bedfordshire (east of Milton Keynes) with a forward base for refuelling 130 km south, in Tangmere (15 km east of Portsmouth) on the south coast of Britain as it joins the English Channel. They were flown successively by No. 419 Flight, No. 1419 Flight, No. 138 Flight and No. 161 Squadrons in the UK, by No. 149 Squadron in North Africa and by No. 357 Squadron in the Far East. In September 1943, eight Westland Lysander MkIIIs went to Portugal.

The Special Secret Intelligence Service Operation, JAMES BOND, operated out of a large country house near Birdham Military Camp, 10 minutes' drive from Tangmere. The SOE (Special Operations Executive) agents were sent to Tangmere cottage for debriefing and SIS (Secret Intelligence Service) agents went 20 minutes northeast to Bignor Manor, the site of an old Roman villa, before being transferred 90 km to London for debriefing.

The pilot of the Lysander would have been an experienced pilot and one of the best. He would have spoken Spanish for landing in Spain, and probably French from previous multiple bail-outs in France. It was preferable that he did not speak German, to avoid any verbal contact with the German passengers during the last days of the war. He would have had a distinguished record and been above the rank of Squadron Leader and would have been retained in the RAF service after the war, most probably at a consultancy level.

Before the mission he would have been blackmailed, most likely for homosexual activities in a highly distinguished institution like Oxford University, as opposed to Cambridge University, which had already been compromised with the likes of Anthony Blunt and The Apostles. "At Cambridge it was estimated that a quarter of the students and a third of the staff were homosexual."[13]

Hugh Beresford Verity (b. 6 April 1921, Jamaica) was highly competent at mathematics and studied at Queen's College at Oxford University from September 1937 – "having read French and Spanish at Oxford, he had proven language skills".[14]

Two months before the Battle of Britain (August–October 1940) in June 1940, Hugh Verity underplayed what was to come. When Lord Trenchard (nicknamed Boom) approached him and asked whether he would like a plane with cannons or machine guns, he replied "both"; however, it was not a question normally asked of the RAF's version of a car washer.

Within four years, he was heavily decorated with the Distinguished Service Order (DSO) and the Distinguished Flying Cross (DFC) with Bar, meaning he was awarded the medal again for an additional mission. There were very few medals awarded at that time, except for the North Africa Star. The DSO was second only to the Victoria Cross (VC). His medals record acts of courage, service and gallantry that had placed him in a very elite club.

He rescued 97 people from France flying Lysanders by moonlight. When he was captured in early 1944, he was sent to the world's cushiest POW camp in the neutral territory of Eire, in Southern Ireland. This was made popular by the movie The Brylcream Boys. The POWs from both sides went to dances on Tuesdays and the horse races on Thursdays. Both sides were paid their military wages and were encouraged to bet on the race horses, buy drinks and lead a near-normal civilian life, dropping their hard-earned money in Ireland. (That'll be the Irish for yer.) The only rule was that they had to be civil to each other. Fighting at the races or anywhere in public meant a loss of civil liberties.

There had been British POWs in Eire for five years, but when Hugh Verity arrived in early 1944, Britain's Escape and Evasion Team (MI-9) mounted a rescue.

His medals and history show that the British took special care of him and even more care to downplay his role. He continued with the RAF until he was 47 (1968) when he retired with the rank of Wing-Commander, one rank above squadron leader. For his interview with Aeroplane magazine (2001) he wore a tie with parachutes revealing membership to the elite Special Forces Club which he frequently represented in retirement. He also kept in touch with former French Resistance members.

If an RAF pilot of lower rank than 'squadron leader' piloted for OP WINNIE THE POOH they would have been swished to the colonies after the war; however, Hugh Verity remained in Britain.

When the V9673 Lysander was modified in the 1990s, it was repainted in satin-black (formerly matt-black with charcoal cloud-patterns) and the serial number was changed from V9673 to V9367, while still claiming 161 Squadron allegiance. Serial numbers do not usually change from the time the aircraft is made to the time it is scrapped as the serial number is keyed to all the maintenance records. It is usually only the squadron markings on the side of the plane's fuselage that are changed.

All RAF aircraft have two letters and three digits. So this lysander was an anomally in 1945, just as it is today. The extra digit continues to mark this plane as "the one".

At 4.50 pm on 2 May 1945, the camouflage net on top of the waiting Westland Lysander IIIA was removed and the plane was readied for takeoff. Hugh Verity, who spoke no German, but very good French and Spanish, recognised Ian Fleming and Caroline Saunders from the Birdham Military base 10 minutes from Tangmere, but not the other two passengers, Adolf and Eva Hitler. Rather than a leader of fifty-six, Hitler looked like a harmless dependent old man of seventy. His appearance had degenerated from nine years of excessive drug use and not even his German public could recognise him.

Under cover of some really crap weather the four of them scurried towards the Lysander, engines running, and climbed up the white-painted rungs into the rear cockpit (4.56 pm).

The German Junkers JU52/3m g14e took off first in an effort to draw fire. Soon after the Lysander's wheels left the ground (5.00 pm) the motor launch exploded (5.02 pm) and all evidence was destroyed. All decoys were important decoys. At 190 mph direct flight took 8 hours plus lift-off and landing. ETA in Barcelona was 1.30–3.10 am 3 May 1945 depending on wind and flight corridors.

Hanna Reitsch, the Commander-in-Chief of the German Air Force, then flew the Junkers (with armourplated cockpit) below the Lysander in a predetermined pattern to alert all commands that this was a RAPWI not to be messed with. Neither planes were considered a threat. By 2nd May there was a ceasefire and all British planes were allowed to leave without being shot at. There was only sporadic street fighting, Berlin was taken and the Nazis were scarpering without weapons trying to find any capture other than Russian.

Hanna Reitsch then reported in code to her injured partner Field Marshal Ritter von Greim, General of the Luftwaffe – "Located warren but failed the rescue". Von Greim reported the same code to Doenitz via a third party. The message meant the successful extraction of the two primaries and completion of the German part of Operation WINNIE THE POOH/TESTAMENT.

The submarine that transported Adolf and Eva Hitler then followed Martin Bormann and Operation JAMES BOND down the River Spree waiting for instructions to terminate them using their two torpedoes. The order never came because Ian Fleming refused to acknowledge "Rabbit" as anyone with any status, not even human status and he refused to take orders from a rabbit. In doing so he saved the life of his friend Chris Creighton and the rest of the James Bond team, a scenario repeated throughout Ian Fleming's James Bond movies.

In OPJB Chris Creighton wrote that he sensed he was being followed down the River Spree from 2–10 May 1945.

After Adolf and Eva Hitler left, and knowing what Rittmeister Gerhard Boldt knew, he tried to commit suicide, but Major Loringhoven and Leutnant-Colonel Weiss forced him to vomit up his morphine. Boldt was the aide-de-camp to Loringhoven who was the adjutant to General Hans Krebs and Krebs had committed suicide the night before (1 May) just as he was programmed to do. Major Bernd Freytag von Loringhoven was the aide to army chiefs and he knew what was going on, so much so that he later became the German representative to NATO.

The group then moved westward dodging Russian patrols and were captured by Allies, non Russian allies though, and that was the minimum goal for all of them.

Major Johannmeier, Standartenführer Zander, Heinz Lorenz (Hitler's bunker news/inner circle) and Corporal Hummerich, now without Adolf and Eva Hitler, spent the next day on Pfaueninsel Island (3 May), then made their way to Potsdam, eventually found workers clothing, waited for the German surrender (7 May 1945) and for Churchill to declare the end of hostilities (8 May 1945) and then walked into the Western Allied area as foreign workers. Zander made it to Bavaria, told a few friends he was dead and began a new life as Wilhelm Paustin, having rather obviously buried Hitler's 'cover will'.

Leutnant-Colonel Nicolaus von Below (Hitler's Luftwaffe adjutant) and his batman barman Heinz Matthiesing had scouted the path for Johannmeier, Zander, Lorenz, Hummerich, Weiss, Loringhoven, Boldt, the former Führer Adolf Hitler and his new wife . . . and left the west bank of Lake Havel on the night of 1 May, sick of waiting and being bombed by the Russians. Below and Matthiesing travelled by night and hid in remote forests by day. Eventually they met up with Sergeant Major Pardau who had escaped the Russian capture on 2 May when Mohnke, Günsche, Hewel and Baur (Hitler's pilot) were captured. Foreign Office liaison officer Ambassador Hewel died there.

Leutnant-Colonel von Below made his way to Bonn University and studied law. Heinz Matthiesing returned to his hometown. Both were eventually captured by the British, von Below with Hitler's cover will.

Hitler's inner circle newsman, SS Orderly and personal valet Heinz Linge fared worse and was captured by the Russians. His potential information was the most dangerous of all the captives (except for Himmler who was killed by the British in captivity) but he was sworn to the Holy oath and only ever gave out the believable cover scenario.

When the Lysander landed in Spain (1.30–3.10 am 3 May 1945) they were greeted by Rámon Serrano Súñer, General Franco's former 2IC. The pilot responded in perfect Spanish. The Lysander was then taken into a hangar and the markings were heated up so that the wax paint melted off. The Lysander was now where it was supposed to be, in Spain. The Junkers did not stand out amongst the Condor Legion's Junkers and the Lysander did not stand out amongst the eight Westland Lysander MkIIIs in Portugal from September 1943.

Spain had declared itself a 'safe haven' for war criminals in April 1945. This was immediately covered up by the Allies' 'Operation Safe Haven' to recover gold and other assets stolen by the Nazis.

The operation to remove Hitler (OPWTP) was tacked onto the operation to remove Bormann (OPJB). If any M operatives knew about the planned removal of Hitler beforehand, they would never have accepted the mission.

Hitler carried with him all the Chancellery documents that Martin Bormann had. The James Bond mission was intended to fail as soon as Ian Fleming, Caroline Saunders and Adolf and Eva Hitler had reached Spain. The mission to pluck Adolf and Eva Hitler out of Berlin was tacked onto another mission so that no one could string it all together. Everyone in Operation JAMES BOND was supposed to die and all knowledge of the mission was supposed to die with them.

After Adolf and Eva Hitler were safely in Barcelona they had to cover all their tracks. The same day that Rabbit and Ms Rabbit escaped out of Berlin (5 pm, 2 May 1945), Admiral Doenitz, the new leader of Germany (1 May–7 May 1945) moved his head-quarters from Ploen to Flensburg (closer to the Danish border) and took Minister of Armaments Albert Speer with him. Himmler followed with his entourage of vanity.

> Hanna Reitsch (Commander-in-Chief of the German Air Force) flew Adolf and Eva Hitler into British Intelligence-controlled Fascist Spain, to General Franco's MI-6 handler, Rámon Serrano Súñer. As soon as she had secured Adolf and Eva's acceptance into British Intelligence safe haven, Hanna Reitsch left Spain late on 3 May 1945 and returned to Germany in the early hours of 4 May. (See Hitler's Host for Hitler's Ghost, Appendix 11)

Hanna Reitsch then met up with her injured partner, General of the Luftwaffe, Field Marshal Ritter von Greim and briefed him with Hitler's latest wishes, just in time for a meeting with Himmler at Schleswig-Holstein the same day (4 May 1945). The two dressed him down as though they were the voice of Hitler from beyond the grave.

Himmler, long compromised by the British, failed to receive his promotion, was rejected by the others and relieved of all duties and postings. He was on his way to give himself up at an American outpost when he was intercepted by the British on Churchill's orders and killed by 'Mr Thomas'.

It is commonly thought that Himmler bit on his cyanide capsule during a doctor's examination and committed suicide, but when he died his nose was broken and his cyanide capsule was still in tact. Churchill did not want Himmler interviewed by the Americans and refused to allow him to reveal what he knew at trial. This removed one of the most troublesome witnesses to Hitler's survival and Churchill's part in it.

After five days of independent negotiations with Hitler and Bormann regarding their new identities, plastic surgery, places of residence and where the loot was, Germany surrendered (7 May 1945). The same day Winston Churchill announced WWII would end at 0.01 am 8 May 1945, with the death of Hitler officially noted as 30 April 1945, and Martin Bormann's as 1 May 1945.

This was a signature MI-6 act – one of their greatest ever. They are constantly into double-dealings that appear on the surface, and at depth, to be treasonous.

MI-6's primary role is as an agent of war.

The same day (8 May 1945) Luftwaffe General Karl Koller visited General of the Luftwaffe Ritter von Greim and Commander-in-Chief of Luftwaffe Hanna Reitsch (both 26 April–7 May 1945) and they all said:

"No one would find Hitler's corpse."

They should know. They organised his flight out and covered all bases.

For all the month that Ritter von Greim was General of the Luftwaffe he was injured. He "committed suicide" on 24 May 1945 and his 'suicide' removed any chance of him being a witness.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 Ma

Hanna Reitsch was captured in the summer of 1945. The death of her partner was enough to keep her quiet and her true confessions were either never ascertained or never made public.

Hanna Reitsch returned to Spain to live after the war. In Spain there was another attempt on her life as her plane caught fire, but she was a survivor.

Fieseler Storch

Léon Degrelle also headed to Barcelona flying a Fieseler Storch, a German VTOL (short takeoff and landing). This was the same plane the Germans used to fly Benito Mussolini (1883–1945) out of Italian captivity at Grand Sasso in northern Italy in 1943, and the same type of short single-engine aircraft Rommel used to fly around the African desert. The Fieseler Storch was a well-trusted plane, enough for German High Command intelligence work.

In Spain, Léon Degrelle, a Jesuit from father to son, Belgian Fascist, former Chief of the Belgian SS and father of seven daughters, was known as Dr Sanchez. Here, he and Hanna Reitsch crashed in his Fieseler Storch on a beach in 1945 with Degrelle suffering disfiguring burns to his face and body. They were both supposed to die after the testament mission was successfully accomplished.[15]

Hanna Reitsch had many world gliding records including the longest distance (305 km, 1936) and another for being the first to glide over the Alps. In 1952 she attained third place in the world gliding championships in Spain. Hanna Reitsch eventually died from a massive heart attack at the age of 67 (29 March 1912–24 August 1979).

In the early 1990s, Léon Degrelle (15 June 1906–1 April 1994) was commissioned by the US to write a revisionist history of WWII. He completed this, including his plane crash in Spain with Hanna Reitsch which left his face and body badly burned and scarred. Days after the book came out, he was killed (87) in Malaga (Spain) and the book was withdrawn. (Sometimes MI-6 go around and buy them all).

> It was Ian Fleming, the future author of the James Bond series, and Caroline Saunders who flew out of Berlin with Adolf and Eva Hitler to their final destination in British Intelligence-controlled Spain.

M Section's 'shred, doctor and forge' unit went into overdrive expunging every trace of Operation JAMES BOND to remove Bormann, thus removing any trace of the parasite Operation WINNIE THE POOH to remove Hitler.

[15] 'Dr Sanchez' was Léon Degrelle. This was the testimony of the Spaniard Don Angel Alcazar de Velasco in 1962, formerly a German V-Mann (V.312), known by the German secret service as 'Guillermo'. In the found 'lost archives' of the Abwehr he was a press attaché to the Spanish Embassy in London in 1940 where he managed a dozen other Spaniards involved in espionage for the German secret service. Aftermath, pp. 332–333.

Ian Fleming then became an alcoholic. His financial state was so bad by 1952 his bank manager insisted he write books in order to recover his debts. His first book Casino Royale appeared in 1953 and was based on actual events – the money followed and was shared with all of his James Bond team.

In the British elections immediately after WWII, Churchill was ousted and replaced at the Potsdam Conference (17 July–2 August 1945) by Prime Minister Attlee (July 1945–51). In this way, Churchill didn't have to answer any of Stalin's questions about Hitler's whereabouts. At Potsdam the Soviets and the Allies quarrelled about everything. The only thing they agreed on was that:

Hitler should be left off the list of war criminals and not tried at Nuremberg or elsewhere.

A few weeks later General Eisenhower told Dutch radio that there was reason to believe Hitler had slipped away to freedom.

Russian and American officers who had been to the Chancellery Bunker agreed that Hitler had slipped out of the Bunker and that his body was not found. Berlin newsmen confidently announced that Hitler was still alive. In the United States, Gallup Poll I:527 showed that 70% of Americans believed Hitler was still alive.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2023

Stalin developed an obsessive suspicion that Hitler had escaped and was still alive. One Soviet report suggested that Bormann and Hitler left the bunker together, and this simple summation was reasonably close to the truth.

Hitler left the Bunker at 8 pm on 30 April 1945 and Martin Bormann left at 8.40 pm on 1 May 1945.

Stalin correctly implied that Hitler had backed General Franco's forces and accused Franco of harbouring the fugitive Hitler. Frustrated by increasing distrust and paranoia, Stalin had every contact with Hitler jailed. With them he jailed Russian, East German and Polish undercover personnel and plugged everybody for years about what they knew. The Russians did learn a lot but seemed to be baffled by an overabundance of bullshit which is the natural German reaction to major catastrophes.

In desperation Stalin ordered the infiltration of the Vatican, which produced even more bullshit. In 1953, not much closer to the truth, he had a stroke and died. "Now a new Hitler Youth Director, I mean Pope, presides over all."[16]

> Retired Intelligence Officer on guarantee of anonymity:
> "The difference between the CIA, the KGB and the Catholic Church is the KGB may shoot you, the CIA may shoot you full of drugs and the Catholic Church will guarantee to fuck you up the arse. This is why it has always been difficult to find couriers to the Catholic Church except for a certain breed of agent who doesn't mind. The Russians have always treated the Catholic Church as another spy agency, and an odious one at that."

MI-6 Officer: "Hitler's death was a shonky load of shit. Doppelgängers may have died in the bunker for Adolf and Eva, but the real Eva Braun and Adolf Hitler were swished out of Germany by the British to Spain in the same manner the British swished the Kaiser out of Germany in 1918.

"Hitler returned to Spain where the Germans had been practising for WWII from 1936 to 1939 and was referred to as 'the German Gardener' for his own protection.

"He lived out his days in the Montserrat Monastery just outside Barcelona and in the Citadel overlooking Barcelona. He worked [in the Parc de la Ciutadella opposite the Natural History Museum] as a gardener, dying in early 1950 of stomach cancer. He died from radiation plates fitted into his mattress [six weeks to die], a favourite British method of getting rid of 'sensitive alien allies from former warring countries'."

The Montserrat Monastery is incredibly isolated and currently requires a funicular (cabled railway) to get to it. But it is a very beautiful building in a stunning isolated location. When you get there you are completely dependent on the monks. Above the monastery are two outbuildings where Adolf and Eva Hitler spent their time when things got really hot. Montserrat was built in 1592 and rebuilt in 1858 after being destroyed. Now 10,000 people visit there every day.

Spymaster: "Hitler was definitely in Spain. Circa 1949/50, a group of IRA were in Spain (about 15 years before they were needed) being billeted just outside the Citadel in Barcelona. One IRA billet went for a walk in the Parc de la Ciutadella on New Year's Eve and met the 'German Gardener', Adolf Hitler, and spoke with him about his roses, in English.

"When Spanish Intelligence heard about this they went berserk. They interviewed the billet and said, 'How did you speak to the German Gardener? He doesn't speak English'

“The young IRA man replied, ‘We spoke about the roses and he spoke English.’ He was pistol-whipped for his troubles.

“The same IRA soldier didn’t surface again until 1987 when he was around 60 years old, appearing on TV walking beside Ypres Road, one of the long straight roads below the Poelcappelle (Poplar trees) in Belgium. The British were accusing him of being a Quartermaster General in the IRA (head of the army department in charge of stores). He replied: ‘I am only a poor parish priest going about my business.’ He was referred to as Father Ryan. A week later the British attempted to deport him to England, for trial, but failed, because he [too] could show that the British had removed Hitler to safety and Spain, and that the potential embarrassment of this was enormous, riotous and very unpatriotic for England.

“When I met Father Ryan, he showed me a vellum Vatican bull. It was written in English, French, German, Spanish, Italian and one other language I didn’t recognise. It read:

> ‘This Priest is on urgent mission work > and whomever impedes or obstructs him > will be instantly excommunicated from the Church.’”

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -

Such a statement is quite comparable to that of Pope Gregory XIII (1958–63), formerly Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli, who in 1962 issued a confidential document to all Bishops, stating that they should:

> “not move any claims of paedophilia to discussion” > on penalty of being excommunicated.

Spymaster: “Father Ryan also said he had high blood pressure and if you live long enough, you’ll come down with exactly what I’ve got.”

Sure enough, every capable Intelligence Officer I’ve spoken to has had high blood pressure. Not surprisingly, it lowered when they found someone who would record their stories and lowered again when they read this. Recording these stories takes a certain IQ – bright enough to understand and dumb enough to write it down.

Hitler started learning English when he trained in the British Psych-Ops Schools in Tavistock and Ireland, when he lived in Liverpool for six months, and during his frequent visits to London. Not speaking English was part of his cover as a British double agent and speaking English (and not German) while living in Spain was also part of his cover. It gave him the edge, and helped to make the Austrian, ‘a trusted German’.

That the young Irishman was close to the same age as Hitler was when he was in Liverpool and Ireland (23) raised enough affinity, rapport, and longing for family, for Hitler to break cover. From this point on, “the curio that Hitler had become was not worth the risk that he posed”, and a decision was made to terminate him (3 January 1950).

Radioactive plates were slipped into his mattress (5 January 1950), as per the British, and he died of stomach cancer some six weeks later (19 February 1950).

Due to Dr Morell’s toxic thrice-daily medication during the war, Hitler looked 80 rather than 60 years, 10 months and 19 days old. Adolf’s Will of 1938 was discovered three years later in 1953 and it left 60,000 marks to his half-brother Alois who was Hitler’s seconder. This disregarded the last will and testament Hitler and Bormann brought out of Berlin on 2 May 1945 which would have exposed operations JAMES BOND and WINNIE THE POOH as something akin to complicity to mass war crimes.

Alois Hitler was also Psych-Ops-trained and was encouraged to pick up the pieces immediately after Adolf’s actual death. He didn’t have a hope in hell. He had gambled in Monte Carlo and was bankrupted in 1914. He continued setting up businesses and gambling in Monte Carlo and changed his name from Alois Hitler to Alois Eberle and then to Alois Hiller. He took up politics and became leader of an extreme right wing nationalistic movement in the early 1950s. This also bombed.

By 1953 he was selling portraits of Hitler signed by Alois, as though they were signed by Adolf. The seconder agent had become a spoof. To finish it off, all these records have been confused and it is only input from ‘living libraries’ and ‘talking dictionaries’ that cut the wheat from the chaff.

Like Martin Bormann, there was another story floating around that Adolf Hitler had died in 1958. Folklore ideas with serious consequences are usually introduced under the guise of non-reality, usually through part-fantasy, part-reality films. Sometimes the entire film is a front for a single statement.

This was repeated in 2004 when Professor Trevor Broom (sweep it under the carpet) as Head of America’s Bureau of Paranormal Defence and Research makes this statement in the action/fantasy flick, Hellboy: “1958 – the occult wars finally come to an end with the death of Adolf Hitler.”

Agent John T. Myers: "1945 . . . you mean Hitler died in 1945."

Professor Trevor Broom: "Did he now? Oh, ah, Myers, this is Agent Clay. Take his lead. He'll make the introductions."[17]

There was another more alive action/fantasy story floating around that Adolf Hitler was running a menswear store in Levin, a small drive-through town an hour north of Wellington, New Zealand's capital. Through my research I met one of the two assassins who were assigned to kill this 'Hitler' in February 1964 (the same year Ian Fleming died). They were paid £1000 up front with another £2000 due on completion. One of the two assigned to kill this Hitler was good friends with the New Zealander Dan Davin, head of Britain's M at the time – the same organisation that had brought Martin Bormann and Hitler out of Germany 19 years earlier.

Dan Davin (1913–1990) came from humble beginnings. He grew up in the small town of Oamaru where his father was a fencer and scrub cutter. He played rugby and cricket for the South Island and became a Rhodes Scholar, which is a diplomatic spy network using sporting intelligentsia as founded at All Souls College, Oxford University, England. He wrote The Gorse Blooms Pale (1947) and For the Rest of our Lives (also 1947), a strange book about New Zealanders in Greece and the Desert of Cyrenaica and Libya during WWII. He was the inspiration for Graeme Greene's character 'Smiley', was an Oxford Don as a Classical Scholar, and held the Oxford Chair in Rare Classics, which meant he had no students. He became head of Britain's MI-5 – the British Intelligence Council (some say he became 'M' after Major Desmond Morton) – and he did all of this without the New Zealand Government ever acknowledging him.

Two charismatic ruffians, John and Tom were having an innocent drink in the Regent Hotel lobby on Manners St in Wellington, New Zealand early in February 1964 when a respectable Jewish man approached them and said:

> "I know you boys do bad things. I have found Hitler.
> He works in a menswear store in Levin.
> Heading north, it's the one on the left.
> I want you to kill him for me."

---

[17] Hellboy was a movie about a boy born out of the occult with a military arm (Columbia Pictures, 2004). In the occult Golden Dawn coven language, '8' means '∞'. This was as close to '0' as they were allowed to publicly state.

The Jews were quite obsessed about Hitler and John and Tom were prepared to take advantage of this.

This Jew was the largest furrier (fur coat dealer) in the country and a very successful businessman. John and Tom considered him successful enough to be someone who should not be deluded, but as things have turned out, there were more Slavs gassed in the ovens than Jews.

Double checking this story in April 2005, John said to me: "More of mine got killed" and finished off with a joke:

> "After all the kindness from the Germans paying for Israel, > the Huns got sick of it and sent the Jews a gas bill."

As soon as John and Tom got the £1000 down payment they jumped in a taxi and got as far away from the hotel as quickly as possible. They didn't want the "obsessed Jew" to change his mind. Tom then suggested they'd better check this guy out, so the two assigned assassins went to see the supposed Hitler.

> "He did indeed look like Hitler, right down to the height and the small moustache, but he was the wrong age . . . By then Hitler should have been 74, but this guy barely looked 60 . . . So we went back to our employer and told him we had done the job and collected the other £2000."

No Hitler and no Hitler lookalikes were killed, but it was a notable distraction that perpetrated the theory that Hitler was still alive, and it only cost £3000. The people chosen to do the job were white, believable and likeable charismatics. Their rumours would be believed, spread and misinterpreted throughout the pubs of New Zealand and abroad. The fee, the price of a house and section in those days, was never requested back. This was part of a deliberate and ongoing hoax. It was myth building.

The 'Tom' in this microcosm of history was Tom Stanford, also known as 'Tom Ward' and 'Big Tom'. He had been the cook and bodyguard for Noel Coward in England and through an actor friend of Noel's got work in the movies. He was 6'7" (2.1 m) and built well enough to be the loin-clad man who bashed the gong in the signature opening act for the J. Arthur Rank movies (later Pinewood Studios).[18]

[18] Other's who banged the gong were "Bombardier" Billy Wells, Ken Richmond, Carl Dane and Phil Nieman. Noel Coward had been the lover of King George VI's brother for 19 years.

In New Zealand Tom was a croupier for church and bingo halls ensuring that the promoter got their cut. When Tom Stanford died in the late 1960s he was cremated at Karori in Wellington. Four years later Jockey John went looking for him and found an undertaker who was a drinking buddy of Big Tom's. The undertaker had held on to Big Tom's ashes for a couple of years waiting for someone to claim them. When Jockey John arrived he pointed out where, two years earlier, he had "released Tom Stanford's ashes under these rose bushes here." Jockey John assures me it was quite a nice spot.

Rather ironically, three years before the Hitler contract, Hitler's assassin was cast in the leading role in the first James Bond movie Dr No (1962), but was replaced, due to a drinking problem, by the Scottish milkman and truck driver Sean Connery. He was, however, an advisor on the 1969 James Bond On Her Majesty's Secret Service where he gave George Lazenby acting lessons. (See James Bond – Sir Sean Connery, Appendix 10)

Conspiracy theories amass in cover-ups and there were plenty around Hitler's multiple deaths during his career, his many faceted escapes out of Germany and the many sightings of him after the war. At each level there is another theory and these are developed to occupy the minds of varying intellects and belief systems with varying amounts of research. To decipher these you have to understand that the groups behind Hitler were the most powerful and resourceful organisations in the world. For them, Hitler was an agent of war and as long as the focus was on him, it was not on them.

> Operations JAMES BOND and WINNIE THE POOH were designed so that nobody would believe they ever existed and nobody could prove them. They left no evidence other than a Junkers JU52/3m g14e that witnesses described as a Junkers/Junkers 52, a camouflaged submarine too small to be a submarine, a bombed-out motorboat and a Lysander with dummy wax-painted serial numbers proved to be elsewhere. This was enough to discredit any witnesses. The mission was designed so that nobody would believe it and nobody could prove it, making Ian Fleming the star attraction to the end of the century.

It was essential for the British to suppress details and confuse the outcome of WWII for as long as possible. If those who fought, and those who lost parents and children during the war, discovered that Britain had taken many of the leading Nazis out of Berlin and given them safe haven in Britain, Spain, South America and New Zealand, then patriotic people would have rioted.

> The British went to enormous trouble removing Martin Bormann and Adolf and Eva Hitler out of Germany, creating doubles for all of them in life and death, as well as doubles for their transport planes.

"It was rumoured that Hitler had perished, but nobody really believed this."[19] Hitler survived for another five years and Martin Bormann for another 14 years with doppelgängers operating for both.

> Operations JAMES BOND was a success and a secret for the next half-century. Operations WINNIE THE POOH and TESTAMENT were a secret for the next 60 years.

There are jokes in Intelligence work and one of them is the number on the dates on which pertinent events occur. When the West bombed Tavistock Square as an add on to the London Tube bombing, under the guise of being oil-rich Syrians, they did so on 07.07.2005 – 007.007^7.

The joke here is that the original James Bond characters pulled Adolf Hitler out of Berlin at 5 pm, 2 May 1945 or 1700 hrs on 02.05.1945, with the numbers being $007^{\infty}.007^{\infty}$ or $(007^{\infty})^2$ – the 'squared' being another allusion to Freemasonry.

Ian Fleming left a lot of leads, just as in-house sabotage does today.

> The old boys who laugh at history – the old Freemasons with nothing to make them radical and enough protection to make them feel like life's a day's fishing amongst friends – they laugh and say the Spanish government were still making remarks about Hitler in 1965:
> "Our soil is tilled by the smartest people of Europe" and
> "Our soil is tilled by the finest minds of Europe".

From this they believe Hitler died in 1965 or 1975. That may be so for one of his doppelgängers, but there was cover upon cover and the real boy died on 19 February 1950.

Lost Leaders

If you want to study history, you need to follow the murders.
The history of war – for instance – is the study of mass murder.
It is mass murder that makes history and culture that makes home.

War is the destruction of cultures and homes.
The primary target for the destruction of the home is the man with integrity.

We call this man husband and hero.
Traditionally he takes care of the animals and protects the region.
Without him culture is as malleable as clay.

It shouldn't be so surprising that Hitler was a British agent. Not only was he completely supported by Churchill and Stalin (they sabotaged attempts to kill him), but the same pattern is repeated over and over again in war today.

Two of the groups that tried to kill Hitler were the Black Orchestra (Schwarze Kapelle – German intelligence) and the Red Orchestra (Rote Kapelle – communist intelligence). Both, the Black and the Red Orchestra were prepared to risk their lives to kill Hitler. As such, both groups should have had the support of Churchill and Stalin. Instead both groups were sabotaged by Churchill and Stalin.

The Black Orchestra constituted the only anti-Nazi resistance movement in Germany and had the best access to Hitler as they worked within Hitler's ranks. They were in constant contact with Churchill, but Churchill refused to return their calls.

Churchill, on the other hand, took the less effective Red Orchestra more seriously and assisted them occasionally. The Red Orchestra were communist intelligence who wanted to kill Hitler on behalf of Stalin, but would always be less effective than the Black Orchestra.

As part of the Russo-German Non-Aggression Pact (23 August 1939), Hitler asked Stalin to surrender the Red Orchestra. These were all highly trained and motivated German, French, Belgian and Dutch spies. In a fit of ambivalence Stalin ordered the Red Orchestra to Moscow by rail to receive medals. When they passed through Germany the Gestapo sealed off an entire train station and had them all shot. So perished the best Intelligence service the Russians ever had in the West.

In this way, Churchill and Stalin had Hitler's most motivated and resourceful enemies killed with little reference in the history books. Churchill and Stalin were conspiring together in support of Hitler. Whatever Hitler wanted, Hitler got. All three were working together for the continuation of war with Churchill pulling the strings.

"By their [Churchill and Stalin's] actions towards the anti-Hitler conspiracy they sealed the fate of Europe and the world in a pact of blood on D-Day."[1] Now Churchill's war could continue in earnest.

There were a few hard-core spies who weren't on the train, were sick or chasing poontang (sex) so a few survived, but very few. Leopold Trepper, one of the brightest, said, "Who ever heard of spies getting medals?" and never showed up.

Hitler also had enemies within Germany, many within his own ranks. "Hitler entered the war with grave misgivings of the German High Command."[2] The Black Orchestra were similarly done away with.

In 1942 a second Black Orchestra resistance (the defacto Schwarze Kapelle) was founded within the German Army and by June 1944 Colonel Claus Count Schenk von Stauffenberg had appointed himself its head. This was well known to the British. On 20 June 1944 Count von Stauffenberg was appointed as chief of staff to General Friedrich Fromm, commander of the army reserve, the home army. This gave him admission to military conferences with Hitler in his headquarters.

On his first day Count von Stauffenberg openly told his boss General Fromm that he was planning a coup d'état. General Fromm listened silently and then asked Stauffenberg to assume his duties. On 6 July 1944 Count von Stauffenberg, carrying explosives, attended a military conference with Hitler at the Berghof. Stauffenberg did not activate the timer on the explosive because he also wanted to kill Goering and Himmler simultaneously. The same thing happened on 11 and 15 July 1944.

MI-6 supplied the bomb and detonator. Both were faulty.

Rommel, who was to support Count von Stauffenberg after a successful coup, was then severely wounded, as if on British cue. By mid-1944, British fighter bombers had the Cab rank system which was capable of targeting any German vehicle. They had also sent in ground troops to assassinate Rommel. The Führer's headquarters were then transferred from his residence in the Berghof in Obersalzberg in Berchtesgaden in the Bavarian Alps to Rastenburg in north Germany.

Rastenburg, known as the Wolf's Lair, is just south of the Russian border. It is near Gierloz, 8 km east of Ketrzyn, 100 km (64 miles) southeast of Konigsberg and near Karlsof with its seven bridges. In the old language it is East Prussia. It lies on the flat sandy plain of the Guber and had 2.5 km of bunkers with walls six metres thick. It was built by the dreaded Todt Organisation (notorious for their ill-treatment of prisoners) and served as Hitler's headquarters from September 1941 to September 1944. Hitler spent most of his days here except for short trips to Berlin and Berchtesgaden in Bavaria.

The Wolf's Lair had been built on cheap swampland surrounded by deciduous forest and marshy pools which were perfect breeding grounds for fungi, mosquitos, worm eggs and dysentery. As a result, the bunkers were damp and cold as were all the Nazis' underwear and uniforms. In combination with Dr Morell's toxic treatment, Hitler suffered from diarrhoea, stomach cramps, nausea, aching limbs, shivers and fever.

The British knew this. Koch had overseen the building of the Wolf's Lair and had told British agent Winterbotham. It would have been easy enough to bomb the various German headquarters during the war, but this would have ended the war. The Berghof was the only German headquarters to be bombed, but this only happened at the end of the war and only after it had been emptied. It was more or less a symbolic gesture.

As everyone was sitting in their cars ready to leave the Berghof, Hitler returned for one last look, and commented to a bystander that he would probably never return. His apparent psychic ability was a reflection of his Intelligence reports, much of which came via British sources and via his teeth.

Von Stauffenberg then received an appointment to see Hitler on 20 July 1944 at Rastenburg, with the compromised British agent Goering attending. The British were quite happy killing Goering towards the end of the war. He was outliving his usefulness and his death would secure their shared secret – Carinhall was financed and bugged by the British.

At the last minute the conference was shifted to the barracks, with its thin timber-panelled walls. Stauffenberg was interrupted in another building while setting the timer on the bomb with pliers. As if with complete complicity, he then managed to place the bomb under the heavy map table in Hitler's meeting room. This was reported to Hitler minutes later. Under threat of assassination Hitler used one of his ever-ready doppelgängers to represent him.

The bomb was powerful enough to blow much of the wall and ceiling panels off and seriously injure or kill ten of the 25 people, but it was not as powerful as it should or could have been. As soon he recovered from the shock, General Wilhelm Keitel ran towards the doppelgänger Hitler saying "Where is the Führer?" He then immediately helped the severely injured doppelgänger Hitler out of the room.

Doppelgänger Hitler's reported medical condition afterwards is the least one could expect in that situation. It was reported that he had splinters in his legs, slight bleeding to his right elbow, trival bruises on the back of his left hand, both of his eardrums had been ruptured, and he had head traumas for weeks afterwards.

With the use of doppelgängers, all the expected signs of damage seemed to disappear. "After the bomb blast his left leg stopped trembling and even his hand tremor almost completely vanished. To outward appearances, the bomb left Hitler unscathed."[3]

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March

Soon after, the real Hitler entered the room with singed hair and a blackened face. He carried tattered trousers and a jacket with a square of cloth removed from it. It is difficult to rip a jacket in any pattern that is not a square, whereas an explosion does not rip a square hole, but leaves the jacket, like the trousers, in tatters.

> Hitler's experience of the explosion became a collusion.
> "Like everyone else in the room Hitler had experienced the explosion as an 'infernally bright darting flame' and a deafening crash. When he got up out of the burning, smoking debris with blackened face and the back of his head singed, [General Wilhelm] Keitel came running towards him, shouting, 'Where is the Führer?' and helped him [doppelgänger Hitler] get out of the room."[4]

---

[3] The Secret Diaries of Hitler's Doctor, p. 60. Historian Hugh Trevor-Roper goes as far as to say that Hitler wasn't even hurt in the 20 July explosion.

Hitler was leaning over the desk at the time of the explosion and his legs would have been broken and smashed with splinters of wood. He would have been knocked unconscious from the table rising to hit his upper body and head. Hitler was very close to the bomb and two people around him were killed, yet he was not counted amongst the seriously injured. His injuries "seemed to miraculously disappear within hours".

Six people were seriously injured and four died including stenographer Heinrich Berger who sometimes acted as Hitler's doppelgänger. General Heusinger who stood next to Hitler was seriously injured. Colonel Brandt, General Korten and General Schundt were all very close to Hitler and all very dead after the explosion.

In all, 226 Germans were involved in the plot to kill Hitler, so many in fact that Hitler was forced to continue working with the people who had planned to kill him.

Dr Erwin Geising treated Hitler's 'bomb plot' doppelgängers for head trauma for weeks after. "But he had suffered considerable damage"[5] and was killed by Dr Morell who treated him with his fake [toxic] 'penicillin powder'. Typically Morell used a sulphonamide of which U_1 iron was the most toxic and would have caused a violent allergic skin reaction with extreme anger as a side effect. Both of these were reason enough to die.

Once the real Hitler entered the room (after blackening his face, singing his hair and carrying the torn clothes of his doppelgänger) he told the shocked meeting that he had long known of a conspiracy to kill him and he would now unmask his conspirators. He then displayed the tattered trousers and jacket that had come off the doppelgänger Hitler moments earlier. This comes from a long practice of role playing. Role playing various scenarios is still practised by the Freemasons today (7.30 pm Tuesdays and Thursdays at a lodge near you).

That same afternoon, on 20 July 1944, Benito Mussolini arrived at Rastenburg and Hitler greeted him with his left hand (his only visible anomaly) and calmly used the bomb blast to his advantage while carrying on a conversation with full hearing. Mussolini, who believed in heroes and posing like a Greek God, said "This was a sign from heaven". More likely it was a sign from the British.

Around 5 pm back at the Führer's bunker, Hitler and Mussolini met with Marshal of the Reich Hermann Goering, Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop, Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy Admiral Karl Doenitz, Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces General Wilhelm Keitel, General of Artillery Alfred Jodl, and Hitler's Chief Advisor and Chancellor Martin Bormann.

Bormann had already begun negotiations with the British. He had been forewarned and was not in the barracks during the explosion. He was in the official photographs but Bormann was not mentioned in any of the Hitler text as being present.

Hitler was advised that Germany was losing the war, yet he refused to capitulate. Part of Hitler's British deconstruction was the all-or-nothing approach and the all-or-nothing annihilation of Germany.

The conversation then centred around getting Hitler out of Germany alive after the war was lost. Hitler seemed lost in thought, drugged from a lozenge provided by British agent Dr Morell. These drugs exacerbated Hitler's short fuse and allowed it to be lit with key words. One of those words was 'Roehm' and it referred to Hitler's homosexual past and the control the British had over him.

When the Freemason agent, Commander of the Armed Forces General Wilhelm Keitel brought up 'Captain Ernst Roehm and the Night of the Long Knives', Hitler's subconscious hatred was activated and he rose to his feet declaring he would kill all those involved in the coup, including their wives, families and relatives.

The bomb was not powerful enough and historians blamed this on Hitler transferring from a concrete-walled bunker (which would have enclosed the blast) to a timber-lined barracks which allowed much of the explosive forces to escape. Regardless, the lack of power of the bomb had the opposite effect to which Colonel Count von Stauffenberg desired.

Over the next nine months, to April 1945, there was a wave of executions of the conspirators, the de facto Schwarze Kapelle and the German High Command with links to England. Count von Stauffenberg, his wife and sister were killed, but the children were swished. They were put in custody under false names and repeatedly moved. Many other von Stauffenbergs were hunted down and killed. Effectively all of the high-ranking intellectual Germans – the von Intellectuals – were killed.

Mussolini celebrates his chin (above).

Mussolini and Hitler parade.

This Nine Months of Long Knives did not occur without British support.

> "In fact both Nazi and Allied propaganda, in one of those dreadful harmonies they exhibited more and more frequently at this stage of the war, denounced the conspirators."[6]

The British, by providing Count von Stauffenberg with an ineffective explosive with forewarning and a doppelgänger replacement, had drawn the final curtain over the German aristocracy with any influence or military connections. Those who survived the Nine Months of Long Knives were put through the Nuremberg trials and killed afterwards.

> The only thing left for the British was to kill as many Germans as possible in the last nine months of the war and to destroy whatever vestige of infrastructure Germany had left. This too happened in a killing spree so great that more Germans died in the last nine months of the war than during the rest of the war put together. The last nine months of WWII became a massive depopulation exercise.

The killing of the Jews pales in comparison to the Allied killing of the Germans (July 1944–May 1945), which pales in comparison to the killing of the 26 million Russians, which pales in comparison to the 50 million that died from the British 1918–19 Spanish Flu epidemic.

War, it seems, is an organised killing epidemic.

Hitler went into hiding and forgot about defending Germany. His military decisions became irrational and were no longer based on the strength of his forces, but what he dreamed them to be. He spent the remainder of his time in bunkers developing jaundice, dental problems and a heart attack, all in September 1944. He also required the extremely suspicious second vocal chord operation in the same month. The first was in the Autumn of 1933.

This is a lot of sickness and operations for one man and one suspects that this sickness was spread over all of his surviving doppelgängers. The doppelgängers were bribed with the promise that their families would be safe as long as they acted for Hitler. As the security of that promise waned, so did their health. With the death of one of their comrades, they chose 'operations' as a means for time out and time off.

Because Mussolini was present at the meeting for the planned escapes of Hitler out of Germany, the British ensured that he too was killed before the end of the war, before he could speak out. Of the others present at the 20 July 1944 meeting, Goering was tried at Nuremberg and committed suicide (11 pm 15 October 1946) with American assistance just before he was due to be executed. Ribbentrop was tried and hanged at Nuremberg two hours later at 1 am 16 October 1946.

Keitel (1882–1946) and Jodl (1890–1946) were totally fluent and complicit with the doppelgänger Hitlers and it was essential that all of their secrets died with them. They were both tried and executed.

"A major-general in 1934, he [Wilhelm Keitel] was serving as chief-of-staff to the Minister of War in 1938, and, on Hitler's abolition of that office after the Blomberg/Fritzsche crisis, became head of the unified defence staff which was set up to replace it (OKW). He held the post throughout the war. It involved constant attendance on Hitler and he was therefore privy to all his major strategic decisions, besides being responsible for their transmission to the operational commands . . . In practice, his age [63] made his advice of little use (he was known in the army as Lakaitel – 'Lackey') and Hitler depended more on Jodl."[7]

"Colonel-General Alfred Jodl was chief of the Operations Section, High Command of the Armed Forces, and Hitler's personal operations officer. He was born in 1890 in Bavaria [the cradle of Naziism], into a traditionally military family. Commissioned into the artillery in 1910 he served throughout WWI. He was appointed Chief of the National Defence Section of the General Staff (war plans) in 1935 and Chief of the Operations Section in the new OKW in 1938 and held that post throughout the war. His chief tasks were to inform Hitler of military situations as they developed and to transmit his orders to the operational commands. OKW was not itself a command staff, but it was the one with which Hitler was in most frequent and intimate touch and Jodl came eventually to act as Hitler's principal military adviser, since Keitel lacked the courage to disagree with him."[8]

"Admiral Karl Dönitz [Doenitz] was Grand Admiral, Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy and Hitler's successor. He arranged the surrender of Germany to the Allies and insisted throughout the trial that his career had been solely that of a professional naval officer, a submission to which the tribunal went some way towards accepting. He was convicted on two out of three counts and sentenced to ten years."[9]

> Admiral Doenitz had been a submarine commander and knew all the secrets of German Antarctica and was far too useful for the Americans to kill. He had also been a British agent from early 1919. As a result, Doenitz survived until 1980 – longer than anyone else.
> Martin Bormann escaped the Nuremberg trial by providing the British with the Nazis' Swiss Bank account numbers. He did attend the Nuremberg trials, but only after plastic surgery, attending in the spectators gallery with M, the head of British Special Secret Intelligence Operations. M had got Bormann out of Berlin in OP JAMES BOND and Hitler out of Berlin in the piggyback mission impossible, OP WINNIE THE POOH.

The 20th of July 1944 was an important day in history. From a failed British sabotaged coup, all the de facto Schwarze Kapelle and their families were killed. The 'von Intellectuals' were wiped out, as were their families. The Germany military tradition was wiped clean and the fate of the entire German command was sealed.

"Thus Hitler not only destroyed Germany, he also put an end to old Europe . . . ultimately it must be granted that he could not have destroyed Europe without the help of Europe."[10]

> The killing of Germans began in earnest at six times the rate of the rest of the war – and all for what? So that Adolf Hitler, an Austrian-born British agent running Germany into the ground, could be brought out to safety, and hidden, until the propaganda of war had taken over the post-war recovering world, the Cold War begun and the mystery man would take all the blame for the social engineering and military profits of the war-makers.

The Wolf's Lair headquarters in East Prussia (Poland) was built under British supervision. Group Captain Fred Winterbotham visited the site in 1935 and knew it was built for the attack on Russia which had been planned from 1919. The attack on Russia was self-sabotage for the German war effort – hence it was supported by the British. The Germans also lost WWI by fighting on two fronts.

> From this point on, Hitler prepared many options for his escape. He also kept well hidden, and virtually gave up on defending Germany. This was also part of the British plan. Why should Hitler defend Germany when his own men were trying to kill him? Hitler gave up and waited for the destruction of Germany as per his British training. He knew he was to be guaranteed complete assistance in his escape.

Hitler sowed confusion as to his whereabouts using surviving doppelgängers for his public appearances. One, in a hospital, was shown on Movietone News in 1945 with the title German Newsreels on Hitler's Escape. Newsreel narrator: "Looking rather more round-shouldered than usual, he goes from bed to bed commiserating with the casualties. Maybe this is Hitler's double or perhaps his double was killed by the bomb. Though there are scores of theories, the facts are not yet known."[11]

The fact that Movietone News had the newsreel showed that it was leaked for PR purposes.

The Movietone News doppelgänger was an entirely bigger person, with round shoulders, a chin, jowls, different-shaped ears, hairline and neck thickness. He was 1–2 inches taller (25–50 mm), had muscular arms, a thick chest and large farmer's hands. He was a bigger man altogether but wore the trademark moustache which drew attention away from all other features. He had also had plastic surgery to imitate Hitler's nose.

Hitler, at this stage, was square-shouldered and thin, with a hollow chest.

Narrator: "In the final months of the war, even the Germans couldn't be certain. Since the 1944 bomb plot, Hitler kept well out of sight hidden away in bunkers. The last ordinary Germans who saw him in the open were a handful of the Hitler Youth."[12]

[12] Ibid.

There were seven plans to get Hitler out of Germany. These are separate from the faking of his death. Some of the plans for his escape became active false trails and these were pursued relentlessly by complicit intelligence agencies. These seven plans included South America, south-west Africa, Switzerland, Norway, Antarctica, Spain and New Zealand where a hit against a Hitler was ordered in February 1964, well after his actual death.

The main East-West avenue was used by the Nazis as a runway right up to the last moments when Berlin fell with Hanna Reitsch flying out on 29 April 1945. The Nazis had captured British planes at hand to try and make their escape without being shot down, one of which was an Auster with RAF markings.

Flight out of Berlin was certainly possible. Hitler's switchboard operator: "There were two planes waiting to the North of Berlin. One of them was the [large] JU390 and a Blohm and Voss that could fly the same distance. It could fly 18,000 km without refuelling, so Hitler could have escaped if he wanted to."[13]

Professor Hugh R. Trevor-Roper, a wartime MI-6 officer and British Army Major and more recently the Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford University: "Up to 22 April [1945] when the net closed, they could get out by air. Big airplanes could take off on the 22nd and a whole convoy of them went off from Berlin to Berchtesgarden on the 22nd carrying quite a large number of people who wanted to get out – all those who opted to get out. The Russians couldn't be everywhere."[14]

Despite Trevor-Roper's confidence, a packed Condor, including Dr Morell, flew out on 23 April to Munich.[15]

Stalin's deputy, Marshal Zhukov had announced Hitler was dead on 1 May 1945, but had changed his mind. Hitler could easily have escaped. The runway was open and he was probably in Spain or Argentina, both of which were fascist. So the newspapers published articles with the headings, "Hitler's Argentine Connection". This was another cover-up. Spain was a fascist country under British Intelligence control and Hitler was a British agent.

Hitler was in Spain.

[13] Hitler of the Andes.

[15] This was additional to the Condor that flew out and crashed two days earlier.

Hitler's destination to Barcelona was pre-empted with the Condor that crashed on 21 April 1945 in Müldorf as it left Berlin headed for Barcelona. Despite the strong indication that Hitler had escaped to Barcelona, all search efforts were directed elsewhere.

To counter this, the British sent out a young army major and MI-6 agent, Hugh Trevor-Roper who was someone with no authority, but breeding. He was 31 years old but looked 23. This is called 'send a monkey, get peanuts'. Hugh became Baron Dacre of Glanton for his efforts.

In The Last Days of Hitler, British Army Major Hugh Trevor-Roper gives an illuminating account of his vain efforts to obtain information or co-operation from the Russians:

> "The Russians accused the British of harbouring Hitler and Eva Braun in their zone for some nefarious and unstated purpose in the future. And at this point my superior officer, Dick White [who later spent his Christmases in the 1950s and '60s with the treasonous homosexual spy Anthony Blunt attending] said, 'Enough is enough. It's perfectly ridiculous that the facts have not been established' and he charged me with this mission."

Starting a month after the report of Hitler's death (approx. 30 May 1945), Hugh Trevor-Roper's mission was fraught with difficulties. The bunker had been ransacked by the Russians and was 0.3 metre (1 foot) deep in water with no electricity. Neither the Soviets, British or Americans shared information or evidence. Hansl Baur, Hitler's pilot and Hans Rattenhuber, the head of Hitler's guard, people who were in the bunker at the time of Hitler's escape, were in Soviet imprisonment and unavailable for interrogation.

All the important conclusions of Hugh Trevor-Roper on Hitler's death were based on the evidence of one man, Sturmbannführer Erich Kempka, Hitler's personal chauffeur who was also present at the Night of the Long Knives. According to Kempka, Hitler was shot. This became the official version, but the British found no bloodstains that matched Hitler's blood type, no bullets, and no bullet holes in the room where he was supposed to have shot himself.

To continue his 'milk and cookies' version of history as the official British history of 'maximum depth and endeavour', Hugh Trevor-Roper was made Regius Professor of Modern History at Oxford University in 1957. (See Hugh Trevor-Roper, Appendix 8)

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

A month prior to sending Hugh Trevor-Roper, the British had sent Anthony Blunt (37, King George V's illegitimate son) to Schloss Kronberg (a castle near Frankfurt) to retrieve any evidence of the former King Edward VIII's Nazi involvement. British half-royal Anthony FitzBlunt was German Army Intelligence with a 'V-Mann number' and a numbered Soviet operative.

These connections gave Blunt a free pass anywhere in wartime Europe. He had spent the war actively passing information to both the Germans and the Russians and was known by the Russians as "ideological shit". This made him one of the best non-ideological spies the world had ever seen.

> Anthony Blunt represented one thing – the British monarchy: a non-ideological spy-unit 'loyal only to itself' – perhaps the best definition of 'royal' ever.

Spymaster: "On his mission, Anthony Blunt took liberty and stole the Kaiser's crown jewels from the Czech castle Karlstejn, which had been purposely built to safeguard the inheritance."

Russia Looks for Hitler

By late July 1945 at the Potsdam conference, Stalin knew the bodies of Hitler they'd discovered were fake and the British were hiding Hitler either in Spain or Argentina. Stalin said as much to President Truman (Freemason) and to Secretary of State Jimmy Byrnes as recorded in Frankly Speaking and Hitler.

Espoys Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

> "At the Potsdam conference in July, 1945, Stalin assured his Western colleagues that the Russians had not found the corpse and that Hitler was hiding in Spain or South America."[16]

> Hugh Trevor-Roper:
> "In Spain there was General Franco [general & dictator from 1936–75] and in Argentina there was Colonel Perón [soldier and president from 1946–55, 1973–74]. From Stalin's point of view, these were both semi-Nazi reactionary dictatorships who supported the Germans."[17]

To support the Argentina theory, before, during, and after the end of WWII, the large German population in Argentina would give each other the Nazi salute . . . even on the beach, where they could be seen from submarines, and in places where they were openly filmed on land.

Smersh and the KGB did their best to prove that Hitler hadn't killed himself, but had somehow vanished. This marked the start of Operation MAPTA (MYTH), Nº 655-A/OP. Operation MYTH was the cornerstone of Stalin's claim that Hitler had escaped and was being looked after by Western fascists. It was made public in the 1990s. Of detailed note is that the typewritten 'P' in 'OP' had been changed by ballpoint pen into a 'B'. The 'B' stood for 'observation' rather than 'operation'.

The Soviets never looked at the bodies found in Berlin after the first autopsy of 3–8 May 1945. They knew they were doppelgängers of Adolf and Eva Hitler. The Russian commission autopsy report (Document 12) showed no bullet wounds to the skull, nor any detectable fragments from the claimed shooting, but the remains of a crushed ampoule in the mouth of the corpse. There was no smell of bitter almonds given off by cyanide compounds observed in the other bodies, but those bodies weren't burnt.

The bodies were treated with exemplary neglect by the Russians and buried secretly in a shallow grave, in a little wood, so that even dogs could dig them up. Then the Russians placed a guard at the site – until the earth settled.

The KGB then claimed to have "flushed Hitler's corpse" into a Magdeburg river in April 1970. These were the skeletal remains of a doppelgänger Hitler or Hitler's killed 29 April–1 May 1945.

> "In a memorandum to the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, dated August 5, 1945, they [the British] requested that all those concerned with compiling the official histories of the war not 'be given access to any original special intelligence material'.
> "They [the British] further proposed that the British Chiefs of Staff 'write up important battles, using personnel already indoctrinated', and it was this information that would be given to official historians for incorporation in their volumes . . . The U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff . . . agreed in a memorandum to the British Chiefs of Staff, dated September 7, 1945."[18]

To continue this, Stalin was blamed for covering up true information and putting out false information about Hitler.

> "In the end the Russians managed to swathe the whole question in such obscurity that the wildest versions concerning the end of Hitler circulated . . . fleeing in a submarine to a remote island, living in a Spanish monastery or on a South American hacienda."[19]

Amongst those most taken with the news that Hitler was alive was General Eisenhower. Months after Berlin was taken, he said publicly:

> "We have been unable to find one tangible piece of evidence of Hitler's death. Even though I initially believed Hitler was dead, there are now reasons to assume that he is alive."[20]

A radio bulletin stated "The United States Army does not know whether Hitler is alive or dead." An Associated Press heading read "Zhukov Says Hitler Wed Actress In Berlin, May Be Alive in Europe . . . Berlin, June 9 [1945] – Adolf Hitler not yet found."

On 19 December 1945 a newspaper article read: "Soviets not convinced Hitler Dead". Other articles read, "Far from being brought to justice, Hitler had melted away" and "Court Ruling sought on Hitler's Death".[21]

> After all of these headings the Soviets then claimed the British were holding Hitler alive. Stalin should know. He was a British agent and had been a criminal in London's East End underground. He still had contacts in Britain and knew as much as most as to what was going on.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org

After the Potsdam conference the false trail was developed to Argentina and was continued through into the mid-1970s. This involved a U-boat leaving Norway for Argentina in great secrecy and was followed by a well-publicised landing and surrender on the coast of Argentina on 17 August 1945.

The FBI then became involved and searched for Hitler from the subways of the Bronx to the jungles of Latin America. This was only ever going to be a wild-goose chase. The FBI were already discredited by their director J. Edgar Hoover (1924–1972) who looked like a Russian with a crooked jaw and mouth. "He was a paranoid and suspicious neurotic man who had built his career on finding the enemy within."[22]

[20] Hitler of the Andes.

Soon after Hoover (1895–1972) died the hunt for Hitler ceased. A discredited person is always required to pursue a fruitless mission and J. Edgar Hoover was a cross-dressing, bisexual, inside-crime boss, who was given the Hitler-hunt for 27 fruitless years. Hoover was regularly sodomised by the Mafia while dressed as a woman.

J. Edgar Hoover was useless for integrity and could be guaranteed to support crime at whatever level, whenever it was required. He was as much an agent for chaos as anyone and it was only through having intelligence files on everyone else that he was able to take his intelligence role to the top and to keep his weird sexual behaviour under wraps. The Mafia didn't care about reputations and used his secret to screw him every which way. While the FBI were hunting Hitler, the Mafia were creating crime.

The FBI (America's CID) began to investigate if Hitler had made it across the Atlantic, and recently released FBI documents point to worry and hysteria surrounding the possibility that Hitler was alive and in their neighbourhood. The FBI documents presented had all traceable detail blacked out, so little or no follow-up was possible. Some of these documents were letters sent in by players to create false leads and other leads were treated as hoaxes, like "If you want to know where Hitler is call xxx-xxx". The name and address was also blacked out.

Polls at the time showed that over 50% of people believed Hitler was still alive and this led to a lot of Hitler sightings. Every FBI bureau in the US received sightings of Hitler somewhere in America. There were a thousand FBI agents working on these reports at any one time. This produced over 1200 documents on Hitler's escape – all of which were decoys.

The maths on this is fascinating. If 1000 FBI agents hunted for Hitler over 30 years from late 1945 to the mid-1970s and produced 1200 reports, then each FBI agent spent 25 years completing one report. The hunt for Hitler was cover for every other FBI operation under the sun.

A hoax is always built upon a previous hoax and never the truth of history.

This is how history is hidden and how history is formed. It is also why 95% of all history books contain information that is two-thirds false. The longest hoaxes are always reason for the next war.

The most enthusiastic Hitler hunter was The National Police Gazette – Sports, True Adventure, People (America's first pictorial, established 1845). In the December 1945 issue, the front cover showed two American actors looking like suburban versions of Hitler and Eva at 40 and 30 years of age. The cover read "Hitler is Alive! His Marriage to Eva Braun – Their Fake Suicide and Escape from Berlin".

One story goes that a double had died for Hitler at the bunker and Adolf Hitler and Eva Braun had escaped to Norway (north Germany, through Denmark, to Norway) and from there were taken by the U-boat submarine U-977 to Latin America.

U-977 crew member: "We left Norway on 6 or 7 May [1945] and then practically became a phantom boat, all the way around the North of Scotland, past Ireland, past France and the Bay of Biscay. They were looking for us and searching for us and all we could do was listen for anyone above us."[23]

This was a voyage many thought physically impossible but the U-977 made it to the coast of Argentina on 17 August 1945. On the same day the newspaper headline read "102 Days Late, German Sub Surrenders to Argentina". The crew were immediately taken prisoner and accused of hiding Hitler on board. During their interrogation many Nazi U-boat officers were castrated.

John Walsh, an American FBI G-Man (a spy working for the American Embassy in Buenos Aires on the fruitless Hitler-hunt in Argentina): "The U-boats came and surrendered to Argentina. The press reports there indicated that someone in Montevideo [Uruguay] or Argentina suggested that Hitler had been on these boats and that caused a number of people to say, 'Well, we have to look into that possibility'."[24]

More reports of U-Boat landings came into the FBI over the next couple of weeks. "Reports of Hitler Hideout – Los Angeles, [muffled] Bureau, 21 September 1945 – The first sub came close to shore after it had been signalled safe to land and a doctor and several men disembarked and Hitler and two women. Another doctor and seven more men said Hitler had suffered from asthma and ulcers and had shaved off his moustache and had a long 'but' on his upper lip."[25]

Hitler was supposed to be hiding in the foothills of the Southern Andes but reports remained unconfirmed. Argentina's navy tried to capture the U-boats but the huge coastline made it easy for the Nazis to evade capture and get ashore on German-owned coastal farms in Patagonia.

The FBI then set up an operation behind the walls of the American Embassy in Buenos Aires but the FBI's power of interrogation was restricted and their agents had to operate covertly. They had difficulty establishing the crucial network of informants on the ground and were limited by their conspicuousness. They were also under constant surveillance from local police and Nazis who hid behind newspapers.

This was a game of Spy versus Spy for the Nazis, with the Nazi spies looking exactly like the FBI's G-Men except that they all had moustaches. This pre-empted the movies that took them seriously and the comic strips that lampooned them later.

Messages from outside Argentina were relayed to the FBI Hitler-hunters by the FBI Radiogram system. These instructions kept the team of G-Men busy chasing the ever-elusive, never-present Hitler for over four decades.

The FBI G-Men would even report on footprints found in mudflats near San Gelling (25 June 1948), leading to a car and would then follow up in Veronica. There were thousands of lost leaders. Another U-boat was spotted on 18 July 1948 at Mar del Plata, then Hitler was seen heading across the Argentine pampas towards the southern Andes towards the German-owned Eden Hotel in La Falda, a remote region of Cordova nestled in the foothills of the Andes. This was a crop circle investigation, defined by the Oxford Reference Dictionary as caused by "whirlwinds, fungi, alien spaceships and/or hoaxers".

In November 1945, the FBI had linked Hitler to the Eden Hotel, a centrepiece of a long-established wealthy German community. This was an international hotel where aristocrats from Cordova and Buenos Aires danced to the orchestra into the early hours.

Since the 1930s, the Eden had been a paradise for its predominantly German clientele. It was run by Eda Eyckhorn whose connections reached the highest echelons of the German Reich. She was definitely dykey-looking and went to Europe each year to attract guests.

One suspects that the principal guests she attracted were those Germans with an unnatural interest in children. Kiddy porn is still not illegal in Germany and fascist Germans are renown paedophiles, including the Stasi.

According to the FBI, who established a dossier on Eyckhorn after the war, she had close links with the German Reich. Before the Nazis had come to power she placed her entire bank account of 30,000 marks at Goebbels' disposal. Over the years she became one of Hitler's closest friends and confidants although there is no mention of her in Joachim C. Fest's authoritative Hitler.

This was a fabrication and showed the FBI's collusion in taking the world's attention off the scent, onto Argentina and away from Spain.

> Spain was where Hitler was and, quite purposely, no post-war-controlled media published anything of him being there.

It was difficult for the FBI G-Men to get to La Falda in person, because they stuck out like sore thumbs. The FBI never went to the Eden Hotel. They used locals and got all of their information second-hand. A lot of photos of Hitler had been placed around the hotel and the hotel was in a constant state of readiness for his arrival. It was considered to be the natural place for him to be in Argentina.

Catalina de Mero, a seventeen-year-old maid at the Eden Hotel, said Hitler came to the hotel in 1948. "He arrived one night and was put up on the third floor [of the two-storey hotel]. I took breakfast up to him, placed it at his door, knocked and then left. It was German food including cheese soufflés [beaten egg] and he ate everything."

According to Catalina de Mero, the Hitler of the Andes was clearly recognisable as the Hitler of so many people's imagination, even though he'd lost his moustache and most if not all of his hair. He wore a wig. For the three days he was there, the third floor was private, but everything carried on below as normal.

The hotel proprietor, Eda Eyckhorn, told the 17-year-old maid: "Whatever you saw, pretend you didn't." Two weeks later Eda and Catalina drove up to a wooden house in Pandazucar in the mountains and delivered a picnic basket of German food to the supposed Hitler. From here he went to La Rioja after which they lost trace of him. Pandazucar means 'sugar bread' and is still a lodging place today.

The Angel of Death, Josef Mengele (1911–79) chief doctor at Auschwitz, and Adolf Eichmann (1906–62) an SS organiser of anti-Semitic activities, arrived in South America the following year (1949). Mengele befriended the Nazi Wolfgang Gerhardt in Brazil in 1961 and assumed his identity when Gerhardt died. Eichmann reached Argentina in 1948 and was traced by Israeli agents. He was taken to Israel in 1960 where he was tried and executed. (See Was Wallis Simpson A Man, Appendix 13)

The FBI didn't close the files on Adolf Hitler until the mid-1970s, after the useful hoaxer J. Edgar Hoover had died in 1972. After this the Americans started to liberalise their attitude towards the secret matters of WWII and a flood of documents were declassified in the spring of 1975 containing secret papers on cover and deception.

> John Walsh, FBI G-Man in Buenos Aires:
> "Much of the information was not credible . . . others where there was a possibility of some credibility . . . we made enquiries . . . but [in] none of them we found any true indications that Hitler was in Argentina or the United States, or in any place where we had any responsibility. All the investigations we made came to a dead end because nothing really specific had been found."[26]

The narrator of Hitler of the Andes states that these revealed Stalin had deliberately confused and misinformed the West about Hitler's fate in Spain or Argentina. This is an interesting end to the documentary as it never investigated Spain. It is designed to confuse, introduce an erroneous story, affirm lost leaders and discredit truthful leads.

Stalin tried to find the truth about Hitler's escape. It is what fellow agents and mortal enemies do. They look out for each other, whether they like them, admire them, or fear them. After all, Stalin and Hitler were both fellow foreign British agents in a plan to make the Great War (WWI) even greater (WWII).

Eisenhower then became America's 34th President on 20 January 1953 and Stalin was killed by MAD 44 days later.

Spymaster: "With his interest in Hitler, Stalin's protection from being poisoned was suddenly removed. In his diet kitchen there was an amalgam of secret services who all tasted his food. These included Smersh and the GRU, the forerunner to the KGB. They watched each other and tasted everything. It was quite the tense kitchen.

"Stalin was treated in much the same way as Hitler and the Queen, receiving all these homeopathic medicines, but Stalin never received any medicine, homeopathic or other, for high blood pressure, nor was he treated for high blood pressure. High blood pressure is a common condition amongst top secret agents, especially deconstructed agents at the head of the programme.

"When Stalin suffered his stroke, his sentries enforced his privacy. He was most likely guarded by White Finns (Finnish) who worked for the British government on contract. White Finns were also used to guard Lenin in his last days. There is a long history of foreign troops guarding key assets in Russia. The Czech legion guarded the trans-Siberian railway in the last days of WWI because it was a foreign asset."

Modern Equivalents

The Hitler-Hunt was the FBI's most incredible manhunt, but the whole scenario reeks of Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden – they too are more useful as 'enemies to incite ongoing hatred' and therefore defence spending, as opposed to 'succumbed and conquered' enemies. The myth of Hitler was kept alive for the same reason – the development of fear and arms.

British SAS: "Saddam Hussein is an American agent, but may have been taken over by the Israelis at one point. Osama bin Laden has been an American agent for the last 30 years and his CIA codename is Tim Osman. He was educated in Britain and is described by a former school buddy as 'Harry bin Laden' (his British name) and as 'a family man, full of integrity, with a nice nature'."

High ranking ASIO officer: "I have seen Bin Laden in a safe house in London. Perhaps that's why he doesn't appear to age as he walks down the rocky slopes of yesteryear."

James Bond III: "Bin Laden is in on the oil scam. The 007, 7 July 2005 London Tube bombing was arranged by the Americans and Israelis with everything attributed to the Syrians as Syrian oil is the next American mark. They won't attack Iran because they have nuclear weapons, but you watch, Syria is the next country America will attack making Syria the 74th country since 1945. It's the same scenario as my namesake pulled."

Spymaster: "Arafat was an Egyptian brought in to run Palestine as an Israeli-American agent of war, which in turn profits the Americans who supply Israel with arms, hence Yasser Arafat's inability to conclude peace."

"But many Palestinians now believe he [Arafat, 75] could not have served Israel's cause better had he been a card-carrying member of Sharon's Likud party."[27]

Spymaster: "Palestinian President Arafat [4 Aug. 1929–11 Nov. 2004] was poisoned during the build-up to the American elections when his protection from poisoning was suddenly removed. The first poisoning on 20 October 2004 gave him stomach pains making him really sick by 29 October. He was vomiting and unable to eat or drink. This was made to look like 'leukaemia or some other blood disorder' with an 'abnormally low count of blood platelets'. This took him out of the country to a Clamart military hospital in Paris where his wife Suha has lived for the last two and a half years with their daughter Zara Arafat (8).

"The second poisoning was powerful enough to put him into a 'reversible coma' (5 November 2004), the day after the American election result. The first poisoning hospitalised him and the second was to keep him in a coma on life support. Because he had never named a successor, Palestinian leadership was placed in hiatus, making the Palestine Liberation Organisation vulnerable to takeover, by yet another American/Israeli agent."

On 9 November, on Al Jazeera TV, Suha Arafat accused Palestinian officials of conspiring to kill her husband. "They're trying to bury him alive."

High-ranking ASIO officer: "To discredit her the International Monetary Fund [part of the UN and an American patsy] found US$1 billion in one of Arafat's offshore accounts. The money was missing from the Palestinian Treasury. The technology for this search was provided by America who monitor all the world's money transfers. Eventually closer to US$6 billion was found in Arafat's purse.

"Arafat took this money on American instructions and with American assistance. It is a common tactic of those offering bribes to give money in exchange for a favour, in this case more conflict, and then discredit that person and retrieve the money."

MICK P: "In this version, Arafat took someone else's money, not America's but the Palestinian Treasury's. Consequently the Israelis never took Arafat seriously and buried him alive, playing cat and mouse with him for his last three years, keeping him alive only as a toy incapable of negotiating peace. Arafat was then discredited and killed, creating a power vacuum, while morally empowering Israel. This is called 'demonising the opponent' and was also used against Hitler and Stalin. They all deserve it, but they were all double agents."[28]

[27] New Zealand Herald, 12 November 2004, A22.

British SAS: "America wants to install puppet governments in every area of conflict. Because up to a third of America's gross national product is based in and around the military industrial complex, and because America is so dependent on oil, America is setting up puppet governments in all areas of conflict, and in all areas where there is oil, which, surprise surprise is the same thing. Afghanistan (drugs), Iraq (oil) and Syria (oil) are cases in point. These countries always 'attack' the West before America goes in and takes over their resources."

Arafat lived simply but was reported to pay his wife a monthly allowance of US$100,000. The fight for his power and fortune now begins with Suha Arafat. Her deceased husband has been sufficiently discredited, and his wife is now unable to return to her own country, having lost all influence. It's a tidy little stitch-up not dissimilar to those of WWII.

Arafat was poisoned (20 October and 5 November 2004) at the same time as the American election (28 October–3 November 2004) with the self-confessed war-maker George W. Bush re-elected (4 November 2004) and Arafat dying on 11 November 2004 (11.11.2004). Whenever such symmetrical dates are attached you know it was a planned event.

Spymaster: "Britain's prime minister Tony Blair is also not immune to bribes. The war-maker George W. Bush called again for Britain to support the war in Iraq in early October 2004 as a part of the 'Coalition of the Willing'. This was a month before the American election and Bush needed Britain's support in order to get re-elected. Many other countries, including Spain and Japan, had pulled out."

On 8 November 2004 a radio bulletin said that Blair was beginning to look like "The greatest British prime minister since Winston Churchill". Churchill himself was a war-maker and both were heavily compromised. Both were occultists and both were rock spiders (paedophile minders).

British Intelligence Officer, 12 November 2004: "On 10 November 2004, it was revealed that Tony Blair had bought a £3.5 million apartment on the Thames – the ferrets are all over this.

[28] 'MICK P' is a Member of the Intelligence Community Knowledge Pool.

"In order to get countries to support America in the Iraq war, Bush had the FBI pull out all the smut files on every political leader. Tony Blair, it was found, was covering for and promoting those involved in a paedophile ring involving knights and at least one prominent royal, a second cousin to the queen.[29]

"Britain's Tony Blair is now a fully-fledged puppet for the American military industrial complex, which is why he has been in power for so long. The media is the propaganda machine for the war machine. It's just as Winston Churchill said:

'The first casualty of war is the truth'.
All the war media are embedded and the media is bound to tell the lies the military industrial complex want told."

In the Iraq war, America's death toll was minimised to 1500 and the civilian death toll as officially 17,000, but in the real world it was over 100,000 as of April 2005.

By June 2006 the official American death toll had risen to 2,500 and the official Iraqi civilian death toll had dropped to 50,000. This meant that in the 14 months of American-Iraq war from April 2005 to June 2006 at least 50,000 Iraqis have miraculously not died. This would make the truth very dead in Iraq and Allied media capable of raising the dead.

Even the Iraqi Health Ministry has acknowledged the 50,000 death toll as an undercount.[30] The problem is that the violence has been so extreme in the north and the west with the used of plutonium-tipped missiles and rolling thunder (a rolling wall of fire 100 metres high and 800 metres wide) that often there are no bodies left to count and no one left to say how many died. The 'body count war lie' has been purposefully exacerbated by cut telephone and power lines, but we all know the real reason for America's atrocious acts in Iraq.

> The worse Iraq gets, the more justification there is for oil price increases and those oil prices are set worldwide. It is not diplomacy that controls the world, but oil. Diplomacy is just something sodomists fake under the guise of being employed by governments whose employees are elevated depending on their level of involvement in shame

[29] This was the Dunblane massacre in 1996 in which 16 school children were murdered by Thomas Hamilton.

[30] Los Angles Times, 25 June 2006.

. . . and the measuring stick of shame is paedophilia . . .
hence rock spider Prime Ministers.

James Bond III: “Iraq is being depopulated by ‘Rolling Thunder’, 800 metres of ground-level rolling flame . . .”

Spymaster: “And the Israelis have developed plutonium-tipped rockets. The bodies are simply vaporising and vaporised bodies can’t be counted.”

All this for American access to oil upon which its superior survival depends, with the doubling of oil prices to fund the war. It’s just as the American comedian Craig Kilborn said:

“How did our oil get under their sand?”

A week after the election, America went into Fallujah with its “biggest military assault since WWII”. They decimated Fallujah killing several hundred rebels (breeding males) each day and untold civilians (these are not reported).

MICK P: “They were due to attack oil rich Iran anytime from October 2004, using Israeli aircraft off American aircraft carriers, with the intent to drop low-radiation nuclear bombs, decimate the population, and take over the oil fields . . . but on 9 October 2004, through an Israeli-Iranian treff in a chip factory in the colonies, Iran confirmed that they had a large number of nuclear weapons hidden under the likes of school buildings.

“These were purchased from India, via Sweden (India’s nuclear weapons agent). Sweden has a nice name, so no one suspects. So instead, tens of thousands of Indians and 3000 Swedes were killed and another oil field was taken over on 26 December 2004 in what became known as the Boxing Day Tsunami.”

Spymaster: “Much of the technology used in the tsunami was trialled by the New Zealand Army off Whangaparoa Peninsula during WWII. In those days it was destined for use against low-lying ground in Japan.”

MICK P: “HAARP[31] was used to create the main earthquake. The six minor earthquakes around Diego Garcia, the US military base in the upper-middle of the Indian Ocean ere caused by NZ-styled bombs placed well before the Tsunami hit. Consequently, Diego Garcia suffered no damage, despite the base being 0.6 m (2 ft) above sea level. US ships were also given two-weeks notice to leave the Indian Ocean.

“There is also a move to disappear islands off maps for use as military bases. Diego Garcia is disappearing, just as Kodak Island has already disappeared.”

If Burma’s high casualty rate made it to the media, it would have brought unwanted attention to Diego Garcia, a nuclear missile base. Burma colluded and denied the bulk of their casualties.

Control of the media is essential to acts of war.
Truth is still the first casualty of war.
Lies are told before and after strikes.

It seems that nuclear arms are a strange form of peace that protect oil fields. Ironically, no-radiation nuclear bombs are also the symbol of the anti-patriotic movement.

Vet: “The war in Iraq is now having a demographic effect on the Iraqi population for the simple reason that there are so many car-bombings and shootings, all entirely concentrated on the young. This is a sure indication that the Mossad and the CIA are at work. Whenever they run an insurrection, they engineer demographic change and one of the largest groups hit in Iraq have been the ‘breeding cows’ (females anywhere from 2- to 20-years-old).

“Concentrating war on a very finite section of population is a known Israeli and CIA tactic. The CIA used it in South America where they ran genocidal conflicts in conjunction with the Mossad. When school came out there were no breeding cows (schoolgirls). This was even noticeable after the CIA coup against Allendé in 1973.

“The CIA trained the local Argentine Army Special Forces in the College of the Americas where they did the short graduate course, ‘How to be a paedophile’. As a result, the Argentine Army Special Forces couldn’t drive their international 6 x 6 trucks passed school bus stops without arresting nearly every schoolgirl in sight.”

The CIA have never been an intelligence organisation.
The CIA’s motto is to protect American business interests.
The CIA cherry picks its intelligence to suit its business goals.

[31] ‘HAARP’ stands for ‘High-frequency Active Auroral Research Program’ based in Tok Road, Gakona, 300 km southeast of Fairbanks in Alaska. It is run by the Phillips Laboratory of Hanscom AFB in Massachusetts and is sponsored by the Office of Naval Research and the US Air Force. It has the ability to control the weather, volcanoes, earthquakes and tectonic plates, and is part of the ‘Global Warming’ scam.

This becomes obvious in the light of George Herbert Bush who was born oil rich, ran Saddam Hussein in oil rich Iraq, became the head of the CIA, and then became President of the United States. When George installed his son George into the same position, a large amount of American self-sabotage occurred with 9-11 being called "another Pearl Harbor".

The George Bushes used the Georg Ludwig trick and blamed 9-11 on any country they wanted to go to war with, especially ones with their dictators running them. This had long been back-engineered and Iraq was an oil rich country with a different religion.

These new Christian-Islamic wars (YOU HAVE – WE WANT) were created with increasing the price of oil in mind. Because the oil price is fixed internationally, regardless of who attacks who, any war by anybody, as long as it hits the media, profits all the oil owners.

The bigger the media hit,
the bigger the oil hike.

To humans at war, war is everything.
To the oil companies,
war is an itch that makes them rich.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 Ma

Wars have been back-engineered. That is, treaties, agreements and contracts (cause and effect) have been placed on paper beforehand to ensure maximum profit and minimal interference. The United Nations is a case in point. Since the UN receives 50% of its funding from the US, it has come under the thumb of the CIA.

The UN has no opposition
when conflicts serve American interest.
No American can be charged by the UN for international war crimes.

The UN is now a white paper on war, drugs and paedophilia and only those with secret CV's of corruption, murder, bribe taking, drug use, paedophilia and front-marriages (intell. files held by the CIA, the FBI, the Mossad and the KGB) are considered for any position of influence.

Secretary general of NATO Lord George Robertson: "Jaap [de Hoop Scheffer] has a distinguished record as both diplomat and politician that make him superbly qualified to be secretary general of NATO . . . I am delighted that we have found the right man to ensure NATO remains the world's most successful defense alliance." Lord Robertson went on to become deputy chairman of the British-based Telecoms group Cable and Wireless – the ultimate position for spying on drug and paedophile markets . . . and supplying them.

NATO's new secretary general is Amsterdam born Jaap de Hoop Scheffer. Jaap was a reserve officer in Dutch Air Force, senior diplomat before entering Parliament in 1986 and is described as "as extremely talented professional". Jaap: "the enemy is international terrorism . . .. that is why NATO is in Afghanistan."[32]

After near bankruptcy post-WWII, Monaco's bank was taken over by Aristole Onassis. Monaco then became a meeting point for drug shipments, washing drug money . . . and a tax haven.

The Pope John Paul II (Karol Jozef Wojtyla) and Prince Rainier were both terminally ill and NATO went in search of new drug markets for their newly acquired role of drug trafficking Afghan heroin. The paedophile Lord Robertson (Dunblane massacre) knew of the New Zealand government's paedophilia through the US Customs naming of Jonathan Hunt (Speaker of the House) as a paedophile in September 2004 and the ongoing intelligence documented homosexual child-sex abuse of Peter Davis (husband of Prime Minister Helen Clark) from pre-1979 to his arrest at San Francisco's Airport on 7 June 2006 where he propositioned an underaged Mexican boy by grabbing his crutch and saying "How about it?" The underaged boy turned out to be a policeman and Davis was arrested. First Laddy Davis claimed diplomatic immunity and was rescued by the RNZAF and three diplomatic officers (Sodomy Olympics).

Jaap de Hoop Scheffer went to Australia and New Zealand and gave a speech at Wellington's Victoria University on 31 March 2005: "We have come closer together over the last three years . . . Australia and New Zealand were the top candidates for NATO partnerships . . . NATO is everywhere." He arrived into New Zealand with 10 kg of Afghan heroin via diplomatic pouch. Once this new market was accepted the two previous drug lords were knocked off.

The next day (1 April 2005) the homosexual paedophile Jonathan Hunt became New Zealand's High Commissioner to Britain. The following day the Pope died (2 April 2005) and Prince Rainier (codenamed 'Tax') died four days later (6 April 2005). Both were involved in drugs and money laundering. Tavistock's MI-6 drug activator Peter Frampton then appeared in New Zealand on television (11 May 2005) using words and coded phrases to activate the baby boomer's drug habit. Tavistock's Frampton was the popular culture hook into the heroin market.

[32] BBC News, 23 September 2003.

Minister of Health Annette King was responsible for the cover up of police paedophilia at Banks Ave in Christchurch. She moved the focus to a Christchurch kindergarten and this was written up by Internal Affairs agent Linley Hood in A City Possessed. The excessively weak Minister of Police George Hawkins was then replaced by the 'sustainable-corruption Minister' of Health Annette King on 19 October 2005.

In order to become the Minister of Police, Annette King delivered the Afghan/NATO heroin to the police for distribution prior to the 17 September 2005 rigged election. As a reward, Annette King became Associate Minister of Defence, Trade, and Race Relations (all 19 October 2005–3 May 2006). The police distributed the Afghan heroin to the gangs on 30 November/1 December 2005 and planted drugs on any gang member who did not comply.

On 3 May 2006, once the Afghan heroin had taken hold, all of Annette King's positions were upgraded to Minister of Police, State Services, and Transport. This provided Annette King with full cover. Annette King has a Bachelor of Arts, a Post Graduate in Dental Nursing and was a practicing dental nurse from 1967–81. Her daughter was involved in drug dealing and was struck off as a teacher.

New Zealand's Minister of Police is a heroin enabler.

Intelligence officers: "The Afghan heroin definitely came into New Zealand by diplomatic pouch." It arrived in March 2005 with street word that it had arrived in February 2005, thus diverting the focus of the search. All of this came as a backdrop to Helen Clark's status as the highest-ranking KGB operative in New Zealand, former St Petersburg prostitute and Tavistock St Petersburg graduate.

Helen Clark is the prime contender for the position of Secretary General of the United Nations. She was filmed having sex with another woman at Anderson's Cottage (better known as Lincoln Cottage), near the White House on the night of 3/4 January 2003. This gave the crooked American President George W. Bush full control over her, hence his backing for the KGB operative Clark as the Secretary General of the pitifully useless and massively corrupt United Nations.

During WWII, MI-6 and the OSS were never intelligence organisations. They were BIG BUSINESS MAFIA with leanings towards the occult and homosexuality, just as they are today.

The Americans have dismembered Iraq so thoroughly they are now ready to hollow out their old enemy Iran for the simple reasons that:

1. Iran has oil.
2. Iran has a different religion.
3. Iran is not part of the Rothschild central banking system.
4. Politics is a sodomite's holiday; DIPLOMACY IS THE SODOMY OLYMPICS; peace accords merely set the boundaries for the next conflict; the media are compromised talking hairdos and any conflict the media releases, staged or otherwise, increases the price of oil.
5. The only politics that counts is oil.
6. America is powerless without oil.
7. America is all-powerful with oil.
8. If Iraq had no oil, there would be no war there. Similarly if Iran had no oil, there would be no war there. Without oil Middle East wars would be considered humanist conflicts and the UN would step in, no doubt taking bribes of paedophilia before handing out food rations.
9. Tony Blair won't speak out against war in the Middle East because the FBI files link him to the Dunblane massacre paedophile ring.
10. Oil is not the product of 10 trillion dinosaurs dying in one place. Dead dinosaurs produce soap, not oil.
11. Oil is the natural product of the Sun's energy and Earth's Outer and Inner Cores. Oil greases the friction between the Outer Core rotating at 8.3 revolutions per day in one direction and the Mantle and Crust rotating at 1 revolution per day in the other direction. This creates the mythical interface speed of 1000 miles per hour.
12. Superman got it right. Watch your cartoons. They have more news than a talking hairdo, especially during times of war. For rational thought watch The Simpsons and South Park cartoons. For irrational propagandist talking hairdos spouting war, watch Fox televison.

Lost Leaders

Common to all of these men is that they succumbed to the positions given them and took on the beliefs of their own subjects. They all began to believe in their own greatness. By and large their place in history is by way of emptiness, fault, and double agent training, rather than working patriotically for their people.

Hitler, Stalin, Churchill, Roosevelt, Truman, Hussein, bin Laden, Arafat, Blair and Bush have all been, or still are, puppets of war. They were not the prime makers of war, for if they were to make peace, they would have been liquidated with the rest of the peace-makers – Neville Chamberlain (1940), Rudolf Hess (1941), Karl Horn (1941), Colonel Claus Count Schenk von Stauffenberg (1944), Wilheim Canaris (1945), Mahatma Gandhi (1948), John F. Kennnedy (1963), Martin Luther King (1968) . . .

> It was the West who deliberately confused and misinformed their citizens to avoid linking the dots that WWII was an organised war, a massive depopulation exercise – with the British sabotaging peace talks at every turn, the Americans getting into the war with complicit self-sabotage (Pearl Harbor), and the British developing a hatred for their German cousins with Dieppe and D-Day.

Pseudo documentaries such as Hitler of the Andes by David Howards and Madoc Roberts are yet another propaganda exercise for the British. It promotes the myth and avoids the evidence at every turn right down to the detail, making important names inaudible, interviewing fifty percent of the people without naming them and showing documents with any information that could be followed up, blurred out.

The 2002 Hitler of the Andes mystery/doco concludes that few now believe Hitler was ever in Argentina, but that fantasists still follow Hitler from the foothills of the Andes to Antarctica. It concludes that they solved the mystery of Hitler by giving evidence that Hitler was not in Argentina or North America, but was buried outside Berlin and flushed down the River Elbe. But this story, although true of one of Hitler's doppelgängers, is not followed up. It contains within it all the hallmarks of another lost leader –

A mystery wrapped in a riddle inside an enigma.

Adolf Hitler lived with Eva Braun in Spain, in Barcelona, in the Parc de la Ciutadella opposite the Natural History Musem and in the Montserrat Monastery. Hitler wanted to continue his most far-reaching missions, and these did involve Antarctica, particularly the secret German submarine base at South 69° 10' and West 4° 15'.[33]

"The Germans had frequented Antarctica since the 1920s. Here they discovered an undersea entrance to a cavern south of South America in Queen Maud Land on the Princess Astrid Coast and named the mountains of their chosen area after German bureaucrats of the time like the Mühlig-Hofmann Mountains and the Wohlthat Mountains. These names remain today.

"Richard E. Byrd was the most famous American Antarctic researcher and was the first person to fly over the South Pole in 1929. In mid-November 1938 (10 months before WWII) he showed a movie of his Antarctic flight in Hamburg, Germany. Very soon after Byrd was promoted from civilian to high-ranking US Navy Admiral.

"The Germans went to Antarctica two months later based on what Richard E. Byrd had shown them. Under polar-experienced Captain Alfred Ritscher, the Germans made 15 flights over some 600,000 square kilometres (4%) of Antarctica from 19 January 1939 and took 11,000 pictures of the area. They discovered ice-free areas with lakes and small signs of vegetation. These aerial photographs showed that the 1931 Norwegian maps of the interior were fake.

"Immediately after this, Nazis began building an underground city on the Princess Astrid Coast, and in 1940 Nazi engineers began construction of buildings to withstand 60°C below zero. During the war, underground bases were the de rigueur for protection and secrecy (Harz and Thuumlringen) and the Germans have maintained underground construction activity at Antarctica since 1941.

"The Nazis referred to this impregnable city as New Berlin (Neuberlin) in an area called New Schwabenland, Neuschwabenland, Neu Schwabia or Base 211. It is built to withstand an atomic attack and a nuclear winter. Schwabenland refers to a place 'where the population is as thick as pig-shit and reluctant to take orders.'

"Neuschwabenland refers to a place "where the population are intelligent innovative technocrats and take to orders impulsively". It also refers to "New Cockroach Land", a place where atomic survival is possible.

[33] With receding ice, this entrance has now moved.

"In 1943, four years after they began in earnest, the Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy, Admiral Karl Doenitz (1891–1980) stated, 'The German submarine fleet has even now established an earthly paradise, an impregnable fortress, for the Führer, in whatever part of the world'.

"In 1947 the American Naval Task Force 68 led by Admiral Byrd under Operation HIGHJUMP tried to roll the remaining Germans out of New Schwabenland, but they failed. American Operation HIGHJUMP maps say that the Americans left the German side of Antarctica 'unexplored'. Instead an agreement was reached between the Americans and Nazis. This usually occurs when the riches or technology are more than the both of them could share."[34]

> WWII was an agreement between all parties. It was planned in 1919 with players tagged as early as 1836 (Maria Anna Schicklgruber). The major players were trained at Britain's Tavistock from 1907 – Stalin (Koba, Losif Vissarionovich Dzhugashvili) and Adolf Hitler (Edmund Hitler, 1912).
> "All his life Hitler owed his success largely to one or the other of his enemies. Now, once more, his ill-wishers – as if in a last display of all the mistakes of the era – made it possible for him to live a mythical posthumous life . . . only a mind that has learned nothing from the misfortunes of these times will call him the man of a single nation and refuse to recognise that a powerful tendency of the age culminated in him, a tendency that dominated the entire first half of this century."[35]
> Official history still covers for him.

Churchill, Hitler and Stalin Work Together

Chaplin Plays the Muse

When the British soldiers returned from war on the Continent and compared notes with British Intelligence in Britain, they suddenly felt very sick. The British Intelligence chiefs woke up in 1945 and realised they had been had, that the war was an arrangement, a fallacy, a pre-organised hoax with goals well defined before WWII ever broke out. This led to personal disillusionment amongst many high-ranking soldiers who then refused to talk about the war – the tight-lipped, big-eared generation, as indicative of determined survivors (large noticeable ears), who were bitter about their responsibilities (tight-lipped).

British Agents – Adolf Hitler and Dr Theodor Morell

Hitler's doctor, Dr Theodor Morell, was a British agent, Freemason, secret Tibetan Lodge member and 'Vril' practitioner, placed there by King George V and VI. These were all qualities he shared with Adolf Hitler, although Hitler denies the Freemasonry connection.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

'Vril' was the life force as taught in Tibet to Gurdjeiff, who taught Hitler's dentist, Dr Friedrich Krohn and Professor Karl Haushofer, both of them Hitler's primary spiritual mentors in the occult. Vril was so popular as a concept in the early 1900s, it led to the brand name 'Bovril' – 'Bovine and Vril'. Karl Haushofer's son Albrecht was the Duke of Hamitlon's lover, who was the Duke of Kent's lover, who was King George VI's brother.

Dr Morell was offered a position as doctor to the Shah of Persia. This is a tell-tale sign that he was a British agent, as the Shah of Persia was a British hostage, allowed to function, but completely under British rule.

Dr Morell had been a doctor on board elegant trans-Atlantic liners between Hamburg and Buenos Aires and was a fashionable dermatologist at the Berlin Tennis Club, making him something of a VIP. Although he was recognised and well received by high society (he was a short fat curio), the opinions of his colleagues and historians were that he was a complete charlatan. I don't disagree, but he was a purposeful charlatan. The fact that Hitler's own staff didn't stop his over-medication defies logic and points to a phoney war with disaffected double agents.

Hitler's photographer, Heinrich 'Heini' Hoffmann was an alcoholic and latent homosexual with gonorrhoea whose wife had just died. Dr Morell switched to specialising in venereal disease from 1936 and was invited to treat 'Heini' who just happened to be employing Eva Braun. Only those with British intelligence connections had access for the drugs required to treat venereal disease and this gave Morell access to Hitler in the weeks afterwards.[1]

From January 1937 Dr Morell was Hitler's preferred doctor and like Winston Churchill with Lord Moran, Hitler preferred doctors of dubious repute.

Dr Morell didn't drink or smoke, but he ate like a horse, belched like a mule, stunk like a pig and had chronic flatulence as did Hitler under Morell's treatment. The 5' 6", 105 kg (16½ stone) Dr Morell was not popular in Hitler's circle, was refused an SS uniform, was a social outcast and chuckled at anything Hitler said, just in case it was funny.

Hitler didn't eat meat, poultry, fish or eggs. He ate fruit, vegetables and pastries. By October 1937, Hitler's consumption of pills overtook his consumption of food and his health declined rapidly. Morell gave Hitler morphine, hypnotics, dextrose, hormones and vitamins and endless anti-gas pills compounded with strychnine and belladonna, up to 16 per day.

Dr Morell systematically ruined Hitler's health, feeding him banned drugs, toxins and narcotics which aged him prematurely. Dr Brandt even alleged that Morell had systematically poisoned Hitler with strychnine disguised as anti-gas pills. Morell more or less admitted to this in their shared prison cell in 1945: "Hitler was never ill".[2]

"Morell converted the largely healthy man that Hitler had been earlier into one constantly plied with injections and tablets which made Hitler more or less dependent on him; he played on Hitler's neuropathic nature by spouting utter rubbish about how Hitler's heavy workload meant that he was burning energy at the same rate as people in the tropics, and that the lost energy had to be replaced by all manner of injections like iodine, vitamins, calcium, heart-and-liver extract and hormones."[3]

Dr Morell kept Hitler heavily medicated with an antagonistic cocktail of uppers and downers – an action which suggested he was deliberately medicating Hitler into insanity. He gave Hitler 28 different pills and injections each day, some of them more than once. These were a combination of stimulants, digestive aids, anti-influenza drugs, vitamins, hormones, and glucose including Prostacrinum (an extract of sperm and prostatic tissue), and Bromnervalit against depression, Indelan to stimulate appetite, Eupaverin to alleviate colitis, Eufrasin against colibacillary infection, ecalyptus lozenges and even Dr Körster's quack pills.

After Hitler's second attempt at peace, which the British sabotaged, as well as his planned escape to America in June 1941, the doses were increased with injections of strophanthus and nicotinic acid. By August 1941 Hitler was nauseous and had uncontrollable shivering. His legs became oedematous (they held water), he became weak and deteriorated rapidly.

Dr Morell ignored the side-effects and increased his doses adding Cardizol, Coramine, and Sympatol and even more anti-depressants. When that didn't work, he gave Hitler caffeine, Pervitin (speed) and Vitamultina (amphetamines with even more caffeine). The bulk of the Nazi military were also on speed and they had containers to be accessed in an emergency.

Hitler had a heart attack, arterial hypertension, icteric hepatitis, his eye haemorrhaged, his right eye closed up, he had long and frequent lapses of memory, constantly burped and aged five years to every one. His staff reacted to him in much the same way that most people react to heavily medicated old people – they sold off his assets. By 1942, Dr Morell's drug-induced condition of Hitler had become such a success that even the Allied Headquarters kept an eye on Hitler's 'psychiatric situation'.

Hitler's own generals were completely baffled by his ever-changing battle plans. This gave them further impetus to 'run away from that crazy old person' and defect. As a result of Hitler's drug-induced madness there was a plan to kill Hitler using Martin Bormann's gun (a universal agent) and there was another attempt by the German High Command/British agent Hermann Goering, who attempted a Palace Revolution in early 1945. Hitler's madness was deliberately induced and he was meant to die many times, but the assassination attempts kept failing or the doppelgängers were killed instead.

[3] Dr Erwin Geising, 'Report on My Treatment of Hitler', June 1945, cited, ibid. p. 19.

This was a direct result of having MI-6 arm and finance Hitler's would-be killers, when MI-6 were also in charge of looking after Hitler's life . . . so only the doppelgängers died.

There is no doubt that Dr Morell was a quack and an expert quack. His treatment history showed that he wanted Hitler to 'govern in a mad rage of irrational forgotten decisions' which he achieved on behalf of King George VI. It was quite brilliant really. Hitler spent most of his time burping and leaning to the right, rather than carrying out war strategies. His movements, moustache and hairstyle certainly usurped those of Charlie Chaplin and this gave great mirth to the Freemasons.[4]

Between 1939 and 1941 Hitler started WWII with the masterful intuition of a double agent. Between 1941 and 1945 he spent four years in a heavily medicated stupor. This was followed by five years (1945–50) of recuperation, after which he was assassinated by the very people who trained him, drugged him, and gave him the information he needed to achieve his international status. It was a 40-year wind-up and wind-down that created a platform for experimentation, which gave rise to a plethora of inventions, and killed 50 million people in the process.

World War II was a 'how can we most easily rule' experiment. Regrettably the answer was:

1. The deconstruction of disgruntled foreign nationals as double agents, activated at will and deactivated by debriefing.
2. The medication of the masses with a daily cocktail of uppers and downers and mild poisons like beer, coffee, cigarettes, medication, drugs, fluoride and radioactive water. (See The Fluoride Con, Appendix 2)
3. Government department and police-enforced socialism, or communism, of which today's brand is sex-communism or gender-feminism where children are removed from their fathers at 45 times the rate of war.

War has been a huge success.

What happens rapidly in war, happens slowly in peacetime. War has always been the acid-test blueprint for what the next society will become.

According to the medical records on Dr Morell, he suffered from partial paralysis and lost his ability to speak on 17 June 1945. He was formally arrested a month later on 17 July and remanded in the prison at Reichenhall where he shared a cell with Hitler's competent doctor, Karl Brandt. Morell's last words to him were:

"I wish I were somebody else."

With British complicity, Dr Morell was judged too sick to attend the war trials of the 23 other Nazi doctors which began on 15 November 1946. Only the competent doctors were accused. Ironically, it was the competent Dr Brandt who was hanged in 1947 and Morell was allowed to live out his days, although with Hitler's curse.

Dr Morell was "cleared of war crimes" and discharged on 20 June 1947 (Prisoner No. 52,160) and went straight to the local clinic in Munich, where he was treated for arteriosclerosis in the same way that Hitler was – by injection. Within eleven months he was dead.

"There is some evidence that Himmler, the Gestapo chief, Martin Bormann, Hitler's executive officers and the ill-famed Dr Morell conspired in a plot to slowly poison the Führer."[5]

Dr Morell was a self-convinced suspiscionist who did more to destroy Hitler in the last three years of the war than anyone else, or anything else. (See Unlikely Heroes, Appendix 9)

The fat man is an unsung hero. In war, even the delusional have their uses. British agent, Dr Theodor Morell (22 July 1886–26 May 1948):

"Well done, true and faithful servant."

James Bond Revisited

While working as the intelligence officer at Grizedale Hall in 1941 Ian Fleming met a woman raising Herdwick sheep in the Lake District. Her name was Mrs William Heelis who wrote and illustrated The Tale of Peter Rabbit (1900) under her maiden name Beatrix Potter (1866–1943). Fleming promised her he would become a thriller writer and that his books would appeal to children.

[5] Collier's weekly, 4 May 1946.

Ian Fleming was a wartime-only sailor and after the war he became 'the foreign manager of the Sunday Times' (1945–59). However, this was more or less a cover for other operations including his heavy drinking and womanising. He would go through women like there was no tomorow.

In 1952, at the age of 41, Fleming was approached by his bank manager who insisted he write books as his only possible method of paying back his increasing debts. His first book, Casino Royale, appeared in 1953 to good reviews. On 21 October 1954, CBS screened a television version of Casino Royale. The show was quickly forgotten but a James Bond comic strip appeared. In 1960 film producer Harry Saltzman paid Ian Fleming US$50,000 for six months' rights to the Fleming novels.

Sean Connery (32), in the British Royal Navy from 1946–48 (aged 16–18), was cast for the lead role. On 16 January 1962 the filming of Dr. No began. Ian Fleming recommended his author/singer/actor/composer/playwright and witty friend Noel Coward (1899–1973) for the part of Dr. No. Noel Coward was Fleming's homosexual neighbour on the North Shore of Jamaica and had been the lover of the Duke of Kent for 19 years. The written reply came back, "No, no, no".

Rather ironically, two years later, in an act that linked reality, fake reality and illusion, Noel Coward's cook and bodyguard Big Tom Stanford was commissioned to kill one of M's doppelgänger Hitler's (February 1964). This theme was followed up in the trademark James Bond opening shot, using a pinhole camera photographing the inside of a pistol barrel, the person who appears as James Bond is not Sean Connery, but doppelgänger stuntman Bob Simmons.

Looking down the barrel of a gun, it was a stunt man.

Dr. No premiered nine months later on 6 October 1962 in the Pavilion Cinema at London's Picadilly Circus. It was an instant hit. In the spring of 1963 Dr. No also became a smash in America. The initial gross takings of US$20 million was 20 times the US$1 million budget.[6]

In 1963, Ian Fleming sent Chris Creighton, the real James Bond, £20,000 in £5 notes to be shared amongst the survivors of OP JAMES BOND. In those days £20,000 would buy each OP JAMES BOND survivor a house.

[6] John Cork, Inside Dr. No.

"Many of James Bond's experiences have some basis in fact. Facts that Fleming came across while serving as assistant to Britain's Director of Naval Intelligence [Rear-Admiral John Godfrey] during WWII, which he has used to embroider the exciting adventures of secret agent 007, James Bond."[7]

Ian Fleming was a big drinker and James Bond's drink was a medium dry vodka martini with a twist of peeled lemon, shaken, not stirred. The James Bond movies were satires of Fleming's personal and operational experiences in government Black Ops. As in the movies, the British Secret Service was indeed on the eighth floor of a building in Regent's Park, London. In the movie the intelligence company was known as 'Universal Exports'. In real life they have very similar names.

After the war, Major Desmond Morton (M) sent Christopher Creighton to become an actor, training at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art (formerly the Old Vic) where he met Roger Moore who later played James Bond, and made contacts for Creighton to become a movie director with Warner Brothers in Hollywood.

In Hollywood Creighton wrote and produced Murder at 3 am (1952), acted with Noel Coward and Eva Gabor in Nude with Violin, acted in Present Laughter on Broadway (1957) and directed Judgement in Prague (1967) while under cover for NATO. He also acted and directed for television.

Of all the James Bonds, Roger Moore was Creighton's closest lookalike starring in seven films from 1973's Live and Let Die to A View to Kill in 1985. The real James Bond, Christopher Creighton, remained active in secret intelligence work until the early 1980s.

After the war, M continued to give Chris Creighton a bad name, adding "supposed villainy, psychopathic tendencies, gambling, bad debts and bankruptcy to his list of failings". M also encouraged this reputation amongst his father and his stepmother, which saved Creighton's life many times. He was, for undercover reasons, in the RAF as the disaffected pilot, John Davis, turncoat, arch-hater of Britain, and not in the Royal Navy. His name appeared in the Nazi list as an ardent disciple of the Fascist leader Oswald Mosley, which caused him to be disowned by his father and stepmother, who passionately abused the name Chris

Creighton whenever they were questioned. It was full cover.[8]

Laurence Olivier and Ralph Richardson (both ex-Fleet Air Arm Lieutenant-Commanders) and Somerset Maugham (gay) were all active in counter-espionage, some triple agents, and all becoming famous actors. They were rewarded with a life of luxury for their efforts, and good on them.

Spies were often retrained as Shakespearian actors. They are trained into people others want to be and will therefore talk to, spilling the beans. It used to be Shakespearian actors, but now it is televison and movie actors, musicians and DJs.

The British Mitford sisters took their lead from the heads of the British Conservative Party and via them it was the done thing to be pro-Hitler. As a result, Diana Mitford (1910–2003), the most outstanding beauty of her time, met Sir Oswald Mosley in 1931 and married him in Berlin in 1936 at the home of Hitler's propaganda minister, Josef Goebbels, with Hitler attending.

Her sister Unity Walkrie Mitford (1914–48) went to live in Germany and soon met Hitler and slept with him. She attempted suicide in the British Garden outside the Bavarian Interior Ministry on the day Britain declared war on Germany. She was shot in the right temple with a small automatic pistol but survived another eight years as a brain-damaged invalid. Her father was Lord Baron Redesdale (David Mitford, 1878–1958) who had seven daughters, all notable beauties and brought up in isolation on the Cotswald Estates, almost as an experiment.

When Diana Mitford was interviewed recently she was rational and knew what the Nazis were involved in: "Hitler made the trains run on time and it was only afterwards we discovered the cost." She was, however, as shallow as a puddle, but these people too have their place.

The world celebrates simple-mindedness wrapped in beauty and makes them famously so.

Churchill and Stalin

Stalin spoke perfect English and had spent almost four years training in England as a British agent. He could understand innuendo which showed that he had more than one English-speaking trainer.

Stalin later worked very closely with Churchill, using 'C' (Colonel Stewart Graham Menzies, 30 January 1890–29 May 1968) as his intermediary and they had over 1500 meetings. Stalin executed those whom he thought closer to C than him and eventually killed over 20 million people. C was trained at the Sandhurst Military Academy and in the Grenadier Guards.

The chiefs of the British Secret Service were always known as 'C'. "C's job was to direct espionage, sabotage, counter-espionage and much of the political warfare outside the British Empire . . . and to report to the Prime Minister."[9] Despite Winston Churchill and Colonel Stewart Graham Menzies being half-brothers, they did not get on and neither publicly declared who their shared father was. "Despite Churchill's animus for Menzies at this time, Menzies subsequently became Churchill's most important advisor."[10]

Spymaster: "Stalin had a similar relationship with his spook director, Sudopolotov, but treated him more harshly. Due to Stalin's paranoia, Sudopolotov was in and out of prison like a yo-yo. Eventually the prison staff allowed him to wear his uniform in prison and referred to him as 'Comrade, Major General' because they never knew how long he was going to stay."

Churchill warned Stalin of the imminent attack by Germany on the Soviet Air Force on the first day of Germany's invasion of Russia on 22 June 1940, as did Germany's Soviet Ambassador. Strangely Stalin chose to ignore both warnings and Germany wiped out most of Russia's air fleet on the first day.

All three, Churchill, Stalin and Hitler were operating under higher powers, powers that were controlling the war. These were the Freemasons, the Illuminati and the Rothschilds who were funding both sides of the war. They wanted the war to go on for as long as possible and to be as all-encompassing as possible. Profit and depopulation were the goal – even of their own people, the Jews.

Stalin's Intelligence was a mess, a reflection of the bloody chaos within the military. Every spy dreaded any communication from Moscow. No news was good news. Britain's greatest intelligence coup occurred when a spy in Germany was summoned to Moscow over travel expenses. Instead of turning up to Moscow, he walked into a British Embassy and spilled the beans.

Communism had a real appeal in Europe in the 1930s. It was a Utopian dream placed before the masses with the vision of unified wealth. To most, the Industrial Revolution had brought a poverty of work conditions and a loss of quality of life and Communism was to do the same over a third of the planet.

Nothing succeeds like making the same mistake twice.

Churchill made a special visit to see Charlie Chaplin in America in 1929 and then went underground for 10 years from 1929–39 while he planned the war that would serve all sides but cost the populations dearly. Both Churchill and Hitler were Psych-Ops trained. It would be silly to train Hitler without training Churchill. If Churchill wasn't trained, Hitler would have run rings around him. Churchill, Hitler and Stalin were all trained at the British Military Psych-Ops War Schools.

Chaplin Plays the Muse

Four days before Hitler's birth, Charlie Chaplin was born in Lambeth, London, on the 16 April 1889. Hitler (20 April 1889–19 February 1950) and Chaplin (16 April 1889–25 December 1977) had a similiarity to their lives and Chaplin mirrored and mocked Hitler, as any good mime artist should do. Both had questionable grandfathers and were fatherless at young ages (3 for Chaplin and 13 for Hitler). Chaplin was raised in an orphanage from 9 and Hitler lived in dosshouses from 19. Both were trained by comedians and knew that success depended on appealing to the sympathies of their audience. Both had their first loves die on them. Both were romantics, a soft touch, loved women, but couldn't live with them. Both were sexual deviants and raged against monogamy (Chaplin was into young girls and Hitler was a bisexual coprophiliac). Both were immigrants and had mental illness in their families. Both had confusion over their names of origin – Chaplin (née Tbonstein, Bodges and Harley) and Hitler (née Hiedler, Hutter, Schicklgruber). Both were accused of being Jewish.

The Jews often claim successful British-trained agents as having Jewish lineage, and rightly so. Often the agents are created two generations ahead. Hitler lived in Germany for 18 years before he got citizenship and Chaplin lived in America for 42 years and never got citizenship. Both were trained by British Intelligence and used to change the social landscape towards a One World Order.

Like Hitler, who studied under the Munich comedian Weiss Ferdl, Chaplin studied under the British comedian Fred Karno. Fred and Charlie went to Hollywood in September 1910. Hitler used his training for public speaking and Charlie went all the way in acting.

Charlie Chaplin's first play role was as 'Billy' in Sherlock Holmes. In the West he was set up to mock Hitler so the American public wouldn't treat Hitler as a threat. This worked very well with Chaplin adopting his out-turned feet, walking cane, British bowler hat and comical short moustache for his second silent movie The Kid on 6 January 1921, after which Hitler adopted his short moustache, first photographed on 8 November 1923.

Chaplin also made The Gold Rush (June 1925), City Lights (1931), wrote, directed and produced his first political film Modern Times (1936), wrote, directed and produced The Great Dictator (October 1940) based on Hitler, and Churchill's favourite movie, Monsieur Verdoux (1947) in which he takes on the persona of the nearest person or machine, and Limelight (October 1952).

As a result of the visual similarity between Charlie Chaplin and Adolf Hitler, Hitler was constantly in the funny pages, and Chaplin was used to play down the Hitler threat in America. In 1933 "If they had heard of Hitler at all, they probably thought he was just a comical fellow with a loud voice and ridiculous moustache".[11]

Chaplin admired Hitler and Hitler put up with Chaplin, knowing that he smoothed the way for him.

Chaplin had a front as a communist sympathiser, which he accomplished with actor's credit (FBI File No. 100-127090, p. 45/2063). This gave him access to communist connections in America and overseas. Chaplin spied on France, Africa, Germany, Italy, Switzerland and Japan (September 1931–June 1932) and on his return wrote the script for Modern Times based on Hitler. He then visited China and the South Pacific (April–June 1936) before WWII broke out.

Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

Many British agents were in the entertainment field and Charlie Chaplin was a huge success, his acting career far outshining his British Intelligence role. By 1916, at the beginning of his career, he was the highest-paid person in the world at US$10,000 per week, now the equivalent of US$2 million per week.

Hitler was first filmed silently giving speeches and looked ridiculous. He looked very Chaplinesque. The first talking picture (1921) was The Jazz Singer, a movie by Jews about Jews. By 1923 sound made Hitler a powerful film presence and Chaplin considered Hitler one of the greatest actors he had ever seen.

Hitler saw every American film he could. The Lives of a Bengal Lancer with Gary Cooper and Franchot Tone was his favourite and he loved Greta Garbo movies. Like many world leaders, Hitler couldn't tell the difference between a lesbian and a breeder.

The Nazis were convinced Chaplin was a Jew and Chaplin never denied it. Chaplin had the balls to visit Berlin in 1931 and the Nazis loathed his rapturous welcome. Chaplin then visited Venice expecting to meet with Mussolini, but Mussolini took his line from Hitler, banned his films and refused to meet him.

Against a background of aggression and appeasement where Jews were cleaning the pavement with toothbrushes, Chaplin announced (18 October 1938) he was going to make The Great Dictator. Many thought Chaplin was a comic David against a German Goliath. Three weeks later Kristallnacht brought a wave of violence against the Jews (9 November 1938) and on 20 April 1939 Hitler celebrated his 50th birthday with one of the biggest military parades in history.

Chaplin financed The Great Dictator entirely himself and filming began on 9 September 1939 under conditions of strict secrecy. This was six days after WWII broke out in Europe with America not officially joining for another two years.

No sooner had the filming finished than Hitler began his blitzkrieg. France fell in months and Denmark in a matter of hours. Chaplin was so appalled he spent another 111 days filming, changing the final speech, which became a parody of Hitler's latest actions. The same day this speech was filmed, Hitler drove into Paris to view his conquest. When Hitler returned to Berlin, he drove through a carpet of flowers, but it was a doppelgänger Hitler in the parading Mercedes (more portly with a smaller nose) as Hitler was in constant fear of being assassinated.

Chaplin gave his final speech in front of a flag with a double cross, wearing a hat with a double cross, alluding to Hitler and the war being a double cross. Chaplin wanted to premier The Great Dictator in Berlin but the British war-makers said they would ban the movie. After all, Chaplin's dictator was a caricature of their own 'double agent of war'.

Despite what the war-makers wanted The Great Dictator opened on 15 October 1940 in London at the height of the blitzes – almost as an attempt to destroy the movie theatres. It received standing ovations and calls for Chaplin, yet it was banned in Ireland, across Europe and in parts of South America. Roosevelt, who was Jewish but could not admit it, guaranteed its release in America. The Great Dictator was to become Chaplin's biggest moneymaker.

Hitler watched The Great Dictator and then watched it again two days later. Even the German Army saw the film.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

In Belgrade, Yugoslavia, the 17-year-old Nikola Radosevic (now a filmmaker) working in film despatch, discovered a print of The Great Dictator and showed it to the Blue Ribbon, a group which never fired a shot. Their modus operandi was to make fun of the Germans. "We wanted Hitler to hear what Chaplin thought of him."

Nikola Radosevic substituted the German feature the Nazi soldiers were to see for The Great Dictator. "At the start of the show, the people didn't immediately realise what was going on, but after 40 minutes an SS man pulled out his gun and opened fire at the screen. All the others rushed out of the hall. They didn't want to stay any longer because something was against Hitler."

Chaplin was officially written off as a lefty of the far left, when he was, in fact, a non-political British agent who maintained his cover throughout his life. As with Christopher Creighton (James Bond) the cover went deep. On 13 March 1944, the communist newspaper People's World stated: "Charlie Chaplin had been a friend of the Soviet Union since 1917" (FBI File, 47/2063). He was a generous man who helped a lot of people out and said "I am for the little people". He was 1.65 m and 65 kgs, some 5' 5" and 145 lbs.

Charlie Chaplin's brief was to spy on communism in America, feed it back to Britain and to mollify Americans regarding Hitler and communism. He was playing the communists in America. As part of his British Intelligence briefing, Charlie Chaplin spent a week's camping holiday with Clare Sherridan, Winston Churchill's free love cousin.

". . . in September 1946, Chaplin will be subpoenaed before the United States House Committee on UnAmerican Activities where he will be questioned regarding his communist affiliations amid concern of his alleged partnership with a third political party" (FBI file p. 49/2003). That third party was Britain's MI-6 – essentially Winston Churchill, via Clare Sherridan (who had sculptured Lenin and Trotsky) and whatever other contacts Chuchill provided from 1929. After 42 years producing a 2063-page file, the FBI still didn't get it.

Chaplin wouldn't take American citizenship and the FBI were so desperate to get him, they considered charging him with purchasing too much cheese – more than the war rations would allow for one household. How cheesy is that? "Mr Charles Spencer Chaplin, you will receive the maximum penalty for the excessive consumption of war-rationed cheese. You are hereby sentenced to sit next to people who talk in talkies."

Chaplin had a weakness for young girls. His first two wives were 16 and his last was 18. Others look for such traits as it makes the agent controllable on threat of reputation alone. Both sides of this coin were a common trait in British agents and Chaplin was available for blackmail right throughout his career. Those blackmailed will usually even cover their own expenses in exchange for return cover. In exchange, Chaplin gave a respectable face to child-sex in Hollywood, was a British agent and was never charged.

At 59 Charlie Chaplin had an 18-year-old wife and a 21-year-old girlfriend, and went some way in inspiring Hugh Hefner's Playboy enterprise. As is typical of British agents into underaged girls, he was knighted as Sir Charles Spencer Chaplin in 1975, aged 86. This would have placed his last act of child-sex 18 years earlier in 1957, aged 68, while living in Switzerland with his most troublesome daughter Geraldine (b. 31 July 1944), just 13 years old at the time. It is typical of a child who sees or senses her father with another young girl to have attention tantrums, for which Geraldine was renowned.

Espaço 5020 - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

Chaplin died on Christmas Day 1977, aged 88, having married three times (a fourth marriage was a Mexican farce to keep her relatives happy), with 10 surviving children from two marriages between May 1925 and July 1962. Charlie sired his last child, Christopher Chaplin (b. 6 July 1962) at the much-celebrated age of 72. His wives were Mildred Harris, 16 (15 when they met), Lita Grey, 16 (whom he married on his boat, the Panacea within two weeks of meeting her), and Oona O'Neill, 18.

Politically, Sir Charles Spencer Chaplin was very well informed, enough to take politics lightly.

> "I have no political views. I'm a comedian, not a politician . . .
> I don't want radical change, I want evolutionary change . . .
> I don't want spy censorship . . . I'm against dictatorship . . .
> I'm against everything . . . I believe the purpose of language > is to conceal ideas rather than convey ideas."

He never revealed to anyone he was a British agent and he never told anyone when Hitler died, except through his artform.

As soon as Chaplin got word of Hitler's death at the end of February 1950, he wrote Limelight, started shooting in 1951, editing in spring 1952, with the first screening in London on 23 October 1952. It is the story of a fading clown who helps a paralysed dancer regain the use of their legs and achieve great fame. After the screening, Chaplin moved to Switzerland. Chaplin was connected to Hitler via British Intelligence and Limelight was his last movie. He was 63 at the time, and like Hitler, the most famous actor the world has ever known.

In the 1990s Charlie Chaplin was voted the greatest actor in movie history. Chaplin remains the second most famous person in the world. The first is Hitler. In the end, comedy is the most powerful tool for war.

> Chaplin: "Courage doesn't do it, Laughs do. Please parody > me wherever you can" – It's The Fool who owns history.

For Hitler to be referred to later as 'the German Gardener', his death in 1945 had to have been faked. This was drawn on by Peter Sellers (born Richard Henry Sellers, 8 September 1925–24 July 1980). Sellers was a stand-up comic, impressionsist, one of the original Goons from 1951 and a humorous chocolate soldier of the Secret Service with all the correct contacts, career, and support. He was also a Freemason and Freemasons placed a lot of value in having the wars they've created put in a humorous context.

Peter Sellers played the role of Chancey Gardener (also known as 'Mr Chance', 'Chance the Gardener', and 'Chance') in the movie Being There (1979), as in 'YOU HAD TO BE THERE'. The gardener portrayed by Peter Sellers was a simpleton who became famous for repeating lines others attach esoteric meanings to. This parodied Hitler's early years, Mein Kampf, the repetition in his speeches, and the conversation the IRA billet (Father Ryan) had with Adolf Hitler over the roses.

Being There has many parodies of Hitler from 1945 to his death in 1950. His love interest is named Eve (Eva Braun) and even the voice-overs from the TV are pertinent. One of the most profound parodies is that the most malleable people, with the most hidden history, become the rulers of their countries.

At that time photocopiers were a rare thing and copies were cyclostyled with the print quality particularly bad. It may have been that Peter Sellers mistook the 80-year rule for a 30-year rule and this oversight killed him.

The movie was first screened on 19 December 1979 and Peter Sellers received an Oscar nomination for best actor in 1980. Spymaster: "His other reward was a pre-emptive death by heart attack brought about by an overdose of digitalis disguised in a dish containing apples – a favourite method used by British Intelligence."

Espayo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org 7 March 2013

Peter (Richard Henry) Sellers (54) died on 24 July 1980, seven months after Being There was first screened. His life was then misportrayed in The Life and Death of Peter Sellers (2005) which showed him to be a miserable son of a bitch. Using misery to show a comedian's life is cheap pop-psychology designed to write off any importance Seller's had. To a degree it worked.

Being There was written in 1971 by Jerzy Kosinski (1933–91), a political scientist. He grew up in Lodz, Poland and studied political science at Lodz University where he taught from 1955–57, after which he emigrated to America and pursued an academic career, writing four books. The Painted Bird (1965) is a classic of holocaust literature. Although the numbers are up for debate, the ongoing emotionalism around Jewish deaths, rather than the more prolific Russian deaths, continues – 6 million Jews versus 26 million Russians.

A common theme to Kosinski's books are characters who machinate to make the most of their situation, similar to Chaplin's Modern Times.

This is the vacuum we live in today.
That vacuum can at least, in part, be filled with an anotomically accurate historical correction.

Peace kills and immortalises a few.
War kills millions and they are remembered, for the most part, as unknown soldiers of inaccurate statistics.

War traps surviving generations into a refusal to accept that their war was tried and executed with a predetermined plan of chaos, followed by order (peace) and then chaos (war) again,
so that each generation always experiences a war (chaos), and boundaries are forever shifted,
until finally,
all that we have that is human,
is lost.

Perhaps war is the fifth element:
Earth, Air, Fire, Water & War.
Perhaps humans are dependent on war as one of their elements.

Espavo Soro treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

World wars do have a habit of not occurring in places of active volcanoes and earthquakes, but in places of storms and harvests, where traditions and cultures create freedom worth dying for.

Perhaps humanity is just another clay on the world stage, and the world stage,
for all its players,
is there to be moulded.

Blessed are the war-makers, for the heroes are all dead.

Afterword

Counter Intelligence

I knew that from 11 May, in the six months leading up to 1–11 November 2005, I would be able to talk and allowed to communicate. Suffering from media shyness dating several years back, I never knew how this was going to happen. The date is partly due to the 60th anniversary of the end of WWII, partly because the Black-Opps peace agreement was developed 12 years earlier and had an 11½-year silence, and partly due to the media having come some way to catching up.

On 11 May 2005, it was also released that investors were claiming back US$8 billion for dishonoured bonds (off Germany) for their financing of Hitler. The British banks had funded Hitler and hadn't asked for the money back.[1] They probably thought it was money well spent. Things regarding Hitler's history were hotting up.

I had been renovating my house down the line and had tools in the truck (4WD, 5 m long), along with a pair of $400 sunglasses, a $5 note, and a disk containing all ten books to date. I intended to lodge the disk in the painting shed but ran out of steam at the end of the day, so the disk remained in the glovebox.

The Spymaster came around at 1 pm on Wednesday 11 May 2005 and he had lost the paper 'Gifting the United Nations to Stalin' from Volume III. We searched through his car but couldn't find it. It was then that I noticed that my truck had been entered. After completing the search we went back to the house. At 1.11 pm (11.05.2005) it was confirmed that the disk containing a copy of all books had been taken and nothing else (apart from the sunglasses).

The driver's seat had been slid and tilted forward, something that only a large person would need to do. The glovebox was left open, as was the central console. The spare set of keys for the car was not taken and $1000 worth of tooling was also left in place. It looked like a professional job and there was no sign of forced entry. It looked like a fast job by a large person, with the sunglasses taken for cover.

The sunglasses or DNA off them could easily be used for planting at a crime scene using DNA replication lice, the same lice that changed the DNA structure of migratory Polynesians to Maoris during their migrations from the Pacific Islands to New Zealand. This is nature's way of adapting to the new environment. It was discovered by a brother-and-sister team at Massey University in Palmerston North. One hopes that publication is still protection.

On the Monday prior, a friend had come around and we chatted for four hours. He gave me the lead for the 'Missing History' story (Volume III). When we went out onto the footpath we saw a new black Audi 4WD a spotter's distance away.

The driver was at the bonnet and as soon as he saw us, he got back into the driver's seat. He was huge, about 6'4", 18 stone of muscle, dark brown hair, slightly balding (35). His partner was a similar description. The front bumper and indicator of the black Audi were removed. Most importantly, it had easily borrowed temporary yellow dealer plates.

They had been there for a while. When we got to the pavement, they took off, not noticing us, even though we looked at them quite intently, but in a way that anyone else would acknowledge us. It was after all, a domestic street and a reasonably friendly neighbourhood. They were really trying not to see us.

Without prompting, my very experienced friend said, "That's weird."

I replied, "That'll be the SAS. They're interested in all of my visitors, all of my movements, anything I say or write and whoever I contact. Part of it is to isolate me from anyone I ever knew. It's all part of boiler plating [harassment]."

My house is thoroughly bugged. My car has a military tracking device on it and the SIS paid for the re-piling of the house next door in exchange for using it as a bugging station, reading off my computer screen, logging keystrokes, that sort of thing. Thus, everything that is said in my house goes straight to Intelligence and I use it as such. Because of this, Army Intelligence refuses to visit and I always have to meet them at 'the place'.

On 28 March 2005 the Spymaster had come around with the Knowledge Carrier, a black woman in her early twenties who did not know her country of origin or her birth parents, yet the information she provided was beyond both of us and the detail and breadth of her knowledge was such that we were both gobsmacked, continually. That takes a lot of doing.

She provided a different perspective. It was a history from the black person's point of view. I told her I was a mulatto short of a quadroon and she said it didn't matter. I wasn't black.[2]

I had managed to gather some psychological training in my travels, and after our third meeting I told the Spymaster, KC was working for MI-6, had been downloaded with information and was gathering a hit list to keep history suppressed and this would be released through scopolamine.

On the Monday (9 May 2005), I was travelling down the line to fit some hardware to my front door (knocker and lock). It took me five hours and I qualify as the world's slowest builder. My shingle should read, 'Sloth Builders, $6/hour'. On the way down, the Knowledge Carrier rang and left a message for the Spymaster who was also down the line. Previously I was in a naturally ecstatic mood, but became grumpy immediately after her call. Not only is the KC demanding, but it occurred to me that I was about to get robbed as both the Spymaster and myself were away. When I got back Monday night, I was surprised to find that nothing was stolen. That's not to say it wasn't copied.

The following day I went to both of my cars on the street. I noticed that a white van with red markings was at the house next door. The guy had a look in my direction. I was his 'mark'. He was SIS tech support. In exchange for tapping my place, the house next door had its garage foundations re-piled four months after I moved in. Again I thought things were hotting up.

The next day, after the Spymaster came round and we had established that one of my papers from Volume III was missing from his car and the 10-volume history had been stolen from my truck, I asked him who he thought had done it.

"Well it could have been thieves because they're lazy and don't steal tools. Those guys in the black Audi 4WD were SAS. It was most likely school kids. They'd steal sunglasses and a CD. They'll probably write over the CD. Don't worry about it."

[2] A mulatto is a tawny-coloured mixed race person, named after a mule. A quadroon is their offspring. A 'mulatto short of a quadroon' is the next generation after this. You can trace your black race, but you don't look the part. No handouts for me.

This is a common attitude amongst Intelligence – 'Don't worry about things you can't change.'

I said, "It's not rewriteable. They may try it as a new history with their teachers and we'll see what happens to them. What happens to them would happen to us if we published under our own name. I knew the leaking would start on 11 May 2005. Still, it's a good buffer for us. Someone else gets the initial blame . . . I rang JBIII today."

Spymaster: "An Intelligence Officer is all over him at the moment. He's trying to get any and all information he can out of him, including his contacts."

"Is he from Australia?"

Spymaster: "Yes."

"So is the Knowledge Carrier. I want all reading done here now. Try and lose her for two weeks. I don't trust her, the other girl, or the drunk. He'd give away any and all information for a peck on the cheek from either of those two."

Spymaster: "That's true."

"Don't bring any of them around. It's almost finished and we're changing history. I want all the reading done here . . . It's important now. We can't afford to fuck it up at this stage."

A week prior KC was around here claiming that her surrogate father was the James Bond of the Pacific. She certainly carries the knowledge of someone whose sat around briefing tables from a very young age. She had complained to the Spymaster of symptoms that matched scopolamine and freely rings American Intelligence, Echelon and detective constables, calling them by their surnames and in a demanding tone. What's most surprising is that she has all their phone numbers.

In private, I suggested to the Spymaster that she had been drugged, briefed with all the New Zealand cons ASIS knew of, and told to spread them around in order to draw out those able to acknowledge and correct them. She would then be put under scopolamine again to draw out the information she'd gathered in New Zealand.

"Spymaster: "She certainly told the police who killed who in infinite detail. They were completely taken aback."

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Some of the ASIS stories on New Zealand were wrong and some of them were deliberately wrong to fish for those with the information . . . but my biggest worry was with the Mossad who now control Australasian Intelligence. Tasmania is targeted as the new Israel and New Zealand as their holiday home, slave colony, information mine and gateway to Antarctica with all its shenanigans.

But then New Zealand is a listening post with the highest rate of retired and swished spies. If you listen in New Zealand, you find out more than anywhere else.

"I won't ring JBIII."

Spymaster: "See ya."

4.45 pm, 11 May 2005: I get into my car and drive it three metres and then repark it. I get out and walk to the shops with my mobile phone in my pocket. My mobile has been tracked and tapped for the past three years, part of the discredited Operation Leaf – discredited by the Prime Minister/Minister of Security and Intelligence who was doing the bugging. Through my phones they listen to everything I say.

Shopkeeper: "How are you?"

"I'm fine, but I've just been robbed. My car's just been robbed. Nothing was taken except a disk with 10 volumes of books on it – three years' work."

Shopkeeper: "What are you going to do?"

"I dunno. Probably lodge an affidavit with the High Court, registering the thefts and what the titles were."

Shopkeeper: "Can't you go to the police?"

"The police were behind it. They operate thieves in 90% of all crimes, all thefts."

Shopkeeper: "Nooo."

"Yes."

Shopkeeper: "What are you going to do now?"

"I'll probably lodge all the information with the High Court and let them deal with it."[3]

I returned at 5.15 pm, open the truck driver's door, removed the drink bottle, threw a box in the back and looked in the pouch behind the driver's seat. The disk was there, returned.

[3] The shopkeeper and his family emigrated to England soon after this was published.

It was the big SAS guy driving the black 4WD Audi import. That would explain the seat slid and tilted forward, no tools taken, the disk missing and then returned once my Merc had moved, my mobile phone was on walkabout and my conversation with the shopkeeper.

The SIS bugged and sabotaged my car from 26 March 2002 and changed this to a military device on the night of 13/14 August 2003. As soon as I moved the car, they knew they had a window of opportunity to return the disk to the truck. There was a spare key in the car and they took a soap impression and then had a copy made.

This was actually done 18 months prior. I changed my house keys but that was pointless. There was a period where break-ins to my house occurred two and three times a week. The front door was either left ajar, or with the keys in the outside of the door. This was boiler plating, designed to intimidate, saying 'my life was theirs' and they could terminate it whenever they felt like it. The reason I survived was that they really wanted to read the finished product . . . combinations of people who can write such books are few and far between.

It was just a normal day. It was a good day's fishing for them and I've had three good years fishing for information they stole off me. There's probably some mutual respect thing happening. It could act for or against me, but . . . 'I can't do anything about the things I can't change'. Tomorrow, if I'm still amongst the living, I'll have forgotten what yesterday began. The times they are a-changing . . . I wish someone would come and push back the clock for me . . . But I'm already there in my mind and it's good enough for now.[4]

Friday 13 May 2005: My immediate neighbour on the other side has his power connection to the house repaired. Connections here are a classic surveillance technique. I spoke to the electrician, but he failed to give me any information and refused to look at me.

Saturday 14 May 2005: The Spymaster had come around at 9.30 pm to baby-sit for me. This was the first and only time he did it, but it gives me a great sense of kudos to say the Spymaster was my babysitter. My child should be able to dine out on that for a few years, but still, it's service that brings results and results bring status.

That night, the Spymaster told me of a conversation he had with the Knowledge Carrier the night before.

Espavo S020 - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Spymaster: "You're working for MI-6. If you're going to kill me, kill me. Get it over and done with. I've lived my life and I've done everything I wanted to do."

Knowledge Carrier: "I promise to take care of your kids."

Now this may not seem like an actual conversation, but it is the gist of the conversation without all the ums and ahs. She had an accent that came from everywhere. It was Irish, Trinidadian, Australian and Fijian. She came with no confirmed history, could not identify her biological family and was the Spymaster's honey-trap, designed perfectly for him. She was the only person I've ever met who could keep up with his knowledge of history and intricate detail of events suppressed.

I had already established she had spent time in a mental hospital in Melbourne, Australia on the way here (Callan Park). This is standard practise to be referred to later for writing off the person as of no consequence and as cover if any charges were laid.

> New Zealand is the spies' holiday and retirement home. In New Zealand it is not illegal for a woman to kill her male partner, as long as she is dark brown, lesbian, lesbians are attracted to her, or she has a history of mental illness. The KC has 3 out of 4 of these attributes. New Zealand's legalising of 'female murders male' came under the KGB operative Prime Minister Helen Clark, a renowned feminist and lesbian herself.[5]

Sunday 15 May 2005: At 6.45 pm (dark), a 1.8 m (5'11") tall black man walks over to my stairs, then turns back, opens the gate to the house above and tries a key in the front door. The woman inside looks out and then calls me. The key he had was for my house and made from soap impressions taken when my truck was broken into (mailbox key included). It didn't fit her lock. He left, waving at the women behind the door – a typically relaxed protected non-traceable operative (NTO).

I thought about what to do if the NTO (black guy) came to my door. I'd leave the curtains drawn and take a leaf from James Bond III's hit on [5] This law was tested in Whangarei in 2002 when a female Maori rugby player stabbed her husband and father of her two children to death in front of her mother in her own kitchen during a party. She didn't lose custody of her children for a minute and wasn't even convicted of manslaughter. This set in concrete the New Zealand judiciary as an 'occult mafia'.

Adolf Hitler in February 1964: "Are you the shooter? . . . The job's done. Tell them you did it and take the money." The black NTO was later revealed to be a Rhodesian NTO known to New Zealand Intelligence.

I wanted to change my door lock barrel first thing, but was going fishing the next day so I decided to leave the front door deadlocked so the key wouldn't work. I went out the back door and took the large key with me, of which there are only 12 variations. I also left my phone behind, turned off, so if they rang, it would go straight to message . . . and I left the radio on. Such was my security.

The Spymaster has been around every day reading and adding last-minute stories. Various intelligence communities from various suppressive governments want the finished product. My fear was they would add a virus to my non-net-connected computer. I copied this 'Afterword' and left it on the dining table, at the front of the manuscript, and on the keyboard, I copied all of the work to date and gave it to my fishing buddy's friend to stick in his mattress, delivered another copy to the Godfather, then put this sign on the front door, emulating James Bond III:

Job done.
Tell them you did it.
Take the money . . .

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

I got back after fishing, the sign was still on the inside of my door and there had been no break-in. It's no wonder, the large back door key was incredibly hard to fit, something to do with rusty locks. The Spymaster came around the next day at 11 am and told me what happened to him the previous night.

The Knowledge Carrier told him she wanted to start seeing a South African guy (white) and the Spymaster said, "Fine, Go."

KC: "You're not jealous or angry?"

Spymaster: "No, just go. Do what you want to do."

It's curious that the key had been stolen (SAS), a black Rhodesian NTO had tried to get into the house above using my key and the Knowledge Carrier had started seeing a white South African – all within the same week.

The Spymaster came around to my place the next day (17 May 2005) and did some editorial work and confirmed the KC was MI-6. The KC then came around uninvited. I remained in my office and changed from being a nice guy to saying: "Get rid of her. Don't let her in." She hears this, sees the sign "Job done. Tell them you did it. Take the money . . ." – but doesn't see me.

The next day two ex-British MI-6 officers (white, in their 30s) phone up requesting false names: 2.19 pm, "Is Gary there"; 2.31 pm, "Is Ben there". I haven't added question marks, because they weren't asked as questions. They were actually recording and comparing voice recognition (Echelon) to see if I had been replaced by a doppelgänger. I mentioned this to the Spymaster and gave a description of the people from their voices. He was worried very worried and said, "They are MI-6". He suggests I take the book to the editor early.

James Bond III was equally worried.

Thursday (19 May 2005), the Spymaster came around and confirmed my worst fears. The KC is not even the stepdaughter of the man she claims to be her father – the James Bond of the Pacific. "He is her controller and we already know him to be an evil S.O.B. having caused many coups, even ensuring that some fail." I tell the Spymaster that she's here to clear out any intelligence rings. It's her job to confirm the 'Marks' for the killers.

Just as I was finishing (20 May 2005) my printer broke down two-thirds of the way through the final print job. The paper tray had jammed half in. I took it to the dealer and it was like nothing they had ever seen before. I got a brand-new printer, straight out of the box and that failed on a technical matter, twice, which meant that my CPU had been fiddled with and I lost hours. They never asked for the loan printer back.

While I was out I got a call from my sub-landlord that builders would be around tomorrow doing an unspecified job. Now that both neighbours were bugged, they were moving in for the kill. I took my computer in and insisted repeatedly that they not put it online to download any printing programs. Three unknowns turned up, but double jeopardy, my computer had been at the dealers or was in the car. One of the builders knew the entire family of my closest relatives. This helped with their rapport-building.

The Spymaster came around (28 May 2005) and told me he had taken the KC to ONI (Office of Naval Intelligence) for an IQ test and confirmed everything I had said. She had an IQ of 95 – low enough to know you're not getting it, but bright enough to keep asking questions (annoying). The fantastic amount and detail of historical information she had, had been dumped into her subconscious via MK-Ultra.

The Spymaster suggested, "She was the illegitimate daughter of someone famous". Yeah, with a maid.

A friend popped by to make it a proper treff and slipped something out that solved a case the Spymaster had been working on for three years . . . something about a judge wearing nappies during filmed S&M.

On 2 June 2005, the Spymaster confirmed more information, that her father (illegitimate) was a seriously high-ranking British MI-6 officer. All these events just confirm my suspicions aired two months earlier. It was a severe case of bottulism all round.

After I had given the book to the editor and had mentioned, in my very bugged home, that it was at the editor's, the driver's licence and credit card stolen six months earlier were returned (9 June). Then, on 11 June, my other credit cards were stolen.

On 13 June it was known that I was going charter fishing. When I got into my car, the minor electrics had failed – radio, CD, rear window. This is all part of boiler plating. The message was: "Are you sure you even know how to tie your own shoelaces?"

When I got home early, the Spymaster rang just as I was putting two and two together. The Spymaster had been grievously assaulted in the previous three weeks. Eleven days later the assailant killed for the second time – this time his father (40), but because he was a minor, he would be let off to kill again. He's tough, the old Spymaster. When he rang me after the assault, he didn't even mention it, but you wouldn't believe how much I laughed when I saw the nasal strapping. He mentioned that the 18 year-old double murderer was being groomed as a government hit man. As it turned out he killed again (for a third time) six weeks later.

I've been working on ten books and took one book to my editor on 2 June 2005. The day before, mail was sent and I was being sued by a school buddy of the Prime Minister, a person who owed me money. It was obvious from their search that they received a lot of inside help, even discounting that their timing was perfect. The hearing for their case ended up at the same time and day as another hearing of mine. Each time I raised the sexuality of the Prime Minister (lesbian married to a homosexual child-sex abuser), the case was interfered with, postponed and I was charged. Rather than receive the amount due I was ordered to pay the amount due.

Interference or coincidence? What are the chances of that? It's corruption and sexual collusion in the Courts.

So far three Courts have failed to sight my evidence and keep delaying me into higher Courts. There are changes being made in the Courts, but they are all to do with cosmetics, like delays.

The real question Western world citizens need to ask is:
'To what degree are our Courts an occult mafia?'

While writing these books, including the constant thefts out of my home, car, bank account and insurance, I've experienced at least 50 incidents, over half of which were criminal attacks by the police or courts, including three lawyers through my architecture practise.

> The legal system is primarily an occult mafia, but it is also a history mafia when challenged. The legal system is based on the current version of social history. As such, the Courts believe it is their right for others not to know right, and their version of false history is the only version that should be known. The truth hurts and it seems that I have taken many of the hits.

Mother rang me shortly after the London Underground bombings (7 July 2005, with '777' signature as the Bible definition of evil) and invited me to lunch. Mother talks away and then slips something in. "You know, no one believes in your conspiracy theories." I hadn't given him any information. He had obviously read off the disk the SAS stole on 11 May. At the end of the day, Mother's allegiances are towards the status quo. Information is not there to rock the boat, but to keep it on edge, levelled by the next report.

On Wednesday 13 July 2005 I rang the Godfather to make an appointment to see how his reading was going and arranged an appointment for Saturday morning 16 July. On Friday 15 July I lodged a High Court appeal against the Prime Minister's school buddy who had employed me with fraudulent documents on 24 May 2004. This was two days after I had ended eight days of Mossad reconnaissance (16–22 May 2004) with a debriefing on their previous murder of the government historian, Michael King, on 29 March 2004 by ipecac and impact explosive on the petrol tank.

The Mossad were quite annoyed to have been discovered, but quite pleased to find someone to talk to. It was 4 February 2006 before they invited me to a meeting and even the Spymaster rang prompting me to be on time.[6] They queried me on space. I found what they had to offer, dull, and the report came back, "He's highly intelligent". I would have been happy with "He's quite bright" . . . M had told me my work on space was shit.

On Saturday 16 July 2005 I drove the truck to the Godfather and on my return the Mercedes rear right quarterglass had been smashed. I spoke to the neighbour and established that it had occurred between midnight and 8.30 am on 16 July 2005. Inside nothing had been stolen, not the money or the CD player, but the rear interior light (video & sound) had been pulled apart, the front overhead seatbelt light had been pushed in (video & sound), as had the passenger's electronic seat adjuster (receiver) and the passenger lock cover on the door as it meets the frame had been removed (receiving signals, tracking & sending). All the parts were there as were the tools for the job – a 14 cm black slot-head screwdriver and its 12 cm Phillips adaptor. The Phillips adaptor was used to pinch the quarter light and break the glass. The slot-head was used to pinch off the light and seat control covers and it was this one that was in the black handle when they scarpered.

I later found out they had left the tools behind to illustrate their confidence in the system not to catch them and a slow leak in my rear left tyre as a little indicator that this was also boiler plating, just for the hassle of it all. The fingerprint department isn't open until Monday and fingerprints only last three days, or so I thought. Given low priority, there was no chance, or so I thought.

The SAS had obviously read at least some of the ten books on disk they had stolen two months prior (including much of this one), saw the mention of the SIS planting tracking devices in my Merc (26 March 2002, 13/14 August 2004, 16 July 2005), and had them removed.

[6] This was two years to the day that I had returned with this info. What are the chances.

It also confirmed my suspicions about Mother, that they did believe what I had written and gave it enough credibility to try and remove evidence of their part in it, first by saying no one believed what I was saying and second by removing the tracking devices. Ironically Mother had popped in for a social call 18 hours before the car was broken into and spoke directly to the SIS, framed as a question, "I don't understand why the police employed Graeme Capill as crown prosecutor when they knew he was a paedophile 21 months before he was charged?"

At 5 pm I drove the Merc to my regular takeaways/restaurant where I always purchase on credit card and by chance, inside was an SAS man. They stand out like dog's balls – well built, late twenties, black receding hair, wearing a black polo neck and having to concentrate on having a civilian dinner with another couple as opposed to eating out of a tin can. As I walked in I noticed him checking out the rear light dangling inside the Merc and then checking me out. Initially I thought his stare was a bit camp but it seemed to have a certain admiration attached to it.

About three hours later the Spymaster popped in and I mentioned the break-in. He asked to see the tools the SAS had left behind. Looking at them he said, "It was a semi-professional job . . . at least we now know you're not paranoid, but others will still need some convincing."

We got to talking and he explained how few people still active had his experience. We established that the SAS and the SIS did have this information and then so did the Prime Minister. Then I mentioned that this SAS guy in the restaurant was actually looking at me with some admiration, kind of looking up to me like a student to a teacher. The Spymaster didn't say anything, but word will get to him soon enough. If he starts being treated with more respect then we know we've hit the believability button at the coalface.

A month later the SAS approached him and said, "You know we didn't used to believe you, but now everything you've been saying has come true, well most of it."

On Sunday I met the Spymaster again and he confirmed that international investigations had confirmed everything we had said in this and the other nine books and a summarised version was about to be published in magazine form prior to the election. These people are the old boys of an organisation so powerful they have access to all information currently available, unavailable, suppressed and stolen.

I queried whether they had accessed information stolen by the SIS and whether it had muddied the waters, but there were still things we had solved that they weren't aware of – bigger than God and clearer than the wide blue sea – it came out soon after.

On Monday 18 July 2005 I drove to the police station and filled in the 'Offence Report'. Senior fingerprinting officer Struan Ferguson was serving someone next to me and took an interest in my case. He took fingerprints off the screwdriver and came down to the car. He saw the rear interior rear light dangling, the safety belt light pushed in and the electronic seat adjustor with its covers off.

Struan Ferguson: "I've never seen anything like it." He also said fingerprints lasted longer than three days.

I told him I thought the SIS had done the job and he replied, "SIS fingerprints would not be on our database."

Welcome to the world of NTOs – Non-Traceable Operatives.

I had long suspected the Prime Minister's school buddies of being NTOs. When I first tried to get money out of them through the District Court, my Merc was scratched the same night, the hood ornament was wrenched out and the driver's window was pushed down, but nothing was stolen. The same thing happened this time when I lodged in the High Court and again before the night was out.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

I showed the car to Mother. He said, "The Prime Minister's people have done it. They're on to you . . . You're too friendly. Too many people know you linked the Prime Minister to Vladimir Putin." But I never told him that.

Mother's read it and Mum's the word. So what am I, just an interested recorder of events, an active historian caught up in the politics of the Cold War as the New World Order emerges? A week later the "Police Complaint Acknowlegement Form" came through the post, "File Ref: No. 050722/5468".

I lost a High Court Appeal of the same case to a feminist judge on 28 July 2005, got into my truck and parked outside the bank in Mt Eden village. There was a driveway in front of the parking space, so parking was easy and a few cars passed me before I'd finished parking. A $150,000 Black CL500 Mercedes coup (CAW834) then stopped the traffic for 45 seconds and parked in the middle lane of the main road right next to me. A large fit 58-year-old male in dark sunglasses got out of this car and started yelling and gestating in high anger, "Fuck you, fuck you . . . I fucked your wife."

It looked like he was coming for me so I locked my doors, wound up my windows, closed my sunroof and then wound down my driver's window a few inches to, "I fucked your wife".

I said, "I don't have a wife".

He appeared to be on methamphetamine. With three witness names gathered, I filed a complaint "File Ref: No. 050728/2968" and later asked the police for his address so I could send him a get well card.

They said they wouldn't have a case officer for two months. Sometimes people do contract boiler plating for the government (police and intelligence) in exchange for not being charged for other crimes ranging from drug use and drug dealing to murder.

At 5.25 pm on 11 August 2005, police officer Graeme Bruges phoned and said he was working on the case, that the other witnesses had agreed with my statement and they had been to the listed address of the driver, but he had moved, and according to his record, he probably was on P.

No kidding.

Officer Bruges then said, "I'm going on holiday for two weeks, and when I come back I'll try and locate him."

Straight after the High Court appeal against government NTO's, driving a flash car with a history of road rage, on P, moving house, no forwarding address and the policeman on holiday . . . this was perfect NTO material. It'll be at least four weeks before they locate him. I wouldn't be surprised if he's overseas already, or if pressured, catches the trans-Tasman Seatow to freedom.

On 30 August Constable Graeme Bruges invited me to give a statement. I went into the station and it was all very cordial. He noted that it was strange that a person driving a $150,000 car should be living in a rental state house in a bad area. He said he would arrest him and the hearing would be in a year or so.

The next morning the Spymaster asked me which station I had been to and then told me that the driver of CAW834 was protected.

Authors work for years without pay and I had been after a loan on my rental house. After six weeks of haranguing it finally came through the same day.

Three hours later I got a fax from the High Court requesting payment for the defendants lawyers fees stating that my case had been abandoned . . . 18 days before the election. The case was not due to be abandoned until 1 October, 14 days after the election.

Both the Disputes Tribunal judge and the High Court judge were lesbians and the District Court judge had been very cordial to me on one case and had jumped so far down my throat on this case I was still pulling his shoe-laces out of my throat a month later.

I had two separate cases scheduled for exactly the same time and day to be heard by the same judge who acted completely differently on the two cases. What are the chances of that? Judges are influenced by politicians, especially when that politican has had their hit thwarted.

Within minutes the Spymaster contacted me and said: "You'll never believe this. Westfield property bought the Twin Towers two months before 9-11. Westfield is a front for the Mossad who bought it for Silverstein Properties – the Mossad. There was a clause in the purchase that they didn't have to do any maintenance in case of terrorism . . . The building was insured."

The Mossad purchased the Twin Towers in July 2001 when they required extensive maintenance and were near the end of their life. The buildings were attacked in an act of terrorism, the government cleaned up the mess, the insurance companies paid out, everyone else's premiums went up worldwide, and Silverstein Properties ended up with a freehold empty section and enough money to build again from scratch. Nice little stitch-up. Problem is, it changed the face of the world.

Things were hotting up. The KGB operative Prime Minister was under attack and erroneously thinks I'm involved. Who, me? I'm just a struggling architect who was the first to expose her. On 25 March 2002 I mentioned she was a KGB operative on radio. There was an attempt on my life on 2 April 2002, I put my comments to print on 11 April and the early election was leaked on 15 April 2002.

> "Hitler continues to pose a dreadful problem . . . If we don't get Hitler right, the critics insist, we might not recognise the next Hitler."[7]

[7] Sunday Star-Times, 15 May 2005, C2.

Hitler is everywhere now. There are parts of him in every leader in the world. Governments are occult organisations dedicated to the destruction of their citizens' lives by whatever means is most profitable. We live in a Mafia State. You do in your country too.

New Zealand is ruled by a mafia of paedophiles.

What we are witnessing is the transfer of control from national governments to the Shadow World Government and from there to the One World Order where heterosexual male individuality is treated with the utmost suspicion – as virtual treason.

Patriotism is now treasonous.
All that defined yesterday's heroes is now under attack.

Regarding the 11 May 2005 truck break-in, when I filled in the complaint form the Spymaster advised me to say that it was the SIS and Israeli's who did it. In the computer disk stolen and returned the same day, I had mentioned that Hitler was a British agent and was trained at Tavistock, but reference to this was the least concrete part of the book.

The Israeli's answered all my prayers. They confirmed Hitler's Tavistock training eight weeks later on 7 July 2005 with their signature hit on Tavistock Square. In Golden Dawn coven/Freemason language 07.07.2005 is 007[7] or '007 on the square', in direct reference to James Bond and Ian Fleming's escort of Hitler out of Germany at 1700 hours on 007.1945 – '007 squared'.

Tavistock Square is part of an estate owned by the Dukes of Bedford and takes its name from the courtesy title given to the eldest male in the line of the Duke of Bedford – 'Lord Tavistock' – with the younger males styled 'Marquess of Tavistock'.

The Lord Tavistock's had not been having a good run of it lately. The 13th Duke of Bedford had organised an open-air concert headed by Neil Diamond in 1977 attended by 56,000 people (56 people died in the London bombings). This Lord Tavistock died on 25.10.2002.[8] Two years later in October 2004 MI-5 labelled WWII's Duke of Bedford "a Nazi sympathiser".

His son, the 14th Duke of Bedford died eight months later, aged 63, on 13.06.2003. The 15th Duke of Bedford was born on 30.03.1962 and had just had a son, the 16th Duke of Bedford, born on 07.06.2005, exactly 30 days prior to the bombings. He is the Marquees of Tavistock and when his father dies, he will be the new Lord Tavistock.

[8] The 13th Duke of Bedford's estate included a safari park. The author had dinner at his Woburn Abbey in 1989 and it was here that he found out just how unpopular thinking was with the British.

Bus No. 30 was driven off its route into Tavistock Square and blown up. It was an add on to the London Tube hits. The front of the building at Tavistock Square was all covered in blood – blood on its hands – and with this allegory still in tact, those in the front of the bus were left unscathed.

The Marquees of Tavistock was born on the same day as Adolf Hitler's father, exactly 168 years later (Alois Hitler, b. 7 June 1837). In the Golden Dawn coven language, '168' translates as "infinite one dead".

Hitler was trained in the Tavistock military Psych-Opps war school from February to November 1912, 103 years prior – 7 July occurs right in the middle of that training.

Initially 13 died, plus the bomber (18) and then another died, an architect, the namesake of an author who had written about such matters, one Lee Harris.

Developed in the 1820s, Tavistock Square contains a memorial to conscientious objectors. This was unveiled in 1995, 56 years after the beginning of WWII and 56 people died.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 201

The bombing occurred in the 56th year of Hitler's death – 55 years and 136 days after he died. In Golden Dawn coven/Freemason language '55' represents "the master of occult history" and '136' is "dead bad luck".

The bombers were all from England and from low-paying jobs. There is a theory that they undertook the bombings on the understanding that they were time-delay bombs and that they were organised to take the emphasis off Sir Bob Geldof's focus on the depopulation of Africa – for its resources.

Of the people who died, all were British except for 12 foreigners. No American's died and the only Israeli to die was a charity worker who was scared of suicide bombs on Israeli buses, so she moved to London – dead bad luck, '136'.

During the London bombings, the surveillance cameras were all monitored by an Israeli so there was little fear of pertinent evidence catching up with them. The London policeman who said the bombings were done with military explosives was sacked prior to 6 August 2005 (when this information came to author) and the official release said that the bombs had been made out of common household products, but no one believes this.

It was an American and Israeli hit with Tony Blair's complicity. In covering up the Prince's Greek attraction to youth (Thomas Hamilton's Dunblane massacre), Tony Blair had signed a document prior to 7 March 2003 allowing the US government to kill up to 60 Britisher's or people on British soil in order to create the next oil grab (Syria) and sure enough, it was the Syrian's who were blamed by the press the next day, with no evidence to back it up.

Between 60 and 160 dead would mean a proportionate reduction in oil prices for Britain and over 160 meant that the British government could kill American's on American soil in agreed retaliation (another Israeli employment scheme), which would also suit the Americans who would also blame this on the Syrians.

> This is the value in shame over a British aristocratic paedophile ring and it was what America used to bring Tony Blair's Britain into the 20.03.2003 Iraq war.

This was followed by the promotion of back bench MP George Robertson to Cabinet Minister (1997), Lord George Robertson (24 August 1999) and then Secretary General of NATO (11 August 1999–5 January 2004) for his part in supplying the Freemasonry letter of reference for the purchase of the gun for Thomas Hamilton's massacre of 16 school children (16 March 1996). Robertson was accused of this on 11 March 2003, nine days before the Iraq war started, using FBI files as a reference.

Lord George Robertson, Secretary General of NATO, repaid the favour by protecting Afghanistan and ensuring that 98% of the heroin in Britain comes from Afghanistan. How regular are those NATO flights? Have they got their air-to-air refuelling yet? History is built on shame. Those with the most shame are promoted. Politicians regularly fail their way to the top.

The same month as the London bombings, Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was exposed by the Haaretz newspaper as having an affair with his wife's sister, killing his first wife Margalith on 6 May 1962 (car accident), marrying his wife's sister Liala (Lily) in 1964 (date unavailable) and then killing his first son Gur on 5 October 1967 (shooting accident), with their new son Omri (b. 8 August 1968) conceived the same month.

This shows a heavy influence of the occult.

Ariel Sharon had became Israel's Prime Minister by special election on 6 February 2001 with much shenanigans. His son's, Omri and Gilad were both involved in corruption over the 1999 election campaign, with Omri convicted of corruption and dishonesty on 26 July 2005 and Gilad refusing to give self-incrimination evidence.

Given Ariel Sharon's history this is not beyond belief. He has been in the military since the age of 14, became an intelligence officer at 22 and then a major, reading Animal Farm (1945) and leading 'Unit 101' as a 25 year-old.

When his brutal disregard for human life was noted after the Six-Day War in 1967, he resigned and moved straight into politics. As Israel's Defence Minister (1981–83) he was responsible for two refugee massacres in September 1982 and was forced to resign again. He has been successively known as the Butcher of Qibya/Lebanon/Sabra/Chatila and Beirut and has failed and murdered his way up the ladder to become Israel's Prime Minister.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

With the assassination of Israel's Prime Minister Yitzah Rabin on 4 November 1995 and no killer found, the warring Ariel Sharon is not off the list of suspects. He bores us with news of Middle East conflict every night, stories of his own making, which force out less violent and more relevant news.

Israel's Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom, mid-July 2005:

> "Suicide attacks around the world are driven by a common hatred for freedom. Ultimately terrorism can strike any country in the world that has an ideology of freedom, of democracy, that has an ideology of openness."

Shortly after this Ariel Sharon ordered his minister's not to comment on the London bombings and within a month passed into law:

> 'Any expression critical of Israel or any anti-Semitic remark warrants extradition and interrogation, without limit to any country. That it is true, is no excuse.'

This was done with the London bombings in the forefront of his mind and these texts in the background – two months after they were stolen, three months prior to completion and four months prior to publication it's already influencing history.

When Israel attacks foreigners they make it as significant as possible in order to give it mystical qualities. Tavistock is a very significant place and '007 on the square' or '777' was a very significant hit.

According to Hebrew interpretations '777' represents God and '777' is an offence against Jesus Christ. When written in the original Hebrew '777' looks remarkably like '666' which looks remarkably like a track of paw prints of a large animal, hence 'the beast'. Later numerology got hold of '666' and was supposed to represent someone's name, either the Roman emperor Nero (Neron) or Hitler, but these are all just riddles that leave their mark.

With British complicity and under American orders those who organised the London bombings were intelligent enough to leave us clues. They were also intelligent enough to pick up on mine. Thank's for the confirmation of Hitler's British training . . . my condolences to the victims throughout history.

Israel is a wolf in sheep's clothing barking that it is a sheep.

In an unpublished article to TIME magazine (9 March 2005) I had predicted New Zealand's election would be at the end of September 2005. (A minium of three weeks notice is required.)

On 28 June 2005 I had written another unpublished article, "The Rainbow Warrior Bombing, An update on the Sunday programme on 26 June 2005" and vetted it with Mother and the Spymaster. The following day I phoned Donna Chisholm at the Sunday Star Times and met with her predicting former Labour Prime Minister David Lange would publish an autobiography just before his death and his death would be just before the election.

> "When the nuclear issue came up for New Zealand . . . David has written about this in his book, which is timed to come out immediately upon his death, as is another biography on Lange's life by Dr. Michael Basset."

I spoke with Mother on Sunday 24 July 2005 and he told me the election would be announced on Wednesday. Being highly bugged, it was announced the following day, on Monday 25 July for 17 September 2005.

David Lange's book came out on Tuesday 9 August 2005. On the afternoon of Friday 12 August 2005, Mother contacted me and said: "David Lange's life support was switched off at 11am. I just thought you'd like to know. He has a matter of hours or days to live. Keep it secret."

I couldn't help myself. The Spymaster was standing right next to me and after the call I asked him if he could keep a secret. I asked him three times and each time he said "No", so I told him anyway. We then sat outside and he told me the KC was back. I said "Don't let her in. Where is she?"

Spymaster: "Up the top . . . They've read your books. They've gone to the highest levels. They were going to kill you and everyone involved and then someone else read the books and said, 'No, they serve our purpose. It's about time the truth came out', so they're going to write you off as a Nutter."

I just sat back and laughed and the Spymaster watched me for a while and said, "The books have gone to the highest levels."

"Have they got the latest information or just the information they stole on 11 May?"

Spymaster: "I don't know how they've got it, but they've got all the information. The third nuclear bomb really threw them."

"They must have been reading keystrokes . . . who, the Brits and the Jews?" There was no answer. The Spymaster always protects his sources with no response and a completely unreadable face whenever he wants to protect his sources. "I can imagine you and me as the North Going Zac and the South Going Zac with the British and Israelis firing bombs at each other overhead."

Spymaster: "This is the dinkum oil."

I laughed again . . . couldn't help myself and the Spymaster said, "I thought you'd react this way . . . I reckon they'll delay Lange's death so it won't be announced on the late news, but in the Sunday papers."

David Lange died at 10 pm Saturday 13 August 2005. His death was announced in the Sunday papers the following morning as having occurred at the start of the Bledisloe Cup rugby test match, which New Zealand won. If the government wants to stay in, test matches are bought and the All Blacks have been winning hands down. This was followed by full Sunday television coverage of David Lange.

9 March 2005: predicted election in late September 2005 to Time magazine; 28 June 2005: predicted David Lange would publish an autobiography and die soon after, but before the election; 24 July 2005: knew election was to be announced, as it was the following day; 9 August 2005: Lange's book came out and he died four days later on the suspicious date of 13 August 2005. The election was due five weeks later and Lange's death caused a lot of sympathy to the incumbent government.

It's easy enough to rig a rugby test match with the awarding of penalties. The winning team has penalties awarded in their opposition half and the losing team has theirs awarded in their own half. If the bribe is big enough, the loosing team's kicker, kicks for touch, rather than for goal. This is how the Lions lost all three test matches to the All Blacks in June/July 2005. It came with the complicity of Tony Blair's paedophile minder, Alistair Campbell (ex-military) who fronted as the Lions maître d'.

The Prime Minister had a consultation lunch with Alistair Campbell on 26 June 2005 regarding rigging the next election. First there was to be no KGB or lesbian information on Helen Clark, no homosexual child-sex abuse information on her husband, Peter Davis, no paedophile information on Jonathan Hunt, the High Commissioner to Britain; no coverage of Sir Peter Elworthy's 'death', or Michael King's 'death'; butch lesbians were to hide from the public, no lesbians were to drive convertibles and lesbians were to disappear from public view in general; all Labour women were to get new bright pastel clothes and were to dress like heterosexuals; Helen was to lose weight and have her 55-year-old lesbian XY-self made to look like a 28-year-old heterosexual complete with manufactured teeth. This image was to be placed on an election pledge card. David Lange was to die just before the election – engineering sympathy, and the leader of the opposition Don Brash was to be accused of being CIA backed. The latter was to prevent last minute accusations that Helen Clark was the KGB operative IE and had worked with Vladimir Putin in Wellington to launch a nuclear strike on American property during the Cold War – namely Canberra, Adelaide or Sydney in a rotating fashion.

After the chicken salad had arrived, the NATO delivered Afghan heroin was not to reach the market until after the election, regardless of who won. In exchange for no information on Tony Blair's rock spider activity, Campbell would throw the Lions Tour of New Zealand which would make Helen Clark popular in the eyes of rugby fans. He would also ensure the world's media remained silent on Helen Clark's filmed sex with Heather Simpson at Lincoln Cottage. He could only guarantee W. remained quiet on it as long as she continued to not criticise the Iraq war. This was the deal. This was how it was engineered and this was how it was done, complete with carbonated water.

Another interesting aspect of election rigging is the engineering of fine weather during the winter leading up to the election providing that feel good factor.

Under Operation CLOVERLEAF (1997–) aerosol and electro-magnetic operations, high frequency microwaves are used to manipulate the charged atmosphere for weather modification. Along with this are 4 beats per second extremely low electro-magnetic frequencies breaking down human biological and mental functioning . . . and aerosol poisons dissipated by planes.

These particles (10% the width of a human hair) are made up of barium salts, aluminium and radioactive thorium, viruses, bacteria, fungi, desiccated bovine (cow) blood cells and mutated spores which secrete a powerful microtoxin, Ethylene Dibromide (a carcinogen and toxin banned in 1983) and Mycoplasma Fermetens Incognitus, the same Mycoplasma that created the Gulf War syndrome.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Weather modification is bought via bribes to the CIA who fly unregistered planes stolen off the American military and America companies as well as pre-modified commericial planes like the KC-10A, KC135 (707) and C-130s. These have been adapted with 500 litres of poisons stored amongst the sewerage bowels and are dissipated through the modified static discharge wicks at the rear of the plane's wings.

Spymaster: "The CIA just waltz in with their bogus and forged documentation and commandeer the planes. They are not all commercial flights and some of the planes are unregistered."

The poisons are so fine they are breathed in and enter the blood cells. Their toxic metals suppress the immune system, weakening muscles and cause cancers, Alzheimer's, blood clots, strokes, heart attacks, changes to the endocrine and nervous system, respiratory problems, coughing fits, shortness of breath, sinus headaches, respiratory failure, severe infections to the throats and sinuses, swelling of the lymph glands and liver damage . . . and it only costs US$0.73¢ per kilo to disseminate.

The cover for this is that the aerosols contain fine metalic particles which reduce the sun's electromagnetic radiation to stop global warming, but GLOBAL WARMING IS A HOAX.

> DuPont's CFC patent was due to run out in 1985 and they wanted to stop Asian companies producing CFCs cheaply, so they banned them and introduced HCFC's having the sole patent for this. HCFC's are more expensive and less effective, but DuPont has the patent.
> Mt Erebus releases more CFCs than all the rest of the world's volcanoes put together and these are sucked up into the atmosphere during the spring and autumn equinox. To prevent this being measured, a plane crash was engineered.
> When the 28 November 1979 Air New Zealand crash was arranged to hit Mt Erebus, DuPont and the CIA were present at all meetings. The CIA's motto is to PROTECT AND ADVANCE AMERICAN BUSINESS. The Erebus crash now prevents anyone climbing Mt Erebus to test its CFC emissions.
> The hole in the ozone layer was caused by a nuclear explosion in Antarctica in 1958. It was measured for 60 years and when the ozone hole began to contract in 2002, it was no longer news. Erroneously the GLOBAL WARMING HOAX is still with us.

Instead of spraying fine reflective particles to stop global warming, poisons are being sprayed to assist the new Avian Flu (H5N1) which has been designed to be as strong as the 1918–19 Spanish Flu that killed 50 million. The Bush administration has been having discussions as to the optimum number of people to 'work the planet' and their current estimates are around one billion (May 2005). This has resulted in experiments to kill 5 out of 6 people.

"United States health officials said this week they have started human tests of a vaccine against Avian Flu, which experts believe could kill tens of millions of people if it becomes easily passed from person to person . . . Usually, people catch the virus directly from birds such as chickens or ducks. Geese and wild birds and mammals such as cats can also carry the virus . . . To date, there has been a small number of cases where human-to-human transmission of the virus may have occurred

. . . public health experts fear that the virus may evolve into one that is more easily transmitted between people . . . If this were to happen, a worldwide pandemic could follow . . . the public health community is concerned that the virus will develop the capability of efficiently spreading from human to human and thus create a risk for a worldwide pandemic . . . the vaccine [is] made by Sanofi Pasteur [with] Chiron Corp. of Emeryville, California."[9]

Prime Minister Helen Clark stuffed up the importation of the vaccine ensuring that a less effective vaccine was purchased . . . just as previous Prime Minister William Ferguson Massey (1912–25) carried the Spanish Flu into New Zealand personally, refusing to be quarantined. In Freemasonry he was 'M. W. Bro. W. F. Massey' and for his efforts in eugenics (mass murder) a Freemasonry lodge was named after him – the 'William Fergusson Massey Royal Arch Chapter No. 60'.[10]

Deaths in New Zealand are due to happen with a cold snap in late October after the election and after a warm winter. The Avian Flu is due to arrive into New Zealand (the world's test population) via planes carrying Chinese 'Chicken-Sleepers' from Manchuria on 10 October with the virus taking hold on 14 October,[11] followed by an extreme cold snap in late October.

Almost all natural disasters are man-made and governments arrange emergencies to keep them in power. For the Bush government it was 9-11 and the Iraq War. For Blair it was the Iraq War and the London tube bombings. For Helen Clark it is 250,000 deaths from the Avian Flu.

The rules of Nordic-Anglo-Saxon colonising are that you have to limit the killing of 'people with integrity'. These are noted as white heterosexuals. The plan from 1500 years ago is for those from Thule (Greenland) to sweep down to Antarctica over 1500 years and then to sweep back up again with a different species – modified humans – for the next 1500 years.

[9] This Reuters article 'Human tests of avian flu vaccine underway' made public on 25 March 2005 was published in the New Zealand Herald five months later on 1 September 2005.

[10] Freemasons often misspell a persons name by one letter. It is a sign they believe they are above the law. Sure enough, Massey belonged to the British-Israel-World Federation with an office next to Buckingham Palace (1924–90). Federated on 3 July 1919, its roots can be traced back to the 1800s.

[11] As it panned out, H5N1 struck in Romania and Turkey on exactly these dates and New Zealand was saved by the Mossad accused.

From 1945 this new species of humans – homo sapien 1.52 – has been developed with their 'human' aspects breed and trained out of them. They are now a race of technocrats – capable servants – 21st Century serfs rasied amongst the world's largest geothermal lakes between Neuschwabenland and the South Pole, first accessed by U-boat under the ice.

Israel has taken over Tasmania on condition that the Australian population be disarmed (2003). At the same time the Avian Flu was successfully tested as a human killer in Korea, but its contagiousness needed to be improved. The Israeli government then enforced the withdrawl of its people out of the Westbank (15 August 2005) and gave each family US$800,000 and placed them in rental accomodation. They will soon be emigrating to Tasmania en masse, followed by the depopulation of New Zealand resulting in extremely cheap housing and an influx of very wealthy Israeli's without the grief of the incubent population. At the same time the Antarcticans (Homo sapien 1.52) will merge into New Zealand, purchase houses with counterfeit money of a foreign country, but accepted by New Zealand banks (most likely the Euro). Their move from Antarctica to New Zealand will go unnoticed amongst the confusion. This is the way migrations happen.

History rarely notes the intricate details of a migration and rarely if ever survives to record another species.

That's the plan, but gang aft aglae – things fuck up.

Normal peace agreements say 'this is peace now', with no definition of what peace is,
and 'if you cross this line, it is war'.
War is defined, but peace is not.

Peace was always some static thing on a spring summers day when nothing went wrong.

In between wars there is PEACE, FREEDOM AND CULTURE which is maintained with 'AAA' –
Acceptance, Acknowledgement, Attention – and it is this simple formula that was used to send the above plan astray.

Yet another example of migration engineering and population control. It is how the face of the planet is altered.

Information and Inventions

Still Camera

The first permanent photographic image using a Camera Obscura occurred in 1825. The first production camera was made in 1839 and weighed in at a whopping 55 kg. By 1850, the photographer's kit required a horse-drawn wagon. The first pocket camera became available in 1899, the first folding camera in 1890 and the first market camera from 1917 (Kodak 1A, US$21). The first market petite camera with matching lipstick holder and compact hit the espionage scene in 1930. Cameras became digital in 1990 and this posed a problem with the veracity of the finished image.

Photos can now be taken from paint (camera paint) and this technology is now available in make-up, which means that your honey-trap can be filming you from your first date. "I can't believe it's you. Are you really . . . . [fill in name]?" . . . then you're dead with no wake-up call.

Fax

The facsimile (fax) was invented in France in 1843. The first commercial fax service was up and running 22 years later in 1865. Forty-one years later, newspaper photographs could be faxed (1906). The fax was originally called a 'Mojo' and by 1973 it was capable of sending one page of text every 18 minutes. For its first 130 years, the fax was the dinosaur of communication.

Calculator

The calculating engine was invented in 1855. IBM formed in 1924 and the first pocket calculator was available in 1972 for 15% of the price of a new car (US$400).

Telephone and Dictaphones

Italian American, Antonio Santi Giuseppe Meucci (1808–1889), was considered a revolutionary and incarcerated (aged 25–26). He discovered the principle of the telephone in 1849 and developed a working model by 1859. He also registered at least 11 patents for such things as the stearic candle process, paraffin candles and electroplating.[1]

Officially Bell patented the telephone in 1876 and the first exchange opened two years later in 1878, making Bell incredibly rich. Trans-Atlantic telephones were in operation from 1927 (51 years later). Telephone answering machines were invented in 1930, dictaphones in 1935 (available from 1939) and cell/mobile phones from 1982. The invention of the telephone was attributed to the Scotsman, Alexander Graham Bell (1847–1922), and it was only attributed to the much older, actual inventor, Antonio Meucci, on 15 June 2002 by the US Congress.

[1] Antonio Meucci: The Inventor and his Times, Basilio Catania. (Vol. 1), Seat – Divisione, Editoria per la Comunicazione, Rome, 1994. 107th CONGRESS 1st session H. RES. 269.

Alexander Graham Bell still has the memorable phrase attibuted to him: "Give us a bell." If the similar "Give us a Meucci" were in use, the Germans and Japanese would be very confused.

The Freemasons claimed Antonio Meucci, as they used to claim Alexander Graham Bell, and they do it by the following rider from the website of the Grand Lodge of British Columbia and Yukon, entitled 'A Few Famous Freemasons'.

> "The following list has been compiled from primary references or creditable authors. It is neither comprehensive nor definitive, but merely attempts to demonstrate the interest in Freemasonry found in all facets of society. Although the authors noted at the end of the list write with some authority, they do not always provide citations. Membership therefore cannot be considered confirmed unless a lodge name is supplied. Biographies for some of those listed can be found in our Biographies section. Although these men were Freemasons, they neither represent nor speak for Freemasonry."

No lodge citation was provided for Antonio Meucci.

The Freemasons have an invested interest in the Patent Office and many inventors falsify their patents so that they do not work and cannot be copied. Regardless, Bell was still an interesting cat. He built the biplane which flew the first public flight in America (1908), designed a hydrofoil capturing the world water speed record (1918) and designed the 'photophone' based on transmitting speech by light which anticipated optical-fibre communications, although it did not work.

Lie Detectors

The hilarious Alphonse Bertillon system was in operation from 1887 to July 1901, when it was phased out by fingerprinting, which fingered its first criminal in June 1902 (the Fingerprint Bureau at New Scotland Yard). There are no advertised convictions from the Alphonse Bertillon system which worked off ear prints and racial prejudice. In America, it was 1924 before an Act of Congress established the Identification Division of the FBI. This was the first thing the cross-dresser J. Edgar Hoover did.

In 1921, an instrument capable of continuously recording blood pressure, respiration and pulse rate was devised by John Larson.

In 1926 the polygraph was invented by Leonarde Keeler, but it was found that people could lie and neurotics on pentathol would go on and on and on, giving endless false leads that would take forever to investigate into oblivion. The best way of getting people to tell the truth was to interview them naked and this is still standard military practice to this day.

In 1936 the psychogalvanometer which measured electrical changes on the skin was invented by Walter Summers.

Radio

Radio waves were discovered in 1887 and transmissions in 1895. The valve was patented in 1907 and regular public radio broadcasts occurred from 1921. Transistor radios were invented in 1947 and became available seven years later in 1954.

Electricity

The first alternating current motor (AC) was built in 1888, with alternating current produced for public supply in 1895, courtesy of the Croatian, Nikola Tesla (1856–1943), a man who privately blamed his inventions on aliens. The definition of 'Guru' is 'bringer of light', and since Nikola Tesla brought light to the masses, he is more influential than God, with similar billing rates and line charges.

Moving Camera and Movies

Silent movies were invented in 1895 and movies with sound (talkies) came out in 1929. Many thought it would kill the industry. The first portable movie camera, the Bolex H-16, was in use from 1933 and has been used for intelligence and counter-intelligence ever since. The criminals were also spying on the police and saboteurs were also spying on the military.

Television

The cathode ray tube was invented in 1897 with television demonstrated 29 years later in 1926 by John Logie Baird (not a Freemason) and taken up by the BBC in 1929. This was improved from a 30-line mechanical system (shocking picture quality) to a 240-line mechanical system in 1936, just in time for the first B&W television broadcasts of the Nuremberg Rallies and Hitler's Berlin Olympics.

Hitler, as a Nordic-Anglo-Saxon coloniser, refused to shake hands with a black man (Jesse Owens, 10.3 sec) while a Polish man (Stanislawa Walasiewicz) slipped by the Wolf and won the silver medal for the Women's 100 m sprint.

A rival 405-line system was adopted by the BBC in 1937.

John Logie Baird went further and developed radar and infra-red television called 'Noctovision', which meant that you could also cook on your TV, and cook your family, which is partly why early television was only on for a few hours a day.

As well as screen projection and stereophonic sound, Baird produced 3-D images as early as 1944. Colour television was available from 1953 and in the Colonies some 20 years later in 1973. As far as home entertainment and public brainwashing goes, John Logie Baird (1888–1946) was Mr Big.

Video recorders were invented in 1951 and sold in 1956 for US$50,000 (B&W). At the same time, blank tapes cost US$307. Domestic videos and tapes became available in 1971.

The Freemasons have long been stealing inventions and the previous two centuries were ripe for it. Primarily as warring Nordic-Anglo-Saxon colonisers, they believe that everything great is created by a white colonist, and the Freemasons push this onto the public. So when the brown-blooded homosexual, Leonardo da Vinci (1415–1519), invented the helicopter etc., it was important that he was portrayed as a white heterosexual. This false history was successfully projected for over 480 years.

Other long-standing bluffs are yet to be exposed, but Samuel Colt (Freemason) stole the revolver and Winchester stole the repeating rifle. Winchester improved on Volcanic's repeating rifle, bought out the Volcanic Repeating Arms Company (1857) and created the Winchester Repeating Arms Company 10 years later (1867).

Jewish spies named Singer stole the sewing machine invention (patented 1852) and Richard Gatling, a doctor who never practised, assisted his father in the manufacture of sewing machines. During the American Civil War, Gatling (Freemason) stole a gun (1861–62) and is credited with having invented the crank-operated revolving multi-barrel rapid-fire machine gun, since called the Gatling gun. It was still in use in 1991. Perhaps he learnt something off his father and the Singer spies.

Because much of the Freemason history is assumed, they believe they are from an organisation of greatness and therefore assume it is their right to produce anything great. The Freemasons steal inventions by:

1. Inviting the inventor to become a Freemason.
2. Using a Freemason to reinvent the invention soon after; and
3. Then prove a false history that a Freemason did it first.
4. Assume without citation that the inventor was a Freemason.
5. Purchase backyard inventions off starving inventors never mentioning their name.
6. Kill the inventor on the way to the patent office, or
7. Copy the invention from the patent.

The record of the Mill Valley Lodge is a good example of the gullibility of boring white men who want to be part of something great.

> Mill Valley Record, 19 December 1925: "The New Masonic Temple: All meetings of the Masonic Lodges and of the Mill Valley Chapter of the Order of the Eastern Star are now being held in the remodeled Masonic Temple on Corte Madera Avenue.
> "The rooms have been enlarged and equipped with modern accessories. The spacious entrance hall opens off an attractive, small garden spot, next the street. On one side is the dining hall and entertainment room, on the other a thoroughly equipped kitchen. The dining hall has been enlarged and a double floor laid.
> "A wide stairway leads to commodious corridors and dressing rooms above and to the temple room. Elegance and simplicity combine to make the lodge room an ideal one for its functions. The floor is carpeted in an emblematic pattern of soft blue and gray. The proportions of the room are impressive and the new system of lighting lends to the atmosphere of the place.

Esrave Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

> "Before every stated meeting Mill Valley lodge holds a get-together dutch treat dinner. At the last dinner there was 80 in attendance and a large crowd is expected at the April affair which is expected to be an Italian dinner. This is quite a novel idea and should be tried out by some of the rest of our Masonic organizations. (Marin Sciots Monthly BolOgnA, Vol. 1, No. 1, April 1928).
> "On September 10, 1928, at the age of 20, Inventor Philo T. Farnsworth, produced the first electronic television at San Francisco, CA, for Crocker Research Laboratories, which was later reorganized as Television Laboratories, Inc., and in May 1929 was renamed Farnsworth Television Inc., of California. Philo Taylor Farnsworth's electronic inventions took all of the moving parts out of televisions and made possible today's TV industry, the TV shots from the moon, and satellite pictures."[2] [all sic]

Philo T. Farnsworth claimed the invention of the television and the US government even issued a stamp with his image on it. But television was invented 19½ months earlier by John Logie Baird and shown to the Royal Institution on 26 January 1926. John Logie Baird even made a trans-Atlantic TV broadcast on 9 February 1928, but still, the US government (run by Freemasons) issued stamps with Philo T. Farnsworth's image crediting him with the invention seven months later.

John Logie Baird also patented the world's first record and play-back system (the Phonovisor), the world's first fibre-optics, and developed an all-electric 1800-line 3-D television (patented 1944) called Telechrome-colour. This is more advanced than anything we have today.

Realising they had lost the post-WWI movie race, the British government's Hankey Committee (1941) gave the go-ahead to Baird's 3-D television as the British post-war television standard, but two months after the report came out, John Logie Baird died suddenly and his Telechrome mysteriously disappeared.

Immediately after WWII a number of American companies (including RCA) mysteriously patented similar devices. This was enough to scare off most Brits.

Baird was so good, his Field Sequential Colour System was used for the Moon landings. His 3-D Telechrome television wasn't used because it would have revealed the hoax and Russia would have won the moral high ground in the Cold War.

John Logie Baird's 1944 1800-line 3-D Telechrome-colour television would show up all digital hoaxes, so it was not issued to the public.

All those who filmed the 'Moon landings' died within four days of filming – thirteen by car accidents and two by heart attacks. Coincidences are amazing things and history is full of it.

It is common practice in the big stitch-ups to kill those involved and then to kill those who did the killing, with the surviving Freemasons already sworn to secrecy, like the astronauts, Neil Armstrong, John Herschel Glenn Jr., Edwin 'Buzz' Aldrin Jr., Virgil 'Gus' Grissom, Edgar D. Mitchell, Leroy Gordon Cooper, Donn F. Eisele, Fred Wallace Haise Jr., Walter 'Wally' Schirra Jr. and Thomas P. Stafford.

This is what our real history is made of – Freemason stitch-ups followed by Freemason cover-ups.

Sound Recording

Magnetic sound was invented in 1898. Discs for recording sound were invented in 1891, with sound recordings introduced in 1928. Wax discs weren't popular with the public, probably because they could only record once and be listened to once, after which the sound quality diminished exponentially. Wax discs were used to record the sound portion of the sexual practices of political figures of all nationalities in Berlin's Salon Kitty. These were then stored in Russia and the US, and are now worthy of study for historical influence.

The term 'Wax' became slang for its successor, the gramophone record, and 'Wax' is still slang for the raw material used to manufacture vinyl records today.

The first professional tape recorder was available in 1947. Small tape recorders made it to market in 1962, cassette tapes in 1963, 8-Track in 1965 and small chrome tapes from 1969. Digital recorders were available from 1978 and compact discs from 1982. Tapes exceeded vinyl sales in 1984, but you can't 'scratch' a tape.

The First Programmable Computer

Apart from Pascal developing the mechanical computer in the 1600s, the world's first programmable computer, the Colossus, was built in 1943 by the post office engineer Tommy Flowers. It contained 1500 valves and was used to decipher German war codes. Ten were built and they broke the German Enigma codes against a probability of 1 in 150 million million million in a matter of hours, sometimes revealing information to the British before the Germans had deciphered it themselves.

---

[2] Mill Valley Lodge website.

The British were aided by the capture of an Enigma transmitting machine and coding documents from the U-110 (U-boat) on 9 May 1941 by the HMS Bulldog and the HMS Aubretia. The 1500-valve Colossus was so successful that when the British Forces invaded France on D-Day, they already knew the location of 60 of the 62 German divisions.

At the end of the war Tommy Flowers was ordered to destroy the machine, smash it up, bury it, and burn all the plans, which he did in 1945. The secret of the machine was kept for another 30 years (1973), thus giving America credit for creating the first computer. The British made the first computer in 1943 from valves and the Americans reinvented programming language in 1954, taking all the credit for the creation of the computer – typical Yanks.

The first silicon chip was created in 1958. The Internet was invented in the 1960s for US military communications and the mouse was invented to aid this in 1969. Both became available to the public in 1988.

This was just preceded by computer-aided financial charging like EFTPOS (Electronic Funds Transfer at Point of Sale). New Zealand was the test country and New Zealanders were told they were following the rest of the world, then the rest of the world followed New Zealand with Interac Direct Payment, debit cards, Redcompra, Maestro and pinnen.

The first word processor was invented in 1964, the first mini-computer in 1965 and fibre-optic cables from 1966 (first used in computer cables in 1985). The first portable computer was available in 1975 and desktop computers were marketed six years later in 1981 with the mouse, Windows interface and magnetic disks from 1984. The first laptop was flown in the Shuttle in 1983 and available to the public in 1991.

The World Wide Web (www) was invented in 1990 and took off immediately to become the greatest information revolution the world has ever seen – more than the oral history of St Francis of Assisi and the 15th-century language race across Europe.

The www was voted most likely to topple The Forces of Order ('ordered disorder') and opened up a Pandora's box of otherwise secret information that would never have been published.

This was counter-actioned with equally compelling misinformation, computer crime, and too much information, most of which was government propaganda from The Forces of Order.

The www also made it possible to track the thinking and discovery patterns of the world's most belligerent individuals – and dedicated porn addicts – colonial British High Commissioners among them . . . rhymes with Anthony Blunt, he was named by US Customs as Jonathan Hunt.

Ghosts and GHOST

Ghosts were an incredibly popular form of fear, but lost their footing when mobile phones started to block the airwaves in 1982 – then aliens took over as the primary source of fear. But now we have a new form of ghost that runs hand in hand with 'World Anti-Independence Day'. This began on 4 July 2003 with any government department now allowed to hack into anyone's computer and share that information with any other government department – via 'The Privacy Act'!

There are two computer programs called "GHOST/Ghost". One was developed by a member of the test population at the bottom of the Pacific (New Zealand) and called "GHOST". The other was developed as a cover called "Ghost". GHOST can draw down all information on a computer without the computer realising it has been tapped and can work whether you are offline or online.

As soon as GHOST was developed, one of the New Zealand employees was seconded by the US Government to assist in tapping computers in America. GHOST was bought out by Semantec, the same company which delivers Norton Anti-Virus. If you have a Norton Anti-Virus program, you have GHOST, and all of your computer data can be downloaded and read.

There are some 120,000 people in America working for the US Government solely reading the information on your computer, faxes, emails and listening to your phone calls – so send them something funny. Can you imagine how dull their job might be?

GHOST makes thinking and research a dangerous profession. Part of the One World Order is One World Thinking (OWT), and ensuring that no one thinks outside the square.

One of the functions of governments now is placing paedophile images on the computers of thinkers, but this is not an excuse when such images are found on the computers of the police, as they were with the New Zealand Police in November 2004. These were placed on the police computers in order to stop the police charging paedophiles who were in the process of being promoted to the highest governmental positions in New Zealand. To further cover this up the Minister of Police was required to deal 10 kg of Afghan heroin to the police who dealt it to the gangs as part of the deal for promotion. Those gang leaders who refused to deal in the heroin were then attacked by the police.

I saw the results of these attacks first hand and they were very expensive for any gang member who stopped dealing. The police and gangs work hand in glove. The police are the hand and the gangs are the glove. The public perception is the opposite. The police are made up of Freemasons whose motto is ORDER OUT OF CHAOS.

Facial Recognition: Mandrake and Biometrics

The facial recognition programme Mandrake was publicly dropped in October 2003, with the announcement that it did not work. It was withdrawn to be forgotten about, probably because it worked so well and was considered a military device. It was continually developed and upgraded in secret and then marketed again after the secret testing process and withdrawal from the market had increased its value. It was capable of distinguishing between a real person and a body double and this proved problematic for higher-end politicians who use body doubles as a cover and as a form of political afterlife.

Sure enough, facial recognition was re-released to the public as Biometrics in May 2005. It never went away. Whereas fingerprints are not immediate and check 60–90 points, Biometrics instantly records and database-compares 50 points on the face and 240 points on the iris. This occurs from further away than one would think possible – like across the street and two storeys up. It also checks the movements of groups of people as to whether a crime is about to take place. When biometrics was reintroduced, the final shot was of Hitler with the statement "Someone is watching you".[3]

As soon as the Web became a common tool, it also became a common tool for crime. From 2003, computer crime has escalated at a greater rate than any other form of crime. Fishing attacks on computers masquerade as official bank websites and invite the target to log in passwords. Keystroke logers also place the Trojan virus silently at the back of the target computer. This activates during telephone banking and passes the logged information back to the Fisher, allowing them to use the passwords to withdraw funds via the target's Internet banking. This gives new meaning to the term 'Fisher King'.

Radio Frequency Identification Device Tags (RFIDT) are now on many purchased products. This is a low-powered tracking device and can be scanned from up to 10 metres away. RFIDT allows the new Tech-Burglars to identify new items in a home without even entering. This gives new meaning to the term 'stealing to order'.

Submarines and Torpedoes

Originally called the 'Intelligent Whale', one of the first submarines ever built was condemned by the US Navy in 1872.[4] The Holland A-1 (1901, USA) was the first real submarine. Powered by diesel electric it carried torpedoes. "By 1904, the 'Automobile' or self-propelled torpedo was erratic and unseaworthy, often proving as great a danger to the ship that launched it as to its intended victim."[5]

By 1904 the world had intelligent whales launching automobiles – how Jules Verne – but if it was moving, it was good enough for war. The first torpedo war began on 7 February 1904 when Japan attacked Russia without warning in the Manchurian Harbour of Port Arthur. This was the first engine-powered Asian attack against Europeans. Torpedos are now called tin fish.

Cars

The internal combustion engine was invented in 1885. Cars were first mass-produced from 1901 and became the first remedy for incest, especially for the slow walkers.

Ernest R. Godward (1869–1936) invented mechanical hedge cutters (from bicycle parts), the posthole borer, burglar-proof windows, a padded draught protector for doors, the hand-rotated egg beater (1900), some power tools, a hair curler and the spiral hairpin. His home was a veritable Chitty Chitty Bang Bang of inventive clutter.

His most lucrative invention, the spiral hairpin, came about by accident. His wife's hairpins used to fall out in bed and irriate him. Being a bit of an arrogant shit,[6] he would screw them up and throw them against the wall. Mrs Godward would then straighten them out. Noticing that they sat in her hair better, he (32) took out a patent (1901), went to America, set up his Koy-Lo Hairpin Companies at 280 Broadway, New York, and made a fortune.

[4] Visions of Infamy, p. 6.

[6] These were the author's great-grandparents.

For the decade from 1901, Ernest Godward employed the near destitute and penniless 65-year-old Freemason Samuel L. Clemens (Mark Twain) as his vice president until Clemens (75) died. 280 Broadway, New York was no doubt the address from which Tom Sawyer and Huckleberry Finn were read time and again. Authors write their own life and Mark Twain never had to do another hard day's work.

Samuel Clemens had lost his money by acting on his own words, "Invest in land. They aren't making any more of it." When Samuel Clemens died in 1910, Ernest Godward sold the 'American only' rights to the spiral hairpin for £20,000 (now around $20 million).

During his time in America (1901–10) Godward invented the Petrol Economiser, the forerunner to the carburettor. This vaporised fuel and meant that engines could run on petrol, diesel, meths, turps or bootleg liquor using a third of standard fuel consumption . . . and they were more powerful.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 Ma

He tried to sell the Petrol Economiser to British public transport, but they weren't interested so Godward got an engineering degree and sold it to the American military (1929) who fitted it to all of their military vehicles. This increased the length of their supply lines while keeping the military sober.

Not long after, the Petrol Economiser was fitted by most car and bus manufacturers and Ernest formed Godward Gas Generator Inc. in New York to fulfil demand. British public transport then followed . . . "If it's good enough for them, it's good enough for us."

By 1931 Ernest Godward was the foremost authority on the combustion engine. He was one of the lucky ones. He proved himself again and again. He (66) eventually died in a skipping competition on an ocean liner. He had ten children, but where is the money? That's the problem with independence. Ernest Godward gave the slow walkers a cheaper option to incest, but incest is highly protected by the Forces of Order.

Show me the money. No one in the family can find it.

Penicillin

Dr Morell produced quack pills like 'vitamin chocolate', 'Russian lice powder' and 'Ultraseptyl' for sore throats. When Dr Karl Brandt, Hitler's real German doctor, told Dr Morell about penicillin, Morell thought he meant 'phenacetin'. Morell then got 100,000 marks from Hitler to make penicillin and Hitler got sterile cane sugar for his money. When questioned by the Americans after WWII, Dr Morell said that he had invented penicillin and the British secret service had stolen it off him. This may seem ludicrous, but it is worth looking at.

Up to 1950 inventions were regularly stolen, with the true inventor discredited, gone missing, or terminated, and the credit going to a 'deserving' person, usually a Britisher and usually a Freemason. It was common practice in Britain to disregard backyard inventors and backyard discoveries, steal their inventions and give them no credit.

Penicillin comes from mould, something a quack could discover. It was officially discovered in 1928 by Alexander Fleming. For this, Alexander Fleming received the Nobel Prize in 1945, the same time Dr Morell was captured and claiming to have discovered it.

Sir Alexander Fleming (1881–1955) was the opposite character to Dr Theodor Morell, and was someone Morell could have wished he was – "I wish I were someone else". Alexander Fleming was a bacteriologist from southwest Scotland. He served in WWI and then as a professor at St Mary's Hospital in London from 1919. Fleming was the first to use antityphoid vaccines on humans, pioneered the use of Salvarsan for syphilis (something Morell had access to from 1936) and discovered the antiseptic powers of lysozyme. In 1928 he discovered penicillin, was elected to the Royal Society in 1943, knighted in 1944 and received the Nobel Prize in 1945.

Although penicillin was discovered in 1928 and characterised in 1934, it was not used in the war until 1944. The war was about killing, not about saving lives.

Alexander Fleming was the kind of doctor the British wanted to keep away from Hitler. Morell was the kind of doctor the British wanted for Hitler. Morell was an actor in a play who believed his own superstitions. As such, he was the perfect companion for Hitler. Both kept each other from approaching reality and both were borderline personalities.

Alexander Fleming served in WWI and invented many things particularly useful for war – typhoid vaccine, syphilis treatment, antiseptic and penicillin. Penicillin was first characterised by Howard Florey (Australian) and Ernst Chain (German) in 1934. Alexander Fleming and Howard Florey were knighted in 1944. All three received the Nobel Prize (1945). It took another 26 years for things to cool down and the German Ernst Chain was knighted in 1970.

I have seen inventions and the authorship of books taken off people and it has done much to destroy them. They do tend to become a shadow of their former selves, and under alcohol, legends in their own lunchtimes . . . but it is more common for borderline personalities to claim the news as their own, thus substantiating their own delusions.

But then again, inventors are accidental creatures, prone to accidents.

Helicopters

Helicopters were first mooted by the brown-blooded homosexual Leonardo da Vinci in the 15th century, who was portrayed as a white heterosexual for the next five centuries. Half a millennium later, the Spaniard Juan de la Cierva (1985–1936) developed the autogiro, first flown on 9 January 1923. This has a propeller in the front like a single-engine plane and a helicopter-like propeller on the roof. It flew like a plane, could not take off vertically, but could land like a helicopter. These were still flying in the 1940s.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Helicopters were first flown in Germany in January 1938 by the inventor Igor Sikorsky. The pitch-adjustable blades could be adjusted to provide lift and/or forward motion.

Hanna Reitsch was the first to fly a helicopter indoors. She flew a Focke-Wulf Fw 61 in the Deutschland Hall in Berlin in February 1938. This was one of the few cases where reality preceded the movies by 50 years.

Microwaves

Spymaster: “The earliest people I know in possession of microwaves were the Russians. This was discovered in 1939 and 1940 when the Germans got access to Russian Embassies in Poland and the low countries. The Germans were desperate to get into the Russian Embassies as they were looking for coding equipment and any information to go with it. What they found were small rooms containing bits and pieces of body parts.

“These were believed to have been special vaporising rooms. The entire rooms were microwave ovens and used to obliterate corpses. Smersh and the GRU’s standard method was to neck-shot their subject first.

“An ancient Czech agent told me that we would see the Smersh men going out with little paper bags and dump the contents off bridges. We assumed at first that it was sandwiches made by the local Intelligence Officer’s wife and nobody wanted to tell her that her culinary skills weren’t up to scratch. It was only after the Germans gained access to the Russian Embassies that they realised it was all about ‘heavenly transport’.”

“When the Americans stole the microwave and found different uses for it, the Russians were quite indignant.

“The typical money-hungry American swine have stolen our idea. Just because they spotted a commercial use for it and didn’t categorise it as being solely a method for state termination, they generalised its use and then obtained a patent for it.’”

Microwaves are a form of electromagnetic radiation that occurs when electric current flows through a conductor. The microwave was officially invented by Dr Percy Spencer, a self-taught engineer with the Raytheon Corporation who was working on a radar-related project. Dr Spencer noticed that food cooked around the new vacuum tube he was testing. Yeah Right!

Patented in 1946, the first microwaves, the ‘Radarange’, were 1.5 m (5’6”) tall, weighed 340 kg (750 lbs) and cost US$2,500. Nevertheless they were immediately accepted in certain industrial applications, like drying potato chips, defrosting, precooking, and tempering meat. Dr Percy Spencer was titled Dr Percy LaBaron Spencer and inducted into the Inventors Hall of Fame on 18 September 1999.[7]

Space

The first multi-staged rocket was launched in the United States in 1949 and then leaked to Russians via the United Nations. The first Russian satellite shot its bolt in 1957. The first US satellite went into orbit in 1958 and thereafter space was militarised. Satellite phone calls started in 1960, with the first TV satellite coverage from 1962 and the first satellite broadcasts from 1980.

The first Russian travelled in space in 1961 and walked in the thinnest of air in 1965. In the great Russo-American propaganda war, the first Russian unmanned space craft was claimed to have landed on the Moon in 1966. The Russians were never so foolish as to claim to have landed a man on the Moon, citing too much radiation and no atmosphere to block it. The first American space traveller claimed to have docked in 1966 and they went on to claim six highly controversial Moon landings from 1969–72.

Regardless of the truth of the matter, this was the height of the Cold War and Cold War propaganda. The claim served America well, but has never been repeated, not in 34 years.

The Space Shuttle first travelled in space in 1977. The Space Shuttle Challenger exploded in 1986 and the Space Shuttle Columbia, launched in 1981, exploded in 2003. The most successful space mission was the Hubble Space Telescope which was launched into orbit in 1990. It brought back the best real information, but was decommissioned in 2004 after it had rewritten the formation of planets.

Birth Control

The contraceptive pill came onto the market in 1960. The first test-tube baby was born in 1978 and "Dolly" the sheep was cloned in 1997 (d. 2003). The first official cloning of a human cell occurred in February 2004.

Hitler's Moustache

I feel compelled here to mention the invention of one of the 20th century's most visible foibles – Hitler's ever-diminishing moustache.

Bridget Hitler: "When Adolf [23] had come to visit us in Liverpool [November 1912] his moustache had been of the handlebar type, rather full and soft. Long before that I had persuaded Alois [30] to cut off the waxed points of his 'à la Kaiser'. When Adolf came, I set to work on him too and succeeded in getting him to trim it. Now [1923] I see that it had decreased still more, almost to a ridiculous degree. Alois's moustache had grown narrower too when I saw him in Monte Carlo. I had started them in the right direction, but Adolf had gone too far."[8]

When Adolf arrived in Liverpool in November 1912, he had a waxed handlebar moustache in the style of the Kaiser. When he left six months later in April 1913, it was a standard-length moustache, but by 8 November 1923 (34), it had been reduced to a ridiculous state and served as a symbolic reaction against the Kaiser's waxed handlebar moustache.

The short moustache also served to cover Hitler's unfeasibly large nostrils, something not all of his five doppelgängers shared. It also linked him with Charlie Chaplin in the West. This constantly put him in the funny pages and served to play down his threat to America.

Adolf Hitler: "My moustache is political." It was more likely the best doppelgänger tool never to be repeated.

Both Hitler and Chaplin studied under comedians, but only one took themself seriously. The English-American Sir Charles Spencer Chaplin mocked Hitler ruthlessly.

As Hitler became more confident, and more outrageously gay with his faggotty hand-flop wave, the Third Reich was nicknamed "The Gay Reich" and with good reason. Hitler's moustache became narrower, rounder and thicker, until it looked like a lower orifice. Hitler's moustache became so distinctive it allowed his less convincing doppelgängers to be completely accepted. Common thinking went, 'There's the moustache with dark flop fringe on a 5'9" body. It must be Hitler.'

Some of Hitler's doppelgängers were not that convincing and it was the moustache that carried them through. Three-quarters of all Hitler photos are of doppelgängers. The more doppelgängers Hitler used, the more difficult it became to ascertain which was the real Hitler. To date, no historian has risen to the challenge.

From Invention to Mass Use

The Camera had a 14-year delay from invention to production. It took another 60 years to become hand-held, another 18 years to get on the market, another 13 years to be miniaturised, and another 60 years to go digital. The Camera is the most influential invention in world history.

The Fax had a 20-year delay before going commercial, a 41-year delay before transmitting photographs, and a 140-year delay before it became quick enough for human patience.

The Telephone took 51 years to go trans-Atlantic.

Transistor Radios and Calculators had a 7-year delay before they reached the market.

Electricity (AC) took 11 years to reach the market.

Movie Cameras took 4 years to reach the market.

Television had a 10-year delay before it reached the market; 62 years later, we still haven't got 1800-line 3-D Telechrome-colour television.

---

[8] The Memoirs of Bridget Hitler, p. 44.

Videos took 20 years to reach mainstream.

Magnetic Tapes took 64 years to become popular.

Computers took 21 years to reach the market.

Cars took 16 years from the invention of the internal combustion engine to mass production.

Penicillin took 16 years from discovery (1928) to mass use (1944). Many died in extreme agony during the 16 years between.

It took 11 years to move from multi-staged rockets to landing on the Moon. In the light of Cold War propaganda and the Apollo's computers being less powerful than a home PC, men landing on the Moon is still debateable, with less than half the population believing it.[9]

The Internet took 19 years to reach the public and in between was used by the military.

The www took no time at all and grew organically out of a desire for knowledge and synapsis.

The Fluoride Con

One of the by-products of the manufacture of aluminium WWII planes was fluoride, which is difficult to dispose of. The addition of fluoride to the water was first proposed on 29 September 1939 by Gerald J. Cox Ph.D. of the Mellon Institute. His job was to find uses for industrial by-products. In a PR speech built on something that didn't exist, he said, "The present trend towards complete removal of fluorine from water and food may need some reversal . . . it may help with tooth decay."

There was never a trend towards the removal of fluorine out of food or water at the time. It was not even an issue. Fluoride does nothing for tooth decay; however, it does increase infant mortalities by 36% after five years.

The fluoridation of water was a complete fabrication from start to finish. However, the Germans were building huge numbers of planes and openly tested the fluoride by-product on Jews and found it made them more manageable, reducing their powers of lateral thinking. This made it more difficult for the Jews to link events with larger-scale ideas.

This is why fluoride is still used today – for population compliance. Fluoride, like religion and TV, is an opiate of the masses.

Germany, France, Holland and Japan are some of the few countries without fluoridated water. In Germany it is illegal to put any product in the water. Germans refused fluoridated water for its post-war population, arguing that Adolf Hitler used it mixed it with the water to dumb down populations, thus making it easier to conquer nations.

The Japanese culled out all their lateral thinkers 2000 years ago and the Chinese 50 years ago. Germany, on the other hand, culled out its nutters under Hitler.

New Zealand is a country where the practice of lateral thinking is seriously frowned upon, has restricted media time, if any, and is outlawed wherever possible and by whatever means available. As such, New Zealand was one of the first countries to supply fluoridated water (1950), well before the tests were complete.

Rather than culling out its nutters, foreign powers have been filming Kiwi nutters having ‘sex they shouldn’t be having’ and then elevating them to the highest political positions, up to, and including, Prime Minister.

This scenario has been so successful few Prime Ministers have escaped this sure thing. First they are given fluoride, then they are malleable, then they are filmed having sex and then they are malleable in politics. Once malleable in politics, they are elevated into positions of influence.

Hitler had metal teeth surrounded with porcelain, was a noted and filmed coprophiliac and was then placed in roles where the position accelerated his status. Hitler was the perfect role model for this scenario.

The fluoride in toothpaste is sodium fluoride – a byproduct of aluminum production. It is not a good thing.

Fluoride can be good for your teeth, but it has to be naturally occurring calcium fluoride. There is a region in Denmark where this occurs naturally and the locals have good strong teeth.

Appendix 3

Not Without American Help

The Germans were able to fight WWII through the use of synthetic fuels that were created by the hydrogenation process (turning coal into gasoline). This process was discovered by I.G. Farben. Hydrogenation technology would not have been fully developed by WWII, but I.G. Farben made a deal with Rockefeller's Standard Oil, who were able to complete the research, thus facilitating the war. I.G. Farben plants were not targeted by the Allied bombing raids on Germany and by the end of the war their refineries had experienced only 15% damage. They were not strategically removed.

William Dodd, the American ambassador to Germany prior to WWII, wrote to President Roosevelt: "At the present moment, more than a hundred American corporations have subsidiaries here or cooperative understandings. The DuPonts have their allies in Germany that are aiding in the armament business. Their chief ally is the I.G. Farben Company . . . Standard Oil Company . . . sent $2,000,000 here in December, 1933 and has made $500,000 a year helping Germans improve hydrogenation technology . . . The International Harvester Company president told me their business here rose 33% per year, but they could take nothing out. [No earnings, just goods]. Even our airplanes people have secret arrangements with Krupps. General Motors Company [which was controlled by the J.P. Morgan Group] and Ford do enormous business here through their subsidiaries and take no profits out."

Germany needed the capital of these, and many more, American companies in order to wage a war. I.G. Farben had a holding company in the United States called American I.G. Farben. Paul Warburg, his brother Max (head of Germany's secret police during WWI) and Warburg agent Herman Metz were some of the members of the board of directors of the American I.G. Farben. Other directors included Rockefeller/International banking men like Edsel Ford, Charles Mitchell and Walter Teagle.

After the war three Germans from the I.G. Farben board of governors were convicted as war criminals, but the aforementioned Americans were not, even though they participated in the same criminal decisions as those who were punished.

According to author Eustice Mullins, Hitler met with Allen and John Foster Dulles in 1933. The Dulles brothers were acting as legal representatives of Schiff and Warburg's Kuhn, Loeb & Co, which was an Integral part of the Rothschilds network. Mullins claims Kuhn & Loeb had extended large short-term credits to Germany, and needed to ensure the repayment of these loans. The Dulles supposedly assured Hitler he would receive the funds necessary to be installed as Chancellor of Germany if he promised to repay the debts. One of the largest tank manufacturers for Germany was Opel, which was controlled by the J.P. Morgan Group. Another company connected to the J.P. Morgan Group was Bendix Aviation, "which supplied data [to Germany] on automatic pilots, aircraft instruments and aircraft and diesel engine starters". The examples go on and on . . .

The manufactured Pearl Harbor attack allowed Roosevelt to enter America into the war. A second world war had been created by the Illuminati, with the help of the Rothschild/Morgan/Warburg/Schiff syndicate. According to historian Antony C. Sutton, after the end of the war, the tribunals that investigated Nazi war criminals censored "any materials recording Western assistance to Hitler".

Spreading the Blame

New Zealand is a listening post so it is interesting that what happens in the eroding Western society at the bottom of the South Pacific is, more often than not, the test case for the rest of the world. New Zealanders are a population that is constantly being experimented on, first. Hence they are internationally compared to sheep and by the marketeers as 'sheoples'.

New Zealand is the test case for resistance to dehumanisation. It is also the test case to see if covers are to be blown – that is, the believability of conspiracies are tested on New Zealanders via the media, which is why reference to first-screened New Zealand media is so important. Occasionally the programme (whether print media or television) gets it glaringly wrong and the media programme is swiftly changed for the rest of the world.

On 5 December 2003 in a High Court hearing, I asked the High Court judge and the lawyer for the discredited New Zealand police if they were Freemasons. Both said "No" which is what they are trained to do. Regardless, it did have some impact and the Freemasons began opening their doors on 11 September 2004.

Word leaked out that Hitler was a British agent and the Freemasons were about to be exposed for having created WWI and WWII. In response to this, they flung their doors open even wider and began targeting lonely non-thinking groups unable to fight back. The Freemasons are opening their doors to share the blame with geriatrics as this paid advertisement in The New Zealand Herald illustrates (Friday 12 November 2004).

Doppelgänger Hess's Murder

The Affidavit of Hess's Nurse Abdallah Melaouhi

TO: The Service Registering Officer for North West Europe

In the Matter of the Births, Deaths and Marriages (Special Provisions) Act 1957 AND in the Matter of the Entry in the Register of Deaths of RUDOLF WALTHER RICHARD HESS

I, ABDALLAH MELAOUHI . . . do solemnly and sincerely declare as follows:

1. I worked as a male nurse caring for Rudolf Hess from 1 August 1982 until his death on 17 August 1987 at the Allied Military Prison in Spandau. From 1967 to 1970 I trained as a technical medical assistant in tropical diseases at the Institute of Tropical Medicine in Hamburg. From 1970, I continued my training as a qualified male nurse until 1973 when I received a Diploma Certificate in Nursing. In 1974 I moved to Berlin and worked at Hohengatow Hospital in the intensive care unit until 1976. I then attended the specialist medical school, Gauschule, Wedding, at the recommendation of the Department of Health at the Berlin Senate until 1977 and upon completing that training I received a Diploma in anaesthesia and the intensive care of sick people.

I was then promoted to Superior Male Nurse and went to work at Spandau Hospital (Krankenhaus, Spandau) in the intensive care unit until 1st August 1982 when I went to work in the Allied Military Prison in Spandau as Male Nurse for Rudolf Hess.

2. On the day of Mr Hess' death, 17 August 1987, I commenced my duties, which involved caring for Mr Hess, as usual at 6.45 a.m. I assisted him, as was usual, with showering and dressing, and was present when he ate a meal at 10.30 a.m. At no time did he give any indication that his state of mind was disturbed or that he was unduly depressed. Shortly after the meal, he asked me to go to the nearby town of Spandau to purchase a ceramic pot to replace one which was defective. Mr Hess would not have made such a request merely to ensure my absence, since I was always absent in any event from midday, during my noon pause.

3. At 2 p.m. I was called to the prison from my flat which was located outside, but in the immediate vicinity of, the prison (to which I had gone on my return from the town of Spandau). After some delay I reached the summerhouse in the prison garden where I was told that there had been an incident. The small door at the front of the summerhouse was closed.

4. When I entered the summerhouse, the scene was like a wrestling match had taken place; the entire place was in confusion. The straw tiled mat which covered the floor was in disarray, although only the day before I had cleaned the floor and had left the straw tiled mat carefully arranged in its usual place. A tall lamp had fallen over, but I clearly remember that the cable attached to the lamp was still connected to the main socket. It was this lamp cable which the authorities later said that Mr Hess had used to hang himself. A round table and Mr Hess's armchair had also been overturned. In summary, none of the furniture or equipment was in its usual place, and there is no question in my mind but that a struggle had taken place in the summerhouse.

5. The body of Mr Hess was lying on the floor of the summerhouse, apparently lifeless. Near to his body stood two soldiers dressed in US Army uniforms. I had never seen either soldier before. I also saw an American guard, whom I knew as a Mr Tony Jordan. There was no cable anywhere near the body of Mr Hess; as I have said, the only cable was attached to the fallen lamp which was still plugged into the wall.

6. I immediately proceeded to examine Mr Hess. I could not detect any respiration, pulse or heartbeat. I estimated that death had occurred 30 to 40 minutes earlier.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org - 7 March 2013

7. The guard whom I knew as Jordan stood near Mr Hess's feet and appeared overwrought. He was sweating heavily, his shirt was saturated with sweat and he was not wearing a tie. I said to Jordan: "what have you done with him?" He replied: "The pig is finished, you won't have to work a night shift any longer". I told him to bring the emergency case (which contained a first aid kit) and the oxygen appliance, while I commenced artificial respiration. When Jordan returned with the equipment, I noticed that he had first taken the opportunity to change his clothes. The equipment which he brought had clearly been interfered with. The seal on the emergency case had been broken open and its contents were in a state of disorder. The intubation instrument set had no battery and the tube was perforated. Further, the oxygen appliance had no oxygen in it. Yet when I had checked the emergency case and the oxygen appliance that same morning, as part of my normal duties, I am certain that both had been in full working order.

8. Since I did not have any of the necessary equipment I did the best I could which was to perform mouth to mouth resuscitation on Mr Hess and I asked one of the soldiers in American uniform to conduct a heart massage on him. This was at approximately 3.20 pm. These efforts had no discernable effect.

9. A doctor and a medical orderly whom I did not recognise arrived from the English Military Hospital in an ambulance. They brought a heart-lung machine into the summerhouse. I tried to operate the machine but it did not appear to function. Mr Hess was taken to hospital. I accompanied him and made further unsuccessful attempts to resuscitate him in the ambulance. There were final unsuccessful attempts to resuscitate him by the doctors at the hospital. He was pronounced dead at the hospital at 16.10 hours.

10. During the five years in which I daily cared for Mr Hess, I was able to obtain a clear and accurate impression of his physical capabilities. I do not consider, given his physical condition, that it would have been possible for Mr Hess to have committed suicide in the manner later published by the Allied powers. He had neither the strength nor the mobility to place an electric flex around his neck, knot it and either hang or strangle himself. Mr Hess was so weak that he needed a special chair to help him stand up. He walked bent over with a cane and was almost blind. If ever he fell to the ground he could not get up again. Most significantly, his hands were crippled with arthritis; he was not able, for example, to tie his shoelaces. I consider that he was incapable of the degree of manual dexterity necessary to manipulate the electric flex as suggested. Further, he was not capable of lifting his arms above his shoulders; it is therefore in my view not possible that he was able to attach the electric flex to the window catch from which he is alleged to have suspended himself.

11. Having regard to first Mr Hess' physical condition; second, the scene which I discovered in the summerhouse, in particular the location of the electric flex; and third, the surrounding circumstances as I have described them, I am firmly of the view that Mr Hess could not possibly have committed suicide as has been claimed. In my view, it is clear that he met his death by strangulation [1:30 pm], at the hands of a third party.

The Bank of England Heist

During the Battle of Waterloo fought in Belgium, Napoleon appeared to be winning. The first military report to London communicated this on 18 June 1815. However, when the Prussians sent reinforcements, the tide turned in favour of Britain's Wellington. On 20 June 1815 Nathan Mayer Rothschild (1777–1836) received news in London, first by carrier pigeons and then by a fast boat trip, that Napoleon was being beaten. He informed the Government, (perhaps in a give or take manner) and they refused to believe him.

Nathan Mayer Rothschild took advantage of this and sold his stock. Everyone followed suit and this caused a crash on the English stock market. As it bottomed out, Nathan bought all the stock back at rock-bottom prices. The next day, at 11 pm, Britain's War Office 'discovered' Napoleon had lost a third of his men and had indeed been crushed. On 20–21 June 1815, the Rothschild family gained complete control of the British economy and forced England to set up a new Bank of England, which Nathan controlled outright. By 1815 Nathan Mayer Rothschild became the Bank of England, becoming Nathan Mayer, Baron de Rothschild.

Two years later in 1817 France secured loans through government bonds from two opposing banks, a French banking house in Ouvrard and Baring Brothers in London. In October 1818, the Rothschild agents (some of them illegitimate Rothschilds) began buying huge amounts of French government bonds. This increased their value. On 5 November 1818 these were dumped on the open market creating a financial panic as their value declined. This meant the opposing banks, and France itself, no longer had security for their loans and Rothschilds gained complete control of France's finances.

Nathan Mayer Rothschild then became Britain's first Jewish MP. During his 15 years as MP until he died in office, he accomplished absolutely nothing in Parliament. He maintained the position merely for the power, insight and influence. He was a Freemason, Illuminati, and hard man. During his life he profited hugely from war.

After his father's death (in 1836 or 1850) his son, Lionel Nathan, Baron de Rothschild (1808–79) monopolised the family. In 1838, emulating his father, he said, “Permit me to issue and control the money of a nation, and I care not who makes its laws”. He monopolised large international loans creating the Irish famine (1845–50) followed by the Crimean War (1853–56) which set up the Rothschild’s financially. Lionel Nathan was elected to the House of Commons in 1847, but did not assume the position for another 11 years taking the parliamentary oath in a strictly Jewish manner on the auspicious Golden Dawn coven date of 26 July 1858 – interpreted as “one infinite hidden occult forever, from birth to the promise of heaven and death for the populace”.

American and British Intelligence have documented evidence that the House of Rothschild (and other International Bankers) have financed both sides of every war since the American War of Independence (1775–83). One Rothschild agent, Haym Salomon, supported the British patriots during the War of Independence and later made loans to the American presidents from 1801–25 (Thomas Jefferson, James Madison and James Monroe). During the Napoleonic Wars (1800–15) one branch of the family funded France while another financed Great Britain and Germany.

In order to feed their habit of profit from war, the Rothschilds had illegitimate children which they used as agents for either war or money-lending. This was so for Abe Lincoln (A. A. Springs’ son); Adolf Hitler (Lionel Nathan Rothschild’s grandson); and Bill ‘Slick Willie/Bubba/Elvis/Eagle/The Big Dog/Rockefeller Clinton (Winthrop ‘Win’ Rockefeller’s son/Winthrop Paul Rockefeller’s brother).

As a family working the banks around Europe, the Rothschild’s developed a scam of trusted rescuer and kept this going so that investors had to be rescued, repeatedly. This gave them financial control over Europe, much of America and complete financial control over Israel, now their primary agent of war.

By 1913, the Rothschild’s controlled a fortune well over US$300 million. By the time of railroads, coal, ironworks, the Suez Canal, oil exploration, diamonds, the French African empire, the Hapsburg monarchs and the Vatican bankruptcy (1823) their family fortune was over US$2,000 million. This was a family that could buy countries, the Courts, history and silence. The Vatican has remained financially and morally bankrupt ever since – similarly the British monarchy.

Smersh

Smersh was a contraction of ‘Smyert Shpionam’ and roughly meant “Death to Spies”. It was so powerful and feared that no sane man dared mention its name. With headquarters at 13 Sretenka Ulitsa, Moscow, its earliest operation was the assassination of the Mafia/Russian leader Leon Trotsky (Lev Davidovich Bronstein, b. 1879) on 22 August 1940.

After this successful operation, Smersh specialised in killing cowards (treachery) and double agents during the Soviet retreat from Hitler (from 1941) and was used as an execution squad for the NKVD, the forerunner of the KGB.

Smersh were also supposed to have killed the Russian agent/ Martin Bormann doppelgänger in April 1945. The firing squad were all then shot by someone else. Within days a group of British officers were car bombed outside Palestine’s Lod airfield. One of these was Wing Commander Lindsay who had recently been behind German lines and was privy to sensitive information on the leadership challenges within the Third Reich. Smersh and the Betar worked hand in glove on this and it was organised by Joseph Stalin.

Khruschev disbanded Smersh in 1958. It then became Department V (Sabotage and Assassinations). Many KGB Department V officers made their way into Canada via the 1967 Montreal Expo and thereafter made their way into the United Nations . . . who turned a blind eye to it.

Nikolai Semenovich Skvortsov (Smersh) was expelled from Canada for espionage in 1949 and was immediately employed by the United Nations in New York.

In 1971, the United Nations Secretariat in New York employed 207 Soviet nationals of which at least 120 were KGB.

On 24 September 1971, 105 Soviet intelligence officers were expelled from the UN for subverting public officials and stealing technological data. Breshnev then ordered all other Department V personnel to leave their stations in Europe, Asia, Africa and the West, thus exposing them.

In October 1971, Vladimir Pavlichenko, the Director of External

Relations for the United Nations Public Information Office, was exposed as a senior KGB officer by the New York Times. Two days later the United Nations renewed Vladimir's contract for another two years.[1]

Mikhail Mikhailovich Antipov (Department V) was the first secretary of the Soviet mission to the United Nations. He had been involved in sabotage and assassinations since 1952 and operated out of the United Nations under diplomatic immunity for 12 years until 1972.

When you hear the words "The United Nations said . . ." hear "Communism and the NKVD/KGB/FSB said . . ."

The difference between the KGB vehicle and the United Nations vehicle is that the United Nations is the new model – it just has better suspension, but like the East German car, the Trabant, everything is backwards and designed to slow progress and disrupt forward-thinking, any forward-thinking ideologies, any foreign industry and any foreign family model that works.

Through intelligence eyes, the UN and the Red Cross are:
". . . the biggest bunch of intelligence sluts the world has ever seen".

Hugh Trevor-Roper

Baron Dacre of Glanton

Hugh Redwald Trevor-Roper (15 January 1914–26 January 2003) graduated from Christ College, Oxford in 1936 (22) and in 1939 qualified for the master's degree as a research fellow at Merton College. At the age of 26, he wrote Archbishop Laud (1940). As a religious author with soft hands and no field experience, Hugh Trevor-Roper (31) was then sent to Berlin to investigate the authenticity of Hitler's death.

Trevor-Roper then wrote The Last Days of Hitler (1947), The Gentry, 1540–1640 (1953), The Rise of Christian Europe (1966), The European Witch-Craze of the 16th and 17th Centuries (1969), Final Entries, 1945: The Diaries of Joseph Goebbels (1978), Catholics, Anglicans and Puritans (1987) and From Counter Reformation to Glorious Revolution (1992).

Hugh Trevor-Roper was made the Regius Professor of modern history (1957–80) and Master of Peterhouse College, Cambridge (1980–87), during which time he authenticated some 60 volumes of the Hitler Diaries which covered Hitler's innermost thoughts from June 1932 to April 1945.

These were fake, fraudulent and another very well funded attempt to disguise the true events of WWII. The Hitler Diaries were discovered in 1980 by journalist Gerd Heidemann of the German Stern newsmagazine who paid £2,460,000 for the 60 bogus volumes, around £50 per word. Stern published them on 25 April 1983 and they were simultaneously published by The Sunday Times in Britain and sold to Newsweek (US).

Konrad Kujau (46, also known as Konrad Fischer) had told Stern journalist Gerd Heidemann that he was receiving the volumes from an East German general who had retrieved them from a German aircraft that had crashed in the village of Börnersdorf near Dresden in 1945, after it had left Berlin.

On Adolf Hitler's posthumous behalf, Konrad Kujau had previously written poems, a sequel to Mein Kampf and the beginnings of the opera Wieland the Blacksmith (Wieland der Schmied). Gerd Heidemann (54), a Third Reich aficionado, used his money from the deal to buy Hermann Goering's yacht.

Historian David Irving obtained copies of the Hitler Diaries in December 1982, and concluded a few days later that they were fake.

Regius Professor of modern history, Hugh Redwald Trevor-Roper, then Lord Dacre of Glanton, had been hoodwinked. He claims to have expressed serious doubts the day before it was to be published and phoned The Times editor Charles Douglas-Home on Saturday 24 April 1983 (not The Sunday Times) and his message did not get through to the correct newspaper. His endorsement and his failure to communicate effectively when it really counted darkened his reputation and brought much of his previous historical work into question. The West German Federal Archives then declared the diaries to be "grotesque and superficial forgeries", something which historian David Irving knew all along.

Kujau, a balding, portly, jocular man, who revelled in publicity, was captured by West German police on the Austrian border three weeks later on 14 May 1983. With journalist Gerd Heidemann he went through an 11-month trial and was given a four-year prison sentence for forgery.

When Kujau was released in 1988 suffering from cancer he declared to the press that he was going to write a memoir called "I Was Hitler". Ten years later The Originality of Forgery (Die Originalität der Fälschung) was published under his name, but he did not write it.[1]

[1] The Times, London, 14 September 2000.

Konrad Kujau then became a celebrated forger and made a fantastic living selling genuine forgeries of Hitler, Monet, Rembrandt and van Gogh paintings. With his new-found notoriety he signed the paintings with the original artist's name and his own name. By the 1990s he was so popular his paintings were fetching up to £42,000 each and a counterfeit sub-market appeared in fakes of his fakes.

Such is history – fakes upon fakes.

Kujau (27 June 1938–21 September 2000) then ran for mayor in his hometown of Löbau in 1994 and in Stuttgart in 1996, failing both times.

Despite lecturing propaganda history for 26 years and making the biggest historical booboo of the twentieth century, Hugh Trevor-Roper was retained as the great WWII historian and made honorary fellow and life peer in 1987 – cover upon cover.

Baron Hugh Redwald Trevor-Roper believed in his own intellectual rigour and could make up history with the eloquent language of his breeding. His elevation was enough to give him a following in England.

Hugh R. Trevor-Roper was a naïve intellectual who was easily bluffed by his own employers. His employers, the upper crust of British society and intelligence, gave him kudos, position and status for recording their eloquent status quo of investigative lies. As a result he was made Baron Dacre of Glanton.

Baron Hugh Redwald Trevor-Roper died aged 89 from cancer in a hospice in Oxford and was survived by three stepchildren. He was British aristocracy and wrote their history with a handcuffed pen.

History is the recording of lies from which to build an uncertain peace and justify the next war.
As long as that works,
it is the history that is selected.

British Army Major Hugh Trevor-Roper (left) used the testimony of Sturmbannführer Erich Kempka, Hitler's personal chauffeur (right) as the basis for The Last Days of Hitler and Britain's history of WWII.

Trevor-Roper was assigned to the task by Dick White (MI-6) later director-general of MI-5 (1953–56) and Head of British Secret Intelligence Service (1956–68).

Richard 'Dick' White was a close friend of the treasonous spy, Anthony Blunt, and MI-5 Security Inspector, Baron Victor Rothschild, 'the Fifth Man' in 'the Cambridge Five'. From 1935–63 the Cambridge Five managed to leak all Britain's military secrets and intelligence operations to Russia.

Unlikely Heroes

Because Hitler had been a house painter, they were held in high regard in Nazi Germany. If anyone didn't pay a painter in the Third Reich they were in serious trouble. Insulting the Führer or not paying a painter were (equally) reason enough to be thrown into a concentration camp. Those who didn't pay their painter could also have their houses confiscated. As a result painters were treated with kid gloves and generally not questioned. This preferential treatment gave painters enough leeway to be very effective spies.

René Duchez, a French painting and decorating subcontractor took advantage of this. He took a job at the Caen offices of the dreaded Organisation Todt. He was not a spy, but on impulse stole the plans of Hitler's massive Atlantic Wall from the German engineers. These were the plans of the German defences around Cherbourg and Le Havre. The plans showed the position of the gun emplacements, batteries, pillboxes, machine-gun posts, trench systems, supply and ammunition dumps, fields of fire, gun range, communication systems, command systems and the technical specifications.

René's plans of the Atlantic Wall were taken to England via ship. They were tossed on the deck and generally disregarded during the sailing, then tossed onto an office desk at MI-6 with little or no notice given. MI-6 studied the plans lightly and then recognised their importance.

MI-6 feared the plans would be useless believing the Germans would change everything when they realised the plans had been stolen, but the German design engineers were even more fearful of the consequences, so they produced a duplicate copy and never mentioned it to anyone. British aerial reconnaissance then confirmed German construction was continuing according to the plans René Duchez had stolen.

As well as stealing the plans of the Atlantic Wall, René Duchez would hang around the cafés the German engineers used and pose as the village idiot. He'd initate arguments about their engineering practices and volunteer old-fashioned advice. The Germans would then draw him pictures of what was actually going on.

During the air raids René Duchez would crawl all over the Atlantic Wall with the French agent Henri Marigny and during weekends he would cycle with children along the coast and draw maps. On his return journey these were hidden in the handlebars of the children's bikes.

René was eventually betrayed to the Gestapo. When they came around to his house they found his wife arguing with a dissatisfied customer of her husband. The Gestapo escorted him out of the house, only to discover much later, that it was René Duchez they had removed. In this way, René Duchez, the French painter and paperhanger was one of the great spies of WWII.

René Duchez with Mothballs.

James Bond – Sir Sean Connery

Sir Sean Connery was born Thomas Connery in Edinburgh, Scotland in 1930. He left school at 13 to work on a milk round (1943) before joining the Royal Navy at 16 (1946). He was invalided out of the forces at the very young age of 18 (1948) due to an ulcer and began body-building and truck driving.

His first big break was in the London stage production of South Pacific (1951), a television production called Requiem for a Heavyweight (1956), followed by a string of B-grade movies: Time Lock (2-minute cameo, 1957), Another Time, Another Place (1958), Darby O'Gill & the Little People (1959), On the Fiddle ('Never have so few FIDDLED so many!', 1961), The Frightened City (1961) and The Longest Day (1962).

He was then picked for the role of James Bond (killing with style) by Cubbi Broccolli in 1962, doing Dr. No (1962) with Ian Fleming as consultant, From Russia with Love (1963), Goldfinger (1964), Thunderball (1965), You Only Live Twice (1967) and Diamonds Are Forever (1971).

During this time he also made Marnie (1964), A Fine Madness (1966), Shalako (1968), Red Tent (1969) and Molly Maguires (1970).

He has since done The Anderson Tapes (1971), Zardoz (1973), The Offence (1973), The Terrorists (1974), Murder on the Orient Express (1974), The Wind and the Lion (1975), The Man Who Would Be King (1975), Robin and Marian (1976), The Arab Conspiracy (1976), A Bridge Too Far (1977), Meteor (1979), The Great Train Robbery (1979), Cuba (1979), Time Bandits (1981), Outland (1981), Wrong Is Right (1982), Five Days One Summer (1983), Sword of the Valiant (1983), Never Say Never Again (1983), The Name of the Rose (1986), Highlander (1986), The Untouchables (1987 and Oscar), The Presidio (1988), Memories of Me (1988), Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade (1989), Family Business (1989), The Russia House (1990), The Hunt for Red October (1990), Robin Hood, Prince of Thieves (1991), Highlander 2: The Quickening (1991), Medicine Man (1992), Rising Sun (1993), Just Cause (1994), A Good Man in Africa (1994), First Knight (1995), The Rock (1996), Dragonheart (voice-over, 1996), Playing by Heart (1998), The Avengers (1998), Entrapment (1999), Finding Forrester (2000) and The League of Extraordinary Gentlemen (2003).

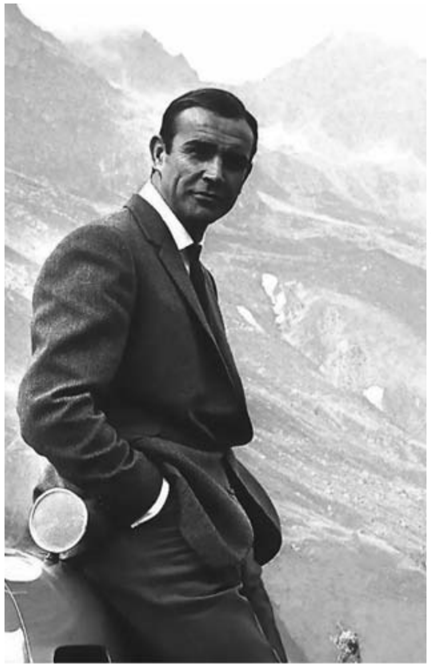
Sir Sean Connery has been in over 57 movies and lives in the Bahamas from where he donates money to the Scottish National Party. At 59 years of age he was voted the world's sexiest man.

Ironically, in the 1970s the biggest gang of murderers in Northern Ireland were 'The Milkmen' and most of them were milkmen made up of New Zealand Maoris. It appeals to the sense of humour of military spy chiefs to send out operatives disguised as milkmen on the basis that no one would ever expect any harm to come from them. Their link with Sean Connery's first job is purely coincidental and has been included for clarification and, to dispel any rumours to the contrary . . . Sean Connery is no Maori!



England had its nuclear arsenal stored in Ireland and in 1978 Russia attacked Ireland to get at these. While neither confirming nor denying their existence, England hired New Zealand mercenaries to go into Northern Ireland and create strife. The Kiwi's became 'Milkmen' for cover and reconnaissance.

The Kiwi milkmen would dress as IRA, identify their targets from photos taped to the butts of their M16 or Armalite rifles, kill, load the bodies in a Triumph 2.5TC with a Leyland P76 V8 motor, drive to a prearranged location and hand over the bodies to the Garbage Men.

The Garbage Men would then put the bodies in a Land Rover and drive out into the countryside. A posthole borer originally mounted on the left-hand side of the front bumper was later moved to the right rear and these were used to dig a ten-foot hole. The skull, shoulder blades, spine, humerus and femurs were smashed with an engineer's ballpein hammer and the body was dropped in head first with half a sack of quicklime poured over the top. This broke down the remains quicker. The hole was then sealed with the original grassed plug. Six to ten inch posthole borer-sized plug subsidence is still visible around Ireland and England today although most are now disguised under bushes.

- treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

The IRA would get the blame again and again for murders and explosions and the British Army would go in and protect their nuclear arsenal under the guise of cleaning things up – again and again – as long as 'nuclear' was the hot issue.

This is why no one from the British side has come forward to name IRA gravesites. It is something only Kiwi's can do.

For this reason, the New Zealand officer who ran the Garbage Men was 'accidentally' killed in a parachuting accident in a Tasmanian mangrove swamp in the 1980s, from which there was no escape. The tragedy is that he was as loyal to the Queen as any Maori.

New Zealand mercenaries would also go into Asian villages wherever the next war was going to be, kill everyone in the village so there were no witnesses, lay out the bodies, open up their postal bags, pull out Chinese and Russian weapons, place them alongside the bodies, photograph them and report that they had killed communists.

This sheep dipping made the New Zealand mercenaries look like heroes and the communists and Russians a threat. Those who survived the set up of war eventually had to chose a side and take up arms. If they didn't choose a side, they were merely killed and the pattern repeated – the weapons of their assassin's opposition placed next to them and the new dead photographed again and again.

Military Intelligence used these Suitcase Men who seemed comfortable with any and all degrees of the stitch-up. They'd even redress civilian child casualties in military style clothing and supply half-sized weapons to photograph next them, ensuring the child looked like a soldier of some merit. What do the Suitcase Men do now? They take photographs of the All Blacks of course – oh true and faithful servant. (Since publication in Sept. 2005, the photographer has been promoted.)

These photos did have the desired affect. TIME and National Geographic published them and helped to create the public indignity that put the heart behind the West's funding of these wars, until their own got killed. It was years and sometimes decades later before Western citizens woke up and realised it was just another Military Industrial Complex fundraiser and a depopulation exercise to keep the population planners in the upper echelons of the United Nations happy.

When the United Nations says, "We estimate that by 2005 one in four people on the planet will be Chinese", you can bet there will be a plan to kill off this population. Sure enough, there are repeated attempts to perfect the killing of Chinese, first with Chairman Mao and his 70 million, then with H5N1 (the Avian Flu, the new Spanish Flu), the virus which is having its fatality and contagiousness continually perfected and tested on "the Chicken Sleepers" in Manchuria. In this case, the Chinese people are the victims at home and the weapons in the West.

Despite this, the paedophile Chairman Mao did his best with the killing of 70 million Chinese from 1936–76, with no books available other than 'The Little Red Book' (Mao Zedong on People's War, 1967) and absolutely no advantage to China whatsoever.

Mao Zedong (1893–1976) was Stalin's agent and Stalin had been gifted the United Nations for an eight day war from 8–15 August 1945. Like Hitler and Stalin, Mao Zedong had been deconstructed and was a man of no ideology, who stood for nothing and achieved nothing, other than spending his life in bed having sex on call with under-aged concubines, reading, but not absorbing the information, and 70 million deaths, which was more than Hitler and Stalin.

Chairman Mao's motto was "Political power grows through the barrel of a gun." His 'Great Leap Forward' and 'Cultural Revolution' achieved absolutely nothing for China. When he died, his third wife tried to seize power, but was arrested as part of the 'Gang of Four'.

This is war and this is the pattern of war from Hitler, Stalin and Chairman Mao to the Milkmen, the Garbage Men, the Suitcase Men and now.

So what is that – 130 million down and another 5.87 billion to go? Watch the news. It will tell you everything you don't need to know and everything that will stop you from knowing.

Research is under-funded and continually compromised.
"Truth is the first casualty of war"
and those who tell the truth about war are continually threatened by The Forces of Order.
By the time a true historian publishes, he is already one-third cat.

Appendix 11

Hitler's Host for Hitler's Ghost

Rámon Serrano Súñer (12 September 1901–1 September 2003) was born in Cartagena, a seaport in the southeast of Spain. His father was José Serrano Lloberes, a distinguished civil engineer who worked on the Valencian port of Castellón. His birthplace was Spain's premier naval port and the largest naval base in the Mediterranean. It was a political town renowned for its Poms and MI-6 presence.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Rámon Serrano Súñer was an excellent student and, despite his father's sane protests, studied law at Madrid's Universidad Central. One of his closest friends was José Antonio Primo de Rivera who also studied law. He was the son of Miguel Primo de Rivera y Orbaneja (8 January 1870–16 March 1930), born in Paris to a family of soldiers. With his contacts in the British Military's General Staff, Primo de Rivera became dictator by coup from September 1923–January 1930, becoming General Pilar Primo de Rivera. He stepped down in January 1930 and died two months later. Officially, "He died in Paris apparently from diabetes, although the exact cause of death has not been determined."[1]

Spymaster: "He was killed in an air accident, a favourite MI-6 method of silencing political leaders, creating an instantly randomised and anonymous death. This is the curse of the 20th century and MI-6." Within three years Franco had overall command of the Spanish Army (1933) and eventually replaced General Rivera.

Rámon 'Serrano' Súñer graduated from Madrid Central University with the highest honours, then passed the combative legal examinations to join the elite corps of public prosecutors, the 'Abogados del Estado'. He spent a year at Bologna (the equivalent of Bavaria) where he developed a taste for fascism and was then posted to Zaragoza in 1929, where he became friends with General Francisco Franco.

In October 1923, Franco (4 December 1892–20 November 1975) married the strict Roman Catholic, Carmen Polo y Martinez-Valdès (9 July 1900–6 February 1988). Three years later he was made the youngest General of any European Army at the age of 34 (1926). Franco passed the favour on and made Serrano (28) the director of the Zaragoza Military Academy. Zaragoza is the capital of the autonomous region of the former Kingdom of Aragón at the crossroads between Madrid and Barcelona, and Bilbao and Valencia.

Serrano would rock up for dinner and it was here that he met his future wife Zita Polo y Martinez-Valdès, the beautiful younger sister of Carmen Franco. Rámon Serrano Súñer then became the brother-in-law of Franco in what was undoubtedly one of the great MI-6 honey-traps of all time, something approaching Mark Antony and Cleopatra. They had six children together. Zita was the better Catholic.

When they got married (1931), his best friend José Antonio Primo de Rivera (son of the recently deceased dictator) was his best man. José Antonio (24 April 1903–20 November 1936) became one of the founders of the Falange (1933) and editor of El Fascio. Five years later while José Antonio Primo de Rivera was awaiting execution at the beginning of the Spanish Civil War (1936), he named Serrano as one of the two executors of his will.

José Antonio was executed without trial at Alicante and became a national martyr at 34. Such was his popularity that Franco had his life artificially extended in order to die on the same day as José, 39 years later, and was buried next to him. This meant that Latino fascists could celebrate on the one day.

The Spanish are such impossible romantics.

José Antonio's brother Fernando was also killed without trial in the Madrid Jail at the beginning of the Spanish Civil War (July 1936), while their surviving brother was the Spanish Ambassador to Britain, abundant with MI-6 connections. Their sister founded the female branch of the Falange, and in the February 1936 election Falange managed to gain 0.7% of the nation's vote.

Rámon Serrano Súñer was one of the outstanding legal minds of his generation. Daily access to Franco and his association with the former dictator's son completed his credentials. At the elections in 1933, Serrano was the successful Zaratoga Ceda candidate (Catholic Authoritarian Conferación Española de Derechas Autónomas) and became the Conservative member for the Cortes Party (1933–36). He was also a prominent figure in the Catholic youth movement and carried much of its rank-and-file over to fascist Falange on the eve of Civil War – something approaching masterful deception.

The Canary Islands are way out in the Atlantic off southern Morocco and the British virtually patrol them. They were run by MI-6 then and they are run by MI-6 now. It remains a retirement home for many Pommy spooks.

Franco, a graduate of the Toledo military academy, was suspected of plotting against the leftist government (1933–36), so he was sent to the MI-6-dominated Canary Islands where he became the military commander. It was from here that he plotted in secrecy and isolation (in conjunction with MI-6) the Spanish Civil War (16 July 1936–1 April 1939), the testing ground for fascism, the training ground for WWII, Hitler's post-war destination and the beginning of the Cold War.

With overall command of the Spanish Army since 1933, Franco flew to Spanish Morocco and led the Spanish troops in North Africa against the leftist Republic government in Spain.

Sanjuro was the official leader of the rebellion (Civil War) but was conveniently killed in a plane crash four days into the war (20 July 1936). Fascist Germany and Italy sent troops and weapons in support on 26 July 1936 and Franco proclaimed himself Head of State (el Caudillo) on 29 September 1936. The government then left the combat zone, moving from Madrid to Valencia, with the inauguration taking place on 1 October 1936.

Fascist Germany and Italy officially recognised the Franco régime on 18 November 1936. They followed up with Heinkel He51 biplanes, the German Condor Legion on 7 May 1937, and later with Junkers JU52 and Messerschmitt Me109s.

Franco's 2IC was then killed on 3 June 1937. This left Franco and Serrano as the outstanding leaders.

Britain and France recognised the regime on 27 February 1939. Officially it was "reluctantly" but their recognition pre-empted the conquest of Madrid (28 March 1939) and the official end of the Spanish Civil War (1 April 1939) by a month.

Franco failed to warn Serrano that the Civil War was about to start (16 July 1936) and Serrano was caught in Madrid with his family. José and Fernando Primo de Rivera appealed for sanctuary at the British and French embassies, but were refused. They were then caught in the crossfire, captured and held in a Republican prison. Many of Serrano's friends were marched out of jail and murdered, Fernando Primo de Rivera among them. José Primo de Rivera was held for four months before being executed.

This experience imbued a hatred of democracy in Serrano, just as it was supposed to do. This is a common theme to fascist heroes (the same thing happened to Hitler) and the Republican marksmen would have been advised by MI-6: "Don't shoot the public prosecutor, the 36-year-old slightly built handsome distinct figure with aristocratic bearing."

As the war turned in October 1936, Serrano utilised an old MI-6 trick dating back to the 1600s and dressed as a woman to escape. Officially Serrano made his way to fascist Argentina where he joined the navy, sailed to France and made his way to Salamanca (20 February 1937) where he joined Franco's office working on the Falangist side of the Spanish Civil War . . . but it is more likely that he spent four months in MI-6 training in exchange for his assisted escape.

Salamanca, in central Spain, is part of the autonomous Kingdom of León and is one of the most spectacular renaissance cities in Europe. Salamanca is nicknamed 'the Golden City' for its aged sandstone, one of the finest squares in Europe, Castle-León, and the Romanesque cathedral that imitates the Hagia Sophia. In 2002 it was voted the European capital of culture, a title it shared with Bruges.

Following the 1936–39 Spanish Civil War, Rámon Serrano Súñer became the Chairman of the Falange Executive Committee, President of the Political Council of the Falange that governed Spain (full effective control), Minister of the Interior (Whom do we kill? 30 January 1938–40), Minister of Press and Propaganda (1939–40) where he developed the Whom do we malign? State News Agency, EFE (1939), and became the Foreign Affairs Minister from 16 October 1940–September 1942.

Rámon Serrano Súñer was in charge of the government, the press, suppression of the truth, the projection of lies, accusations, trials, convictions, the police, judiciary, the military, murder and Spain's international position.

Serrano was also a Nordic-Anglo-Saxon coloniser. He objected to the increasing role of the Roman Catholic Church in the Falange Party. There may have been no increase in Catholic influence, but at least he had made his official statement. One of the goals of WWII was to separate the Church from the State and that theme was common to all political parties right across the globe.

Serrano was Spain's answer to Goebbels, Goering, Himmler, Hess and Ribbentrop all rolled into one with a bit of Churchill and Moshe Dayan thrown in on the side. He was often called "the Spanish Goebbels" or "the Spanish Himmler". Serrano was Franco's aid and handler and his role often transcended that of el Caudillo himself. Quicksilver Rámon Serrano Súñer was effectively the head of the fascist Falange from 1937–42, with Franco taking the blame for Serrano's fascism. The Falangista was Spain's sole political party.

Franco was nicknamed Generalísimo (Cuñadísimo) meaning "a commissioned officer of the highest rank", "General of the highest degree" or "Commander in chief of the entire armed forces". Rámon Serrano Súñer was nicknamed "the brother-in-law issimo" (el Cuñadísimo).

The Spanish had a cool and casual sense of humour considering the number of dead.

As the much-accomplished brother-in-law of Franco, Serrano (the secret fascist) had a skill for building up the relationship with Mussolini and he modelled Spain after Benito Mussolini's fascist Italy. He also brought Franco and Mussolini together which indicates he had MI-6 connections. Serrano still publicly admired Mussolini in the mid-1990s. He was the only one.

Pedro Lain Entralgo worked for Serrano as a press official in the Spanish Interior Ministry (Whom do we kill?). Whenever a foreigner has a Pommy name in their midst, you can bet they are working for the British, and usually MI-6. 'Lain' is a British name and Pedro Lain Entralgo travelled to Nazi Germany three times during 1939 and 1940.

While in Germany, he was supported by Wilhelm Faupel, the Spanish Ambassador to Germany who directed the Spanish-German Cultural Institute (1934–45). This may seem innocent enough, but Wilhelm Faupel was Army General Wilhelm Faupel who received the esteemed military awards, the Pour le Mérite (8 June 1918) and the Oakleaves (4 August 1918), joined the Freikorps as a commander as soon as it started two months after the end of WWI (January 1919) and became Oberstleutnant (Leutnant-Colonel) Wilhelm Faupel.

Wilhelm Faupel, director of the Spanish-German Cultural Institute, was Army General Freikorps Commander Leutnant-Colonel Wilhelm Faupel who ran a Spanish spy agency in Germany with links to the Spanish spy agency in England.

Spain was such a divided nation that when their war ships were in port they would shoot each other across ships and even on the same ship. Heavy ordnance was not ruled out. Spain was the frontier where Britain and Germany met. As cousins, each had their claim and Spain was continually factionalised by Intelligence from both countries. As such, Spain became the trial run for WWII.

While in Germany, Pedro Lain Entralgo called for "Spanish colonial expansion in North Africa". Franco then publicly demanded Gibraltar and French North Africa. They knew that Hitler would refuse immediately and this charade gave Franco enough reason to turn down Germany's request that Spain become one of Germany's serf colonies, just as the Low Countries had.

In this way, Spain maintained its non-belligerent neutrality during WWII. Franco and Serrano had MI-6's military brilliance at their beck and call.

Hitler had been planning his escape to Spain since the war began, and to this end, Serrano had been conversing with the Germans from 1939. This continued with Ribbentrop (the Nazi Ambassador to England) on 17 September 1940 and with Ribbentrop and Canaris prior to the meeting with Hitler. Admiral Canaris had privately advised Spain not to join the Axis powers of Germany, Italy and Japan as England would win the war.

With meetings regarding Hitler's post-WWII escape going on in England, Germany and France, Rámon Serrano Súñer was officially made Spain's Foreign Affairs Minister on 16 October 1940, exactly a week before he accompanied Franco to the meeting with Hitler, Ribbentrop and aides at Hendaye on 23 October 1940.

Hendaye is the last French coastal resort town before entering Spain and is on the border with Spain's San Sebastian, near Bilbao in the Bay of Biscay. Canaris liked Bilbao so much he had properties there.

Officially this meeting was to discuss Spain's part in WWII, and to this end, no official progress was ever made, to the extent that Serrano failed to record anything of the meeting. The meetings were primarily about a safe haven for Hitler's exile.

The next day (24 October 1940) Serrano sent his junior official, Pedro Lain Entralgo, back in his place, to talk more with Ribbentrop over a secret protocol between Germany, Italy and Spain of which only Hitler, Mussolini and Serrano were to have knowledge.

Serrano would only avoid such a meeting if he felt the need to maintain plausible deniability. Spending two days at a meeting for which there were no records is not plausibly deniable.

The meetings contained vague territorial offers, but they were really about Hitler's escape to Spain at the end of WWII. Hitler had a history in architecture and liked Hendaye and the whole romantic feel of the place. Officially Hitler and Franco had "failed" negotiations on 23 October 1940 and nothing was recorded of their meeting. In real terms the whole thing was a smashing success and Serrano made further visits to Germany a month later in November 1940, and again in November 1941, to tidy up the details.

Once this was complete, the cover had to be instigated and all three disowned each other. Franco adopted a cooler attitude towards Germany and Italy and dismissed his 'Hess', Rámon Serrano Súñer, in September 1942, blaming him for the very German alliance he had just torpedoed. Hitler publicly called Rámon Serrano Súñer "the gravedigger of the new Spain" and Serrano was forced to officially resign his posts.

After WWII Serrano wrote a persuasive public letter to Franco, "calling for a transitional government that would have room for intellectuals in exile". Franco replied by scribbling "Ho-ho" in the margin and Hitler now had a safe haven.[2]

[2] Web: Facts, Info, and Encyclopedia article, Rámon Serrano Súñer.

Serrano remained a proud Catholic, which placed him at odds with the Nazis who officially regarded him as an enemy – perfect cover for receiving the new Holy Ghost, the six times dead and resurrected Catholic British agent, Adolf Hitler.

In the 1940s Serrano was considered a hypochondriac and in poor health. He officially retired from public life in 1947 and lived quietly thereafter – but at 94 he was still giving authoritative history lectures (minus the history) for 3½ hours before he was asked to stop (1995).

In 1947 Serrano published his first volume of memoirs, Between Hendaye and Gibraltar (Entre Hendaya y Gibraltar) which also completely excluded Franco and Serrano's meeting with Hitler and Ribbentrop at Hendaye (23 October 1940), his aides meeting the day after (24 October 1940), his meeting with Hitler in the witching hours of 3 May 1945 at Barcelona, and his subsequent meetings with Hitler in his post-life as 'the German Gardener'.

After Franco's death and the end of his reign (1939–75) Serrano published Between Silence and Propaganda, History As It Really Was (1977) and severely dented Franco's reputation, but still left out these same historical meetings.

More accurate examples of the Spanish Civil War may be found in Ernest Hemmingway's For Whom the Bell Tolls and George Orwell's MI-6 account, Homage to Catalonia.

The tragedies of Serrano's life inclined him towards fanaticism, but his legal mind and ministerial responsibilities made him a pragmatist. He was a lawyer, politician, author, MI-6 agent, fascist and prolific liar with a sparsity of morals. Like Hitler, he was also working for the Catholic cause and like most competent diminutive prosecuting lawyers, he believed his own lies unto death. Rámon Serrano Súñer gave himself plausible deniability in the part he played in history by charismatically thrusting his own sectionalised mind onto other's.

Franco and Serrano were the men who set up Spain to hide Hitler. With the help of MI-6, they gave Spain interim status so that no one, and no governorship, could ever take the blame.

As the uncrowned King of Spain, Franco supported this further in 1969 by designating the former King's grandson, Juan Carlos de Borbón, as his successor. This effectively meant that Spain was on loan to the fascists for the duration of WWII and its stitch ups – the 45 years from 1930 to 1975.

Hitler and Franco at Hendaye,
23 October 1940.

The Hitler scenario was very similar to the Jesus scenario and may have been used as a model.

Jesus was crucified on 1 March AD33 when he was 40, with two others to make it look convincing, one of whom was a doppelgänger for Simon ("Simon says, 'Hold out your arms'") and only the guerrilla warfare assassin, Judas Sicarii died (similar to Goebbels).

Simon was the head of East Manasseh and also known as Simon Magus (Simon the Magician), Zadoc Simon, Simon the Cannonite (Simon the Fanatic) and Simon the Leper. He was one of the most powerful people in the land, just as Martin Bormann was.

Similar to Hitler, all public and private records of Jesus' family were burnt by the Roman governors. Those who kept their family records were called the Desponsyni which became the root word for 'desperate'. They were hunted like outlaws and pursued to death by the Roman Empire and its Church. The none-too-bright spies, Peter and Paul, were killed off in AD64 by the same people that later elevated them to sainthood. The sacking of Jerusalem was completed in AD70.

Jesus was resuscitated and physically resurrected three days after the crucifixion to be acknowledged by the Marys. Hitler was transported to Spain three days later to be acknowledged by Eve.

Espayo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

Jesus travelled as far as possible from the clutches of the Roman Empire and went to Srinagar, in northwest India (40 km south of the border with Pakistan) to the highest peak in the area. There is a shrine to him here at Yusamarg – 'Jesus Meadow'. He was acknowledged by both the Christian and Islamic worlds and is mentioned in both teachings.

Similarly, Hitler is acknowledged by both the fascist and communist ideologies and is mentioned in both political teachings. Both achieved mass destruction and the opposite of what they set out to do. Jesus left a destroyed Jerusalem and Hitler left a destroyed Germany.

From Yusamarg, Jesus escaped some 250 km away to the Ladhak region of Tibet (now part of India) where he studied at the Hemis monastery, down the famous Indus River from Leh. Although this area is currently under Indian governorship, the people speak a very ancient form of Tibetan called 'Ladhak'. They are Tibetan traditionalists in language and culture. The Hemis monastery was shown in the movie Samsara, but the Tibetan language was modernised for the movie.

Similarly, Hitler escaped from the Parc de la Ciutadella to the Montserrat monastery just outside Barcelona and belonged to a secret Tibetan Lodge and practised Tibetan occultism.

There are four monasteries in the Ladhak region of India (former Tibet). The first is Spituk on the east side of the Indus river. The second is Mato some two hours from Leh on the west side of the river. The third is Stagma, a further hour's walk, and the fourth is Hemis, which is the big monastery. These are at 11,000 ft so there isn't much oxygen.[3] Jesus lived in the Hemis monastery in the Ladhak region of Tibet where he studied Buddhism.

At the council meeting in Ephesus in AD70 Jesus was referred to as "the lamb" and "St John" as in the St John's Ambulance Association.

Hitler was referred to as "Rabbit" and "the German Gardener" and is immortalised through the Volkswagen.

Jesus lived to physically die again around AD73 (aged 80) and his followers hoped he would be reborn again and again. When this didn't happen, a vacuum was created.

Hitler died six times within a day in Berlin (30 April/1 May 1945), was swished to Spain (3 May 1945), physically died in February 1950 (aged 60), but then his doppelgängers kept popping up all over the place for the next 22 years (until late 1972), as do his undressed imitators and dressed followers.

Jesus is preserved on a sadomasochistic cross, continually dying as he takes away the sins of those in denial.

Hitler was a sadomasochist and is preserved above a reverse harmony swastika (representing chaos) and is reborn daily in the sins and denial of every second politician – It's "Church on Sundays, hell six days a week, and at least I'm not as bad as Hitler."

How could anything possibly go wrong?

The Origins of Animal Farm

George Orwell (25 June 1903–21 January 1950) was born Eric Arthur Blair in Bengal, India, the second child of Richard Walmesley Blair and Ida Mabel Limonzin. His father worked for the Opium Department of the Imperial Civil Service (British monarchy/government drug trafficking) and his mother was the daughter of a tea-merchant in Burma (Burma was a harvest zone for drugs later hidden in tea). He then moved to England with his mother in 1904 and saw his father again for three months in 1907. He described his family as "lower-upper-middle class".

When he was six he won a scholarship to St Cyprian's Preparatory School in Eastbourne, Sussex. From here he went to Wellington for a term and then to Eton College where he was a King's Scholar from 1917–21, essentially a spy training network for MI-6 so it comes naturally and they don't have to pay them later. Here he made lifetime friendships with a number of future British intellectuals and spies. At Eton, Aldous Huxley was his French teacher for a term.

Orwell failed to win a university scholarship and it was here that his career diverged from his peers. He left England in 1922 and went to his mother's hometown in Burma and served as an assistant superintendent in the Indian Imperial Police (1922–27). Like his colleagues, he took on a native mistress and then quickly grew to dislike British imperialism. This was the role of Burmese beauties.

With this experience he tried becoming a total immersion author. Between 1928–33 he lived as a tramp, beggar, homeless person and itinerant in England and in France (near his aunt's pantry) and then stayed with his sister, aunt or parents to bring himself back from the depths of society he had immersed himself in. He even managed to get himself arrested for drunkenness, spending 48 hours in prison just to get the feel of it.

In 1933 he wrote for the New Adelphi and lived in Hayes in Middlesex, where he taught at a private school. Officially, the beginnings of tuberculosis during this time forced him into part-time work, and he became an assistant at a second-hand bookshop – notorious spy networks and the equivalent of the literary underground. He wrote Down and Out in Paris and London (1933) and needed a pseudonym to maintain a cover and save his parents' embarrassment. He considered 'Kenneth Miles' and 'H. Lewis Allways', but settled on 'George Orwell', a name that reflected the 'Spies and Traders' knighthood of the order of St Michael and St George, the reigning monarch (King George V) and the River Orwell that ran through Suffolk. 'George Orwell' was a code name that reeked of MI-6 influence.

Orwell then worked as a shopkeeper in Wallington, Hertfordshire (1936–40) and published Burmese Days (1934) and A Clergyman's Daughter (1935). Meanwhile, his wife-to-be, Eileen O'Shaugnessy, was becoming very accomplished in her own right.

Eileen Maud O'Shaughnessy (25 September 1905–29 March 1945) was born in northeast England, the only daughter of a customs collector. She attended Sunderland Church High School (founded 1884), where she was once a student of J.R.R. Tolkien's. She studied at Oxford University in the late 1920s and graduated with a degree in psychology. To celebrate the Sunderland Church High School's 50th anniversary (1934) she looked ahead 50 years to the school's centenary in 1984 and wrote a collection of poems of what life would be like then. She included mind control and personal freedom eradicated by a police state. She called these "End of the Century, 1984" and was also a big influence on her future husband's vision in Animal Farm.

In 1935 she met George Orwell and they married in 1936. George was working on a commissioned documentary account of unemployment in Nordy country (North England), which resulted in The Road to Wigan Pier.

The Spanish Civil War broke out in British Intelligence controlled Spain on 16 July 1936, and as an MI-6 agent George was assigned as a war correspondent (like many other writers). Orwell was an uncompromising individualist and political idealist and argued that writers have an obligation to fight social injustice, oppression and the power of totalitarian regimes. The newly married couple arrived in Spain in December 1936. George soon took up arms and joined the struggle against Franco's fascists becoming a member of the Lenin Division in Barcelona. His wife Eileen was his support and civilian intelligence. She effectively kept him alive and informed.

Orwell looked like a robber chief, being inclined to rough-looking clothing, leather jerkins and high leather boots. He carried a long ex-German Mauser 98 Gewher and topped the outfit off with a large knife. When you think of all the other Poms in Spain dressed up like Christmas trees, it was a practical-looking outfit.

In early January 1937 he was given the rank of corporal, sent from Barcelona to join the offensive at Aragón and from there to the front line of Huesca in February. In early May, he took a week's leave to be with his new wife in Barcelona and exchange information. He returned on 12 May to be promoted to 2nd lieutenant in command of 30 men, one of which was a Scotsman named Jimmy.

While talking to an American sentry near Huesca at 5 am on 20 May 1937, Orwell was hit in the neck by a Franco sniper bullet leaving him temporarily dumb and his left side paralysed. This enabled him to go to hospital where he heard that his unit had been declared illegal and were in danger of being murdered by the communist comrades within their unit. With this foreknowledge (his wife included) he managed to escape what was the utter chaos of the Spanish Civil War. Much of his unit was either thrown in prison or murdered, depending on food rations.

This was described in Homage to Catalonia which, after British government interference, was published in 1938. With further government interference it sold less than 100 copies over the next 12 years Orwell was alive.

"I had come to Spain with some notion of writing newspaper articles, but I had joined the militia almost immediately, because at that time and in that atmosphere it seemed the only conceivable thing to do . . . It was the first time that I had ever been in a town where the working class was in the saddle. Practically every building of any size had been seized by the workers and was draped with red flags or with the red and black flag of the Anarchists; every wall was scrawled with the hammer and sickle and with the initials of the revolutionary parties; almost every church had been gutted and its images burnt . . . systematically demolished by gangs of workmen. Every shop and cafe had an inscription saying that it had been collectivized . . . Tipping was forbidden by law . . . There were no private motor cars, they had all been commandeered, and all the trams and taxis and much of the other transport were painted red and black . . . the loud-speakers were bellowing revolutionary songs all day and far into the night . . .

Harry Milton
George Orwell
Eileen O'Shaughnessy Blair

In outward appearance it was a town in which the wealthy classes had practically ceased to exist. Except for a small number of women and foreigners there were no 'well-dressed' people at all. Practically everyone wore rough working-class clothes, or blue overalls or some variant of the militia uniform. All this was queer and moving. There was much in it that I did not understand . . . I did not realize that great numbers of well-to-do bourgeois were simply lying low and disguising themselves as proletarians for the time being."[1]

The 30-strong Lenin Division that George Orwell led in Barcelona was a particular breed of ragtag rebels that wore a unique uniform with scarves. They had Mauser rifles, more ammunition than most other crowds, and a vacancy . . . so the 19-year-old Kiwi joined them, principally because he liked Mauser rifles.

The Kiwi was influenced by a Scottish fella named Jimmy, and Jimmy the Scot clung to a Pom he referred to as 'George the Spook' and he accorded absolute authenticity to any pronouncement that came out of George's mouth. Whatever George said, the Scotsman took as Gospel.

On a Wednesday in June 1937, George jumped up and announced to the Scotsman that he was going back to England and leaving, right then and there. Jimmy the Scott asked him why and George said their unit was going to be slaughtered by the British on the Saturday and they had to leave right away, get to the port and catch a boat back to England.

Jimmy the Scot said, "Right, I'm off then." The Kiwi was inclined to go with Jimmy and said, "Why are you going off?" and Jimmy said, "Where George the Spook goes, I go. If it's good enough for me to go, it's good enough for you to go too." The Kiwi said, "Well, he is George the Spook, so if it's good enough for him, it's good enough for me."

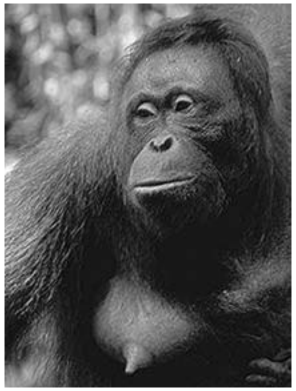
So the Kiwi agreed to go and the three of them made their way to the port in Barcelona. They arrived on Friday and wandered around waiting for their travel documents to come through. George the Spook was paranoid that in the time they were wandering around they might come to some grief. He was certain that they should keep a low profile, that they should dress in civilian clothes and not parade their identities before any number of the varying militias that might put them up against the wall and shoot them. All they had to do to stay alive was to stay out of trouble and not stand out.

George wanted to negotiate with the others everywhere they went, and the Kiwi, being young, wanted to go out and wander around and look at things. The Scotsman, although a little bit more cautious, wanted to go out and have a butcher at things as well, so they decided to go for a short walk late on the Saturday afternoon. They walked along the seafront for about 15 or 20 minutes and came upon an auction held down at the beach. The auctioneers were selling all the travelling effects of a circus and the thing that was put on the lot to go next was a large-breasted female orangutan.

The Kiwi was all fired up in righteousness and said, "We should do something noble in our time in Spain and buy this poor fucking gorilla and we should free it." They were looking hard at the cost of it. In the meantime this English aristocrat came up with a large sum of guineas and made the highest bid on the orangutan.

George the Pommy spook said to the Kiwi, "Now you can't do anything, it's been bought fair and square."

The Kiwi was appalled and said, "That mongrel Pom is going to root that gorilla." At that stage the Kiwi couldn't understand the difference between an orangutan and a gorilla.



George the Spook said, "That's quite likely, but all we can do is go around and pick up the pieces afterwards."

All they had to do was keep a low profile until their ship set sail, but the Kiwi wanted to have a go at the Englishman and started to scrap with the others. Jimmy the Scot kept knocking the Kiwi to the ground and the Kiwi asked the Scot why he kept beating him, and Jimmy replied: "Any fight is better than no fight."

[1] George Orwell, Homage to Catalonia, 1938.

So George the MI-6 Spook and Jimmy the Scot carted the Kiwi back to the hotel and tied him up for the rest of the day, all night and into the next day. On the Sunday afternoon, they finally agreed to release him, and when they did the Kiwi was still adamant he should get back to where this Pom had taken the 'gorilla'.

Very, very reluctantly, George, because he was paranoid about their diplomatic presence in Spain, agreed to go back, but they had nowhere to store their rifles. They were bloody great Mauser 98 Gewhers and stood out like dog's balls, so they stuffed them in their bags and wrapped both in a carpet. To the Spaniards they were known as "the rug pedlars".

They went around to this flash hotel, the best hotel in the whole town. The Pom was right up on the top floor. On the way up, George the Spook was going on and on to the Kiwi about how he must not create a fuss, couldn't damage anything, must say please and thank you, and that they were dealing with a young member of the aristocracy and couldn't afford to annoy or enrage him.

They found his room and George knocked on the door, but there was no answer, so George went back downstairs to the maître d'hôtel to get the key.

While George was away the Kiwi said, "I'll fucking 'enrage' him, I'll fucking kill him" and the Scotsman was going, "I'd like to bash his head in too." Kiwi asked the Scot, "What is this cunt? Is he a Pom or is he a Scotsman?" and Jimmy replied, "He's a Pom" and the Kiwi said, "Well help me smash the door down."

So they busted through the door together and the stench that greeted them inside was absolutely horrendous and the room was in a total shambles. There was shit all over the bedding and at the end of the bed the orangutan was sitting all balled up in sheets, deeply distressed and crying into its arms. Jimmy started looking for the Pom to bash and the Kiwi started to clean up the orangutan and run a bath.

Jimmy said, "Oh, I found the fucking Pom," and the Kiwi said, "Don't bash him. Leave him for me. I'll come out and get him in a second." The Scotsman yelled out, "He's beyond it." The Kiwi rushed out and the aristocratic Pom was lying on the floor, dead as a door nail, all covered in shit with his neck broken. The Kiwi was furious.

George the Spook then came back with the hotel staff, and the maître d'hôtel stood up to his full height and read in his best accented English telegrams that the aristocratic Pom had sent to England on the Thursday night before the circus auction. There were three of them and he had requested the hand-in-marriage of the three wealthiest single women in England. Each offer came back accepted.

After the maître d'hôtel had left the Kiwi said, "This story should be written up and told" and Jimmy agreed, "Aye, it should be written up and told."

After a long and considered pause George said, "No, there is far too much pathos in the story. It cannot be told" and Jimmy reiterated, "Aye, it cannot be told."

The Kiwi then went back into the bathroom and continued bathing the orangutan. George the Spook and Jimmy the Scot were wondering what to do with the A-list marriage proposals and the dead aristocrat, and when it came to moving the body, the Kiwi shouted out, "Monkey in the bath".

With the help of the British Consul in Barcelona, George Orwell, Eileen O'Shaughnessy 'Orwell' Blair, Jimmy the Scot and the 19-year-old Kiwi were able to escape to France. They narrowly missed being denounced and arrested as 'Trotskyites' when the communists moved in to suppress all the militias of their political unit later in June 1937 . . . like the next day.

George Orwell returned to England a staunch anti-Stalinist and anti-Communist, with the plight of animals firmly imprinted on his mind. He remained a democratic socialist, all of which defines him as MI-6 trained through and through.

When the Kiwi related this story to his son in the late 1960s, he said that George the Pom was a famous author from northern England, was quite a capable man and knew a lot. He was a working man and you would never suspect he was from the middle class.

The son asked his father why he had thousands of zoo animals in his photo album, everywhere from Cairo, Alexandria and right up into Italy. The 50-year-old Kiwi replied, "In 1936, as an 18-year-old in Wellington, my aunt told me, 'If you get any free time, I don't want you drinking or gambling. Go and visit the animals and take them something to eat.' So I did.

"While in Italy, I asked an Italian zookeeper why the eagles were so well fed and the zookeeper told me: 'This sturmbannführer [lieutenant] claiming to represent the SS commander in Italy, General Wolff, had come to see me in 1943, just as the Germans were pulling out of Rome and he said, "Don't keep anything that looks like a German eagle in a half-starved condition. Feed them properly or don't show them at all. When the eagle gets hungry, my trigger finger gets itchy. Make sure the eagle gets the best. To cage a half-starved eagle is an insult to Germany. You'll never know when we'll be back. If we come back and find the eagle starving, you and all your staff will be shot." The same German came back the next day and gave me gold coins. The funny thing is they had been stolen from a robbery in Yugoslavia during the German invasion in 1941, two years before I met him.'"

During WWII Orwell was a member of the Home Guard and in 1941 began work for the BBC Eastern Service, mostly working on programmes to gain Indian and East Asian support for Britain's war efforts. He was well aware that he was shaping propaganda and wrote that he felt like "an orange that's been trodden on by a very dirty boot" – just like the orangutan. Despite the good pay, he resigned in 1943 to become literary editor of Tribune, the left-wing weekly where he wrote a regular column, "As I Please".

Orwell opposed the war with Germany and declared that the British Empire was worse than Hitler. He finished his anti-Stalinist allegory Animal Farm in February 1944 and presented it for publication, which brought him to the attention of the Soviet Secret Police, complete with file.

Orwell adopted a three-week-old boy in June 1944 and used a cigarette to burn the birth date and natural parents' names off the birth certificate. His son became Richard Horatio Blair, born May 1944.

Nine months later, his wife and MI-6 support died in a routine operation at Newcastle upon Tyne on 29 March 1945. She was 39. They'd been planning to leave London and move to the Scottish island of Jura so he could concentrate on his next book. Upon her death, George Orwell was simultaneously diagnosed with terminal tuberculosis.

WWII ended on 8 May 1945 and Animal Farm was published on 17 August 1945 to immediate critical acclaim and worldwide success.

"All animals are equal, but some animals are more equal than others." Soon after, he coined the phrase "Cold War".[2]

George Orwell was a close friend of The Observer's editor and owner, David Astor, and from 1945 he was its war correspondent and influenced Astor's editorial policies. Later he contributed regularly to the Manchester Evening News.

The royalties from Animal Farm provided Orwell with a comfortable income for the first time in his adult life. He had literary friends over to his apartment, pretty much as cover for his MI-6 information gathering, and the beautiful and intelligent fag-hags that came with them. Marriage proposals were not infrequent and he applied the same technique to the very beautiful Sonia Brownell, editorial assistant for Horizon magazine, which belonged to Cyril Connolly, his prep school and Eton buddy.

Sonia Brownell refused and Orwell moved to the remote Scottish island of Jura, two days' journey from London by train, bus and ferry followed by an eight-mile walk to a large house at the very end of Barnhill. Although a solitary man, he dreaded being alone and asked her to visit, but she refused this as well.

While in a state of loneliness in one of Britain's most remote locations, he wrote Nineteen Eighty-Four and changed the way the world thinks about itself. He left Jura for the last time in January 1949 and published on 8 June 1949 – "the destruction of language is essential to oppression".

In 1949 Celia Kirwan started working for the Information Research Department, in the Foreign Office unit. This had been set up by the Labour government to publish pro-democratic and anti-communist propaganda.

As a friend of Orwell's, Celia Kirwan approached him for names of pro-communist writers and artists. As a competent MI-6 agent Orwell gave her 37 names which have proved accurate through time. These were not published until 2003 and consisted of many journalists including Kingsley Martin (editor of the New Statesman) and the actors Michael Redgrave and Charlie Chaplin – a double agent.

Cyril Connolly came from a wealthy Anglo-Irish family and was 11 weeks younger than George Orwell and his exact comtemporary through school, but continued on to Balliol College in Oxford afterwards.

[2] Tribune, 'You and the Atomic Bomb', 19 October 1945.

A regular contributor to the leftist New Statesman in the 1930s, he wrote one satirical novel, The Rock Pool (1935) and the autobiography, Enemies of Promise (1938), where he attempted to explain away his failure to produce the literary masterpiece of which he and others thought him capable.

Connolly went on to co-edit the influential literary magazine Horizon (1939–50) and was the literary editor for The Observer. After Orwell's death in 1950, Cyril Connolly was promoted to the position of chief book reviewer for the London Sunday Times – highly paid to read other's works while in control of public perception. He was a fully educated well-funded contemporary of Orwell's, but the literary inferior. Connolly lived to 1974.

Orwell left Jura for the last time in January 1949 and was hospitalised in the Cranham sanatorium near Gloucester, in the Cotswold Hills, near Wales. With easier access, many of his friends started visiting, including Sonia Brownell (1918–80), the Calcutta-born daughter of a British colonial official, reluctantly educated at a British convent school.

"It was well known at the time, though forgotten now, that people in the last stages of tuberculosis frequently formed very strong emotional attachments, indeed those visiting patients were warned against the danger of taking such relationships at their face value."[3]

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

A relationship ensued and Orwell moved to the closest hospital to where Sonia lived. He moved to the University College Hospital in Gower Street, London and she lived two minutes' walk away at 18 Percy Street. The move happened on 3/4 September 1949, into a bed in Room 65.

Two days later he wrote to his friend David Astor (editor and owner of The Observer) mentioning his fever, that he was required to limit his visitors, would marry Sonia, and that his doctor, Morland, was very much in favour. Morland wanted Owell to travel to a high-altitude clinic in France or Switzerland where there would be less pressure on his lungs – the sanatorium in Haute Savoi seemed to be the favourite.

Orwell had been in and out of hospitals for the last three years of his life, and the tuberculosis was probably contracted during his immersion period (1928–33) as described in Down and Out in Paris and London. Hospitals were also one of the favourite listening grounds of MI-6 and people had a tendency to talk to those famous.

[3] W. J. West, The Larger Evils: Nineteen Eighty-Four: The Truth Behind the Satire, 1992.

The very beautiful Sonia Brownell began to take over his routine burdens and Orwell lost control of his life from the moment he entered the University College Hospital. It was a bed from which he was never to leave. The battle for his soul had begun. He had lost the use of his typewriter.

"Opinions among his visitors varied as to whether he was dying. Some took it for granted . . . Other visitors were impressed that he was not so much struggling, but resting quietly to live."[4] "It was fairly clear that he was not going to recover; only the length of time that remained to him in doubt."[5]

Some commentators have argued that Sonia Brownell helped George Orwell through the painful last months of his life and gave him a hitherto unknown sense of joy. Others saw her as a mercenary, only interested in becoming his literary widow. After his death, she edited the four volumes of his collected essays and was fiercely protective of his estate.

". . . His marriage took place on 13 October [1949]. Marrying in a hospital involved obtaining a 'special licence'. But David Astor, his Best Man, handled all the necessary correspondence with the Archbishop of Canterbury . . . He looked unexpectedly grand and military in a smoking-jacket . . . David Astor entertained Sonia and a small party of mutual friends to a wedding luncheon at the Ritz. The signed menu was brought to Orwell. He was 46 years old, the certificate noted, and she was 31.

"After the wedding, Orwell at first rallied appreciably, then had some bad days, then good, then bad again; his temperature chart undulated greatly. He wrote only two or three letters in November, and in December they ceased entirely . . . he was reading . . . Dante's The Divine Comedy . . . What Morland knew could happen before they got him to a high altitude did happen. Orwell's lung haemorrhaged on the night of 21 January 1950 and he died at once and alone before Sonia could be found . . . The world heard the news on the BBC that morning. As the first sentence of his last book had said, the radios had 'all struck thirteen'."[6]

Was Wallis Simpson a Man

Wallis Simpson was born a man, but then so are a lot of women. She was in the range of AIS Grade 4/5, commonly known as fag-hags. These women tend to surround themselves with sexually fringe men and women. They often look manly and often cannot reproduce.

AIS is 'Androgen Insensitivity Syndrome'. It is the new PC name for 'Testicular Feminization Syndrome'. It is a biological intersex condition where the reproductive organs/genitalia are partly at variance with the genetic sex.[1]

Androgen Insensitivity Syndrome ranges from Partial AIS (PAIS) to Complete AIS (CAIS). PAIS is the partial rejection of what makes a man. CAIS is the total rejection of what makes a man.

AIS explains the condition where men have small penises and testicles and increased female characteristics and women have increased male characteristics sometimes with testicles and a full dangling penis.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

In all of these cases, the child began as XY male fetus with varying degrees of feminization. Here's how it works.

Androgen Rejection

Up to eight weeks gestation every fetus (male or female) has the capacity to develop either reproductive system and all fetus' begin as female. To create an XY male, androgens (male hormones) are required and full acceptance of androgens creates an XY male, complete with fully functioning twig and giggle berries.

At any time during the gestation of an XY male baby (from 8 to 40 weeks) if the androgen is rejected, then feminization occurs. Androgen rejection can continue on until the end of puberty. This creates varying degrees of fertility from a fully functioning man to a fully functioning woman and feminization occurs at varying degrees from a feminized male to a masculinized female.

[1] This is different from transsexuality (Gender Dysphoria) which identifies as belonging to the other sex; and is different from transvestitism, which is dressing as a woman, as was the case with the Duke of Kent.

The Gender Circle

An XX female is born a female and grows up to be a female. An XY male is born a male and grows up to be a male. Males with Androgen Insensitivity Grade 1 have normal sized genitalia with some feminine characteristics and some infertility, but generally reproduce as men. Grade 2 have smaller penises. Grade 3 have penises that don’t function sexually. Grade 4 is intersexed. Grade 5 looks like a female with masculinized genitalia and may be able to give birth. Grade 6 is more feminine and can generally reproduce. Grade 7 is the super feminine woman, but was an XY male at some point in the womb.

Grade 1 is the male phenotype and Grade 7 is the female phenotype.

There are two methods of grading intersexed states. The first is by grading it from Partial AIS (PAIS) to Complete AIS (CAIS). The butch feminists (XY males with Partial AIS) use this method. They go on and on about how their enlarged genitalia causes male rejection and isolates them, so they start up pink bannered websites in a bleating search of other XY males who look like women but have male bits. The second method is the AIS Clinical Grading Scheme for the phenotypic features (external appearance) modelled on the Prader Classification for Congenital Adrenal Hyperplasia (CAH).

Grading the Look and the Feel

PAIS ranges from the feminized male to the masculinized female with CAIS as the feminine female stemming from an XY chromosome (male). With AIS the outward genital appearance can lie anywhere along a continuum from Grade 1 (masculine and obviously male when dressed) to Grade 7 (feminine and obviously female when dressed). The AIS grades are as follows:

Grade 1: Normal sized male genitalia but with reduced virility at puberty and occasionally infertile. The penis, testicles and anus are separate.

Grade 2: Slightly smaller penis and/or testicles, one or both. Not so masculine.

Grade 3: Small penis and undescended testicles (cryptochidism) and Reifenstein syndrome. Hitler had this. It was not uncommon to the Rothschilds and illegitimate Rothschilds.

Grade 4: Ambiguous gender, mixed gender genitalia. Hard to tell whether it’s a clitoris or a penis. This masculinized vagina looks like two testicles wrapped around a hole with a penis the size of a large clitoris and huge labia often drooping down to the anus – the party surprise only a select few want. The laybia looks like testicles on ice and a common response is “She’s a man”.

Some say “the penis has been reduced to a urogenital sinus and the testicles have become labioscrotal folds”. The two holes can get pretty close together and occasionally become one. The fanny and the pisser are fused and the anus is knocking on the door for a drink.

Grade 5: It’s a female with separate urethral and vaginal orifices with a mildly enlarged clitoris (penis on ice) and only a small degree of fusion between the clitoris and anus.

Grade 6: Normal female who has developed dark coarse pubic and armpit hair at puberty.

Grade 7: Complete AIS female (CAIS) fail to develop armpit or pubic hair (downy hair only) and breasts range in size from normal to huge Tanner stage V breast. Many of these AIS Grade 7 females have no pubic or underarm hair, small pale nipples and short vaginas which need to be lengthened by masturbation, sometimes for years before intercourse.

Very sexy women can be Androgen Insensitive so don’t give them any. As an added bonus they can still be lactating when their youngest is five. This is the super-female and many AIS Grade 7 have been photographer’s models [AIS 007].

An XY male child Grades 1–3 is raised as a boy and an XY child Grades 5–7 is raised as a girl. An XY child Grade 4 is quite intersexed and the parents generally decide how the child will be dressed.

Fertility

The AIS child is conceived with male (XY) chromosomes. The embryonic testes develop inside the body and start to produce androgens, but due to androgen rejection, the external genitalia develop along female lines with the development of internal female organs suppressed by a hormone from the testes. This is known as the Mullerian Inhibitory Factor (MIF) and results in females with small male genitalia and males with small male genitalia.

Dressed males are perceived as feminine around AIS Grade 3. The problem with gender perception around dressed females occurs around AIS Grade 4 and 5. AIS Grade 4 may have a penis. AIS Grade 4 & 5 are generally raised as a female, but their genitalia are quite masculine.

Androids

A lot of these AIS Grade 4 and 5 were popping up all over the States during the 1920s and 30s and they were actually called "Androids". Their main trait was lack of menstruation and inability to have children. The CIA became very interested in these androids and they recruited Adolf Eichmann and John Money.

In 1947 John Money was recruited from New Zealand to the Psychiatric Institute of the University of Pittsburgh and then onto Harvard University (CIA) where he got a Ph.D. Money was used for AIS research amongst twins and he became known for a controversial gender-change case. After a botched circumcision he had David Reimer's parents raise their son David as a girl. This resulted in David Reimer's suicide on 5 May 2004.

Adolf Eichmann escaped Germany in 1947 and spent a year in a Catholic monastery where he was given a new identity and passport as Ricardo Klement. In 1948 he escaped to Argentina and worked for the CIA (1948–60) until he was kidnapped by the Mossad in Buenos Aires on 11 May 1960 and taken to Israel for trial.

Money was a CIA operative and Medical Advisor. Eichmann had become a CIA operative and did experiments on twins, but he wasn't a paedophile, Money was. The CIA were renown for employing and promoting sexually sick academics from post-WWII to the end of the millennium, and especially paedophiles. John Money was no exception and defended paedophilia for the CIA.

Money, with his CIA backed Ph.D., publicly and in writing, put forth the notion, which he backed as an academic (and the CIA backed him as an academic) that paedophilia was the result of "a surplus of parental love". Money also viewed heterosexuality as "societal, superficial and ideological". Because Money was backed by the CIA, his academic views held more weight than other academics.

Money's public paedophile notions were backed by the CIA because those at the top of the CIA were homosexual and paedophiles having been backed into the top ranks of the CIA by communists who ran their intelligence agencies from their record of CIA recruit sexual practices. Those with clean sexual records were never promoted.

Money filmed himself sexually molesting the male of one of the AIS twins. When his paedophilia became too obvious the CIA hastened his death by MAD. He got Parkinson's disease and this was rapidly advanced. John William Money (8 July 1921–7 July 2006), a Kiwi arsehole.

Wallis Simpson

At eight weeks gestation Baby Wallis (an XY chromosome fetus) began to exhibit an insensitivity to androgens (male hormones including testosterone) and did not fully develop male genitalia. Thus she was born an XY male with female outer genitalia and partially developed male internal genitalia.

She had a female body shape, reduced female characteristics, her breasts, although small, developed at puberty. She had underarm and pubic hair, did not menstruate, had no ovaries, no fallopian tubes, no uterus, could not conceive children and had a small short vagina with internal testicles.

The AIS vagina is at best two-thirds the normal length, and may be no more than a centimetre or two in length, or even just a dimple. This is called Vaginal Hypoplasia or Short Vagina. Vaginal hypoplasia can be treated by the non-surgical method of masturbation from puberty, which actually lengthens the vagina to something approximating normal, depending on the initial vaginal hypoplasia. Wallis enlarged her vagina through masturbation and a prolific sexual appetite.

In Wallis Simpson's case, she was known as the 'Shanghai Squeeze' and was said to have had "the ability to make a matchstick fell like a Havana cigar".[2] Wallis Simpson was AIS Grade 4/5. Wallis Simpson was born a man.

Edward, Prince of Wales/King Edward VIII

Some PAIS babies may be raised as males as was the case with King Edward VIII who had a small penis and was rampantly homosexual prior to his weeklong engagement to the Queen Mother, and his subsequent arranged meeting with Wallis Simpson. She was the only person who seemed able to satisfy Prince Edward and she used to skite about it.

Edward, Prince of Wales was AIS Grade 3 and had a small penis and undescended testicles. Wallis Simpson was AIS Grade 4/5 with a small vagina and internalised male sexual organs. Both men and women with AIS have problems with fertility. Even slight AIS can contribute to infertility in otherwise normal men and both Edward and Wallis were infertile.

An AIS Grade 4/5 and Grade 5 trait is to destroy the sexuality and direction of drive of the live-in male partner. AIS Grade 3 men tend to travel diligently in the direction they're given, until another direction is given and they bounce in that new direction. Hence Wallis Simpson could treat King Edward VIII as her lapdog – birds of a feather flock together.

AIS Grade 3 men tend to be taxi drivers, whether political or physical. Hitler was AIS Grade 3 and was a political taxi driver. His High Command often complained about his constant change of direction.

Treatment

XY females with testes (AIS Grade 4) have lower oestrogen levels than XX females with ovaries (normal) and XY CAIS females (AIS Grade 7), who are immune to being masculinized due to their complete insensitivity to androgens. The CAIS Grade 7 are known for their huge Tanner stage V breasts, model looks and masculine drive.

However at puberty XY females with testes' can spontaneously feminize. If this does not occur, their gonads can be removed aged 20. This is called a Gonadectomy or Orchidectomy. A Gonadectomy can bring about osteoporosis (bone thinning), menopause and cardiovascular disease and hormone replacement therapy (HRT) is recommended. HRT also helps initiate puberty in 10-11-year-old AIS females.

Skin grafts and sections from the intestine can be used to lengthen the vagina, but vaginoplasty should be avoided in early childhood.

With today's technology, "it might be possible for primitive sperm material extracted from intact AIS testes to be used to fertilise a donor egg."[3] That is, Wallis Simpson may have been able to conceive a child as the male and use an egg donor and rent-a-womb – thus giving her the possibility of half the King's ransom.[4]

In 50% of the AIS Grade 4/5 females, the undescended testes can result in a groin hernia during infancy. In the remaining 50% undescended testes may not be discovered until a failure to menstruate at puberty. The AIS Grade 4/5 adult will look like a girl and can lean towards any sexuality. AIS adult females with their testes removed say their testes never bothered them.

Androids in New Zealand

The condition of females being perceived as men is common in New Zealand, especially in politics, and especially in the Labour Party (New Communist) where many of the females have few female characteristics, have not reproduced and have married homosexuals and child-sex abusers as a form of mutual cover. (The Moneys in the Bag.)

When these Grade 4 & 5 women are heard on the radio they sound like men. Some of these masculine females (who actually feminized males) resort to hormone replacement therapy, but it doesn't seem to work for long, and certainly not between election photos and election speeches. Thus, in mid-term politics, New Zealanders are treated to masculine sounding AIS Grade 4 & 5 females who have enlarged their vaginas through masturbation, often helping each other in the process. This has resulted in the Labour Party being correctly diagnosed as "Fabian Fisters" and "Butch Lesbians". The Androgenous fist fight is a long journey to the middle.

[4] "Half the King's ransom" meant that if a man gave birth he was entiled to half the King's possessions. This was removed from the law books during the 1950s as the result of chromosome research.

New Zealand's Prime Minister Helen Clark is a case in point. She has the dressed appearance of AIS Grade 4/5 and looks a lot like the AIS Grade 3 Adolf Hitler. Both were 56 years old when last photographed.

Amongst the tea ladys of the civil service, Helen Clark is known as "Mrs Bull" and there is some truth to the statement "She's a man".

Baby Helen was conceived an XY male and at some later date she rejected the androgen but retained a lot of the male characteristics.

Medically it can be said that Helen Clark was born male.

What is so scary is that this SheMan, with her voluntary radical hysterectamy in December 1976/January 1977, is touted as being the next Secretary General of the United Nations. That would make her a SheDevil.

> AIS has previously been known as Androgen Resistance Syndrome, Feminizing Testes Syndrome, Male Pseudo-hermaphroditism, Goldberg-Maxwell Syndrome (CAIS), Morris's Syndrome (CAIS), Lub's Syndrome (PAIS), Gilbert-Dreyfus Syndrome (PAIS), Reifenstein Syndrome (PAIS) and Rosewater Syndrome (PAIS). Either a lot of sex doctors were Jews or a lot of Jews were inter-sexed. Other XX female conditions with some AIS-like features include: Mayer Rokitansky Kuster Hauser (MRKH) Syndrome and Mullerian dysgenesis. Other XY male conditions with some AIS-like features include: 5 alpha-reductase deficiency, 17 keto-steroid reductase deficiency, Denys-Drash Syndrome, Leydig cell hypoplasia, Smith-Lemli-Opitz Syndrome and Swyer Syndrome (XY gonadal dysgenesis).
> The Danish patient register, 1992 "suggesting an incidence of 1 in 20,400 XY births (hospitalized cases only, so true incidence probably higher). PAIS may be only about 1/10 as common as CAIS."

Biographies

Greg Hallett trained in various psychological models in parallel with his architecture degree and training. He travelled widely behind the Iron Curtain during the Cold War, hitchhiking on planes and making bunks out of airmail bags to party and report between cities. His contacts in Eastern Europe led to deep penetration of the Soviet State, how it functioned and how it was to colonise the West. It was these qualifications that led him to buy buildings in Moscow immediately after the Berlin Wall fell. This led to interviews with the KGB and their revelations about the planned sex-communism and deconstruction of Westerners. What the Soviets planned for the West happened in the West. Equally all modern history can be dated back to 1945. What Hitler planned for the world happened to the world over the next sixty years.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

"Before and after this meeting intelligence had a pattern of attaching themselves to me and the first person to do so was the King's doctor in 1967, quickly followed by the Queen's brother. In the build up to the Soviet meetings, those with intelligence backgrounds provided me with whatever training and cover they saw fit. Those with CIA backgrounds briefed me heavily from America to Greece and joined me in one operation prior. No operation was ever official, nor were they written up. Cover included haircuts, clothing, relationships, travel arrangements, concise and pertinent history briefings, word of mouth . . . and denial.

"I interviewed the KGB in Moscow on 9 December 1989 at a point when they were open, due to lack of pay. At the time you could buy information for the price of a meal. This led to some psychological information being supplied which led to international contacts, further training and meetings with James Bond III and the Spymaster. The Spymaster and other intelligence operatives have been briefing me for the past four years, resulting in ten books – four in this immediate series."

The Spymaster says that he will often go on operations and end up in entirely the wrong place with the wrong people at the wrong time, but always much wiser. Greg Hallett's attitude to history has been similar and the best information is uncovered by accident and without intention . . . "Perhaps the best intelligence gathering method is good table manners, good mental health, no fear, a small amount of wit, and the most ridiculous levels of courage that border on sheer stupidity to those who calculate such risk-and-rewards."

"One of the best intelligence gathering exercises I ever did was to stand in Moscow's Red Square at 1.23 pm on 5 December 1989 and yell out 'Mokrie Dela' [Wet Liquidations] at the top of my voice. This attracted spies to me like shit to a blanket. It also attracted sympathisers and sympathetic spies."

When the Spymaster teamed up with Greg Hallett they found they shared insights and historical answers to many of the controversies of Europe from WWII to the Cold War and the present . . . not disregarding aspects of the future. In listening to each other's stories they noted a lot of common ground and have attempted to lay this bare.

Through such coincidences, history is often more explicable to the ordinary man than a lot of complicated analysis. After embedded historians, we found 'filling-in-the-gaps analysis' to be a primary cause of ill-informed history. "Field experience is everything. Independent field experience is even better and accidental independent field experience is history altering."

The Spymaster has worked in a background of undeclared hostilities in many countries over many decades. He has done undercover amongst Nazis, Communists, Marxists and some of the most vicious gangs of criminals in New Zealand. Several times other people have been killed in his place in cases of mistaken identity. The Spymaster has been arrested more times than he can remember and by more outfits than he can remember and has been on both sides of enforcement operations.

The Spymaster has an in-depth knowledge of offenders in New Zealand and overseas and is often sought out by people in high places. Former Prime Minister Rob Muldoon: "If St Peter ever made a mistake and let you into heaven, there'd be a fistfight in five minutes".

Many intelligence officers have been interviewed for this book and they have given the low-down on the many wars from 1936. In some cases, they, or their fathers, were the main players in the vignettes. These personal histories date back to the Spanish Civil War with George Orwell and redefine the origins of Animal Farm.

Greg Hallett and the Spymaster have teamed up to give you this insight into how the enemies of war are created and how enemies secretly join forces behind the veil of war. This book is not a dream within a dream, but a reality within a reality and the authors wake up each morning content they're still alive.

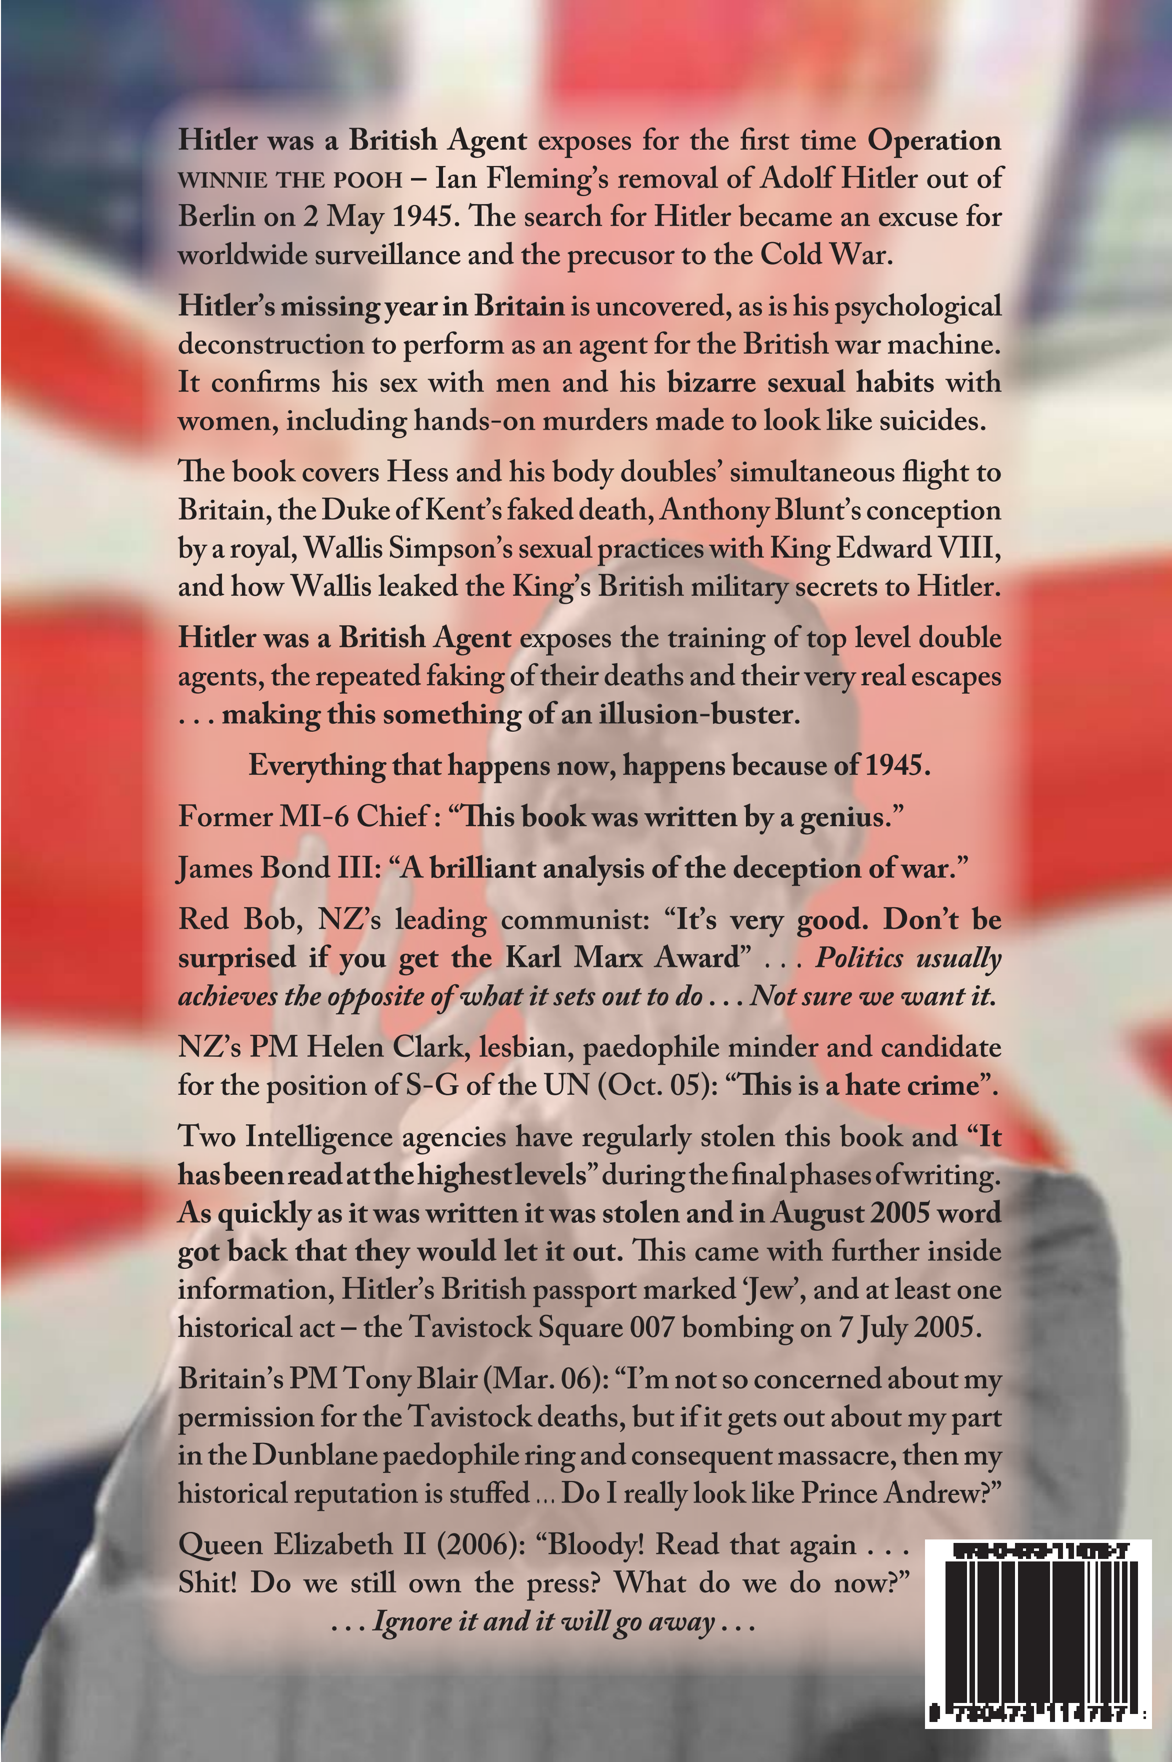
As goes Hitler, so goes the moon . . . if you can't make it . . . fake it.



Hitler was a British Agent exposes for the first time Operation WINNIE THE POOH – Ian Fleming's removal of Adolf Hitler out of Berlin on 2 May 1945. The search for Hitler became an excuse for worldwide surveillance and the precusor to the Cold War.

Hitler's missing year in Britain is uncovered, as is his psychological deconstruction to perform as an agent for the British war machine. It confirms his sex with men and his bizarre sexual habits with women, including hands-on murders made to look like suicides.

The book covers Hess and his body doubles' simultaneous flight to Britain, the Duke of Kent's faked death, Anthony Blunt's conception by a royal, Wallis Simpson's sexual practices with King Edward VIII, and how Wallis leaked the King's British military secrets to Hitler.

Hitler was a British Agent exposes the training of top level double agents, the repeated faking of their deaths and their very real escapes . . . making this something of an illusion-buster.

Everything that happens now, happens because of 1945.

Former MI-6 Chief : "This book was written by a genius."

James Bond III: "A brilliant analysis of the deception of war."

Red Bob, NZ's leading communist: "It's very good. Don't be surprised if you get the Karl Marx Award" . . . Politics usually achieves the opposite of what it sets out to do . . . Not sure we want it.

NZ's PM Helen Clark, lesbian, paedophile minder and candidate for the position of S-G of the UN (Oct. 05): "This is a hate crime".

Two Intelligence agencies have regularly stolen this book and "It has been read at the highest levels" during the final phases of writing. As quickly as it was written it was stolen and in August 2005 word got back that they would let it out. This came with further inside information, Hitler's British passport marked 'Jew', and at least one historical act – the Tavistock Square 007 bombing on 7 July 2005.

Britain's PM Tony Blair (Mar. 06): "I'm not so concerned about my permission for the Tavistock deaths, but if it gets out about my part in the Dunblane paedophile ring and consequent massacre, then my historical reputation is stuffed ... Do I really look like Prince Andrew?"

Queen Elizabeth II (2006): "Bloody! Read that again . . . Shit! Do we still own the press? What do we do now?"

. . . Ignore it and it will go away . . .

Greg Hallett trained in various psychological models in parallel with his architecture degree and training. He travelled widely behind the Iron Curtain during the Cold War, hitchhiking on planes and making bunks out of airmail bags to party and report between cities. His contacts in Eastern Europe led to deep penetration of the Soviet State, how it functioned and how it was to colonise the West. It was these qualifications that led him to buy buildings in Moscow immediately after the Berlin Wall fell. This led to interviews with the KGB and their revelations about the planned sex-communism and deconstruction of Westerners. What the Soviets planned for the West happened in the West. Equally all modern history can be dated back to 1945. What Hitler planned for the world happened to the world over the next sixty years.

Espavo Sozo - treasurer@platinumparty.org -7 March 2013

"Before and after this meeting intelligence had a pattern of attaching themselves to me and the first person to do so was the King's doctor in 1967, quickly followed by the Queen's brother. In the build up to the Soviet meetings, those with intelligence backgrounds provided me with whatever training and cover they saw fit. Those with CIA backgrounds briefed me heavily from America to Greece and joined me in one operation prior. No operation was ever official, nor were they written up. Cover included haircuts, clothing, relationships, travel arrangements, concise and pertinent history briefings, word of mouth . . . and denial.

"I interviewed the KGB in Moscow on 9 December 1989 at a point when they were open, due to lack of pay. At the time you could buy information for the price of a meal. This led to some psychological information being supplied which led to international contacts, further training and meetings with James Bond III and the Spymaster. The Spymaster and other intelligence operatives have been briefing me for the past four years, resulting in ten books – four in this immediate series."

The Spymaster says that he will often go on operations and end up in entirely the wrong place with the wrong people at the wrong time, but always much wiser. Greg Hallett's attitude to history has been similar and the best information is uncovered by accident and without intention . . . "Perhaps the best intelligence gathering method is good table manners, good mental health, no fear, a small amount of wit, and the most ridiculous levels of courage that border on sheer stupidity to those who calculate such risk-and-rewards."

"One of the best intelligence gathering exercises I ever did was to stand in Moscow's Red Square at 1.23 pm on 5 December 1989 and yell out 'Mokrie Dela' [Wet Liquidations] at the top of my voice. This attracted spies to me like shit to a blanket. It also attracted sympathisers and sympathetic spies."

When the Spymaster teamed up with Greg Hallett they found they shared insights and historical answers to many of the controversies of Europe from WWII to the Cold War and the present . . . not disregarding aspects of the future. In listening to each other's stories they noted a lot of common ground and have attempted to lay this bare.

Through such coincidences, history is often more explicable to the ordinary man than a lot of complicated analysis. After embedded historians, we found 'filling-in-the-gaps analysis' to be a primary cause of ill-informed history. "Field experience is everything. Independent field experience is even better and accidental independent field experience is history altering."

The Spymaster has worked in a background of undeclared hostilities in many countries over many decades. He has done undercover amongst Nazis, Communists, Marxists and some of the most vicious gangs of criminals in New Zealand. Several times other people have been killed in his place in cases of mistaken identity. The Spymaster has been arrested more times than he can remember and by more outfits than he can remember and has been on both sides of enforcement operations.

The Spymaster has an in-depth knowledge of offenders in New Zealand and overseas and is often sought out by people in high places.

Former Prime Minister Rob Muldoon: "If St Peter ever made a mistake and let you into heaven, there'd be a fistfight in five minutes".

Many intelligence officers have been interviewed for this book and they have given the low-down on the many wars from 1936. In some cases, they, or their fathers, were the main players in the vignettes. These personal histories date back to the Spanish Civil War with George Orwell and redefine the origins of Animal Farm.

Greg Hallett and the Spymaster have teamed up to give you this insight into how the enemies of war are created and how enemies secretly join forces behind the veil of war. This book is not a dream within a dream, but a reality within a reality and the authors wake up each morning content they're still alive.

Scott D. deHart, and sons: Wesley, Alex, and Bennett:
Thank You is inadequate;
And to Calvin deHart,
in gratitude for helping "proofread" the manuscript and being a second, trustworthy pair of eyes, and for putting up with my "I want it yesterday" schedule!

To Catherine Austin Fitts,
Who, with me, wonders what really is going on "down there";

To "Al" in Norway, who told me during an interview that I should finally write "the Hess book";

To all my website members and subscribers for your support and prayers;

To "Maria" in Spain, and so many others,
for boundless support beyond my ability to repay;

And to the late George Ann Hughes, for so many good times and conversations;

To Matt S. for sharing your good heart and conversation;

To Mr. S.E.J. for helping me authenticate the Nordau Quotation many years ago in the Library of Congress;

And Above All to T.S.F., who told me to write:

FOREWARNED IS FOREARMED

"Readers may form their own conclusions on these facts and deductions, but without such a challenge, acceptance of the official version continues, and with it misrepresentation of this critical moment when history failed to turn in the way that Hess and Hitler and so many in the highest circles of British life wished. It is high time the official story is confronted, for consideration of the path Churchill did not take in 1941 casts a more brilliant light on the morality of the path he did take, the history we know. Hence the subtitle of this book: The Real Turning Point of the Second World War".

Peter Padfield[1]

THIS IS THE PLACE WHERE REGULAR READERS OF MY BOOKS have come to expect a rather lengthy Preface, laying out in abstract form the basic contents and argument of the book which follows it. Prefaces and Introductions are the places where normally I or other authors attempt to clarify the main details and argument of the book, according to the old adage, "tell them what you're going to say (Preface), say it (main book), and tell them what you said (Conclusion)".

But with the Hess affair—or as I have called it in this book, the Hess Mess—one is confronted with something else entirely, something that does not easily lend itself to the usual oversimplifications; it is, as I have designated it, a first-class gold-plated mess. Like the two Kennedy assassinations or the assassination of Dr. King, or the still-debatable Watergate affair ("What was that really about?"), or the Waco tragedy or the Oklahoma City Bombing or 9/11, it is a pivotal event of the twentieth century, and perhaps even the pivotal event. But unlike the rest of them, it is not "neat" or "tidy". A multi-layered conspiracy it most certainly is; a neat and tidy one, like the others, it most definitely is not. Yet, like the Kennedy assassination or 9/11, there are aspects of the Hess Mess that are classified to this day, and that should tell us something of its real significance.

[1] Peter Padfield, Night Flight to Dungavel: Rudolf Hess, Winston Churchill, and the Real Turning Point of WWII (Lebanon, New Hampshire: Fore Edge [University Press of New England], 2013), p. 21.

Preface

What I have is a speculation, a proposal—to be sure, not one that is based solely on contextual argument, but one based on careful parsing of details unearthed—but unnoticed (perhaps!)—by some other researchers. Why the "perhaps" in the previous sentence? Because like everything else in the Hess Mess, the details, when we shall encounter them, are capable of more than one interpretation. My interpretation of those details, as we shall discover, makes eminent sense simply on a logical basis of their implications. Thus, they become other components of the Hess Mess, and perhaps the principal ones.

In any case, the Hess Mess is a mess, and thus, rather than try to tidy-up the mess in the usual Preface or Prologue, I want the reader of this book to experience the same mystifications that I and others have experienced when researching it, in all their complexity and fulsome messiness, for there is a huge, nagging, gnawing Question at the heart of it all, that no one, to this day, knows the answer to. I certainly do not have an answer either. All I have is a speculation, a proposal. That said, I want the readers of this book to experience the confusing clutter of the Hess Mess in all of its apparent junkyard disorder, and hence I have attempted to present the affair as a Gestalt, which can only be appreciated as a series of layered, compounding mystifications, all networked and interlaced with each other, so that when my "added layers" are added to the mess, they will at least fit the "pattern," for Sacrifices and Penguins are very much a part of the Hess Mess.

All of that said, I really wrote this book "for myself and in full freedom,"—to quote the words of C.P.E. Bach wildly out of context -as an exercise to set down all my thoughts on the record, once I had pondered those extra details in the context of the Hess Mess.

PART ONE:
THE HESS MESS

"It soon becomes apparent that the whole Hess affair, from 1941 onwards, is riddled with so many contradictions and anomalies that it is obvious that the British authorities were desperate to conceal something. Judging by the fact that they are still desperate to conceal it, common sense dictates that they deem this secret to be unsuitable for public consumption, even after sixty years. But why? What could be so unacceptable to Britain, or the Allies, in the early twenty-first century? What does the Rudolf Hess story conceal that would in some way shock even today's cynical world?"

"How can the details of an abortive mission undertaken sixty years ago even begin to threaten today's Britain in any way?"

SPANDAU BALLET

(AND NO, WE DON'T MEAN THE 1980's Music GROUP)

> "He certainly had lots of time to think in the nine months he was in Landsberg. It was only after this, according to his intimate acquaintance, 'Putzi' Hanfstaengl, that the Führer cult began in earnest. Before then, he was Herr Hitler to everyone. At Hess' instigation, this now changed, first to der Chef and then to Mein Führer. Hitler seemed to enjoy the transmutation.

> Dusty Sklar[2]

NOTHING ABOUT THE CASE OF RUDOLF HESS is normal, and nothing about the "normal" or even the "revisionist" explanations of the Hess case are reassuring or convincing. Of all the high ranking Nazis imprisoned within the formidable walls of Spandau Prison in Berlin after the war when the Nuremberg War Crimes Tribunals had handed down their sentences, Rudolf Hess stands out as a black hole of bizarrerie almost unequaled in recent history. The Nazi Reich's Armaments Minister, Albert Speer, and the two chiefs of the German Kriegsmarine, Grand Admirals Erich Raeder and Karl Dönitz, all did their "time" in the prison, as did former Reichsbank President and Finance Minister Walther Funk, diplomat Konstantin von Neurath, and Hitler Youth leader Baldur von Schirach. These were some of the men that kept the gigantic war machine of the Third Reich smoothly running and functioning as a military power right up to the end of the war, and in Dönitz's case, had nearly brought Britain to its knees in the unrelenting U-boat warfare. Indeed, of all the "designated successors" to Hitler, it was Dönitz that finally succeeded Hitler as the legal head of state and government after the latter's problematical "suicide" in the Berlin Führerbunker. But these men, crucial as they were to the smooth functioning of the German military juggernaut, were released, some of them—Grand Admiral Erich Raeder and Walther Funk—having been sentenced to life in prison like Hess himself. Funk and Raeder were released early for health and humanitarian reasons, a point already raising a serious question about Hess, for clearly in the last decade or so of his incarceration, he had begun to suffer health problems as well. Why was he not also released on similar humanitarian grounds? Speer and von Schirach served their full twenty years sentences and were released on the same day: September 30, 1966, while Grand Admiral Dönitz, sentenced to a mere ten years, was released on the same day, ten years earlier.

---

[1] It should be noted, however, that the rock group, according to the Wikipedia article on Spandau Prison, did get their name from the expression "Spandau Ballet," which was the slang for the twitching and spasms of the nervous systems of inmates executed by hanging in the prison during its years as a military and civil prison under the German Empire and Weimar Republic. I use it here in an entirely different sense, to denote (1) the theatrical dancing of the Four Allied Powers—France, Great Britain, the USA, and Soviet Union—in their handling of the prison's sole remaining inmate until his death, Rudolf Hess, (2) their explanations of the case, and (3) the equally bewildering mass of research and speculation that the case has engendered since the death of Spandau's most infamous inmate in August, 1987.

[2] Dusty Sklar, The Nazis and the Occult (New York: Dorset Press, 1977), p. 54.

Only Hess remained after the release of Speer and von Schirach, and he lived another twenty-one years past their release, finally dying on August 17, 1987, at 93 years of age.

Hess in SS General's Uniform

Prisoner Number Seven: an elderly Hess (or “Spandau Hess”?) at Spandau Prison.[3]

Buck-toothed, somewhat goofy-looking Rudolf Hess—with his perilous overbite, his dull fanatical eyes, his eccentric obsessions with the occult, and his bizarre and (many would say) insane behavior, not only during the Nuremberg tribunals but long before, during his infamous flight to Scotland in May of 1941 to negotiate peace with the British—only Hess was required to serve his full life sentence in Spandau, the only remaining prisoner after the departure of von Neurath, Speer, von Schirach, Funk, Raeder, and Dönitz. It's an absurd picture: the Allied powers—France, Great Britain, the USA, and the Soviet Union—all contributed to the maintenance and upkeep of the entire Spandau Prison, changing their military guards at regular monthly intervals, just to guard this one man.[4]

[3] See Abdallah Melaouhi, Rudolf Hess: His Betrayal and Murder (Washington, D.C.: The Barnes Review 2013), p. 28. This picture is often seen on the internet without attribution, but as far as I have been able to determine, it appears to be from Melaouhi’s book, and to date from the period that Hess was Melaouhi’s patient.

Even if one was not tempted to believe the absurd tales spun by neo-Nazis of secret Antarctic Nazi bases constructed and maintained by the German Navy, or even if one was not tempted to maintain that there may be some kernel of truth lurking within them, it would still seem far more likely that the Allied Powers and the Soviet Union would have contrived reasons not to release Speer, Raeder, and Dönitz. After all, these were pragmatic, sane, and in Raeder's and Dönitz's cases, professional military men, and as such, they all knew secrets. Yet, with the exception of Raeder, they were not sentenced to life; and in spite of whatever secrets they knew, they were all released. Similarly Walther Funk—President of the Reichsbank, German finance minister, and sponsor of the 1942 I.G. Farben-Reichsbank study on how to create a European federation (a study looking all too conveniently like the current structure of the European Union)[5] and who could also, most assuredly, tell secrets—was also released.

But the allegedly insane occult-obsessed lunatic that remained—Hess—the Allies and Soviets for some reason held under tight guard. This man—reviled and ridiculed in private by some in the Nazi hierarchy even before his infamous May 1941 flight to Scotland to negotiate peace with the British, even while Nazi domestic propaganda continued to laud and extol him, and universally rejected as insane by both the Nazi and British hierarchies after his "crazy stunt"—this man had to be guarded at all costs and his access to the outside world strictly and severely, and some would say, cruelly, controlled. This man alone of the Spandau Seven, had to remain imprisoned—in solitary confinement—for the rest of his 93 years.

Indeed, there is only one other story that is as badly obfuscated and whose official narrative is so blatantly silly as the story of Rudolf Hess, Prisoner Number Seven, and that official narrative silliness concerns the assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

That, perhaps, ought to tell us something.

The question was, and is, what does it tell us?

In the case of the Kennedy assassination, the problem is that several plausible theories can be put forward as to who was involved in the conspiracy, and why.[6] In the case of Hess, however, theories abound to be sure, but without the benefit of anything near the supporting evidentiary weight that approaches that adduced for the JFK conspiracies. On the contrary, the Hess case is a wild roller coaster ride through a hall of mirrors enclosed in a fog of obfuscation of claim and counterclaim and a badly conflicted and contradictory narrative, a narrative also overlaid with wild postwar neo-Nazi assertions of Antarctic survival and UFOs, and the usual academic attempts at debunking them.

A. The Harvey's Barn Methodology: The Hess Mess as an Epistemological and Historiographical Puzzle

My mother had an expression that, through my use of it in interviews over the years, has come to be known to at least a few people. That expression is "going around Harvey's Barn',' by which she meant that a seemingly simple question could elicit from my father and/or me a long peroration of prelude, tangential perambulations and explanation prior to giving an actual "answer" to it. In point of fact, those long prologues and perambulations usually were, and usually are, a large part of the answer.

In the case of the "Hess Mess," however, the long prelude is necessary to highlight, not an answer, but rather the One Significant Question that hovers over the whole Hess affair, from his flight to Great Britain in 1941 and his sentencing at Nuremberg in 1946, to his long incarceration in Berlin's Spandau Prison and his final ignominious and suspicious end on August 17, 1987. That Question, which will remain unstated until the very end of Part One of this book, only gains its significance from a rehearsal and review of the salient and significant details of the "Hess Mess". Indeed, all of the books on the Hess Mess are either an attempt to answer that One Question or a speculation on a plausible solution to it. Such is also the case in this book: the lengthy review of other research and claims is a necessary component of the logic of the argument posed by that significant Question, and the speculative synthesis I offer here.

According to standard historical narratives, Hess was already beginning to fall from favor and influence in the Nazi "inner circle" by the time of his notorious flight to Scotland in 1941 and, according to those same standard narratives or popular perceptions, he thus knew no real secrets. In this respect, the Hess Mess stands as a kind of epistemological and historiographical Chinese puzzle-box, perhaps even a challenge to those disciplines: How much speculation should be entertained with respect to the Hess Mess? What types of evidence should be admitted and examined? What about those post-war stories of Nazi survival, of Antarctica, and their claims about Hess' involvement? Are they simply to be ignored (as most Hess investigators have done), or conversely, are they a possible crucial component of its resolution? Or have Hess Mess investigators perhaps not even considered the implications of their own evidence, doggedly researched and uncovered?

I knew, years ago, when I embarked on this strange series of books in "alternative research" and, more particularly, in the research of the hypothesis of post-war Nazi survival and secret research, that eventually I would have to deal with the "Hess Mess". For reasons that will become clear in the rest of the book, I could not do so without first introducing the concepts of (1) post-war Nazi survival, (2) the Antarctic component of that mythos, and (3) outlining, over the course of several books and interviews, why I regarded the Nazi-Antarctic-UFO mythology as untrue, and something masking, perhaps, a more prosaic, but also more sensational, secret.

Thus, the messiest aspect of the "Hess Mess" is that it does spin out of control, wildly and very quickly, into associations and relationships with mind control, Antarctica, Atlantis, into conspiracies of doubles and double-crosses, and into strange lore and myths, which Hess, no stranger to the occult, and as Hitler's Deputy in the Nazi Party, most certainly knew.

1. The Questions that Lead to The Question

One may gain an initial approximation of just how large and "messy" the Hess Mess is by considering the following questions, which are, to be sure, variations of that One as yet unstated Question:

Why was it necessary to maintain an entire prison, and the military guards and medical staffs of four world powers, just to keep watch over one individual who, by the end of his life, was a frail old man, and a threat to no one? Why was it necessary to bear such a financial cost? Why was it necessary to maintain such an absurd "Spandau Ballet"?

What secrets did he know that the Four Powers wanted to prevent others from knowing? Did they themselves even know what those secrets were, or did they only suspect? Or: were they trying to break him and learn those secrets?

Or: did Hess not know anything at all? Were the secrets located elsewhere? If so where? And if so, then why maintain what can only be characterized as a charade for more than forty years?

Worst of all: was the man they were guarding even really Rudolf Hess, one time "Deputy Führer" of Nazi Germany, at all? Was "Spandau Hess" really Hess? Or was "Spandau Hess" someone else, a double, substituted at some point in the drama? And was that the real reason for the "Spandau Ballet" of elaborate changings of the guard and maintaining an entire prison for just one man, and refusing to let him out, lest the substitution—the real secret—be discovered?

But if "Spandau Hess" wasn't Hess, then what happened to the real one? Why was the substitution made at all? And when was the substitution made? Of course, the question of when a substitution was made also is an indicator of who made the substitution.

While we're talking about Doppelgängers, what about the aircraft in which Hess made his flight? Was it the same plane that crashed in Scotland as took off from Augsburg, Germany? If not, when and why was the substitution made? Was Reichsmarschall Göring secretly involved, as some allege, in aiding Hess' secret flight through the then-state-of-the-art air defenses of Germany? If so, why did Göring also order the same air defenses to shoot Hess down? And what of Hess' crazy flight plan, and equally problematical explanations for it?

On the British side, why was the response of the Royal Air Force so lackluster, when Hess' plane was clearly being tracked by British radar? Was this because Hess was expected, and his flight was being aided by some on the British side, as some have alleged? And if so, what was the explanation for the "soft" response of the then-equally-state-of-the-art British air defenses? Was it because Hess had been lured to the United Kingdom as part of a British intelligence "psyop," a "sting" designed to embarrass the Nazi leadership? If so, then why was no major effort ever launched by Great Britain to capitalize on the propaganda value of his capture? Or did Churchill covertly use Hess for other political purposes, as some researchers maintain, and if so, what were they?

Equally, if Hess was not lured to Great Britain, then why the "soft response" of its air defenses? Was Hess expected, as yet others allege? And if so, who expected him, and why?

Why was Hess' flight made on the same day—May to, 1941—that the Luftwaffe's bombing of London reached its most destructive pitch during the whole war? And why, after his flight, did the Luftwaffe suddenly drastically curtail its bombing of Britain, and why, conversely, did the Royal Air Force also apparently curtail its bombing of Germany?

We may add to this already strange list of questions the following:

Why did Hess undertake his flight to Great Britain in the first place? Was it, as some have persuasively argued, to offer a peace plan to Great Britain in view of Hitler's then-secret preparations and intentions to invade the Soviet Union a little over a month later? If so, did Hitler or other high-ranking Nazis such as Göring know about the peace plan effort? Were they involved with it?

If that is the case, did they hope that there really was a faction in Great Britain hoping for a negotiated peace with the Third Reich? Did Hess come as a plenipotentiary with a guarantee for his safe conduct under a flag of truce from high authorities in the United Kingdom representing King George VI himself, as Hess himself maintained in the early days of his captivity by the British?

And while we're at it:

What happened to Hess while he was in the custody of the British from 1941 to the German capitulation? Was he being drugged, as Hess himself claimed? If so, why?

And once the war was over, how does one explain Hess' bizarre behavior at the Nuremberg War Crimes Tribunals? What is the significance—if any - of the strange remarks that Reichsmarschall Hermann Göring made to Hess during the course of the trials? Is there any relationship between Hess' behavior and the Reichsmarschall's remarks?

Last but surely not least, what (if anything) is to be made of the claims advanced—long after the war had ended and Hess was dead—that Hess was somehow involved in Göring's Antarctica project? Are they to be simply dismissed as unsubstantiated rumor-mongering and story-telling by second-hand dead-man testimony of post-war veterans? Or are there any indicators that they might be true, and if so, what are they, and to what extent are they true?

As can be ascertained by the foregoing and by no means exhaustive list of questions, the Hess Mess is exactly that, a colossal mess with no easy resolution, a nagging and festering mystery that squats in the middle of the twentieth century for over forty years, unresolved to this day. The epistemological and historiographical problem of the Hess Mess is, quite simply, that each and every aspect of the story has more than one explanation, and many of the details of the story have been so badly obfuscated that extreme care must be exercised in reviewing them, and in reviewing what others have concluded from them, in order to highlight the importance and potential implications of that One Significant Question. The Hess Mess is, perhaps, the most significant unresolved historical question of the twentieth century.

In this case, it is best to begin at the end, with Hess' death, for even in death, Hess remains a mystery. Did he commit suicide? Or was he “suicided,” as his own son, Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, and Hess’ male nurse for the last half decade of his life, Abdallah Melaouhi, suspected?

B. “In my End is My Beginning.”..

1. A Death in Spandau

The man we know as Rudolf Hess - one time Deputy Führer to Adolf Hitler himself as leader of the Nazi Party, and third in succession to become head of state and government after Hitler and Reichsmarschall Hermann Göring—was pronounced dead on August 17, 1987, around 4:10 PM at the British Military Hospital in Berlin. He had spent the last forty-one years of his life in Berlin’s Spandau Prison, the last surviving major Nazi leader, and the only one who had been kept in captivity to serve out his full life sentence.

According to researcher and author Peter Padfield, Hess had been accompanied by the Black American sergeant Tony (Anthony) Jordan, whom Hess did not like because of his anti-black prejudice, into the garden at Spandau prison for Hess’ daily walk. A small “garden house” had been placed in the courtyard for Hess, where he would typically spend his afternoons relaxing or reading. This occurred at approximately 1:30,[7] according to some accounts of Hess’ prison warders.

Padfield notes that while strict regulations meant that Hess was to be watched at all times, the small summer house—which had a window facing the formidable walls of the prison, and a pair of sliding glass double doors, a small table and some electric reading lamps—was normally left unobserved by the prison warders to allow Hess some privacy, with the guards only checking on him at regular intervals a few minutes apart. As we shall also discover, Hess normally sat in such a way that his guards could see him through the small window.

Then at approximately 2:20, Sergeant “Ten”—the warders are numbered in the official reports of Hess’ last day—made a routine check on Hess, noting that Hess had emerged from the prison in a tan raincoat and a straw sombrero, walking with his cane.[8] (Already there would appear to be a discrepancy, for was Hess accompanied to the garden house at 1:30, or 2:20 PM?)

Meanwhile, number "Thirteen," who as a switchboard operator had never seen Hess, or Prisoner Number Seven as he was officially known,[9] was alerted by his colleagues that Hess was in the prison yard. Finding a colleague to relieve him at the switchboard, number Thirteen walked into the yard hoping to catch a glimpse of the infamous inmate. There he saw Tony Jordan, sitting under a tree on a bench, located approximately fifteen feet from the cabin.

As he passed by the structure, he attempted to look inside the small window that faced the prison walls to catch a glimpse of the prison's sole remaining prisoner, but could not see him. At this juncture, he called out to guard number Nine in the prison wall watchtower, to inquire if he could see Hess. Nine responded in the negative, but reassured number Thirteen that Hess had indeed entered the garden house.

All of this had in turn been watched by "Lieutenant number Three" who had observed Thirteen's perambulation. "Lieutenant Three" also noted for the official record that Hess' normal practice was to sit and read in the garden house in such a manner that he could actually be seen by the guards on the prison wall through the small window facing it. On this occasion, however, Hess could not be seen.[10]

Then at approximately 2:35 PM, Jordan left his perch at the bench under the tree to check on Hess. In his subsequent statements, Jordan explained that he had looked through the window, and saw that Hess was lying on the floor with his back slumped against the very wall containing the small window, through which he was looking. At that point he quickly entered the garden house and saw that Hess' legs were stretched out, and that he had the electrical cord from one of the reading lamps around his neck, and tied to the window latch. According to Jordan, the cord was taut and was apparently supporting Hess' weight. Additionally, Hess' eyes were open and according to Jordan, he was still apparently alive. Jordan lifted Hess to relieve the tension on the electrical cord and removed it from his neck. After this he opened Hess' shirt, and then ran to seek assistance.[11]

[8] Padfield, op. cit., p. 5.

[9] Spandau regulations officially prohibited any of the officers or warders from addressing any of their Nazi charges by name.

According to guard number Nine on the prison wall, he saw Jordan exit the garden house and run to the prison, then turn around and run back to the garden house, and then, again, turn to run to the prison, this time entering it. At this point, the prison switchboard log records that Jordan had placed a call at 14:30, though as Padfield correctly observes, "it was surely later".[12]

At this point, Hess' male Tunisian nurse, Abdallah Melaouhi—whom we will encounter again when we consider his account of the events—and another medic, number Four, had been alerted, and had arrived. According to number Four, the time was 2:40 PM, for he had "looked at his watch". Collecting his first aid kit, he and Melaouhi ran to the garden house where he checked Hess' pulse, and tried to detect any breathing. Noting the red mark left around Hess' neck from the cord, and not detecting any life signs, he and Melaouhi began two-man CPR on Hess, ordering Jordan in the meantime to find and bring an oxygen tank.[13]

A few minutes later, he did so, returning with yet another medical orderly, "number Five," who brought the trauma kit, and inserted a breathing tube into Hess' neck. However, the connection on the tube did "not match that on the oxygen bottle"[14] and thus, Melaouhi had to breathe directly into the tube instead. The time was now, according to Padfield, around 3:00 PM.

2. But what Kind of Death?

a. The First Bit of Debris in the Hess Mess

At this juncture, accounts begin to diverge, and we encounter our first bit of "debris" in the "Hess Mess," for Hess' male nurse, the Tunisian Abdallah Melaouhi, refused to make any statement to the British military police until he was well clear of the prison. Subsequently, as Padfield notes, in all versions of the story that Melaouhi told, the electrical cord—which in the official accounts Hess had removed and tied to the window latch to hang himself—was still plugged in to the wall socket. As Padfield notes, Melaouhi's statement about the electrical cord "was a feature of all his accounts. If correct it virtually rules out the official account of the prisoner's death".[15]

[11] Padfield, op. cit., p. 7.

[12] Ibid.

[13] Ibid., p. 8.

Before continuing, it is worth pausing to consider two points:

1) Abdallah Melaouhi, while employed by the Spandau prison authorities, was Hess' nurse, and unlike the other figures involved in Hess' last day, was not subject to the military jurisdiction of any four of the Allied powers operating Spandau, but rather to the joint prison authority itself. It is thus intriguing to note that his version of events is ultimately the sole source for the idea that Hess' death was not a suicide, and that it occurred under highly suspicious circumstances;
2) Conversely, everyone else in the story was subject to specific national military jurisdiction, and hence could conceivably be ordered into silence on certain aspects of the occurrences that day, or simply ordered or be threatened to modify aspects of their testimony. And should such methods not prove persuasive enough, there's always the time-tested method of simply altering or falsifying documents, or removing them altogether, which, as we shall also discover, happens on more than one occasion in the Hess Mess.

Thus, at the outset of the Hess case, an investigator is placed into an ambiguous epistemological situation: who is he to believe, the official testimony based on more than one witness, but whose testimony can be coerced? Or the sole testimony of Hess' nurse, Melaouhi's testimony, the testimony of only one witness, who, nonetheless, has some claim as an expert witness?

Padfield continues his review of Melaouhi's account by noting that Melaouhi maintained that he saw two men whom he did not recognize, a large man and a relatively smaller one, both of whom wore American uniforms that were somewhat ill-fitting. Padfield interprets these men to be medical orderlies numbers Four and Five, although he notes that medic Five did not arrive until after Melaouhi was on the scene at the garden house.[16]

While Padfield is extraordinarily careful in his examination of the details of the case, one must pause to point out a problem with his analysis of this point: is it likely that Melaouhi—who by that time had been Hess' full-time nurse for a number of years, and who had become thoroughly familiar with the operations of Spandau and who was therefore familiar with its regular personnel—would not have recognized two American medical orderlies? As Hess' nurse, he in fact had to know everyone with medical access to Hess. Rather, it would seem the converse is true: being familiar with Spandau's operations and personnel, it is more likely that Melaouhi would be particularly attuned to any break from routine, particularly where personnel were concerned. In my opinion his testimony in this respect takes on additional evidentiary weight.

Because the testimony of the American guards is consistent in the absence of any statement to the effect that there were strangers in the prison yard that day, Padfield rules out Melaouhi's story.[17] Additionally, Padfield observes that Tony Jordan's behavior prior, and subsequently, to his discovery of Hess, was radically different. Prior to the discovery, Jordan was calm, collected. The day's routine was unfolding as so many times before. After the discovery, however, Jordan was running back and forth "in complete panic... not knowing what to do".[18] Jordan had thus either to be "a consummate actor" or, contra Melaouhi's suspicions, "he had not killed Hess".[19]

The trouble is, Melaouhi's account is about a lot more than strangers in the prison yard that day, or simple "acting" on Jordan's part; here, the Hess Mess takes another strange epistemological twist.

[16] Padfield, op. cit., p. 10.

[17] Ibid, p. 11.

[18] Ibid.

Before we address Melaouhi's account, however, it is worth noting the remainder of the official timeline as Padfield summarizes it:

At approximately 2:50 PM, as the medical orderlies, "Four" and "Five" (or, the "strangers in ill-fitting American uniforms," on Melaouhi's view) were arriving at the scene, the British Military Hospital was alerted by the code name "Operation Paradox," which was the operational plan in place for a medical emergency involving Spandau's infamous and sole inmate. Sometime circa 3:10, a military ambulance arrived from the hospital at the prison gate, with a British medical officer arriving in his own car at approximately the same time.[20] At this point Hess was removed from Spandau and ca. 3:50 PM his body arrived at the hospital, where it was taken to a very special suite built on its second floor, a suite built and dedicated entirely to Hess. At 4:10, Rudolf Hess was pronounced dead,[21] and with that, the curtain rang down on the last major Nazi leader.

Unfortunately, while the curtain came down on Hess, the curtain went up on a much bigger opera and the ones who kept the case alive to this day, Hess' last nurse, Abdallah Melaouhi, and Hess' own then-grown son, Wolf-Rüdiger Hess.

b. Abdallah Melaouhi and Wolf-Rüdiger Hess: The Problems with the "Suicide" Explanation Begin

It was 6:45 in the evening when American Colonel Harold Keane phoned Hess' son, Wolf-Rüdiger, to inform him that his father had died. He could not give any further details. One day later, Colonel Keane telephoned Wolf Hess once again, and simply read to him the press release that had been prepared. This is the first official statement of the suicide explanation (and please note, the suicide explanation was already being promoted prior to the performance of the official autopsy by the British military authorities):

---

> Hess, as he was accustomed to do, went escorted by a prison warder to sit in a small cottage in the garden of the prison. On looking into the cottage a few minutes later, the warder found Hess with an electrical cord around his neck. Resuscitation measures were taken and Hess was transported to the British Military Hospital. After further attempts to revive Hess, he was pronounced dead at 16:10. Whether this suicide attempt was the actual cause of death is the subject of a continuing investigation.[22]

Wolf Hess, like Hess' nurse Melaouhi, found the claim of suicide to be incredible in the extreme, since his father, whom he had been to visit many times, was crippled and stooped over with arthritis, and was so weak he could not walk without the assistance of a cane and a warder; moreover his hands were so crippled and weak from arthritis that he found it unbelievable that his father could have (1) tied a knot in the electrical cord on the window latch (having to raise his arms to do it!), and then (2) loop the cord around his own neck.[23]

Hess' male nurse, Abdallah Melaouhi, was a young man from Tunisia who had completed medical studies in Hamburg to become a nurse when he was hired in the early 1980's about five years before Hess' death to replace the Dutch nurse who had tended Hess, and who was retiring. According to the Foreword to Melaouhi's book Rudolf Hess: His Murder and Betrayal, Melaouhi had been hired by the Allied authorities of Spandau—and, to be more accurate, the Russians, who did all the non-military hiring for the prison—because given the "language and culture barriers, Spandau officials felt safe, that with Melaouhi that there would be no fraternization problem with Hess".[24]

This surely cannot be correct, since each of the four Allied powers running Spandau for the sole inconvenience of Hess—France, Britain, the United States, and the Soviet Union—were well aware that Hess had been born in Alexandria, Egypt, in the small but vigorous German merchant community there, prior to World War One, and as such, Hess knew and spoke Arabic at least to the extent that he was able to converse with Melaouhi in that language.[25] One is tempted, rather, to view Melaouhi's hiring as perhaps being an attempt by the Allies to get Hess to disclose to an Arabic speaker something he otherwise might not do to anyone else. While there is absolutely no evidence for this conjecture, in a case with so many twists and turns it is the possibility is worth mentioning.

This returns us once again to the epistemological problem. The problem, once again, is simply this: besides being the one "witness" at the scene that day who openly and consistently has challenged the official narrative at certain key junctures and details, and is thus one witness versus many, he is also an expert witness given his medical background, whereas most of the witnesses in the official narrative were soldiers and jailers, and not medical personnel. As noted earlier, it is Melaouhi who is the sole source for the doubts about Hess' death. "Every account of Hess' death insists he committed suicide, except for Abdallah Melaouhi's".[26]

Notably, Melaouhi first insisted that suicide could not be the explanation of Hess' death in sworn statements given under oath before German notaries and authorities. His statements thus "stand in direct contradiction to the official order given to Scotland Yard's chief, Howard Jones, by England's chief prosecution, Allen Green, to suspect all investigations into what the Scotland Yard files labeled 'The Hess Murder Case'".[27] For Melaouhi himself, the case was clear, for he writes in his book, "the question was no longer whether or not Hess had been murdered, but rather who had committed the crime and why".[28] Indeed, as word of Melaouhi's testimony began to circulate in conjunction with Wolf Hess' own clearly expressed doubts, the media began to question the story, and sought Melaouhi out for numerous interviews.[29]

It is easy to see why, for Melaouhi's account is not only a direct, almost point-by-point refutation of the official suicide narrative, but it is also the testimony of the only medical technician at the scene, who was not under any kind of military jurisdiction from any of the four Allied powers operating Spandau.

> It's just after lunch August 17, 1987,

Melaouhi writes, > and I'm sitting in the living room of my official residence in Wilhelmstrasse 23 in Berlin-Spandau, less than 100 feet from Spandau Allied Prison. I'm reading the newspaper when the phone rings around 2 p.m. The young senior guard of the day, the Frenchman Jean-Pierre Audouin, is on the phone and, panic-stricken, he beseeches me: 'Come quick! Dammit! Quick! Hess has been murdered, no, not murdered!'"[30]

Melaouhi sprang into action, putting on his shoes, but forgetting to tie them, and rushed to the prison, where, by his account, he was standing before the main gate approximately two minutes after receiving the call from Audouin.[31]

(1) The Delaying Tactics of the British and American Guards

Once at the gate, however, Melaouhi maintains that he rang the bell incessantly for some twenty minutes—becoming angrier and angrier in the process—"until the British guard, Bernard Miller, finally appeared. Peering through the small window of the iron prison door, he pretended not to see me and immediately closed the window again. I kept ringing the bell".[32]

Finally, some minutes later according to Melaouhi, "he looked through his window again and said: 'Mr. Melaouhi, it's all over, you can go home now'".[33]

If one is keeping track of times, this would have been some time around 2:25-2:30.

Melaouhi, by his own admission, was by this point "really desperate to reach the prisoner whose care had been entrusted to me," so he continued to try to persuade the British guard to open the gate and admit him to the prison, "using German, English, and French" for good measure.[34]

Then comes a significant statement, one that has gone largely unnoticed among researchers investigating the Hess Mess:

> Finally, he seemed to have had enough and, opening the door, he let me pass. I didn't get far because Miller had all the keys to the doors in the building complex and he wouldn't open the door leading to the wing where I would have been able to get to Hess in just a few minutes. An American soldier who was standing only six feet away behind the open door, pointed his rifle at me and shouted: "No, nicht rein!", "No, you can't enter!" Struggling and shouting, I pushed his rifle away from me. Then, suddenly, an American officer came on the scene who knew me. He ordered the soldier to let me pass.[35]

It is intriguing to note that Melaouhi's statement confirms that there were strange or unknown personnel in Spandau that day who—since Melaouhi, a steady fixture there and certainly one who would be well-known as Hess' personal charge nurse—was not recognized by them. In this, Melaouhi's subsequent assertion that he saw two strangers in ill-fitting American uniforms is at least consistent with the above statements.

Notwithstanding the American officer's intervention, however, Melaouhi records that the British guard, Miller, continued to refuse to open the door of the central wing of the prison, forcing Melaouhi "to take a detour of several hundred meters around the building" in order to reach Hess in his traditional afternoon retreat in the garden house.[36] Upon reflection on the delays he experienced with the British and American guards, Melaouhi wondered whether this was due to them not having received any clear orders or instructions on what do to on his arrival, or whether the delay had a more sinister purpose, namely, to ensure that Hess was well and truly dead, and that any revival efforts "would not change things".[57] Indeed, the delay, according to Melaouhi, may have sealed Hess' fate:

[35] Ibid., emphasis added.

> In my opinion—and I have inevitably seen many dead people during my career as an intensive care medic—Rudolf Hess was already dead for about 30 to 40 minutes when I got to the garden. It was exactly this time about 40 minutes, which I lost in the other delays I experienced trying to get to Hess on that fateful day.

Interestingly enough, this introduces yet another problem in the "Hess Mess," for in Padfield's reconstruction, Tony Jordan discovered Hess ca. 2:30 PM, and thus, any calls to medics and to Melaouhi, would have to have been made after that time, if Jordan's times are correct. Yet Melaouhi maintains he received a call earlier, at approximately 2 PM. It would appear that either the official narrative witnesses, or Melaouhi, are either confused about the times of events, or dissembling, or possibly a mixture of both

I, however, am inclined to believe Melaouhi for three specific reasons:

1) Melaouhi has little to gain by lying;
2) In reading Melaouhi's book, it is apparent that, as a medical professional, he strongly felt his first duty was to his patient's health and well-being, and that additionally he felt a great deal of compassion for Hess; and finally,
2) Even on the supposition that he is confused about the timing of the phone call from Spandau urging him to come at once and the timing of his arrival there, the central core of his argument is not based on timing, but rather upon his professional judgment that Hess was simply physically unable to perform the tasks he would have had to perform in order to commit suicide in the manner described by the official story, as we shall see below. Even so, as a medical professional, he is trained to note times of events by habit, and hence it is unlikely that he was confused.

(2) The Scene of the Crime: Strange “Americans” in Ill-fitting Uniforms

Sometime ca. 2:30-2:40, Melaouhi arrived at the garden house, and here it is best to cite his own words more extensively:

> When I finally reached the small building out of breath after losing more precious time, I couldn’t enter the house. When I finally managed to open the door, I immediately noticed that a struggle had taken place. I had cleaned and tidied up the small wooden house just the day before. Now the straw tiled mat covering the floor was completely untidy and the tall lamp had fallen over. I clearly remember that the lamp’s cable lying on the floor was still connected to the socket. The small round table and easy chair had also been overturned. Nothing in the room was in its usual place.
> Rudolf Hess was lying lifeless on the floor, his arms and legs stretched out on the ground. Two men dressed in American uniforms were standing alongside him—the men’s uniforms were much too small, with the uniform of the larger man almost bursting at the seams. Although I knew everyone who had access to “Prisoner No. 7,” I had never seen these two men before. Not only that, but the black American guard whom Hess feared and deplored most, Tony Jordan, was also in the room—he seemed to be completely exhausted and extremely nervous, sweating heavily with his shirt almost soaking wet. He was also not wearing his tie, which was a highly unusual violation of the prison dress code.[38]

Later in his book, Melaouhi elaborates on this scene, speculating on what he thinks it represented:

> After arriving on the scene, my first impression was that a struggle had just taken place. This was where someone suffering from numerous infirmities and without much strength left in his body must have, in sheer panic, desperately yet unsuccessfully tried to defend himself. Looking at the people standing in the room, I then saw whom he had tried to defend himself against. The victim > was lying on his back with his hands and legs stretched out on the ground almost in the middle of the small room which measured about 70 square feet. Lifeless. Dead. The colored American guard, Tony Jordan, was standing near the feet of the dead body. He appeared overwrought and stressed, extremely nervous and sweating so heavily that his shirt was saturated with sweat and sweat was running down his face. He was also not wearing a tie, a clear violation of the Spandau prison military dress code. It was then that I first noticed the other two people who were standing next to Hess. I was now bent over my patient and I looked up from below at the two men in uniform. They both gave me icy stares and then, looking at Jordan several times with questioning glances, seemed to be asking, "What is he doing here?" There was one large and one small man, both of whom were wearing American uniforms.

[38] Abdallah Melaouhi, op. cit., pp. 30-31, emphasis added. Melaouhi’s account subsequently in the book is almost an exact repeat, with the addition that the electrical cord that was still plugged in was “supposedly the cord that Hess had used to hang himself, according to the Allies”.

> But were they really Americans? Guards wearing the uniforms of the four custodial Allied governments were not allowed to enter the inner area of the prison. Soldiers were even categorically forbidden to approach the prisoner. They were not allowed to speak a word to him. They were confined to their posts on the watchtowers and at other "sensitive" points of the prison... .
> But these two men were not Americans, at least not American soldiers—the uniforms that they wore were incomplete and they also didn't fit. The larger of the two men looked like a sausage pressed into a uniform that had been buttoned up with great effort and which now threatened to burst open at any moment. The smaller man's trousers were even too small for him. It looked as if they had just now hastily gotten these uniforms in order to conceal their illegal presence in the prison.
> All of this crossed my mind as I was kneeling next to Hess to check his breath, pulse, and heartbeat. At the same time I reproachfully asked Jordan, "What have you done to him? He replied in a strange mixture of fear, anger, and even spiteful relief, "The pig is finished. You won't have to work anymore(sic) night shifts!" Mind you, he said "finished," not "the pig has killed himself".[39]

Melaouhi's account, if true, raises questions: who were the "strange men" in ill-fitting American uniforms? And what about the plugged in cord? As Melaouhi himself suggests, the latter raises three interesting questions of its own: was Hess strangled with it, and did the murderers reconnect it to the electrical socket? Or was it even the murder weapon at all?[40] Of course, according to the official narrative and witnesses, it was not connected but was wrapped around Hess' neck. In Melaouhi's testimony, it was never around Hess' neck, for in none of his statements does he ever mention seeing it there. For Melaouhi, suspicion fell upon Jordan because he was missing his tie.

In any case, Melaouhi records that he himself became panic-stricken, realizing that "something extraordinary must have happened here," and that "at least the Americans and the British must also be aware of what had happened here".[41] Fearing that the two strange men with the ill-fitting American uniforms "would not hesitate to allow another 'accident' to occur to cover up the first crime, this time to a small and unknown Tunisian male nurse",[42] Melaouhi states that he decided to perform resuscitation, even though he knew Hess was already dead, largely in order to pretend that he did not suspect murder.[43] He ordered Jordan to get the first aid trauma kit and summon an ambulance, and in the meantime gave Hess mouth-to-mouth breathing. This being unsuccessful, he requested one of the two strange men to help him with heart massage. "This time", records Melaouhi, "the stranger demonstrated his strength and brutality by cracking several of the old man's ribs while he pressed down on Hess' chest".[44]

There is of course a self-contradiction here: how can Melaouhi maintain that there were signs of a struggle in the garden house, when Hess was so old and frail to begin with, and scarcely able to tie knots in anything, much less electrical cord?

Unless of course the struggle was between other parties, with Hess entirely uninvolved, and this is, indeed, the conclusion Melaouhi came to.

Melaouhi also notes that on August 17, 1987, the day of his alleged suicide, Hess did not appear to be suicidal or even depressed, and that Hess had even placed a requisition request with the prison authorities for certain items, and that he had made a similar request to Melaouhi to go shopping to replace a defective heating coil for his tea water.[45] Additionally, argues Melaouhi, there were other numerous opportunities to commit suicide with far greater success than in the garden house, where he was under closer supervision. The cell block itself, during the night, with plenty of electrical cords, was not under as close supervision.[46]

(3) Hess' Physical Inability to Perform the Tasks Required for His Suicide According to the Official Narrative

But garden house or cell-block, and notwithstanding possibly mis-remembered times, the real problem for Melaouhi was Hess himself:

> After a while I realized that Hess couldn't have hanged himself even if he had tried. In the last five years in which I had looked after him almost daily, I had gained a clear and precise impression of his physical condition and his physical capabilities, and it was impossible for Hess to have killed himself in the manner described by the Allies by placing a cable around his neck and tying it into a knot and then either hanging or strangling himself to death.
> Toward the end of his life, my patient was so weak that he needed a special chair with an electric lifting device to even get up. He had to be supported when he walked since he suffered from muscular atrophy in his left thigh causing a muscular debility and loss of the control of his knee joints.... He was completely blind in one eye and only had 30% of his vision in the other one. When he fell to the ground he could not get up by himself. He hands were crippled by an intense arthritis. He was even unable to pick up a spoon when he ate; I had to put it into his hand. He would therefore have been unable to tie a knot in a cord or cable—he couldn't even tie his shoelaces. He also couldn't lift his arms above his shoulders so that he never would have been > able to tie a cord to the handle of the window from which he allegedly hanged himself.[47]

[45] Abdallah Melaouhi, op. cit., p. 116.

The problem with the official narrative in other words, was that the Allies, having hired Melaouhi to begin with, were now confronted by first-hand medical testimony of Hess' own nurse that their narrative made no sense.

(4) Miscellanies: Champagne Parties, Tampered First Aid Kits, and a Familiar Pattern of the Destruction of Evidence

As noted above, Padfield observed that the tube from the first aid trauma kit did not fit with the oxygen tank, and that Melaouhi had to blow into the tube himself, and this appears to corroborate Melaouhi's statement about the first aid kit (and here, once again, note the timing difficulties when comparing Melaouhi's statements to the review of the official narrative provided by Padfield); having dispatched Jordan to retrieve the kit, Melaouhi states:

> I was desperately waiting for Jordan to return when he was suddenly standing next to me again. I immediately noticed that he had used his long absence—I estimated that he had been away for about 15 to 20 minutes—to change his clothes. The equipment that he brought had been clearly tampered with. That morning I had checked the first aid kit as usual and confirmed through an entry in my logbook that nothing was missing and that it was intact. Now the seal had been broken and the contents were in a state of disorder.[48] The battery for the intubation set was missing and the tube had been perforated. There was also no oxygen in the oxygen bottle. Yet when I had routinely checked the first aid kit and the oxygen device that very same morning, I am certain that both had been in complete working order. If any further proof was needed that things were not as they should have been, then this tampered first aid kit gave me an unmistakable sign that something had gone wrong here.[49]

This is an important point of general agreement between the "official narrative" summarized by Padfield, and Melaouhi's account, and in my opinion, strengthens the nature of Melaouhi's allegations, for his behavior and observations are consonant with a medical professional's under such circumstances; he is noticing details that a non-medical professional would not.

Things took another bizarre turn for Melaouhi when, accompanying his patient—or his patient's body—to the British Military Hospital, he observed various British officials and "other officers" cheerfully drinking champagne and "apparently celebrating something," which he suspected was the death of Hess.[50] The British governor, Anthony Le Tissier, observed Melaouhi standing alone in the hospital lobby and asked him if he would like to see the body of his patient and so say "a last good-bye". Melaouhi naturally said yes, and was led to a basement room of the hospital where Hess' body was placed. Melaouhi, "very sad and shaken," observed Hess and "prayed for him in the custom of my faith because I believe that God is universal".[51]

The strange day was not, however, over for Melaouhi. Driven back to Spandau to identify a jacket which he had taken off while administering CPR to Hess, he was forced to wait four more hours before he was allowed to return to the garden house. There, the scene had already been altered, for "almost everything had been removed including all the traces of what had happened,"[52] and several strange men were milling about the area. Some of these approached him, handed him his jacket, and asked him to identify it. Having done so, Melaouhi was given his jacket and released. On the way out of Spandau, he inquired of the prison secretary who the strange people were, and was informed that they were "all officers from the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation".[53]

The very next day, the German tabloid newspaper, Bild, ran a story stating that bulldozers would soon appear at the prison to demolish the structure to make room for a new shopping center. The article stated that a plan had been approved three years previously that the old prison would be demolished beginning no less than 48 hours after Hess' death. What was the reason for the sudden need to destroy the scene of a possible crime? Answer: the Allies did not want the place to become a possible neo-Nazi shrine.[54]

There is, however, a deeper, darker, potential pattern here, for if Hess was murdered, then the rush to destroy the crime scene—in this case, a whole building—is paralleled by some other events in recent history where a similar "rush to destroy the scene" by destroying and removing whole buildings also occurred, events where there was also an unusual connection to Germany and extreme right wing Nazis: the destruction of the Alfred Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City after the Oklahoma City Bombing, and, of course, the removal of debris after the destruction of the World Trade Center complex after 9/11?[56]

(5) Melaouhi's Assessment of the Motivations: The "Gorbachev Hypothesis"

Like others involved with, or investigating, the Hess Mess, Melaouhi too is compelled to ask the all-important question: why? If Hess was murdered, why? And why do it so late in the game?

A clue, he argues, is provided by the fact that on the day of his death, there were no Soviet personnel present in the prison?[56] In touch with Wolf Hess soon after his father's death, Melaouhi informed him there was no doubt in his mind that his father had been murdered.[57] For Melaouhi, there is no doubt that is was a crime of state, and that "the special interests that led to this crime are apparently still valid though he does not speculate on what could still be so sensitive, so long after World War Two's end, that would require the political murder of a frail old man.

Melaouhi speculates that one possible reason was that the Allies discovered that Hess was successfully smuggling letters out of Spandau, and wanted to put a permanent end to the practice.[59] The problem with this view is that they would have had no idea of how many letters might already have escaped, and that might turn up with embarrassing revelations on Hess' death and any suspicions that its occurrence was not natural.

A much more serious hypothesis, however, and one that needs to be factored into any consideration of The Question, is the Gorbachev Hypothesis, and it was Melaouhi who was one of the first, but quite certainly not the only, individual who suspected it.

For years the western Allies had assured the Hess family, and the rest of the world, that they were indeed pressing for Hess' release on humanitarian grounds, and that it was the Soviets who continually played the "bad guy" and vetoed any such notion, conveniently enabling the western Allies to "blame Russia".

But then something happened, and that something was Mikhail Gorbachev, the new "liberal-minded" General Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union.[60] As we shall discover in more detail subsequently, through contacts in East Germany, Wolf Hess learned that Mr. Gorbachev was seriously considering a complete reversal of prior Soviet policy regarding Hess, and dropping its veto on his release for humanitarian reasons. It was even rumored that this would be announced when the Soviets took their next monthly turn at guarding Hess.

Melaouhi informed Hess of what he thought would surely be good news to the prisoner and his patient.

> But Hess failed to react at all. After about five minutes I asked him if he wasn't happy about the news. After taking a deep breath, he

---

[58] Ibid., p. 36.

[60] Of course, "liberal-minded" in this context is a highly relative term, given the previous occupants of that position in people like Stalin, Khrushchev, Brezhnev, Andropov, &c.

> answered, "You fool!" Shocked, I asked him what he meant. He answered, slightly irritated, "Do you have to know everything?" I said no, but that I would still like to know this one thing, whereupon he said in a flat tone of voice, "If the Russians release me that would be my death. It would only be a happy day for me if the British published my documents internationally. Then I would be free". I didn't really understand what he meant until he explained to me, "I always wanted to have peace in this world, and I did everything I could to prevent war. Almost everything that people write about me is not true. That is why it would be good if these documents could finally be published, because then I would be a free man and I could finally see my family again. You must, however, not tell anyone about this as this would be more harmful than useful to me, and the Allies would twist every word I said as they pleased as they have always done before".
> It wasn't until after his death that I understood what he meant, that the British—for reasons of state—would never allow him to be a free man.[61]

With this second-hand dead-man's testimony—always of very weak evidentiary value—we have the first intimation of yet another explanatory hypothesis in the Hess Mess: the "Peace Plan" hypothesis. According to this, Hess' flight was, as is now widely believed, a flight undertaken to negotiate a peace with Great Britain to end the war in the West. It is this hypothesis that lies at the central core of almost all investigation of the Hess Mess, and accordingly, we shall have much to do with it throughout the remainder of this book, for it, more than any other, highlights the unusual nature of the Hess Mess and the significance of The One Question.

We may, however, anticipate the problems that the Peace Plan Hypothesis poses to some extent by posing the related questions once again: is this hypothesis really sufficient, in and of itself, to explain why Hess was kept in prison for so long? And if the murder hypothesis be true, is it sufficient motivation to explain it? Why not murder him earlier? And if the murder hypothesis is not true, why would the Russians not release Hess earlier, and use whatever resulted from their about-face to embarrass the Western Allies and exploit its propaganda value? Or was there some secret the Soviets were also attempting to preserve, of which the Peace Plan Hypothesis was only a component? Or were they willing to play "bad guy" in the service of some secret arrangement and agreement with the British? Did they change their position, knowing that Hess would be murdered by someone else to preserve that secret?

[61] Abdallah Melaouhi, op. cit., pp. 113-114.

As Melaouhi puts it, "Outside of sheer cruelty, it would seem that there would have to be some quite powerful political reason why Hess needed to rot in jail".[62] But once again: What political reason would be relevant in 1987, fully forty-two years after the end of World War Two, and, if one considers the fact that some Hess files are only due to be classified in the year of the writing of this book—that is, in 2017—fully seventy-two years, almost three quarters of a century, after the end of the Second World War? What secret could possibly be relevant even up to the present time? Moreover, what possible secret could that be, that Hess might have been privy to, prior to his May 1941 flight?

C. The Autopsies

Such questions were instantly posed the moment the British announcement stated that the ninety-three year old Hess had committed suicide. But assuming for the sake of argument that Melaouhi's statements are totally unfounded—which this author does not believe them to be—is there any other evidence that Hess' death might not have been suicide? Indeed there is.

The British forensic pathologist and professor of forensic medicine, J.M. Cameron, a consultant for the British Army on forensic medicine, was ordered to Berlin on Hess' death to perform the autopsy. Cameron and his team discovered in Hess' clothes a note which they claimed was a suicide note, clearing indicating Hess' intentions of taking his own life. This note was read to Wolf Rüdiger Hess during a phone call.

Hess' son quickly concluded it was bogus because it used forms of expression and diction that his father had not used since the late 1960s and early 1970s, and, since it made direct and explicit reference to the Nuremberg Tribunal which had sentenced him to life, it was in any case forbidden under prison regulations. Wolf

Hess concluded, on this basis, that the note had probably been written in November 1969 during a period of severe illness for his father, and that it was confiscated by prison authorities on one of their many sweeps of Hess' cell years prior to its convenient appearance during his death in 1987. Under Spandau's regulations, Hess was forbidden, absolutely, speak or write about anything having to do with politics, with the Nazi era, or with the Nuremberg tribunals.[63] Wolf Hess, increasingly skeptical of the official report, decided to commission his own private autopsy.

In the meantime, Cameron's official autopsy found that Prisoner Number 7 had perished from asphyxiation that resulted from "compression of the neck" as a consequence of "suspension". In other words, strangulation by hanging.[64] Additionally, however, Cameron's autopsy also discovered other things, things which were left curiously "unexplained", which included a "circular bruised abrasion of the top of the back of the head," and deep bruises on the back of the head, and bruising on the right upper thyroid cartilage, and further additional bruising behind the voice box.[65]

Padfield, who does not believe Hess was murdered,[66] observes that while Cameron's autopsy was intended to dispel doubts and quell any political explanations or examinations of Hess' death, had exactly the opposite effect, because no explanation was forthcoming as to how the bruising occurred. It will be apparent to the reader however, that bruising might be consistent with Melaouhi's assertions that it appeared as if some sort of struggle had occurred in the garden house.

As for Wolf Hess' autopsy, with which we shall have more to do in a subsequent chapter, the German pathologists discovered "two almost parallel strangulation marks on the neck,"[67] a difficult feat for someone hanging himself to achieve, to say the least. However, in his final report, one of the German forensic pathologists hired by Hess to perform the autopsy, an eminent pathologist named Dr. Spann, went further in challenging Cameron's conclusions:

> During the second autopsy, findings were ascertained in the area of the skull and neck which lend themselves to explain the death by a central paralysis, caused by violence to the neck and accompanied by stoppage of the oxygen supply to the brain. Therefore, the findings ascertained by us agree with Professor Cameron's inasmuch as it is also his opinion that the cause of death was asphyxiation due to the compression of the neck. This presupposes that the decisive mechanism causing the death lay in a compression of the arterial vessels of the throat, accompanied by stoppage of the oxygen supply to the brain, and not in a compression of the respiratory tract.
> Dr. Cameron's further conclusion that this compression was caused by the suspension is not necessarily compatible with our findings...
>
> In forensic science, the course which the ligature mark takes on the neck is considered a classic indicator for the differentiation between the forms of strangulation of hanging and throttling. A horizontally level course of the ligature mark around the neck is considered to be a characteristic sign of throttling. In the case of hanging, on the other hand, the ligature mark ascends in the direction of the fixed attachment point of the strangulation device...
> If Professor Cameron, in his assessment of the cause of death, comes to the conclusion that this cause of death was asphyxiation caused by compression of the neck due to hanging, he neglects to consider the other method of strangulation, namely throttling. By definition, throttling entails strangulation by means of a device encircling the throat and the active constriction by another person, or very rarely by the victim himself, whereas in the case of hanging, the compression by the strangulation tool is achieved passively through the weight of the victim's own body. Making this distinction would have required an examination of the course of the ligature mark. The precise course of the mark is not reported in Professor Cameron's autopsy report...
> Here... an almost horizontal course of the strangulation mark could be identified, this finding, as well as the fact that the mark on the throat obviously was not located above the larynx, is more indicative of a case of throttling rather than of hanging. Under no circumstances can the findings be readily explained by a so-called > typical hanging. The burst blood vessels which we observed in the face, caused by blood congestion, are also not compatible with typical hanging.[68]

If one accepts Melaouhi's statements of Hess' frail health and strength, and considers them in relation to these remarks, it is clear that Prisoner Number 7 was in no condition to throttle himself. Add to this the bruising on Hess' head and around his neck, and one has clear signs of a struggle, and of murder. Even standing alone, Dr. Spann's report clearly implies murder, not suicide.

1. The Magical Year of 2017: Weeding the Files

The mysteries surrounding Hess' death are not likely to be solved even with the year 2017—this year and the year this book is being written—and the year that the remaining Hess files are to be declassified. Indeed, one may wonder about the wisdom of writing a book on Hess at all in the year that the files are supposedly going to be opened. But as Padfield rightly observes, the disclosure date in effect means nothing whatsoever, since known files, such as the inventory of items Hess brought with him on his notorious flight to Scotland, have already been "extensively 'weeded'"[69] leaving us with yet another epistemological conundrum, for the amount of files "that have been destroyed" or thus weeded is completely unknown, leaving one to argue from silence, or, at best, from what documentary evidence as does exist for the removal and "weeding" of certain files.[70]

Or to be as plain as possible about it: the 2017 disclosure date in effect means nothing, for while files might appear to challenge this or that detail in the Hess Mess, by the nature of the case, and based on the prior pattern evident in the Hess Mess, nothing is to prevent the removal of some files which might never appear on any index of files. In fact, it is even possible that files might be forged to challenge this or that aspect of the Hess Mess uncovered over the years by various researchers, and hence, the speculations will continue.

2. A Strange Remark in Melaouhi's Recovered Letter from Hess

As we shall see, those speculations should continue, for what has been uncovered in the Hess Mess by various researches is stunning enough. And it should continue for another reason, for some research has uncovered things whose implications have possibly gone unnoticed by the very researchers who uncovered them.

One of those "uncovered things" was a letter of Hess which Melaouhi himself had acquired, and which Hess had apparently written in Spandau and given to Melaouhi, with incredibly detailed and specific instructions on how to transmit it to people "on the outside". In this letter, at a certain point, Hess elaborates on a period of his imprisonment in England at Maindiff Court, a very problematical period as we shall discover in future chapters.

In this case, complaining of his treatment during this period, Hess also complained that he was being poisoned by his British captors, and then states, "I wasn't allowed to smoke".[71] For the health-and-homeopathy-obsessed Hess, Deputy Führer of the Nazi Party, which had itself during the years before the war embarked on an anti-smoking campaign worthy of modern America, this is stunning.

In fact, it's more than stunning.

Because Hess didn't smoke...

...and we re only just getting started.

THE SON SPEAKS ABOUT THE "SUICIDE"

"Then, in 1937—after ten years of marriage—they had their only child, Wolf Adolf Karl Rüdiger Hess. 'Wolf had been Hitler's codename in the early days of the Nazi Party, 'Adolf is self-explanatory, and, of course, he was named 'Karl' after Professor Haushofer. Both men after whom the baby was named acted as his godfathers".

Lynn Picknett, Clive Prince, and Stephen Prior[1]

WOLF RÜDIGER HESS, THE ONLY SON AND CHILD of his father Rudolf and his mother Ilse Hess nee Pröhl, was barely a three and a half years old when his father flew on his now infamous flight in May of 1941 to Great Britain. It was only much later, in Spandau prison, that he saw his father again for the first time as a grown man, and from that point, during much of his adult life, he sought to obtain his father's release from Spandau on humanitarian grounds, and after his father's suspicious death until his own death in 2001 at the age of sixty-four, fought to overturn the suicide verdict of the official narrative, and to restore his father's honor. Whatever one may make of that quest, it is at least understandable.

As the surviving son of Rudolf Hess, and father of three children himself, Wolf Hess was naturally in touch with, and contacted by, many of the researchers of the Hess affair throughout his life, and himself published three books on his father, two of which—My Father Rudolf Hess and Who Murdered My Father, Rudolf Hess? My Father's Mysterious Death in Spandau—we shall have occasion to cite in this book. In this chapter, our concentration will naturally be upon the latter, for Wolf-Rüdiger and his lawyer, Dr. Alfred Seidl, who was also his father's lawyer at the Nuremberg Tribunals, noted many anomalies about the death of Spandau's famous Prisoner Number Seven, and attempted to bring them to the attention of the wider public.

If one gets only one book on the Hess Affair, then in this author's opinion, their book is the book to have. Its probing of the known details is thorough, their ability to unearth new details in the case is profound, and their synthesis and speculations are boldly, tightly and well-argued. As we shall discover, they unearthed a highly suggestive detail which has, as I shall argue subsequently, massive and contemporary significance and implications.

A. Anomalies Noted by Hess' Son, Wolf-Rüdiger Hess

Like his father's nurse, Abdallah Melaouhi, with whom he was in contact, Wolf Hess did not believe the story that his father had committed suicide, and in Who Murdered My Father, Rudolf Hess, he attempted to outline his personal concerns and the reasons for them. Wolf Hess begins the first chapter of Who Murdered My Father by noting one glaring anomaly: the death certificate itself was signed only by British personnel, and yet, his father's death occurred in the month of August, during the American guard rotation.[2] It may be objected that as a British prisoner initially, and as Hess' medical needs were always attended to by the British Military Hospital, there was nothing unusual in this.

However, as will be seen, Wolf Hess raises a number of other issues which place this small fact into a rather larger and more serious context. Not the least of these is that he adds the important detail that as soon as the American governor of Spandau, Darold Keane, phone him in Munich, he and his lawyer, Dr. Seidl, boarded a plane and flew to Berlin the very next morning and attempted to gain entry to the prison, only to be told that they "were neither allowed inside the prison complex" nor were they allowed to view Wolf Hess' father, and that no further information was forthcoming.[3]

Hess and Seidl booked a hotel room, and Hess called the secret phone number of the prison and demanded to speak to Keane, who, "after some attempts to stall me,"[4] finally took the call and informed Hess that the prison governors were still in conference, and that he would be informed as soon as the press report was prepared for release. He was told to stay calm and wait in his hotel for the call from Spandau.

[3] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, op. cit., p. 47.

"Finally," writes Hess, "the long awaited call came". But when it did, Hess and his lawyer began to observe the carefully crafted wording of the release might be concealing a crime:

> I was speechless at what I got to hear. Keane said: "I will now give you the report that we will release immediately afterwards to the press. It reads: 'Initial examination indicates that Rudolf Hess attempted to take his own life. On the afternoon of August 17, under the supervision of a prison guard, Hess went to a summerhouse in the prison garden, where he always used to sit. When the supervisor looked into the summerhouse some minutes later, he discovered Hess with an electric cord around his neck. Attempts were made at resuscitation, and Hess was taken to the British Military Hospital. After further attempts to revive Hess, he was declared dead at 4:10 p.m. The question whether this suicide attempt was the cause of his death is the object of an investigation including a thorough post-mortem which is still ongoing at this time'".
> I hung up. Obviously neither a response nor small-talk were expected on the other end—both were quite superfluous. This was now the third conflicting official account of my father's death within 24 hours. The first had spoken of the death in the British Military Hospital, the second of the death in Spandau prison. So now it was a "suicide" in the prison's garden summerhouse. It was not yet to be the last version of his death![5]

Pausing to note the same frail health and physical weaknesses stressed by Melaouhi, Wolf Hess and Seidl began to question the explanations, not the least because in the "press announcement" there was no time of death itself, only an announcement of the time of the certification of death, leaving open the question, where, exactly, did Hess die? At Spandau, or at the British Hospital?

[5] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, op. cit., p. 48, emphasis added.

Then came yet another "clarification," this time from the Americans:

> In their Telex #241904 of August 24, 1987, the Berlin office of the American news bureau Associated Press put it this way: "Hitler's former Second-in-Command, Rudolf Hess, hung himself in the Spandau Prison for War Criminals with the extension cord of a reading lamp. According to the latest details made available by the Allies on Monday evening, August 24, 1987, Hess (on Monday, August 17, 1987) wrapped around his neck part of the cord that was already attached to the ceiling or wall of the prison's garden summerhouse. He then apparently let himself drop off the bench on which he had sat".[6]

It is worth pausing to consider this report, for as we have already seen, Rudolf Hess' habit was to sit in the summerhouse in such a fashion that he was visible through the window. Why then, as he was presumably wiring the cord for his suicide, was he not visible, and prevented by the guards? Note again the physical difficulties of an old man performing the task, which this press story appears to attempt to address by maintaining that the cord was "already attached to the ceiling or wall of the prison's garden summerhouse". But the statement, having attempted to address one physical difficulty, creates another, for Rudolf Hess then "Let himself drop off the bench on which he had sat".

This newly-created difficulty is revealed by the next Associated Press Telex:

> Shortly after—in Telex #241917—a further communication from the same news agency stated more precisely: "While sitting in the summerhouse, Hess had to elevate his legs. According to the details available, he left himself fall sideways with the cord around his neck. It is not known > whether the cord broke in the process.".. Immediately after (Telex #241938), even more details: "The Allies later indicated more precisely that the cord had been an extension cord. It had always been hung on the window latch when not in use. Hess is said to have looped the cable around his neck and then apparently dropped off the bench."..[7]

Again, it appears that the explanations are designed to meet objections to the suicide explanation based on Hess' frail health and arthritis: the cord is "already attached," and now, rather than being attached to the window latch or the ceiling it is now just the window latch. And Hess is no longer dropping off of the bench (which he might have had difficulty getting on to), he is now "falling sideways". But yet a new problem is created, for in order to do so, we are informed he had to "elevate his legs," a difficult proposition for an arthritic old man that was stooped over from the ailment, and who had to walk with a cane, and whose left thigh according to Melaouhi was atrophied. Interestingly enough, notes Wolf Hess, the initial press release "containing the first mention of suicide was not signed by the Russians, but on the insistence of the British, the Americans released it to the public anyhow".[8]

B. The Pre-Planned Protocols for Hess' Death, vs. What Actually Occurred: The Autopsies Again

In June 1983, as it became evident that Prisoner Number Seven, already advanced in years and in increasingly deteriorating health, was nearing his mortal end, "the four Allied prison Governors had arrived at an agreement that established the measures that would be taken in the event of Rudolf Hess' death".[9] When the situation actually occurred, however, these agreed-upon protocols were quickly thrown out, and the British

---

[7] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, op. cit., p. 50.

[9] Ibid.

"immediately seized the initiative".[10] While the matter of a joint autopsy conducted under the auspices of medical personnel of all four Allied powers in the governing structure of Spandau was not specified nor called for in those protocols, such a joint autopsy was only to be expected, and indeed, it was proposed after Hess' death. But every attempt to pursue this proposal was obstructed "by the angry insistence of the British,"[11] who thus assured that it would be a Briton—Dr. Cameron as we discovered in the previous chapter—who would perform the first and only official autopsy.[12]

There were other anomalies noted by Wolf Hess, one of which concerned the extraordinarily small dimensions of the garden house. It was so small that an "extension cord"—the alleged "suicide" weapon—simply was not needed for any of the electrical appliances in it.[13] His requests to obtain the testimony of his father's black American guard, Tony Jordan, simply went unanswered by the American authorities.[14]

But one request did meet with an unusual success, for Wolf Hess asked for, and received, not just a copy of Cameron's report, but an original, "signed by Professor Cameron and written on the stationary of the University of London's forensic medical institute, which he heads".[15] Wolf Hess, following the suggestion of Dr. Hugh Thomas, another British physician who had attended his father in the British hospital on one occasion, and with whom we shall have much to do later in this book, believes that Dr. Cameron in fact performed "two autopsies," or rather, one autopsy with two entirely different reports or versions of it, one for public consumption, and a much more secret one, intended only for certain British authorities.[16]

C. Was Rudolf Hess Suicidal?

One of the persisting questions in the Hess Mess is—if Hess knew something so dangerous that he had to be permanently incarcerated and then murdered—why not try to murder him earlier than actually happened? Wolf Hess attempts to provide an answer to this nagging question[17] by pointing out that earlier in the year of his death, on January 14, 1987, his father put in a formal requisition request to the four Allied governing powers for a pacemaker to be installed on his heart, indicating that "he was prepared to risk the 'possible dangers associated' with the operation".[18] His father, according to Wolf Hess, told him he had been suffering more cardiac arrhythmia and variable pulse-beats, and even heart attacks, all of which was disputed by two British medical experts, who had "supposedly been unable to ascertain any negative changes of my father's heart".[19]

But according to Wolf Hess, there was more going on that meets the eye:

> I have recounted the pacemaker-episode here not only to document by father's unbroken will to live, but also because his transfer, soon after, to the British Military Hospital would otherwise have been even more mysterious and inexplicable than it is. Within our family, we speak of it as the second attempt on my father's life....
> On Sunday, March 1, 1987, at 3:00 a.m., Rudolf Hess was transferred to the British Military Hospital because of bronchitis. There could be two explanations for this more than unusual time: 1) The British wanted to keep the matter out of the public eye and avoid awkward questions by the press; 2) they wanted to make use of the "blind spot," in the night of February 28 to March 1, between the French and Soviet guard periods, in order to place the blame on the Soviets for everything that would—or should?—happen.

---

[17] It will continue to nag us for the rest of this book.

[18] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, op. cit., p. 113.

[19] Ibid.

> One day earlier, on Saturday, February 28, 1987, our father had still written to us. The letter was peculiar in its unusual brevity and its content. It was not the first time that the handwriting had been shaky, but we could only wonder helplessly at the text. It read: "Dear Gräfelingers, for lack of subject matter, sincere greetings, Yours". If, on this evening before his coup-like transferal to the British Military Hospital, he lacked subject matter for a letter, then he could neither have been seriously ill nor informed about the imminent transferal.[20]

In other words, Rudolf Hess' cryptic letter to his family may have forestalled a "murder-by-medical-emergency".

1. A Prior Attempt on Hess' Life? Or an Interrupted Mind Control Procedure?

But the situation grew even stranger, for Hess remained in the British hospital for some days, after Ilse Hess, Rudolf's wife, had received a telephone call from the prison telling her that Rudolf was in the British hospital suffering from bronchitis, but that there was no need for concern and that he would "surely be taken back to Spandau within 24 hours".[21] Four days, however, passed, until on the fifth day the German magazine Stern called the family, inquiring what news it had of Rudolf's pneumonia! Wolf Hess called the prison authorities and requested permission to see his father, which was granted by the British governor, Le Tissier...

... for the next week, and on a day that Wolf Hess could not take off from work! Hess' son then requested a different day off that week, and Le Tissier informed him to call back on March 9. When he did so, the British governor then informed Wolf that his father did not want to see him until the end of the month.[22]

[22] Ibid., pp. 116-117.

Frustrated by the run-around, and increasingly suspicious of the British prison authorities, Wolf Hess and his lawyer, Dr. Seidl, decided to go to Berlin anyway, and informed the press that they were coming. They were met by an avalanche of press, and a strong German police presence around the prison. Once admitted, they were confronted by all four Allied prison governors, and various interpreters and medical personnel. As it was March, the Soviets were in charge of the prison, and the Soviet governor suggested that the medical experts could update Hess and Seidl on his father's condition.

Wolf Hess and his lawyer refused, and insisted on seeing his father. At this point, the Soviet governor produced a document and placed it on the table. It was > ...a sheet of paper of DIN A 4 format, bearing almost illegible writing with unclear and jumbled syntax, faulty spelling and punctuation. I could hardly decipher it: "I request that my son come to see me on the very last day of the month". No date, no salutation, no signature, only the familiar round stamp: Allied Prison Spandau Official" and two date stamps, one from March 9 and one from March 11, 1987. The latter had been crossed out with ball point pen.

> We studied the document for a long time, astonished. "If my father really wrote this, he can only have done so in a state of almost total mental derangement," I said. Dr. Seidl confirmed that whoever had written this was "not legally competent". So the document in question was "completely worthless". We insisted again on seeing the patient ourselves, immediately. Now the Russian demanded a written application to visit. I explained that I had already sent one two weeks ago, but had not received an answer yet. To which the Russian replied: "No answer is an answer too".[23]

After more back-and-forth between Hess, his lawyer, and the Russian governor, Wolf Hess was finally told that only a written request to see his father would be considered.

[23] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, Op. cit., p. 118.

He immediately wrote out the application, and passed it to the Allied governors who, not expecting such stubbornness, retired to consider it. Eventually they returned, and informed him that the application for a visit had been turned down, but he could go to the door of his father's hospital room with the four Allied governors, and look at his father from the door![24]

What happened next, provides the first entrance into yet another mystifying aspect of the Hess Mess, and here it is necessary to cite Wolf Hess' account extensively:

> The Governors and their entourage accompanied me to a special elevator which went to the so-called Rudolf-Hess-Suite of the British Military Hospital. The entrance to this elevator was guarded by British paratroopers with machine guns. Two of them went up with us. Upstairs, in the hall, there were more armed guards. We went to the room where my father stayed. Through an open door, I could see my father, about 10 feet away. The attendants had pushed two chairs together, sat him down on them like a string puppet and covered him with a blanket.
> He looked frightening: pale, hollow-cheeked, eyes sunk deep into their sockets, flickering and looking unsteadily into a void. Yes, this figure matched the letter we had been shown. He was obviously not in full possession of his faculties. What had they done to him? I don't know for how long I stared at my father like that.
> The French Governor went to my father and spoke to him, insistently, like one might speak to a child, or to someone who is not all there. He had a surprise for him, he said, his son was here and wanted to speak to him. My father interrupted the Frenchman, his voice sounded hollow and alien. No, he said, he didn't want to speak to his son now, not until month's end. He repeated this in the exact same words he had scribbled down on that paper. It was eerie. Was he drugged?
> I couldn't take it any more (sic). Agreement or no, I had to do something. The Governors had left the room; I took a step forward, towards my father, and said loud and clear:

---

[24] Ibid., p. 119.

> "Father, I am your son and am here to talk to you. Can you recognize me?" What would happen? Would the machine guns go into action? Would the commandants drag me out of the room? Nothing happened, they stood behind me as if in silent fascination.
> My father showed no sign of recognition, his face was unchanged. He just repeated, as though memorized or forced, the one senseless sentence he had already expressed in writing. I repeated my question twice, a little louder each time. Then I gave up. We left. There was deathly silence, none of the Governors even said a word.[25]

Such behavior is characteristic of victims of mind-control experimentation and techniques, and it is not the last time we shall encounter that subject with the Hess Mess, for as we shall eventually discover, it is a consistent and egregious feature of the affair.

The strange episode was not over for Wolf-Rüdiger, for after the "encounter" with his drugged father, he was able to speak with a young British orderly. This individual > ...had obviously not been instructed in any way and spoke to me frankly. My father, he said, spent all his time in a sort of dazed half-sleep.[26] He was no longer interested in anything; newspapers, television, books, he pushed them all away. Real sleep alternated with a sort of daze. He had tried to rouse him out of his apathy, but with hardly any success.

> For me, this conversation was an important and informative clue. Now I knew for sure that something unusual had been done to my father. This was not just a matter of pneumonia or circulatory weakness, as the doctor had argued. He had described the effects of these on the brain of a 93-year-old as generally irreversible. But in fact, 14 days later, I found my father in almost splendid health—quite "his own self" again, one could say... But for me, it was the ultimate proof that something was very wrong on March 12, 1987. My father's condition at that time

---

[25] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, op. cit., pp. 120-121.

[26] These words, as we shall eventually discover, are quite important as is the timeframe—1987—in which they were made.

> cannot have had any natural causes, it must have been artificially induced.
>
> Should our unexpected appearance in the British Military Hospital have interrupted an operation whose aim it was to secretly put my father to sleep?
> Had we perhaps prevented a murder, at the last possible moment?[27]

Or had Wolf Hess interrupted a very different procedure, one designed to reinforce prior imprinted patterns of behavior? Had Wolf interrupted a mind control procedure? Strange and bizarre as this sounds now, subsequent facts long known to researchers of the Hess Mess will place this question and its corollary—who was imprisoned as Hess in Spandau—in a premier position of importance. As Wolf Hess notes, when he reported his observations of his father and his conversations with the British orderly to his lawyer, Dr. Seidl, the latter "left it open whether it was a matter of mind-altering drugs or injections, hypnosis or withholding of necessary medical care".[2]

2. The First Attempt at Murder-by-Medical Emergency: The Prostate Surgery Affair

As noted previously, Wolf Hess' family believed the March 1987 "bronchitis" affair to have been a second attempt on his father's life, or, as suggested by Dr. Seidl, an interrupted mind-control procedure. The occasion that Wolf Hess' family suspects was the "first attempt" on his life was the "prostate surgery" affair of 1979.

This incident was occasioned by the news that the Soviet dictator, Leonid Brezhnev, was considering a reversal of Soviet policy regarding Hess, allowing his release, much like Mikhail Gorbachev was to do a decade later.[29] As these possibilities were being pursued through diplomatic channels, unusually—or perhaps, predictably—

Rudolf Hess suffered another medical "emergency" on September 4, 1979, shortly after Wolf Hess had just visited his father. According to Wolf Hess, on this occasion

> ... the British had practically kidnapped him, that is, taken him to the British Military Hospital. Neither the family nor the public had been informed of this coup. We only found out on September 10, through a press report, that Rudolf Hess had been taken to the British Military Hospital for a "thorough examination" and had since been transferred back to Spandau.
> All this was made even more mysterious by the way in which the then British Commandant, G.P.T. Marshall, tried per telephone on September 21, 1979, and then even per letter, to convince the family of the necessity of immediate surgery on Rudolf Hess' prostate—an operation which, he said, the recent examinations had indicated must not be delayed if uraemia was to be prevented. My father stubbornly resisted this operation. Despite the presence of the four Governors, I had warned him most insistently against agreeing to a dangerous operation if it was to be performed by surgeons from those political powers who through his continued imprisonment had shown so much inhumanity that nothing could be put past them. The British attempts to change his mind via my influence were thus useless.
> The fact that my father agreed with my opinion and stood firm presumably saved his life at that time and led to the failure of a plan that can be regarded with a high degree of certainty as the first attempt on Rudolf Hess' life. The man responsible—the British Commandant Marshall—was recalled from his position, ostensibly for health reasons. I suspect that in reality it was rhe Soviets who urged his dismissal after he had tried to cross their plans for the release of Spandau's last prisoner by means of an attempt at murder, disguised as prostate surgery'.[30]

In other words, as far as Wolf-Rüdiger Hess was concerned, both Soviet attempts to reverse their position on Hess, and allow his release, both those of Brezhnev in the late 1970s and of Gorbachev in the late 1980s, led in both instances to strange "medical emergencies" which Wolf Hess believes to have been disguised murder attempts. Notably, the attempt which finally succeeded avoided the medical aspect until the last minute: Hess was "suicided" either at Spandau, according to Wolf Hess, or at the British Military Hospital, where attempts were made, by the Allies' own statements in their press releases, to "resuscitate" him. As far as Wolf Hess was concerned, the murderers had to have already been in the prison in the morning, with the full collusion of the senior ranking American warders.[31]

[30] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, op. cit., pp. 144-145.

This is not as far-fetched as it may sound, for that "full knowledge and collusion" does not necessarily imply that the senior American officers were privy to the purpose of the presence of additional strange personnel. A cover story could have been easily concocted to cover their presence.

And this brings us to Wolf Hess' final, and most sensational, disclosure:

D. The South African Affidavit

Referring directly to Abdallah Melaouhi's statements and affidavit to the German authorities, Wolf Hess observes that Melaouhi

> ...was so flustered by the sight of his charge lying motionless on the ground that he first of all attempted resuscitation and furthermore asked the two strangers if they knew how to perform heart massage. One of them readily bent down to my father and began to massage his chest. The pressure he exerted in doing so was so great that later, during the autopsy, nine ribs and the sternum were discovered to be broken. It is thus quite clear that no life-saver was at work here, but rather one of the two murderers?[32]

---

[32] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, op. cit. p. 97.

But why was Wolf Hess certain that the "two strangers" of Melaouhi's affidavit were his father's murderers, beyond the strong convictions of Melaouhi himself in this regard?

The answer, while unverifiable, is worth citing from Wolf Hess' book extensively once again, for it contains a pattern that will be reflected in other evidence encountered later, and thus, once the supporting evidence for the pattern is encountered, the following information gains in credibility. There was "another affidavit regarding the events in Spandau on August 17, 1987", writes Hess.

> My wife brought it back from South Africa, where she had called on a South African lawyer with contacts to Western secret services. Very little of it has reached the public to date. With Dr. Seidl's and my assistance, my wife was able to persuade the lawyer to phrase his testimony in the form of an affidavit before a judge. It is dated February 22, 1988, and reads as follows:
> "I have been questioned about the details of the death of the German Reich Minister Rudolf Hess.
> "Reich Minister Rudolf Hess was killed on the orders of the British Home Office. The murder was carried out by two members of the British SAS (22nd SAS Regiment, SAS Depot Bradbury Lines, Hereford/England). The military unit of the SAS (Special Air Service) is subordinate to the British Home Office—not the Ministry of Defence. The planning of the murder as well as its direction was carried out by MI-5 (normally responsible for Great Britain's internal security; secret service actions outside of Great Britain fall under the jurisdiction of MI-6). The secret service action whose aim was the murder of Reich Minister Rudolf Hess was so hastily planned that it was not even given a code name, which is absolutely not customary.
> "Other secret services which had been privy to the plan were the American, the French, and the Israeli. Neither the KSG (sic) and QU (sic) nor the German secret services had been informed.
> "The murder of Reich Minister Rudolf Hess had become necessary because the government of the USSR intended to release the prisoner in July 1987 (in connection with Federal President von Weizsäcker's visit to Moscow), in which > respect President von Wiezsäcker was, however, able to negotiate an extension with the head of the Soviet government, Gorbachev, until November 1987, the next Soviet period in the guard cycle.

> "The two SAS-men had been in Spandau prison since the night of Saturday-Sunday (August 15-16, 1987). The American CIA gave its consent to the murder on Monday (August 17, 1987).
> "During Reich Minister Rudolf Hess' afternoon walk, the two SAS-men lay in waiting for the prisoner in the prison's garden summerhouse and tried to strangle him with a 4½ foot-long cable; afterwards, a 'suicide by hanging' was to be faked. But as Reich Minister Rudolf Hess put up a fight and cried for help, which alerted at least one American guard soldier to the attack, the attempt on the prisoner's life was broken off, and an ambulance of the British Military Hospital was called. The unconscious Reich Minister Rudolf Hess was taken to the British Military Hospital in the ambulance.
> "I was given the above information personally, verbally, by an officer of the Israeli service on Tuesday, August 18, 1987, around 8:00 a.m. South African time. I have known this member of the Israeli service both officially and personally for four years. I am completely satisfied that he was sincere and honest and I have no doubts whatsoever as to the truth of his information. The absolutely confidential nature of his conversation with me is also beyond doubt".[33]

Because Wolf Hess does not provide the jurisdiction or court before which this affidavit was allegedly sworn, one must assume it to be true, and allow further evidence to be developed that might corroborate its core concepts.

The concepts themselves, however, if true, are breathtaking in their implications:

1) Rudolf Hess was indeed murdered;
2) The language of the affidavit, with its strange repetition of the phrase "Reich Minister Rudolf Hess," suggests that the alleged affiant, a lawyer, was trying to draw attention to a point of law by his repeated and consistent reference to Rudolf Hess by his governmental title, i.e., Hess was the target of a political assassination, and was not simply the victim of a murder;

---

[33] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, op. cit., pp. 99-100, emphasis added.

3) Once viewed as a political assassination, one must search not only for those with the means, motive, and opportunity for the crime, but also for those sanctioning it; according to the alleged affiant: these were:

a) The British, in the form of the Home Office;

b) The American CIA, which may be "shorthand" for the entire military-intelligence-national security complex;

c) The French secret services; and,

d) The Israeli secret service, the Mossad;

4) The implication of point 3), and sub-points a)-d) above, is that whatever secret Hess knew, or that Britain, France, the USA, and Israel suspected he knew, that secret was of major international implication, and not confined simply to Great Britain alone. However, since Hess himself had expressed to Melaouhi that a Russian reversal on its policy of non-release doomed him to death, as we saw earlier, this means it is likely that the Soviets knew that the Western Allies would likely murder him, and thus their release overtures may have been made cynically, forcing the West to do the dirty work. This implies that they either knew, or strongly suspected, the nature of this secret.

These considerations lead us to make one final observation whose full significance will reveal itself only much later:

E. A Brief Note on German Reunification

The timing of the Hess release plans by Gorbachev and German Bundespräsident von Weizsâcker alluded to in the above alleged affidavit suggests that his death, the last of the major Nazis alive, and the last to have possessed the title of Reichminister—Albert Speer having died in 1981—has something to do with German reunification that occurred a mere five years later, with the Berlin wall actually being torn down only two years after his death.

While this is a topic that must be taken up again in this book, once more details of the Hess Mess are known and explored in subsequent pages, it is worth noting here that Wolf Hess alludes to a vague and mysterious connection between his father and German reunification:

> The Russian attitude to the Hess case had always been mixed. I knew that in 1952, Stalin had offered Adenauer the reunification of Germany, with certain conditions, but the latter—as we know—did not even respond to the offer. Perhaps my father was to play a special role in the reunification. He refused—like Adenauer, but certainly for vastly different reasons.[34]

In my previous book, The Third Way, I detailed some of the machinations of that time period, including Stalin's strange reunification offer. At the time the Soviet dictator made this offer, no explanation was given on how West Germany would be able to expel the British, French, and American occupation forces, and this may have been a factor in the Adenauer government's calculations to simply ignore the Soviet offer; how indeed could Bonn accept such an offer, without perhaps triggering another major war?

But nowhere does one encounter with respect to those proposals any mention of Rudolf Hess in their connection. Wolf Hess' choice of words is, however, and to say the least, suggestive, and laden with more ponderous implications, for he is implying that the Soviet proposals had something to do with his father, and that they were communicated to him, doubtless during a month when the Soviets were in charge of Spandau, and that his father had turned the Soviet dictator down.

The Hess Mess just became even messier.

But again, we're still just getting started...

A BRIEF BIOGRAPHY

"We had come to realize that, despite the almost universal dismissal of the Deputy Führer as a powerless has-been, he was the most important man in the Nazi empire after—perhaps even including—Adolf Hitler. This made his fight to Britain in the middle of the war an act of supreme significance".

Lynn Picknett, Clive Prince, and Stephen Prior[1]

BIOGRAPHIES ARE A STAPLE RESEARCH TOOL for anyone investigating the turbulent years of the rise of Nazism, and the unleashing of the Second World War. Brief searches under the significant names of World War Two leaders will produce a rash of titles for every individual; there are biographies of Chamberlain, Churchill, Roosevelt, Stalin, Hirohito, Hideki Tojo, Chiang Kai-shek, Benito Mussolini, Daladier, Laval, Antonescu, and of course, Adolf Hitler, not to mention biographies of their various military leaders; there are biographies of Marshals Petain, "Bomber Harris" and Dowding, of Generals Curtis LeMay and Patton and Gatland and Guderian and (for real concessioners of the operational art) Giovanni Messe; there are biographies of Field Marshals Montgomery, Auchinleck, Rommel, Rokossovski, Zhukov, Koniev, Kesselring, Keitel, Kleist and Kluge, Yamashita and Terauchi; there are biographies of Admirals Nimitz, Halsey, Yamamoto, Kimmel, Raeder, Tovey, Dönitz and Darlan, And when it comes to Nazis, there are biographies—even memoirs or diaries in some cases—of virtually everyone: Hitler, Himmler, Göbbels, Göring, Rosenberg, Heydrich, Bormann.

Yet one searches in vain for biographies on Hess or titles like "Hess: Hitler's Deputy" or "In the Shadow of the Führer," and Hess left no memoirs that could be made into "Life with Adolf in Landsberg Prison". There are, of course, plenty of books in which Hess plays a central role, but these are not books about him, but rather about whatever it was that led him on the strangest mission of the twentieth century, and which then kept him in prison for the rest of his very long life.

[1] Lynn Picknett, Clive Prince, and Stephen Prior, Double Standards: the Rudolf Hess Cover-up (London: Sphere, 2014), p. xx.

In short, there are no biographies of Hess; there are only theories, and all of them are conspiracy theories, to boot.

A. Early Life and World War One (1894-1914)

Rudolf Walter Richard Hess was the eldest of three children, born on April 26, 1894, in Alexandria, Egypt, to a moderately well-to-do German merchant, Fritz Hess, and his wife Clara. Because of this circumstance, some believe that Alexandria's rich history within classical and ancient Egyptian culture was the matrix in which the future Deputy Führer acquired his interest in history, esoteric and occult subjects, the sciences and mathematics. Alexandria was also, of course, where Hess learned to speak Arabic.[2]

While the Hess family often vacationed in the summers in Germany where it owned a summer house, Hess' schooling until 1908 occurred in the German Protestant school in Alexandria. His father, Fritz, was grooming him to take over the family merchant business, and as such sent Rudolf to a boarding school in Bad Godesberg from 1908 to 1911, then to study business for a year at the École supérieure de commerce in Neuchâtel, Switzerland, before going to Hamburg to begin an apprenticeship with another company.[3]

Fate intervened with the outbreak of World War One in the summer of 1914, however, and in the autumn of that year, Hess, a Bavarian—enlisted in a field artillery regiment, transferring later to an infantry regiment. He quickly distinguished himself and was soon promoted to the highest non-commissioned officer rank (Vizefeldwebel), and received the Kingdom of Bavaria's Military Merit Cross.[4]

[2] Wolf Hess notes that his father was fluent in Arabic to the extent of having also learned more "colorful" colloquialisms. See Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, Who Murdered My Father Rudolf Hess?, p. 22.

B. Wounds: Hess becomes a Pilot (1914-1918)

With Hess' military service during World War One, however, we begin the encounter with yet another bit of bothersome "debris" in the Hess Mess, in this case, debris in the form of shrapnel and bullets, which will haunt the remainder of this book and, indeed, which haunts any researcher trying to make sense of the Hess Mess. This is the matter of the war wounds which he sustained during various battles of World War One both on the Western and Eastern fronts, for which he was awarded the Iron Cross, 2nd class.[5]

During his military service, Hess oddly shows up at most of the "hot spots" of the war, being present at the First Battle of Ypres in 1914 until his posting to the Somme front, and from thence, being posted to the Verdun front during the horrific battle which occurred there in 1916. It was there that Hess sustained his first serious battle injury from shrapnel in his left hand and arm. For a month Hess was on leave to recover, and then his regiment was shifted to the eastern front to a sector of heavy fighting in Romania.

Here he suffered two more wounds. The first occurred on July 23, 1917, when a splinter from a projectile hit his left arm. This wound was apparently not serious, and was dressed in the field and Hess returned to duty.

However, on August 8, 1917, while his regiment was attacking a fiercely-defended Romanian position, Hess was pierced by a bullet which, in one important account, "entered the upper chest near the armpit and exited near his spinal column"[6] and piercing and collapsing his lung in the process. Hess was sent on convalescent leave, first to Hungary and then subsequently back to Bavaria.

Hess was promoted to become an officer, a Lieutenant of the Reserve, but his career as an infantryman, with such a serious its King, and still had its own military which, under the terms of the 1871 constitution, answered to the Kaiser directly as "Supreme War Lord and Commander of the Armed Forces".

[5] Many are under a misapprehension of what this military decoration meant. It was an award given for being wounded or having one's blood shed during military service. It is roughly analogous to the American "Purple Heart" decoration. During World War One it was obviously, and tragically, a fairly common decoration.

wound, was in doubt, and while convalescing Hess requested transfer to the air corps to train as a pilot. He was accepted, and trained for several months until June 1918, during the period of the final massive German offensives on the Western Front. He was ordered to report for duty with a Bavarian pursuit squadron (Jagdstaffel) in October of 1918, but saw little action as the armistice occurred the very next month. Hess was finally discharged that December.[7]

It was, however, a crucial period for Hess, for this instilled in him his love of flying and piloting, and he soon became a very skilled pilot.

C. Post-War: From Putsch to Power (1919-1933)

1. The Haushofers, and Hess

a. Hess and the Freikorps von Epp

Hess returned from the front like millions of other demobilized German soldiers to find the home front economy in a shambles, and the various Länder (German state) governments in chaos and, oftentimes, in the hands of socialist radicals threatening to overthrow them, and agitating for a Bolshevik revolution in the central Reich government itself. This was particularly true in Bavaria, as we shall see.

Like many veterans, Hess joined the various paramilitary organizations that grew up in Germany, and particularly in Bavaria, as a result of this, the Freikorps (Free Corps). These were veterans' groups, largely of conservative political and economic leanings, that were determined, by force of arms if necessary, to prevent any Communist or Bolshevik revolution in Germany as had happened in Russia. In Hess' case, in 1919 he joined one of the most famous—or infamous—of these Freikorps, the Freikorps von Epp, commanded by former Bavarian General Franz Xaver Ritter von Epp.

General von Epp was a power to be reckoned with in the post-war chaos in Bavaria, for as a former General officer in the Imperial Army, his Freikorps formed one of the nuclei of the private armies that would eventually be so associated with Nazi Party strong-arm tactics. Additionally, when Adolf Hitler was tasked to secretly infiltrate the nascent "German Workers Party" in Munich and spy on it in behalf of the postwar German military, the Reichswehr, it is possible that the assignment, which came ultimately from Berlin and army chief Colonel-General Hans von Seeckt, may have been conveyed to Hitler via General von Epp.

For our purposes, however, we see the first example of an emerging larger pattern of Hess forming relationships with organizations and individual persons of power after the war. In fact, Hess was consummately skillful in what would in today's terms be called "networking," and it is this pattern that calls into question the standard judgments that, by 1941, Hess was losing power in the Nazi Party and state. Quite the contrary, as we shall discover.

b. 1919: Hess, the Haushofers, "Geopolitics," and the Thulegesellschaft

(1) The Thulegesellschaft

1919 was a "joining" year for Rudolf Hess, for in that year he also enrolled in the University of Munich, and quickly established a reputation among his professors as having some aptitude for mathematics and physics.[8] Additionally, in that same year he was introduced to the infamous Thulegesellschaft, the "Thule Society," an anti-semitic, quasi-occult lodge in Munich, complete with its own private army, the Thulekampfbund, that met in five rooms which it leased at the Munich hotel, Vier Jahreszeiten (Four Seasons Hotel), by a Freikorps friend, and a member of the organization, who invited Hess along to a meeting in February, 1919.

> Hess was stunned. Each of the five large rooms that he entered was lavishly adorned with swastikas and large, oak-leaf-crowned daggers superimposed on shining swastika sun-wheels. The men wore bronze pins with a swastika on a shield crossed by two spears; the women, pins with plain gold swastikas. Members greeted one another with "Heil und Sieg" ("Hail and victory!"). Hess met Rudolf Baron von Sebottendorff, the founder and head of the Thule Society and its armed wing, the Kampfbund-Thule. He at once joined both organizations.[9]

No sooner had Hess joined the Thule Society and its private army, the Thule Kampfbund, then it became the target, in April, of the Bavarian Spartacists, the radical socialist and Communist revolutionaries throughout Germany, who likewise had their own private armies. On April 26, 1919, one of these, the "Schwabing Soviet" raided the headquarters of the Thule Society at the Four Seasons Hotel, and "found a treasure trove: the society's card index, its membership lists, dozens of anti-Semitic pamphlets, charts showing the deployment of Egelhofer's Red Army,[10] and a cache of weapons".[11]

[8] W. Hugh Thomas, in his famous and controversial book, The Murder of Rudolf Hess (New York: Harper and Row, Publishers, 1979), notes that Hess while in the Lutheran boarding school in Bad Godesberg displayed quickness and intelligence, and that he was "good at maths, physics, engineering, and astronomy" in addition to showing a special aptitude for history. (p. 53).

[9] Holger H. Herwig, The Demon of Geopolitics: How Karl Haushofer "Educated" Hitler and Hess (Lanham: Rowman and Littlefield, 2016), p. 72. Herwig's book fills a much-needed gap in studies of this period, and particularly of General Karl Haushofer and his son, Dr. Albrecht Haushofer, and their geopolitical theories. Herwig devotes much time to an analysis of the relationships of the Haushofers and their theories to other geopolitical thinkers of the era, including Sir Halford MacKinder. For students of the history of geopolitics, this is a valuable book.

A few days later, on May 1, Sebottendorff's Thule Kampfbund retaliated, recovering much of the stolen material, which simply subsequently —and some would say, suspiciously—vanished in the aftermath of this first clash of private armies that came to be called the "Battle of Munich".[12] This raises certain questions, for as a result of the disappearance of its records, the sources of knowledge—or rather, source of knowledge—about the Thulegesellschaft remains Baron von Sebottendorff himself and his "highly self-inflated memoir, Before Hitler Came. Therein he claimed credit as having been the 'inventor' of National Socialism and Adolf Hitler's 'precursor.

The relationship between Hitler and the Thule Society has always been a point of contention. In the absence of the records of the society, we have only Sebottendorff's own claims, and these have been viewed with some suspicion. The bottom line is, there is no documentary evidence that Hitler himself ever joined the society.

Hess, however, did, and the behavior of the Nazi regime after it took power certainly leaves the impression that Hitler and Hess were concerned to obscure the connection between the National Socialist Party and the Thulegesellschaft, for Sebottendorff was arrested after his book was published. Its three thousand initial copies quickly sold out, and a second printing of five thousand copies was quickly confiscated by the Bavarian government and Sebottendorff was again arrested and sentenced to three months in prison. He obtained his release by promising to the Bavarian

Minister of Justice, the Nazi Hans Frank—a former Thule member!—that he would leave Germany.[14]

Well might Hitler and Hess have attempted to silence Sebottendorff, for in his book he provides a list of members of the society, a "veritable Who's Who of early National Socialists".[15] Among these were Dietrich Eckart, the poet who is alleged to have urged "Follow Hitler; he will dance, but it is I who have composed the music"; the economist Gottfried Feder, whose economic theories of debt-free money bypassing central banks became a cornerstone of the Nazi Party platform,[16] and of course, Rudolf Hess. Additionally, Sebottendorff claimed that "virtually every senior military commander in Bavaria"[17] was closely associated to the Thulegesellschaft. For Herwig, the significance of the Thule Society is that it is contrary to Hess' and Hitler's own "official narrative," which has Hitler and Hess meeting for the first time when Hess attended his first meeting of the Nazi Party in Hofbräuhaus beer hall in Munich, and heard Hitler speak for the first time. Herwig believes it is more likely that the two met at a Thule Society meeting in 1919,[18] and the possibility cannot be ruled out.

Thule Society Logo

It would be an oversight if, in reviewing the association of the Nazi Party and of Hess with the Thule Society, no mention was made of its core doctrines and beliefs, for these as we shall discover may have some relevance in unravelling the Hess Mess.

The founder of the Thule Society, Rudolf von Sebottendorff, was born Rudolf Glauer, son of middle class Prussian parents. Like Hess, Sebottendorff spent much time in Egypt and Turkey, where he studied the Giza complex and the doctrines of esoteric Islam.[19] During these studies at one point Sebottendorff even called himself "a Muslim Brother" as well as an "Odinist".[20] Glauer became "von Sebottendorff while in Turkey, where he claimed he had been adopted by the patriarch of the family, Baron Heinrich von Sebottendorff. The family never challenged and actually endorsed the claimed relationship, though it appears that the claim to nobility was never formally recognized by Kaiser Wilhelm II.[21]

Once back in Germany von Sebottendorff founded the Thule Society, borrowing heavily from the racist doctrines and beliefs of Lanz von Liebenfels and Guido von List, doctrines which also included a "revisionist history" of an ancient very high civilization, from which the Aryans were descended.[22] This was blended with the claims of ancient lore, that the Aryans descended to Earth at the poles (usually the North Pole), and dispersed themselves throughout the planet, marrying the "lesser" humans already on the planet, and thus "corrupting" their race.[23]

[21] Goodrick-Clarke, The Occult Roots, p. 140.

[22] For a summary of this history, Goodrick-Clarke's work is the best. See particularly p. 145. Also see my Reich of the Black Sun: Nazi Secret Weapons and the Cold War Allied Legend (Kempton, Illinois, Adventures Unlimited Press, 2004), pp. 161-180. Joscelyn Godwin calls Guido von List, Lanz von Liebenfels, and von Sebottendorff the three "godfathers" of the "Nazi" version of the Thule doctrine.(See Godwin, op. cit., p. 48)

[23] This idea of miscegenation and a "corruption" of an otherwise "pure" race was also a large component of List and von Liebenfels' doctrine. It is worth mentioning that Godwin points out earlier precursors of the "polar descent and migration" theory, including the Frenchman Jean-Sylvain Bailly (1737-1793) who, consulting ancient texts and coordinating their claims to actual astronomical data, concluded that the polar descent and migration might have been true. (See Godwin, op. cit. pp. 27-29, particularly p. 29).

The influence of the Thule Society on the formation and evolution of the National Socialist German Workers' Party (National Sozialistische Deutsche Arbeiters' Partei, or N.S.D.A.P.) was thus, in terms of some of its core doctrines, immense; "it may," writes Goodrick-Clarke, "justifiably be regarded as a ginger group and predecessor of the National Socialist German Workers' Party".[24]

One influence in particular was Sebottendorff's doctrine of the "Temple of Halgadom," an "empire of all the Germans" between the Rhine and Vistula rivers, and eventually including all "Germanic peoples," the "other descendants of Thule": Norwegians, Danes, Swedes, Dutch, Britons and French.[25] As we shall discover below, this is remarkably similar to the doctrine of Lebensraum of Hess' geopolitics professor at the University of Munich, Professor General Karl Haushofer.

All of these considerations become terribly important when one understands that the influence of the Thule Society and its doctrines on the Nazi party were possibly mediated directly by Hess himself, for it was Hess who, after all, became Hitler's "Deputy," in charge of running the day-to-day affairs of the Nazi Party itself, and maintaining its doctrine and ideology.

This in turn implies something of possible significance for the Hess Mess, for it means that Hess was familiar not simply with the "run-of-the-mill" occult doctrines typical of the Western esoteric tradition, but with much more peculiar doctrines—twisted doctrines—on the fringes of that tradition via his membership in the Thule Society. The potential significance lies in the fact that the occult influence on various Nazi leaders was suppressed at [24] Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, Black Sun: Aryan Cults, Esoteric Nazism, and the Politics of Identity (New York: New York University Press, 2003 (p. 114. Goodrick-Clarke also observes that there is some evidence that the alleged Vril Society was an offshoot of the Thule Society, and that it was in the matrix between the two that the claims to have "psychically contacted" the Aldebaran system arose. With that, the myth of a polar "Thule" or ultima Thule - the Arctic "touch down" point for the ancestors of the ancient Ayrans—became not merely interplanetary, but interstellar. (See pp. 166-167). Godwin mentions that as early as 1914, a conference was held in the town of Thale in the Harz Mountains of Thuringia, attempting to unite all pan-Germanic and anti-Semitic secret societies in Germany around the doctrine of Thule, i.e., of an interplanetary origin of the Aryan race, its descent to Earth at the poles, and its subsequent migrations.(See Godwin, op. cit., p. 50).

[25] Godwin, op. cit., p. 50.

Nuremberg by the Allies, lest it be used as a component in "insanity" defenses.[26]

There is, however, a potentially deeper significance, for it has been suggested "that Rudolf Hess' quixotic flight to Britain was the last attempt of the old Thule Society—long dissolved, or driven underground—to affect world politics in the face of a Führer who had escaped their clutches and completely deformed their visions".[27] While this may sound incredible, one has only to examine its basic implicit premises to see that it is not, for the statement is asserting that:

1) a faction existed within Germany and within the Nazi Government itself which opposed the policies of Hitler; and that,
2) this faction was influenced by occult doctrines tied to the Thule Society, the most prominent of which is the doctrine of Thule itself, i.e., the idea of "Aryan descent" from off planet to the polar regions, and subsequent migration from there.

When these considerations are coupled with the observation that the Nuremberg Tribunal prosecutors forbade the introduction of any evidence of an occult connection into the trials, then the conclusion cannot be avoided that perhaps their fears of an "insanity defense" might itself be a kind of cover story for something else, a secret they were desperate to preserve: the relationship of Hess to Antarctica.

Indeed, Joscelyn Godwin himself, in his classic study Arktos: The Polar Myth in Science, Symbolism, and Nazi Survival, has to wonder about the wisdom of the Tribunal in suppressing this evidence. "One would know much more about the political and even the occult machinations of this period, so integral to an understanding of the twentieth-century's greatest tragedy," he writes, "if Hess had been encouraged to speak instead of being held incommunicado in Spandau prison for over 40 years".[28] This is quite correct, for under the regulations of Spandau, none of its Nazi inmates were permitted to speak with visitors about politics, history, or anything to do with the Third Reich, and after the others' release and eventual deaths, this left Hess alone. The implications of Godwin's observations are thus profound, and one cannot help but suspect that lurking in between his carefully worded statement lies the suspicion that Hess' continuing imprisonment might have had something to do with his occult interests, and his membership in the Thulegesellschaft and his possible belief in these doctrines.

(2) Hess, the Haushofers, and "Geopolitics"

While the occult influence on Nazism, and on Hess, was palpable enough for the Allies to ban consideration of it at Nuremberg, the specific details of that influence have always been subject to interpretation and debate. The situation is much less ambivalent when one turns to a consideration of the influence of Hess' geopolitics mentor while he was a student at the University of Munich, Professor General Karl Haushofer, for it was Haushofer who was Hess' "gray eminence," and who, via Hess, exercised an enormous influence on Adolf Hitler's geopolitical vision and ambitions.[29] Haushofer's son, Albrecht, also became a geopolitical guru to Hess, achieving his doctorate in geography and becoming a leading light and lecturer at Berlin's elite Geographical Society.[30]

[29] See Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., pp. 30, 43.

[30] It should be noted that, at the time, "geopolitics" was not a discipline in which one could obtain an advanced academic degree. In this respect, "geography" often encompassed "political geography," which was Professor General Haushofer's term for what we now call "geopolitics". For Haushofer, "political geography" meant the relationship between a nation-state—particularly a great power—and its "physical space" and how the latter determined, or should shape, its foreign policy.

Professor General Karl Haushofer (1869-1946)

Karl Haushofer was well-acquainted with, and well-suited for, a life of "military academia," for his father had been a professor of economics, and Haushofer himself entered military service in the Bavarian Army in the field artillery, completing three courses in Bavaria's War School, Artillery School, and Bavaria's War Academy. Notably, he married his wife Martha, whose father was Jewish, in 1896. This small fact will assume some importance when we turn to contemplate Hess' actions and character once the Nazis assumed power.

Haushofer's abilities were quickly recognized, and he became part of the Imperial German Army's General Staff, and by 1903 was an instructor in the Bavarian army. Crucially, in 1908 the German Army dispatched him to Tokyo as a military observer and consultant to the Imperial Japanese General Staff, where Haushofer instructed his Japanese counterparts in tactics and artillery operations. It was during this period that Haushofer became fluent in Japanese. This accounts for Haushofer's later practice, in private letters to his son Albrecht, of referring to leading Nazis with Japanese codenames.[31] Haushofer returned with his wife to Germany in 1910, and during an illness and leave from the army, completed his doctorate from the University of Munch, writing a thesis on Japanese geopolitics. During World War One, he attained the rank of major general and commanded a brigade on the Western front.[32]

(a) MacKinder, Kjellén, the Heartland, and "Lebensraum"

After the First World War, Haushofer became a professor of geography at the University of Munich where he began to elaborate and perfect his conceptions of geopolitics, and to chart a course via those concepts for Germany's restoration as a military and great power. Two geopoliticians were particularly crucial in Haushofer's own unique elaboration of geopolitical theory.

The first was, of course, the British geopolitician, the "godfather" of geopolitics, Sir Halford Mackinder. Mackinder's geopolitical vision, at the cusp of the outbreak of World War One, and throughout the war and after, was not only consistent, but eerily similar to the geopolitical difficulties now emerging in the early twenty-first century, with the formation of the BRICS bloc of nations clustered around the strategic alliance of Russia and China, and the increasing tensions between the American and British bloc on the one hand, and the German-led European Union on the other. It is worth citing Holger H. Herwig's summary of Mackinder's prescient views in full:

> Mackinder painted with broad brushstrokes. He divided the world into three major camps—the land power of the "pivot area," encompassing today's Russia, Iran, and the central Asian republics; an inner or marginal crescent, consisting of Germany, Austria, Turkey, India and China; and an outer or insular crescent, peripheral to the "geographical pivot," consisting of the sea power of Britain, South Africa, Australia, the United States, and Japan. He categorized the first group as "nomads (later robbers) of the steppe"; the last, as "pirates from the sea". His concern as a British patriot was that there had been a paradigm shift in transport and distribution. Railroads had replaced ships as carriers of the world's goods. They were faster, easier to build, more dependable, and able to penetrate even the remotest hinterland. Ever more, national wealth was counted not in seaborne trade and commerce but rather in rail-hauled pig iron, steel, coal, sulfuric acid, dynamos, engines, tools, dyes, and the like. Political power, Mackinder warned his countrymen, was now the product of "geographical conditions, both economic and strategic," and the "relative number, virility, equipment, and organization of complete peoples". At heart, he was a determinist: the tectonic forces of geography in large measure decreed historical development. "Man and not nature initiates," he once stated, "but nature in large measure controls".

[32] "Karl Haushofer," https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Karl_Haushofer. German generals' ranks are often confusing to people more acquainted with British and American ranking systems. The German rank of General-major is actually not a two-star general, but a one-star general, equivalent to a brigadier in the British and American ranking systems. Generalleutnant or lieutenant general is thus a two-star general, and not, as in the American system, a three-star general. General der Artillerie/Infanterie/Kavalerie would be the three-star equivalent, and Generaloberst or Colonel General is equivalent to a four-star general.

Mackinder's nightmare vision was one of the grafting of German industry, knowledge, and technology to the vast land and natural resources of the Russian colossus. He described the latter as "a continuous land, ice-girt in the north, water-girt elsewhere, measuring 21 million square miles, or more than three times the area of North America". If there came into being a contiguous Russo-German block" could the "outer crescent" of Britain, Canada, the United States, South Africa, Australia, and Japan long survive?

World War I did little to dispel Mackinder's fears. By 1919, he warned that the physical parameters of the "geographical pivot" might even be enlarged to include all the "regions of Artic and Continental drainage," this is, eastern Europe and Siberia. This vast expanse, inaccessible to sea power, would be opened up and exploited by railroads and airplanes. "Let us call this great region the Heartland of the Continent". Therewith, a catchy term had been coined, one that would find great resonance in Germany in the 1920s. And while Mackinder refused to have the label "geopolitician" attached to himself, his German counterparts would have no such qualms.[33]

[33] Holger H. Herwig, op. cit., pp. 116-117, emphasis added.

Viewed from this perspective, the two World Wars were but two separate and discrete acts in one World War designed to prevent that German-Russian Eurasian bloc from forming; Mackinder was, in effect, telling his fellow-countrymen that while they may have just won the first round of the World War, they were already losing that war over the long term. Indeed, Mackinder's vision is often misunderstood, for what he was also saying was that the world was in a major geopolitical and economic paradigm shift, a shift away from the paradigm that had prevailed since the Renaissance and the beginning of the Age of Exploration, that age which was also the beginning of a global sea-based economy, where power accrued to the chief sea power. By Mackinder's time and according to his lights, that era was beginning to end, and a new integrative economy was being formed, based not on the seas of the world's great oceans, but based on land and connected trade via land. In that power structure, the principal world powers would be land powers, and sea power would be largely ineffective.

All of this General Haushofer, and through him, Hess, absorbed completely. But there was another crucial influence on Haushofer, and therefore on Hess. This was the Swedish geopolitician Rudolf Kjellén of the University of Uppsala. It was Kjellén who provided much of the technical terminology for the emerging concepts of geopolitics.[34] Haushofer read Kjellén's book Contemporary Great Powers in 1917. In this book, Kjellén:

> ...divided the globe into four true "world powers" (Britain, Germany, Russia, and the United States) as well as four lesser "great powers" (Austria-Hungary, France, Italy, and Japan). More, he argued that the world was constantly in a state of flux. "Vigorous, vital states with limited space"—read Germany—were held together neither by laws nor constitutions but rather by "the categorical imperative of expanding their space by colonization, amalgamation, or conquest". It was heady reading in a time of global war and expansive war aims.
> Haushofer next immersed himself in Kjellén's The State as a Living Organism. Karl immediately recognized its cardinal importance. For there, in black and white, were the terms that > explained so much of what he had been reading in the works of German geographers. First and foremost, Kjellén gave the vague field of "human geography" its future title: Geopolitik (geopolitics).[35]

---

[34] Herwig, op. cit., p. 117.

For General Haushofer and his son Albrecht, these concepts required a complete "rethinking" of German imperial policy.

From this process of "rethinking" German geopolitics and goals, Haushofer elaborated a concept which he called Lebensraum, the "living space" in which a nation and its people existed and lived, and this Lebensraum was defined by the interplay of that nation's economics, politics, natural resources, military strength, its "position on the map"[36] as well as by much subtler factors such as culture and ethnicity. From this consideration of the German Lebensraum Haushofer concluded two things: first, Germany's imperial policy prior to World War One was completely wrong: there was no need for a confrontation with Great Britain nor for Germany to build such an incredibly large navy in order to acquire, and sustain, colonies. This led to Haushofer's second conclusion: Germany, in order to remain a Great Power, would have to increase its Lebensraum to encompass what effectively had been the old Holy Roman Empire, i.e., the areas of Holland, Austria, Bohemia, the Tyrol, and western Poland would have to be incorporated into the Reich in order to ensure that all ethnic Germans were in a common Lebensraum. From there, the Reich would have to expand to the East.

The importance of Haushofer's vision cannot be over-emphasized, for via his influence on Hess, and through Hess on Hitler, one finds the origin of the idea which will dog Hitler's diplomacy after the outbreak of World War Two, and which will become a central component in how one interprets the infamous flight of his Deputy Führer to Britain: with Haushofer's geopolitics, we are chin to chin with one of the central pieces of debris in the Hess Mess. It is because of the above two fundamental theses that Adolf Hitler attempted, repeatedly, to reach out and offer a negotiated peace to Great Britain, from September of 1939 to May of 1941. The British Empire was not, Hitler repeatedly stated, Germany's natural enemy.

Crucial to these overtures, as we shall discover, were the Haushofers' numerous contacts within the upper reaches of British Society, including people who, like Haushofer, viewed the future as belonging to Russia and the USA, unless the two principal economic and military powers of Europe untied to prevent it. Indeed, Haushofer foresaw the need for a "united Europe," a federation of the European powers, led by Germany.[37] These contacts included Albrecht Haushofers friendship with a key actor in the Hess Mess, the young Duke of Hamilton.[38]

c. The Spartacist Coup, the Counter-coup, and the Beer Hall Putsch

The crucible in which the Haushofers' influence over Hess and Hitler was forged were the events prior to, during, and immediately after the Nazi attempt to seize power in Bavaria in November, 1923, the so-called Beer Hall Putsch. This event is one of the most misunderstood events in standard historiography, and consequently, in most people's understanding of the event. The popular understanding is, in this instance, almost diametrically the opposite of the reality.

As was previously seen, in the turbulent post-war years of 1919-1920, the socialist-communist revolutionaries within Germany—the so-called Spartacists—raided the Thule Society, stole its documents, and, in what was not previously discussed, captured and murdered some of its members, one of whom was the Prince von Thurn-und-Taxis, a scion of one of Germany's oldest noble and banking families.[39] This gives a measure of the powerful influences at work with the Thule Society, which because of the donations of such wealthy patrons, had been able to purchase a nearly defunct newspaper called the Völkischer Beobachter (The People's Observer), which became the official organ for the Thule Society and then subsequently for the Nazi party.[40]

As we noted previously, the Thule Society struck back forcefully via its own Kampfbund and in connection with the Freikorps von Epp, and recovered its documents. But the tensions and street battles between the radical left and right continued, to the extent that conservative elements in Bavaria,[41] fed up with the growing slide of the Reich government to the left, attempted to seize power in Bavaria via Gustav Ritter von Kahr, who was made a councilor of Bavaria, given dictatorial powers, and who began to court elements of the German army and Bavarian state police. The goal was to break Bavaria out of the German Reich and restore its complete independence as a sovereign nation, the status it had prior to the proclamation of the German Empire in 1871.[42]

It was because of this threatened break with the German Reich that Hitler, Hess, and the Nazi leadership acted, for they were not trying to seize power in Bavaria to break with "Greater Germany," but rather the contrary, they were trying to prevent that break. As Picknett, Prince, and Prior aptly put it, "(Hitler) could not let Bavaria leave the German union, for this would effectively put his plans for a Greater Germany into reverse. He had to act before it was too late".[43]

Here an interesting pattern emerges, a pattern of the delicate dance of power between Hitler, Hess—who would become Hitler's

[40] Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, The Occult Roots of Nazism, pp. 148f. notes that one of the major contributors to the purchase of the newspaper was Georg Feder, the economist and theorist of "debt free money" for the Nazi Party. During the period of hyper-inflation, what kept the Thule Society and Nazi party running were infusions of stable cash in the form of foreign donations in US dollars and Swiss francs.

[41] To understand the full measure of the political crisis in Germany at that time, it's worth mentioning that Lenin himself sent representatives and "experts" in revolutionary tactics to Bavaria to assist and secure the revolution there. See Martin Allen, The Hitler/Hess Deception: British Intelligence's Best-Kept Secret of the Second World War (London: Harper Collins Publishers, 2003), pp. 4, 8

[42] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 50. Picknett, Prince, and Prior understand the mechanics and politics behind the Beer Hall Putsch better than most historians and certainly better than the popular view that the Nazis, in the Putsch, were attempting to make Bavaria independent. Accordingly their presentation will be followed closely here.

[43] Ibid.

"Deputy Führer" within the Nazi Party itself after the seizure of power—and Göring, who would become Hitler's designated successor in offices of state itself. While Göring was at that time the head of the Sturmabteilung, the notorious SA "Brownshirts", and therefore the boss in charge of any "wet works" that needed to be performed during the attempted counter-coup, it was Hess to whom Hitler entrusted secret orders to round up the ministers of the Bavarian state itself,[44] which Hess was successful in doing. Indeed, this is not often reported in accounts of the Beer Hall Putsch, but it is nonetheless true. As the coup collapsed, Hitler was captured and put on trial for treason (while von Kahr, of course, was not). Göring fled to Sweden, and Hess fled to Austria where he was to remain for five months, until, upon learning of Hitler's shockingly light sentence, he returned to Munich, stood trial, and was sentenced to prison.

d. Landsberg Prison: Hitler, Hess and Mein Kampf

Hitler and Hess both served their time in the same prison, Landsberg prison, and were given adjoining cells which in turn shared a cell that was converted into a comfortable, almost salon-like work area. It was here that their strong personal relationship was forged, and it was here that Hess and Hitler were regularly visited by General Karl Haushofer. It was Landsberg that, in Picknett's, Prince's and Prior's apt words, "redefined" Hess' role:

> ...establishing him as Hitler's confidant, muse, and mentor. There was no question of his being Hitler's lackey. If anything, at least at this time, the reverse was true. Far from being kept in the dark about Hitler's plans, Hess himself shaped many of them. The two men were their own charmed inner circle, from which the likes of Hermann Göring were excluded. A visitor to Landsberg commented on Hess' manifestly growing influence over Hitler and their deepening friendship: "Hitler enjoyed repeating his friend's slogans. (It is interesting that they were Hess' slogans, not his own). It was obvious to everyone that a very close relationship exited between the two of them. For the first time I > heard them use du. "Hitler had taken to calling his friend by the affectionate diminutive "Rudi" or "Hesserl".[45]

Landsberg was thus a pivotal turning point in the Hess-Hitler relationship.

One myth that grew during the Landsberg period and that was sustained both by Hitler, by Hess, and by party propaganda itself ever afterward, was that Hitler had dictated his "magnum opus," the infamous and infamously turgid Mein Kampf to Hess, who obediently typed the first manuscript as Hitler expostulated on his ideas.

But the reality is the exact opposite, particularly in those few lucid passages in the work, which were not the ravings of Hitler the thwarted artist, but of Hess, the multi-lingual university student of Haushofer, himself a regular visitor to the two frustrated putschists. For starters, Hitler's original title for the work was Four and a Half Years of Struggle against lies, Stupidity, and Cowardice, which hardly rolls very easily off the tongue. It was Hess who "insisted he change it to Mein Kampf (My Struggle), which at least had the virtue of brevity".[46]

But there's more, for one of the earliest English language translators of Mein Kampf, James Murphy, had actually worked in Berlin for one of the many bureaucracies controlled by Hess prior to the war. Murphy left no doubt of who had ghost-written much of the more "conceptual" parts of Hitler's manifesto:

> Those chapters of Mein Kampf which deal with the propaganda and organization of the Nazi movement owe their inspiration to Rudolf Hess and most of the actual composition was done by him. He was also responsible for the chapters dealing with Lebensraum and the function of the British Empire in the history of the world.

[45] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 53. In the German, there are two words for addressing someone else as "you," "Sie" the formal usage, equivalent to our English pronoun "you," and "du", equivalent to our now-archaic pronoun of familiar or intimate address, "thou". While the niceties of courtesy and etiquette are no longer as attached to these usages as they used to be, prior to the war they were still very present in German culture, and the intimate and familiar address "du" also connoted equality.

> His younger brother Alfred, often assured me of this. For a time we used to see each other almost daily in Berlin.[47]

After the war at Nuremberg, when inquiries were made on precisely this point of the relationship between Hess and Hitler, and who was actually the inspiration of certain passages of the book, General Haushofer stated that it was actually Hess, not Hitler, who had dictated some passages of the work.[48]

Hess, standing on left and leaning down, his wife Use seated on the left and holding Wolf Hess, and Adolf Hitler, seated on the right, at the Hess'.

Like Hitler, Hess was released from Landsberg after having served only a few months of his sentence, and from this point until the Nazi assumption of power, it is a testimony of the closeness of Karl Haushofer, Rudolf Hess, and Adolf Hitler that when Hess married his wife Isle Pröhl in 1927, that it was Haushofer and Hitler who served as his groomsmen, and when Wolf Hess, Hess' son was born approximately a decade later, that it was again Haushofer and Hitler who stood as godfathers at his christening.

D. The Stellvertreter: Hess' Power within the Nazi Regime

1. The Nuremberg Indictment and Hess' Power

It is difficult to give an exhaustive accounting of the actual power that Hess held in the Nazi state prior to his flight to Great Britain in May, 1941 even by enumerating the many bureaus, agencies, intelligence services, and liaison connections between them all, that he controlled. Not only this, but as Party chief, he literally had control over most bureaucratic appointments in the Nazi state. But Hess also knew the ways of the symbols of power, and knew them well. It was he, in fact, who began the "Führer cult" within Nazism, for prior to the Putsch and their incarceration in Landsberg, Hitler had simply been "Herr Hitler". After this period, however, and due to Hess' constant manipulations of language, Hitler became der Führer, and of course, all the Thule Society symbolism became the protocols of the party, from endless Sieg Heils to the swastika.[49] During the final campaign to woo the German industrialists and bankers to financially support the Nazi cause in the final political campaign of 1932, it was also Hess, in conjunction with Hjalmar Schacht, who had helped put the "sophisticated face" to Nazism.[50]

However, one gets a measure of the vast power that Hess possessed by reading the Nuremberg Tribunal indictment against him:

> The defendant Hess between 1921 and 1941 was a member of the Nazi Party, Deputy to the Führer, Reich Minister without Portfolio, member of the Reichstag, member of the Council of Ministers for the Defence of the Reich, member of the Secret Cabinet Council, Successor designate to the Führer after the defendant Göring, a General in the SS and a General in the SA.[51]

The term Stellvertreter, which is often translated as "Deputy" of the Führer, is actually a stronger term than can be rendered into English, and Hess' relationship to Hitler and Göring has been the source of some confusion because of this, since many view Göring's being designated as Hitler's successor as head of state and government (Führer) as a demotion of Hess in the pecking order of the Nazi hierarchy. The term, however, in its etymology, suggests something far more powerful: a place-holder or personal emissary. Perhaps the best analogy would be to an apostolic nuncio, an ambassador simultaneously not only of the papal office, but also of the person holding it, a kind of "plenipotentiary" or, if one wants to be "Ottoman" about it, a "Grand Vizier".

Thus it is important to remember that Hess as Stellvertreter, was literally "place taker" or personal representative for Hitler in the Party hierarchy. This made him the de facto head of the operational day-to-day management of the Party, of its various intelligence agencies, and bureaucratic appointments. Hess, like Stalin earlier in the Soviet Union, was in a position equivalent to "General Secretary of the Communist Party," and while the position of Stellvertreter did not continue after his infamous flight to Britain, in effect, the power of that position did, when Bormann took over from his former boss the control of all party functions as Party Reichsleiter.

[51] International Military Tribunal, vol. 1, p. 31, cited in Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 11.

Because of this powerful position, Hess' signature thus appears on German legal documents, including actual legislation itself, during this period, signing on behalf of the party as a kind of witness to, and for, Hitler. This fact, as Picknett, Prince, and Prior point out, was at the core of the Nuremberg Tribunal's prosecution's case against Hess, for during its presentations, "the emphasis remorselessly lay not only on Hess' culpability, but on his power within the Third Reich up to 1941. The prosecution spent a great deal of time and effort establishing the extent of his responsibility and the fact that nothing could happen in Germany without his knowledge and approval".[52] The reason for this? Quite simply, because in the Nazi state, nothing could, nor should happen without the Party's knowledge and approval, which Hess, as Hitler's personal "place holder" or Deputy, provided. This will become quite the crucial point in part two of this book.

Indeed, prior to 1941 and Hess' flight to Britain, one could wonder just to what extent Hess, with his party bureaucracy—which, let it be noted, included his secretary, Martin Bormann—was really the "brains" of the operation. Picknett, Prince, and Prior point out that even the American journal Foreign Affairs, mouthpiece of the American "deep state" apparatus, The Council on Foreign Relations, wondered at that time if Hess was not the ultimate "intellectual creator of Adolf Hitler to the extent that a piano creates music".[53]

2. The Moral Ambiguity of Hess, and the Hess-Bormann Relationship

As noted above, there was no regulation or law enacted in Nazi Germany without Adolf Hitler's, and Rudolf Hess', signatures; virtually nothing happened without Hess' knowledge and quiet involvement. This means, of course, that Hess' signature was on the infamous Nuremberg Race Laws. Yet, Hess acted as, and was viewed by many as, the conscience of the Party, objecting to some of the harsh measures meted out during the Reichkristalnacht violence against Jews. Additionally, Hess protected General Haushofer's "half Jewish" wife throughout his tenure as Stellvertreter, and this seems to have been somehow continued after his departure to Britain.

However, it also means that Hess is at the epicenter of several threads of covert activity, both diplomatic, and in terms of secret research, including, as we shall discover, the German a-bomb, and Hitler's plans for settling the "Jewish question," and, as we shall argue in part two, Göring's 1938-1939 Antarctic expedition. Here, as we shall discover, other researchers have uncovered something truly astonishing, but have not properly understood (or perhaps, as is more likely, not been willing to state) its true significance.

We have also seen that in Haushofer's thinking, and therefore in Hess' and Hitler's, the British Empire was not viewed as the natural enemy of Germany. Yet, while Hess shared this view to such an extent that he flew to Great Britain on an ostensible peace mission, it was also Hess who opposed Hitler's Haltbefehl, the "halt order" issued to the Wehrmacht at Dunkirk, which permitted the British Army to escape almost certain annihilation. It was Hess who, on the contrary, urged Hitler to finish off the British Army.

Similarly, it was Hess and his secretary, Martin Bormann, who urged the action in the "Night of the Long Knives" in taking out the leadership of the SA, the Brownshirts; it was Hess who spotted Bormann's talent, and made him his own right hand man within the party machinery, particularly of the party's own intelligence services, and the liaison office between the party and the Reich's intelligence and security services, the so-called Hessamt or "Hess Bureau".[54] It was Hess who cynically placed Bormann as his eyes and ears within Hitler's inner circle itself.

We are now in a position to evaluate the central core of the Hess Mess, his flight itself, his motivations for undertaking it, his subsequent imprisonment in Great Britain, and the many details other researchers have uncovered, and the scenarios and hypotheses they have advanced to explain all of it. To do this will require probably the longest single chapter I have ever written, for each facet must be examined again and again from several points of view, and each hypothesis evaluated. Before we take that plunge, it should be recalled that Spandau Hess, Prisoner Number Seven, confided a document to his Tunisian nurse, Abdallah Melaouhi, that at one point in his imprisonment in England, he was not permitted to smoke, when pre-flight Hess in Germany did not smoke at all. We should also recall (1) Hess' commitment to the Thule Society and its doctrines, (2) his fascination with "occult" matters, and (3) the implication of Joscelyn Godwin's remarks that perhaps Hess' continued imprisonment might be somehow related to those occult, and occulted, concerns. As we shall discover, there is evidence that Hess' mission was about far more than just a simple "peace plan," or rather, that he brought a comprehensive plan for Britain's consideration, one touching on all these subjects, from atomic bombs to the "Jewish question," from European peace and order, to Antarctica, for consideration.

Buckle in, because this will be a long, and bumpy, flight.

The Hessamt functioned as Hess' personal vetting agency within both the party machinery and the Reich bureaucracy, thus becoming a kind of parallel bureaucracy to all the functions of the state, in a manner quite similar to the party machinery of Communism in the Stalinist Soviet Union. FLIGHT OF FANCY, PEACE PROPOSALS, DOUBLES DILEMMAS, DIFFICULTIES WITH DUKES, AND NONSENSE AT NUREMBERG

"It is perhaps because of the many aspects of the affair that sensible academics have chosen to leave it well alone. It is far from a simple story".

John Harris and Richard Wilbourn[1]

VIRTUALLY EVERYTHING IN THE HESS MESS has a double aspect, if not a triple or even quadruple one, admitting of a multitude of interpretations, depending on how one interprets each detail of the case, and which hypotheses one adopts to explain them.

Before the end of this chapter, we will have bumped into the Cambridge Five, the notorious Soviet spy ring that included Philby, Burgess, and Blunt; the brother of Ian Fleming of James Bond fame, Peter Fleming, the British Royal Family and the Dukes of Hamilton, Windsor (the abdicated King Edward VIII), and Kent, younger brother of King George VI, and the Duke of Bucceleuch; the notorious SS general Reinhard Heydrich and a few Luftwaffe generals (Udet and Galland), and a British doctor who caused a firestorm of controversy when he published a book maintaining that Spandau Hess was not Hess at all. In other words, Hess may have ceased being Hess altogether and may have been replaced at some point, either by an actual physical double, or, at the other end of the spectrum, a mental one, an "alternative personality" brought about either by increasing mental deterioration, or caused by more malicious means, or (after all, this is the Hess Mess), both. And for those favoring the Doppelgänger hypothesis, there is every possibility that the double—if there was one—might himself have undergone mental deterioration via natural or deliberate causes, and in turn, had to have his "Hess personality" reinforced from time to time by "artificial means". All of this only serves to emphasize, once again, the importance of the One Question: why all the decades-long fuss?

If this sounds like mind control, that's because it is, but if this sounds too impossible to be even remotely connected to the Hess Mess, then brace yourself, for there is no other way to approach this first of a long list of "problems" in the Hess Mess other than to plunge into the deep end.

A. Nonsense at Nuremberg, and Difficulties of Doubles

1. Foretastes of MK-Ultra: Allen Dulles and Hess at Nuremberg

In 1979, British physician W. Hugh Thomas published a book that, in retrospect, has to be considered to be at the very heart of the Hess Mess. That book was The Murder of Rudolf Hess, and in it, Thomas argued that the prisoner in Spandau Prison was not Rudolf Hess at all, but a double, and from this context, Thomas spent much of his book trying to fathom what the whole Hess Mess was really all about. That book touched off a storm of controversy continuing to this day. Thomas argued his case because, on one brief occasion, while serving in the British military in Berlin, he had the opportunity briefly to see the infamous prisoner without his shirt on, during a routine medical examination at the British Military Hospital.

Hess, he maintained, showed no scars of the war wounds he had suffered in World War One. In fact, we have already seen hints that Spandau Hess may have been a double, for recall his complaining to his nurse, Abdallah Melaouhi, that during a certain period of his confinement in England, he was not allowed to smoke, and the real Hess, like his beloved Führer Adolf Hitler, did not smoke. Such behavior anomalies were a major focus of Thomas' book, and have become a major focus for anyone investigating the Hess Mess.

But Thomas was not the first.

Far from it. The first people to observe that something was "off" about Hess were those who encountered him at Nuremberg, where his behavior was nothing less than a performance, and a nonsensical one at that. His former colleagues, especially Reichsmarschall Göring, clearly indicated they thought something was "wrong," and, for that matter, so did Hess' Allied captors, and particularly, the Americans.

One of those Americans who had his suspicions about Hess was none other than Allen Dulles, OSS station chief in Zurich during the war, former advisor (with his brother, John Foster) to President Wilson at Versailles, a partner of the prestigious Wall Street law firm of Sullivan and Cromwell, and, of course, future director of the CIA, and future member of the Warren Commission. Dulles, in what Picknett, Prince, and Prior quite aptly qualify as "the most telling episode at Nuremberg,"[2] called upon his friend, psychiatrist Dr. Donald Ewen Cameron, to examine Hess.

This one fact should make anyone's "suspicion meter" shoot into the red zone, for Dr. Ewen Cameron is notorious for his role in the CIA's "mind control" program, MK-Ultra, having developed the technique, alluded to earlier, of "psychic driving," whereby he hoped to erase one personality from an individual, and substitute another. Cameron, in short, was one of the "pioneers" working in the field of mind control

At this juncture, matters become even more complicated:

> In the words of Gordon Thomas, in his study of the military and intelligence uses of psychiatry and psychology, Journey into Madness (1993):
> "Dulles first swore Dr Cameron to Secrecy, and then told him an astounding story. He had reason to believe that the man Dr. Cameron was to examine was not Rudolf Hess but an impostor; that the real Deputy Führer had been secretly executed on Churchill's orders. Dulles had explained that Dr Cameron could prove the point by a simple physical examination of the man's torso. If he was the genuine Hess, there should be scar tissue over his left lung, a legacy from the day the young Hess had been wounded in the First World War. Dr Cameron had agreed to try to examine the prisoner".
> He was never to make that examination. The next day, when Hess was brought to him, he was handcuffed to a British Military Police sergeant, who refused point blank to remove the handcuffs so that

---

[2] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, Double Standards: the Rudolf Hess Cover-up, p. 9.

> Cameron could take the prisoner's shirt off—or even unbutton it—to look at his chest.[3]

Why would Allen Dulles have chosen Dr. Cameron for such a task, much less have confided in him his suspicions that (1) "Nuremberg Hess" was a double, and (2) the real one had been executed on orders from Churchill?

Picknett, Prince, and Prior note that there is a conceptual link between Cameron's later techniques of "psychic driving" during his MK-Ultra research for the CIA, and the work of British psychiatrists L.G.M. Page and R.J. Russell, who first published a paper about similar techniques in 1948, a paper summarizing "many years of intensive experimentation".[4] In other words, Dulles needed someone he knew to be familiar with the British work, and its possible use on "Nuremberg Hess". In Cameron's hands, the techniques pioneered by the British psychiatrists would be taken to new levels, one implication of which was that an amnesiac, quasi-sonambulistic state could be induced by cocktails of drugs, and prolonged sleep, during which patients—or rather, victims—were highly susceptible to suggestion, including the inducement of false memories?

These considerations raise yet a further possibility: was "Hess"—either his double or the real individual—possibly used as a "mind control" experiment subject for the express purpose of sending a Manchurian candidate back to Nazi Germany, to assassinate top Nazi leaders? In fact, Picknett, Prince, and Prior, note that a meeting occurred in Great Britain in 1944 where this possibility was proposed.[6] The implications of this meeting are profound, for it suggests (1) that "Hess"[7] was already the deliberate subject of such mind-control techniques, and (2) that those techniques were being used to create the "Manchurian Candidate," the perfect, mind-controlled assassin and spy.

[7] "Hess": we will now, from time to time, have to refer to this individual as "Hess," in quotation marks, to denote the uncertainty of whether or not we are dealing with the real Hess, or a double, in order to emphasize the nature of the hall of mirrors we are now entering.

At this juncture we must pause for yet another reason, and consider the strange orthography of referring to him as "Hess". From time to time, we shall now have cause to refer to this individual as "Hess," in quotation marks, to denote the uncertainty of whether or not we are dealing with the real Hess or a double, in order to emphasize the nature of the hall of mirrors we are now entering. Picknett, Prince, and Prior are quite alive to this problem in a way that most Hess researchers are not, for the double problem compounds the difficulties at almost every step of analysis. For example, they point out that

> If it was the real Hess, then the doctors had tampered with his memory in order to eradicate what would otherwise prove to be—at least to the Churchill legend and the Establishment—the aspects with the most potential to embarrass and undermine. They would have attempted to erase from his mind issues connected with the Duke of Hamilton, the Royal Family and anything else that might have seriously rocked their boat.
> If it was a double at Maindiff Court, the intention would have been more ambitious. But could they actually make the double believe he was really Rudolf Hess? Perhaps. But the human mind is far too complex and tricky for that to be a safe and reliable option, and there could have been no guarantee that any apparent success would be lasting. It is, however, possible though the use of drugs and hypnosis to reinforce suggestions that bypass the brain's critical faculties.[8]

The need for constant "reinforcement" of these induced memories and patterns of behavior might explain why the British government constructed an entire "Hess suite" in its military hospital in Berlin. Indeed, Picknett, Prince and Prior suggest this possibility earlier in their ground-breaking work, when they ask how long, and why, a double would keep up a pretense for so long.[9]

[9] Ibid., p. xxviii-xix.

But we are getting ahead of ourselves, and hence it is necessary to return to the Allen Dulles-Ewen Cameron element of the Hess Mess to observe another highly important question that Picknett, Prince, and Prior raise, but do not attempt to answer. "How did Dulles," they ask "arrive at the notion that the Hess in Nuremberg was a double, and that the real Hess had been killed on Churchill's orders?"[10] How, indeed, did Dulles know?

There are, I suspect, two possible routes for this knowledge, and neither are mutually exclusive. One route would be via the financial and intelligence contacts through his law firm, Sullivan and Cromwell, and its deep ties to the American and British financial elites. These contacts would certainly have extended to his acquaintance, William McKittrick, American president of the Bank of International Settlements in Basel, Switzerland, during the war, where both men were posted. The BIS, even alone and apart from any contacts Dulles would have through Sullivan and Cromwell, would have been a possible conduit for such information, since it maintained close business ties between the Allied Powers and Nazi Germany throughout the war, even enabling business transactions between corporate and financial interests whose nations were at war.

This raises the other pipeline of possibility, for Dulles also had cultivated many contacts with high-ranking Nazis toward the end of the war, including a number of contacts in the SS, such as through SS General Wolff. Dulles could even count Walter Schellenberg, head of the Sicherheitdienst, or SD, as a distant acquaintance through his network of contacts in the Third Reich. They could also have informed him of their suspicions vis-à-vis "Hess," for as we shall discover, the Hess Mess engulfs many high ranking Nazis, even casting its shadow over the notorious Reinhard Heydrich, of the RSHA (Reichsicherheithauptamt, or "National Security Agency").

There is, of course, a final possibility, and one which no one to my knowledge has researched or mentioned. It has no evidence in support of it that I have been able to unearth, but on the other hand, it is suggested by a string of very odd synchronicities and the balance of probabilities implied by them. That fact is simply that no one, to my knowledge, has ever inquired whether or not Dr. Donald Ewen Cameron, Dulles' confidant at Nuremberg in the Hess Mess, and later a leading scientist involved in the CIA's MK-Ultra Mind Control programs when Dulles was CIA Director, was related to Dr. James Malcolm Cameron, the British forensic pathologist who conducted the "Hess" autopsy (and, as we saw previously, a possible secret autopsy). Both men, after all, have the same last name, and more importantly, both men were associated with Scotland, Ewen Cameron being born there in the small town of Bridge of Allan, and James Malcolm Cameron attending the University of Glasgow for his medical studies, where Ewen Cameron also received degrees in "psychological medicine". The fact that both men are associated with the University of Glasgow, and that both of them studied medicine there, and have the same clan surname, is enough to suggest that Allen Dulles' pipeline into the Hess Mess might have been directly from the family of British pathologist who would ultimately perform the official autopsy. In this respect it should be noted that James Cameron was born in 1930, and died in 2003, making him 11 years old when Hess parachuted into Britain, so the speculation must remain speculation, of a very high order at that.

2. "Hess'" Strange, Buffoonish Behavior at Nuremberg: "Brain Poison" and "Hess'" Jewish-Bolshevik Mind Control Conspiracy

Whatever Allen Dulles' pipeline of information about the Hess Mess might have been, there were other important indicators that "Hess" himself was a mess, not the least of which was the strange behavior he exhibited, and the strange statements he made, at Nuremberg. As will be seen, a pattern of statements and behavior emerges in Nuremberg that was presaged by behavior and statements he made after his capture by the British, and which was continued—off and on—during his years as Prisoner Number Seven at Spandau. This pattern consisted of strange remarks made in passing, without thought or further comment, calling into question "Hess'" identity, along with much more deliberate statements by "Hess" asserting memory loss and memory "reacquisition". We have seen already one such statement that Hess made "in passing," in the letter he entrusted to his nurse, Melaouhi, complaining of not being able to smoke during his confinement at Maindiff, in England.

This is not the only such statement.

Lieutenant Colonel Eugene K. Bird was the American commandant of Spandau prison until he was dismissed from that command in 1972 for having consulted with "Hess" about his memoirs. In his book, Prisoner #7: Rudolf Hess: The Thirty Years in Jail of Hitler's Deputy Führer, Bird reproduces several entries from Hess' "Nuremberg diary". One of these entries for October 13th, 1945, reads "Göring tried for an hour to refresh my memory—in vain. He told me that when I flew to England I should have left a letter behind for the Führer". While this comment is ambivalent and capable of more than one interpretation—was "Hess" dissembling to Göring and only pretending he did not remember that in fact he had left a letter for Hitler prior to his flight, or did "Hess" really not remember the letter?—it highlights once again the problem: is "Nuremberg Hess" the real Hess or not? If the real Hess, was his memory lapse genuine, or only faked, as he himself would later claim in his now well-known and infamous statement to the Tribunal? Or was it a "double" who simply had not been adequately "programed" to remember all details? (And if the latter, why even risk it?)

That speech to the Nuremberg Tribunal Hess was never able to deliver in toto, but he did make copious notes for it, which Col. Bird reproduces in his book. In that speech, Hess intended, at least in part, to recount his recollection and version of his confinement in Britain. Before introducing the comments themselves, Bird writes this:

> His terms had been rebuffed, even laughed at. Hess, at this time, became convinced there was only one possible answer to this "craziness" on the part of others: they were all either hypnotized or secretly drugged by some evil power. The evil power was, in his mind, the dread coalition of Jews and Bolsheviks.[11]

He then introduces "Hess'" prepared remarks:

---

[11] Ibid., p. 23.

> "I had the impression," Hess remembers, "that most of the people who came to me for the first time had first been detained with tea or a meal before they were brought to me. This was also the case with Lord Simon when he visited me for a long conference on the orders of the British Government. He had the typical glassy and dream-like eyes.
> "From my observations it can be gathered that people who are in this abnormal state of mind can be forced to put others in the same state. Field-Marshal Milch has said that he had the impression the Führer was not normal in the last years. I would say that the expression of the Führer's face and his eyes had changed in the last years; there was an expression of cruelty in it, if not of insanity.
> "I am aware that what I have to say about what happened to me in my imprisonment in England will at first sound unbelievable".[12]

After writing more about a period of painful constipation which he believed to have been brought about by the British secretly drugging him, "Hess" goes on to make even more sensational claims:

> The suffering was indescribable. If they had shot me or killed me with gas or even let me starve, it would have been humane in comparison. They began to add acids to the food as well. I found out by leaving a fork in the food; within a few hours the fork was covered with verdigris. The doctor was very embarrassed by this experiment. After meals I could often only sit, or walk bent with pain. In my desperation I scratched chalk off the walls, hoping this would have a neutralizing effect. But it was in vain.[13]

With "Hess" being such a mess, one must always be cautious in weighing his allegations and interpreting them, except, on this point, "Hess" was always consistent: he believed the British were secretly drugging him.

[12] Lt. Col. Eugene K. Bird, op. cit., p. 23. Bird notes that "Hess" had written this "in his 'closing statement' he prepared for delivery at the Nuremberg Trial. But he was cut short by the Court and only some of it was delivered".(p. 23, n.)

[13] Ibid., p. 24.

In this case, the comment about “acid” is illuminating in the light of other claims by “Hess” that he was suffering amnesia and that he was being given “brain poison,” for “acid” in this case might be a careful reference to LSD, a drug which was later to play a role in the CIA’s mind control experiments. While LSD was still a very “new” drug in “Hess’” time, and thus it is questionable whether he would have been familiar with it or its effects, it is intriguing to note that regular LSD use has been associated with constipation.

The “acid-and-constipation” allegations, however, were not the end of “Hess’” mind control fantasias. Indeed, they may not have been fantasias at all, but may have contained some element of truth. This is certainly implied by Dulles’ remarks to Dr. Ewen Cameron, but it is also implied by some of “Hess’” other remarks. In November 1941, after his capture by the British, “Hess” was at dinner with his doctors. This event, we shall consider again, but from a very different context. We introduce it here to highlight the strangeness of “Hess’” remarks and behavior at Nuremberg. It was at this dinner that he first alluded to looming amnesia; he was, he said, having difficulty remembering things, even things that had happened only a short time previously. Two weeks later, he informed his British doctors his memory had failed completely, and he was to remain in this state “for almost two years. The doctors had little doubt that it was real”.[14]

But in his “Last Word” statement for the Military Tribunal in Nuremberg, Hess expanded, and in the expansion, one finds the subject of mind control being suggested once again:

> “My memory failed quite a lot.... At the same time, I was constantly asked strange questions about my past. If I answered them correctly, they were disappointed. If I was not able to answer them, they were obviously pleased. So I proceeded to increasingly feign a lack of memory. They explained that they could bring back the memory with an injection. Since I had to remain constant in my “loss of memory,” I could show no mistrust, and agreed. I had been told that the injection would be followed by a narcosis in which questions would be asked me that were supposed to connect the conscious with the sub-conscious. It was clear to me that they wanted to test in this way if the loss of memory was real”.[15]

"Hess" finally agreed to this procedure on May 7, 1944, and was injected with the drug Evipan.

What followed next was sheer theater, or was it? The transcript of the session, which Col. Bird reproduces in his book, reads like someone unable to remember his identity (perhaps, of course, because "Hess" wasn't Hess):

2210 hrs Dr. Dicks (psychiatrist) enters and stands by Hess' bed.
2110 hrs Dr Dicks tells Hess: "You will now be able to recall all the names and faces of your dear ones. Your memory will return. We are all here to help you."..
2112 hrs Groans.
Dr Dicks: What's the matter?
Hess: Pains! In my belly! Oh if only I were well. Bellyache. Water! Water! Thirst!
D: Remember your little son's name?
H: I don't know.
D: Do you remember your good friend, Haushofer...
H: No.
D: Willi Messerschmitt?
H: No (groans). Bellyache! Oh God!
D: ... And all the stirring times with Adolf Hitler in Munich.
H: No.
D: You were with him in the fortress at Landsberg.
H: No.
D: You will recall all the other parts of your past.
H: Recall all the other parts.
D: Recall all the great events of your life.
H: All the great events...
The session ended at 2215 hrs and the doctors noted afterwards: "At no point did the patient make a spontaneous remark: the sole unprovoked utterances were groans. This was followed by repeated exhortations that here were all his old doctors eager to help him, but he sat up and said: "Water please, and some food".[16]

But "Hess" later claimed, in a letter written to his mother from Nuremberg on July 5, 1947, that he knew the whole time what had been going on, and in a letter to his wife Ilse from Nuremberg, he stated it was all “a great piece of play-acting,” and that he had been feigning his insanity because he was hoping to be sent home.[17] This was not an irrational hope, as it turns out, for under the terms of then-existing international law, insane people we not to be held prisoner, but returned to their countries.

[16] Lt. Col. Eugene K. Bird, op. cit., pp. 25-26.

Later, at Nuremberg, the insanity-feigning was to serve a different purpose. By February 1945, as the war in Europe was coming to its inevitable conclusion, “Hess’” memory had fully returned, when “Hess” confessed to his British captors and physicians that his memory losses and amnesia had all been faked on his part, a conclusion that Dr Dicks dissented from. Acknowledging “Hess’” full memory recovery, Dicks wrote “I cannot accept his own statement that the memory loss never existed. There was at that time a true partial dissociation of the personality, which permitted the patient to ‘take in’ what was going on around him but caused difficulty of recall. It is a case of preferring to have duped us to having shown temporary weakness”.[18]

But at Nuremberg, “Hess” had a very different version of what had happened to him; writing in his “Last Statement,” he stated:

> Slowly my memory returned fully, even though the brain poison was given to me for at least two years. The latter was the reason that I continued to pretend to have a loss of memory. I kept this up until after the beginning of the proceedings,[19] since I suspected that otherwise I would never be admitted to the proceedings and would never have the chance to make by exposure to the public. Only after the danger appeared that I was not in a state to take part in the proceedings and would have to be excluded, did I admit my manoeuvre. But since I was given a brain poison on each possible occasion in Nuremberg I again took to “feigning a lack of memory” in an increasing manner. Only at the moment I began to make my closing statement did I let my memory “return”.[20]

So, was “Hess” able to fool his British doctors in spite of being drugged (as he alleged), and as at least on one occasion he actually was, and possible on other occasions, as his complaint about constipation would indicate? Or was his claim of feigning amnesia itself a part of the programming of which he was complaining?

[19] “Proceedings,” i.e., the Nuremberg Tribunals.

Before we consider "Hess'" infamous speech at Nuremberg claiming he was feigning his memory loss, not only in Britain, but in Nuremberg itself when he was confronted, face to face, with General Haushofer and Hermann Göring himself, and claimed he could remember neither man, we need to take note of some other strange occurrences at Nuremberg involving "Hess". Picknett, Prince, and Prior state that Airey Neave, the process-server on the Nuremberg defendants, recounts that "Hess" once responded to "an officer who called his name: 'There is no Rudolf Hess here. But if you are looking for Convict Number 125, then I'm your man!'"[21]

A Rogue's Gallery at Nuremberg: on the front left, Hermann Göring uses papers to cover his mouth while he is laughing at "Hess," in the front center. On the front right, former Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop appears to be staring in disbelief at "Hess". In the back row, former Grand Admiral Dönitz, in sunglasses, is glaring at "Hess". As will be seen later, this picture and the odd "seating" arrangement, may have some synchronous symbolic significance, since all four men are implicated in the Nazi Antarctic Expedition. In any case, it is not known at what point in the proceedings this picture was taken, but it may very possibly have been after one or the other of Hess' infamous "statements".

Göring clearly gave indications that he knew "something" was going on with "Hess," for at one point during a recess in the proceedings, when all the prisoners were together in a room, he alluded to a "great secret" that "Hess" should reveal. The former Reichsmarschall again repeated this in the actual tribunal court room dock itself during a break, needling "Hess," who was seated next to him throughout the proceeding: "By the way, Hess, when are you going to let us in on your great secret? ... I make a motion Hess tell us his big secret in the recess. How about it, Hess?"[22] Picknett, Prince, and Prior imply that Göring's emphasis on "Hess'" surname might suggest that he suspected "Hess" was not Hess.[23]

Returning now to the Tribunal itself, "Hess'" lawyer, Dr. Alfred Seidl, whom we have encountered in earlier chapters, attempted to defend his client on several grounds, contesting the legality and standing of the Tribunal, the conflict of interest in having Soviet judges present on the court sitting in judgment of his client, and finally, contesting whether or not his client, "Hess," was even competent to defend himself, since he could not remember anything.[24] After all, recall that by this point, "Hess" had been interviewed by American psychiatrists, and had been confronted face to face by both Göring and Haushofer, whom he claimed he could not remember.

[24] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, Who Murdered My Father, Rudolf Hess?, pp. 11-12. Dr. Seidl, who wrote the foreword to this book and who was defense counsel for "Hess" at Nuremberg, notes on p. 11, in his foreword, that as a signatory to the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact, whose secret protocols divided Poland between Germany and the Soviet Union, the Soviet Union "acted as legislator, prosecutor, and judge. In other words, it was judge in its own case. It is a general held juridical maxim that this ought not to be permissible". Dr. Seidl goes on to quote extensively from the October 5, 1946 issue of the famous British weekly magazine The Economist, which pointed out the same legal and moral ambiguity of the Tribunal: "Such silence, unfortunately, proves that the Nuremberg court was an independent court only within certain restrictions. In a proper criminal trial, it would be most remarkable if a judge in a proceeding against a murderer were to leave out of consideration testimony about an accomplice's part in the murder because the testimony revealed that the judge himself had been the accomplice. That no one in the Nuremberg Trial considers such a concealment to be out of the ordinary shows just how far removed we are from anything that could be called 'rule of law' in international matters".(p. 12)

However, as Dr. Seidl rose to begin the defense of his client, yet another turn in this bizarre circus unfolded. Dr. Seidl, through no fault of his own, was completely unprepared for it, nor were, for that matter, the judges of the court and the other defendants in the dock. On November 27, 1945, "Hess" wrote at length in his Nuremberg diary, what happened:

> The psychologist said to Göring that my stomach and abdominal cramps were psycho-somatic in origin. Soon afterwards Göring said to me that the cramps were "hysterical" and that this was the opinion of the German doctor as well. I replied that he would one day learn the truth. My defence counsel said at the end of today's hearing that the decision would probably be taken on Friday as to whether or not I was fit to stand trial. That the decision would presumably be that I was not. I asked him to point out that I felt myself and regarded myself to be fit to stand trial, and wished to continue to take part in the court proceedings. Counsel and Göring thereupon exchanged knowing looks.
> Four o'clock in the afternoon, a special session to decide the question whether I am fit to stand trial. One minute before the start, I said to my counsel that I had decided to say that my memory had returned. He turned away in some perturbation and said: "Do as you wish". Whereupon he started delivering a summing-up which lasted about an hour. He argued against my fitness to stand trial because without memory I would not be in a position to defend myself or to provide him with the necessary information to enable him to defend me. Although he was bound to add that I myself regarded myself as being fit to stand trial. He goes on endless reading out from the medical reports. I send him a message saying that the whole matter could be shortened by letting me speak. He takes no notice of this but goes on speaking for a long time. After that the prosecuting counsel talk one after the other, likewise at great length, in the course of which they suggest that I may be exaggerating my condition and alleged loss of memory. They likewise read extracts from the medical reports and quote from massive law-books. The judges also have their say and argue to and fro regarding the consequences of my loss of memory and its effect on my fitness to stand trial. One of the judges points out to the American prosecutor Jackson that I > apparently wish to be cross-examined. Jackson replies that he does not believe this wish to be genuine and presumably counts on the arguments of the defence counsel in favour of unfitness to stand trial to be stronger than my alleged wish.

> After about two hours of argument, the President of the Tribunal submits that I ought perhaps to be allowed to speak.[25]

Eventually, of course, "Hess" was allowed to speak, and his remarks caused, then and now, a further interpretive problem (besides that of who was really uttering them):

> Mr. President, I would like to say this: at the beginning of this afternoon's proceedings I gave my counsel a note that I am of the opinion that these proceedings could be shortened if they would allow me to speak myself. What I say is as follows:
>
> In order to anticipate any possibility of my being declared incapable of pleading, although I am willing to take part in the rest of the proceedings with the rest of them, I would like to give the Tribunal the following declaration, although I originally intended not to make this declaration until a later point in the proceedings.
> My memory is again in order. The reasons why I simulated loss of memory were tactical. In fact, it is only that my capacity for concentration is slightly reduced. But in consequence of that, my capacity to follow the trial, my capacity to defend myself, to put questions to witnesses or even to answer questions—these, my capacities, are not influenced by that.
> I emphasize the fact that I bear the full responsibility for everything that I have done or signed as signatory or co-signatory. My attitude, in principle, is that the Tribunal is not competent—is not affected by the statement I have just made. Hitherto in conversations with my official defence counsel I have maintained loss of memory. He was, therefore, speaking in good faith when he asserted I lost my memory.[26]

The court, records "Hess" later in his diary, listened in shock, with some judges' mouths actually open in disbelief, while the Press box broke out into laughter as it ran out of the courtroom to file its reports.[27]

[27] Lt. Col. Eugene K. Bird., op. cit., pp. 43-44.

As far as his defense counsel, Dr. Seidl, and Göring and the rest of the defendants were concerned, "Hess'" speech was proof of his incompetence to stand trial, and indeed, it may have been a desperate ploy on his part to evade trial. The Tribunal did not share this view, however, and "Hess" as we know, stood trial and was sentenced to life in prison.

Then, after all this, the circus took its final turn, when on the day of closing statements, "Hess" made his final statement to the Tribunal, and as it would turn out, his last public statement, ever. In it, he once again alluded to the subject of "mind control," and that his, and some of the other defendants' behavior, had been externally induced:

> He talked of the "predictions" he said he had made before the start of the trial... predictions that people would make false statements on oath; that some of the defendants would act strangely. He spoke of former political trials where the defendants actually clapped in frenzied approval when their death sentences were passed.
> It all pointed to the same evil influence: the secret force that made men act and speak "according to the orders given them". When he had rambled on for some 20 minutes, the President of the Court interrupted to say that defendants could not be allowed to make lengthy statements at that stage in the proceedings. He hoped Hess would soon conclude.
>
> Hess did. "I was permitted to work for many years," he intoned, "under the greatest son whom my country has brought forth in its thousand-year history. Even if I could, I would not want to erase this period of time from my existence...
> "No matter what human beings do," said Rudolf Hess finally, "I shall some day stand before the judgement seat of the Eternal. I shall answer to Him, and I know He will judge me innocent".[28]

Those were the last, and conveniently unrepentant, words that the world ever heard from "Hess," probably the world's "most mentally examined patient".[29]

3. Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's Assessment of "Hess'" Nuremberg Speeches

These statements would all be perfectly dismissible if one had not already encountered the likes of Allen Dulles and Dr. Ewen Cameron lurking in the mix, not to mention Dulles' alleged words to Cameron that he suspected "Hess" was a double. Nor should one forget the actual British drugging session in 1944, trying to "recover" the lost memories of "Hess," and his strange, hypnotic "replies". Looked at a certain way, this session could easily have been not a "programming" session but rather, a testing session, to see if the programming "took". We have, of course, not yet proven nor even argued the case that "Nuremberg Hess" (or any other Hess) was a double. By referring to him as "Hess" we are, once again, leaving the question open.

But the allusion to mind control suggests that something sinister was indeed going on at Nuremberg, and "Hess" —or whoever—was trying to draw attention to it, albeit, clumsily. It is worth reviewing Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's evaluation of "Hess'" closing Nuremberg statement. On any surface reading,

> It was a rambling monologue in which he blamed the atrocities committed by German concentration camp guards, and even Hitler's actions, on unknown mind controllers.

Before we continue with their words, stop and let this sink in for a moment: "Hess" was, in effect, saying that the entire war, and all of its atrocities, was an example of some worldwide "mind control phenomenon," which in his Nazi hysteria, he was blaming on Jews and Bolsheviks. But if one leaves the Jews and Bolsheviks out of it, this is, nevertheless, a breathtaking statement to make, and let it be noted, "Hess" warned the Tribunal that, indeed, his remarks would seem incredible. Continuing with Picknett, Prince, and Prior:

> However, close study of the content suggests that, while at times confused and unclear, the defendant at Nuremberg was trying to convey a message. (It should be noted that the president of the tribunal ordered Hess to end his defence speech on the grounds that the defendants were allowed a maximum of twenty minutes.

> Reading Hess' actual words from the trial proceedings—even allowing for hesitancy and slowness of speech—it is difficult to make them last much more than ten minutes.[30]

In other words, the subject of "mind control" was a subject that the Tribunal—or at least, its president, who was British—did not want to be addressed at any length.

This is not, however, where Picknett, Prince, and Prior leave it, for they note that "Hess" began his speech, by predicting odd behavior from defendants, and alluding to the "show trials" of Stalin's 1930s purges, where defendants did indeed seem to be in a trance, behaving completely contrary to their self-interest. At this point however, Picknett, Prince, and Prior note a detail that was omitted in Bird's account, for "Hess" then states in his speech before the Tribunal that while confined in Britain, he had been given access to pre-war issues of the Thule-Nazi Party official newspaper, the Völkischer Beobachter. This is an extremely odd oddity, since "Hess" was prohibited from having access to any newspapers or news at all, British, German, or otherwise. Their question, at this point, is "Could this have been part of the schooling of a double?"[31]

It is also worth mentioning that "Hess," while at Nuremberg, refused to allow his wife Ilse to visit him or to bring his growing son, Wolf-Rüdiger, to visit, writing to her that it would be an affront to his dignity. Indeed, "Hess" would not allow his family to visit him until the 1960s at Spandau, many years after the end of the war.

"Hess'" speech, however, contained even more oddities, and here it is best to allow Picknett, Prince, and Prior to speak for themselves, and at length, for their assessment of the speech is central to that nagging One Question at the center of the Hess Mess:

> Hess goes on to suggest that the German concentration camp guards, and the scientists who experimented on the inmates, were under a similar form of control as the Moscow defendants, and even that Hitler's reported mental abnormalities in the final years were due to an external cause. He then describes how he began to > think along these lines because of the behavior of his guards and doctors in Abergavenny:

> "Some of them—these persons and people around me—were changed from time to time. Some of the new ones who came in place of those who had been changed had strange eyes. They were glassy and like eyes in a dream. This symptom, however, lasted only a few days and then they made a completely normal impression. They could no longer be distinguished from normal human beings".[32]

Again, note that "Hess" is alleging some sort of "mind control" experiment is taking place, one of truly international extent, for it is, by his confused lights, occurring not just in the Soviet Union, and not just in Nazi Germany, but in Great Britain as well, with his own doctors and guards apparently subject to some sort of "procedure" prior to becoming involved with him.

Picknett, Prince, and Prior note that these "confused ramblings about 'mental influence' were an attempt to argue that Hitler and the Nazis were not responsible for their actions".[33] But in their view, this is not really the intention of "Hess'" remarks, because his real goal is not justification of Nazi atrocities, but rather, simply to persuade the Tribunal that "such things are possible," because, on their view, "he is building up to some revelation concerning himself".[34]

It is difficult and problematical to dismiss their assessment, because "Hess" himself stresses the importance of the subject, time and time again, not only in his speech at Nuremberg, but as we shall discover, elsewhere as well:

> After giving his examples he stresses the importance of what he is going to say next:
> "Obviously it would have been of the utmost importance if I had stated under oath what I have to say about the happenings during my own imprisonment in England. However, it was impossible for me to persuade my defence counsel to declare himself willing to put the proper questions to me... But it is of the utmost importance that what I am saying be said

---

[32] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 449.

> under oath. Therefore I now declare once more: I swear by God, the Almighty Omniscient, that I will speak the pure truth, that I shall leave out nothing and add nothing... I ask the High Tribunal to give all the more weight to everything which I declare under oath, expressly calling God as my witness".

> Having stressed at such length the importance of what he is about to say next, Hess then begins his revelation: "In the spring of 1942.".. It is at this point that the president interrupts, telling him that he is at the end of his allotted twenty minutes.[35]

While my own reaction to "Hess'" speech may not be the same as the reader's, I cannot help but record my impression that one senses a certain desperation in his words, an urgent need to convey information, perhaps even a warning, to the Tribunal and, through it, to the world.

But whether or not "Hess" was desperately trying to save himself, it does at least appear that he was trying to say something, for another strange question occurs in connection with his remarks: why would Dr. Seidl not wish to question "Hess" about his mind control ideas and allegations, particularly when, at that time, such ideas would have been considered absurd. Even today, when the evidence of patents and studies has at least rendered the topic "discussible," people are reluctant to do so, especially in courts, where the technology is a direct epistemological challenge to existing theories of evidence. But questioning "Hess" on his remarks, he may have been able to mount an insanity defense.

Thus, in "Hess'" case, such an airing of his views might actually have helped the case that Seidl—not "Hess"—wanted to make, namely, that he was not fit to stand trial.

However, what would have happened had he done so? Here it is worth noting that Picknett, Prince, and Prior point out one extreme difficulty with the "double" or Doppelgänger hypothesis: the British government, by allowing a "double" to stand trial was taking an extraordinary risk that the whole charade might be exposed in open court, thus risking an airing, in open court, not only before the world press, but before the personnel of the other three Allied powers, France, the U.S.A., and U.S.S.R., whatever it is that they were trying so hard to conceal and obfuscate. The second risk was allowing the double—or the real Hess—to continue for life in prison, where the programming of either the double or the real Hess might break down at any moment.[36] [35] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., pp. 449-450, italicized emphasis in the original, boldface emphasis added.

In this context that they observe that the only physician unqualifiedly urging that "Hess" was not fit to stand trial was Lord Moran, personal physician of Winston Churchill, who had literally pushed himself into the three-man British team of physicians at Nuremberg and who, they note, omitted all reference to his diagnosis of "Hess'" unfitness for trial from his memoirs. "Strangely enough," they state, "if Hess had not stood trial because of insecurity, he would not have gone free. Instead, he would have been incarcerated in a top-security mental institution somewhere in Britain (as he was still in British custody). Is this why Churchill's man alone argued for such a diagnosis?"[37]

This question also raises questions about Dr. Seidl's defense, and why he did not want to put questions to "Hess" about his mind control allegations. It also raises into sharp relief the possibility that "Hess" was not intended to stand trial, but rather, be returned to Britain, where he would be incarcerated for a time before being removed more permanently; in this respect, only recall that "Spandau Hess" maintained that the Soviet reversal on his release was in fact a death sentence, and that the British would never allow him to leave Spandau alive. If that was the intention, then "Hess" thwarted it by the speech he gave, insisting that he stand trial.

The "nonsense in Nuremberg" highlights the fundamental question, who was "Hess"? Was the "Hess" in Nuremberg, or later, in Spandau, the Hess who took off from Germany in May 1941? The nonsense in Nuremberg thus leads, directly, to the other questions and hypotheses in the Hess Mess that we must now confront directly: the doubles dilemma, his flight of fancy itself, and what he—or rather, what researchers argue that he—hoped to accomplish by it, which leads to the peace mission and "lure" hypotheses, and to the Difficulties with the Dukes of Hamilton, Windsor, and Kent.

B. More about the Doubles Dilemma

1. War Wounds, Missing Scar Tissue, and Magic Bullets

That "Hess" in Nuremberg—and therefore subsequently in Spandau—was a double is a hypothesis that was first put forward and argued before the public in W. Hugh Thomas' now classic book The Murder of Rudolf Hess. The controversy has raged ever since its publication in 1979, for Thomas presented a number of compelling "details" to buttress his main argument.

In Thomas' case, that controversy has raged largely because he maintained that it was the Nazis who substituted a double for Hess from their "stable of doubles,"[38] having learned of his secret "peace plan" proposal and determination to fly to Britain to negotiate with an alleged "peace party" in the upper strata of British society and politics. The substitution was made, Thomas argued, because high-ranking Nazis such as Himmler and Göring were eager to remove a powerful rival from the equation. Accordingly, Hess' plane was shot down and another plane, with a double, was substituted.[39] While most researchers, including the present author, reject this particular detail of Thomas' theory, it will nonetheless be reviewed thoroughly here because there are details in Thomas' elaboration that imply a significant political dynamic at work in the background of the Hess Mess. If it is true that the one book to own concerning the Hess Mess is Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's Double Standards: The Rudolf Hess Cover-up, it is equally true that Thomas' book more than any other provoked the world-wide interest in the Hess Mess, and triggered the articles and books about the case that followed it.

Like everyone else who has ever investigated the Hess Mess, Thomas himself admitted that the whole affair was "disturbingly enigmatic," and pointed out that ever since "Hess'" parachute landing in Scotland on May 10, 1941, his behavior was one of the biggest mysteries. He refused, as we have noted previously, to see his wife or son at Nuremberg and indeed, did not allow them to visit him in Spandau until 1969. Pressed to identify Haushofer,

Göring, or even his two secretaries by the psychologists in Nuremberg, he could not do so.[40] As we shall see, for Thomas, such anomalous and erratic behavior became supportive evidence in his main argument that "Hess" was not Hess at all, but someone else, a very clever double, from someone's "stable of doubles".

Such behavior, however, was not the issue that opened the Pandora's Box of the "Doubles" hypothesis and all the dilemmas it posed. Thomas had not shown much interest in the Hess Mess until, while serving in the British military as a physician, he was posted to Berlin as a "Consultant in General Surgery to the British Military Hospital".[41] Realizing that this meant Spandau prison's infamous Prisoner Number Seven might come under his care at some point, Dr. Thomas began to familiarize himself with "Hess'" medical file, compiled by the British Army psychiatrist J.R. Rees, who kept a meticulous record of "Hess'" bizarre behavior in Great Britain.[42]

It was in this file that Dr. Thomas learned about "Hess'" wounds that he suffered during World War One, with the shrapnel hit at Verdun, and the far more serious bullet wound on the Romanian front a year later. At this point, the mystery began, for completely unaware of Allen Dulles' suspicions about Nuremberg's "Hess"—after all, they had not yet been written about!—Dr. Thomas then discovered something quite odd in "Hess'" medical file, written by Captain Ben Hurewitz, "Hess'" examining American doctor when he was first brought to Nuremberg after the war. What was missing from Hurewitz's otherwise meticulous report was any mention of scaring that would have resulted from the bullet wound Hess suffered while on the Romanian front.

In September of 1973, Thomas finally was able to see Hess in the British Military Hospital for a routine examination, when "Hess" was completely naked. "I looked in bewilderment," he writes.

> I saw at once the two small linear scars reported by Hurewitz, and also a small scar on one wrist; but apart from these marks there was no trace of any former wound. For an instant I froze in > disbelief. Then I put out a hand and held the dressing-gown, in the pretence of helping but in reality to have another, longer, absolutely clear view of his torso. Neither chest nor arms carried any wound-scars whatever. Satisfied with my scrutiny, I let the dressing-gown go and muttered something like "Es tut mir Leid' (I'm sorry). No. 7 probably thought I was just being clumsy in helping him on with the gown.

> For the rest of the evening I felt stunned. This man had not been shot in the chest during the First World War, or at any other time. Nor had he been wounded in the arm. Perhaps, I thought, there was a persistent mistake running all through his records. Perhaps Rudolf Hess never had been wounded... .[43]

Before "Hess" returned for a follow-up visit later that month, Thomas had time to review the X-rays that were taken of "Hess," and sure enough, there was no evident bullet scaring or damage to be seen on the picture. For Thomas, the conclusion was beginning to be inescapable: "For thirty-two years the world had believed he was Rudolf Hess. Yet now I knew that unless the historical records were wrong, he could not be".[44]

When "Hess" returned later that month for the follow-up visit, Thomas made certain he would be present throughout the entire examination. "Hess" was in a good mood, communicating with Thomas, "making pleasant small-talk in his excellent English".[45] X-rays were once again taken, and Thomas remained with "Hess" as the pictures were developed and examined. What happened next is worth recording in Thomas' own words:

> Then someone called out that the films were all right, and that No. 7 could get dressed. At once he slipped off his shirt—still sitting on the edge of the table—and began to pull on the warmer dressing-gown. As he did so, I again had a clear view of his chest. I stepped forward and pointed at it, saying in a friendly, straightforward voice, "Was ist passiert mit den Kriegsunfallen? Nicht hauttief?" ("What happened to your war-wounds? Not even skin-deep?").

> The question had a startling effect. The patient's manner changed instantly. From being in a sunny, cheerful mood, he turned chalk-white and began to shake. For an instant he stared at me in what appeared bewilderment or even utter disbelief. Then he looked down and avoided my eyes. After what felt like ages he muttered, "Zu spät, zu spät" ("Too late, too late").[4]

At this point, the reader is probably wondering why no other physician had noticed the discrepancy between "Hess'" World War One wounds and the lack of scarring on Prisoner No. 7. If "Hess" was a double, did this mean that all of his French, British, American, and Russian doctors, since Nuremberg were in on one of the greatest secrets of the century? Or did it mean something else entirely? And if "Hess" was a double, why was no attempt made to "duplicate" the scarring effects on the Doppelgänger? This could have easily been done under anesthetic.

Thomas began to dig, and discovered the original records of Hess' military service and wounds during World War One. This record lists his wounding by a piece of artillery shrapnel near Fort Douaumont, one of the French fortresses at Verdun, and scene of some of the bitterest combat during that battle. Here, Thomas discovered another anomaly, for the wound Hess suffered at Verdun was not, apparently, minor, for it required a full month in a military hospital, a stay of time representing a "substantial wound".[47]

But when he examined the war record for the wound to his left lung on the Romanian front in 1917, Thomas discovered just how serious the wound must have been for Hess had to spend four months, moving from military hospital to military hospital until he arrived back in Germany, but when he was finally discharged, he was discharged into the reserve, and spent two more months convalescing. Then, as further proof of the seriousness of the wound, Hess was discharged altogether from the infantry—reserve or otherwise—by being awarded the "Dull White Battle Wound Badge," effectively a sign that he could no longer physically function at the peak performance needed for the infantry.[48] In fact, while Hess maintained himself in as healthy condition as he could, for the rest of his life he would complain of shortness of breath on long walks, or climbing hills, a natural result of a serious wound to the lung.[49]

In any case, Hess needed surgery in order to repair the damage to this wound, and, as Thomas points out, this surgery itself would have left scarring, visible both on his skin and in chest x-rays, and the surgical repair additionally would have required incisions of at least four inches in length. None of these were visible on "Hess," or "Hess'" x-rays.[50]

This left Thomas with two logical possibilities: Spandau "Hess" (and therefore, Nuremberg "Hess") was not Hess, or his war record had been falsified.[51] Dr. Thomas naturally shared his suspicions with the Hess family, Frau Hess and her son Wolf, and while Frau Hess was under no doubt that the man in Spandau was her husband, she did confirm that he had indeed suffered a severe wound—a Lungen Durchshuss or "shot through the lung" that had left scars on the front and back of his body[52]—during the First World War.

2. Anomalous Corroborating Behavior and Other Miscellanies

Hess' war wounds—and "Hess'" apparent lack of them—formed the core of Thomas' argument that the prisoner in Spandau was a double. In addition to this, however, Thomas pointed out certain examples of anomalous behavior by "Hess" that made sense if his Doppelgänger hypothesis were true. For example, the real Hess was not only not a smoker, as we have pointed out previously, he was also a vegetarian. Yet, once he had been apprehended by the British in Scotland and taken prisoner, "Hess" the "vegetarian" was seen gobbling up salmon on one occasion with his British captors.[53] Additionally, Thomas notes that in 1969, when "Hess" finally allowed his family to visit him for the first time since he took off on his infamous flight to Scotland, his wife Isle made what, for her, was merely an "in passing" observation but which may be very significant, for she observed her husband's voice had become deeper.[54]

---

[50] Ibid., pp. 31-33.

[51] Ibid., p. 34.

[52] Ibid., 35.

Thomas comments as follows on this small, but important, observation:

> Whether she realized it or not, Frau Hess had stumbled on a physical near-impossibility. Any normal man's voice rises with age, rather than deepens. Physical processes associated with ageing inevitably push the timbre up rather than down. Only if the man has a disease of the vocal chords called myxedema, which causes a thickening of the tissues, can his voice drop in old age.[55]

One of the numerous problems with the Double Hypothesis was "Hess'" numerous letters home, which he began to compose while in confinement in England, and which naturally continued after his return to Germany at Nuremberg, and later, at Spandau. In these letters, "Hess" makes copious detailed references to things only known to his family. This fact, many would argue, means that "Hess" was in fact Hess.

But Dr. Thomas points out a disturbing pattern with these "letters home":

> At first sight the numerous references to family affairs and friends seem to constitute obvious proof that the writer of the letters was Hess himself. Yet if the correspondence is studied in chronological order, a striking pattern soon emerges. A very high proportion of the events and people mentioned occur first in earlier letters which the prisoner had received from Germany: almost everything he says about his former life is an echo of [53] W. Hugh Thomas, op. cit. p. 20.

---

[55] Ibid., pp. 172-173.

> something already written by another correspondent. It would take a computer analysis to work out precisely what proportion he himself initiated, but even without going into that amount of detail it is clear that his modest amount of original material could easily have been mastered by an intelligent double.
> The pattern becomes even more curious when considered in the light of his methods of receiving and answering mail. As several of the men who looked after him in Mytchett and Maindiff still testify, he showed absolutely no enthusiasm or emotion when a letter came from Frau Hess, but would often leave it lying about unopened for several days. When he did rouse himself to reply, he would spread out numerous earlier letters on a large table, together with many small scraps of paper on which he had made notes, and thus, furnished with several dozen reminders, he would write his answer.[56]

However, anomalous behavior is not the only type of corroboration of the Double Hypothesis.

While we have not yet examined Hess' flight to Scotland itself, where we will encounter still more messy details in the Hess Mess, it is worth noting that Hess, according to the standard narrative of the flight, used someone else's flight suit when he left Augsburg, Germany, in his twin-engine Messerschmitt 110. That flight suit belonged to Helmut Kaden, "who had written his name in full on the inside pocket. The suit worn by the man who came to Scotland bore no name at all (the garment is still in Spandau Gaol where I myself have inspected it)," Thomas maintained.[57] This, of course, is one of the key reasons that Thomas believed that Hess was killed, and the Doppelgänger substitution was made by the Nazis, long before "Hess" reached Scotland. Again, while this author does not subscribe to this particular aspect of Thomas' scenario, it must be mentioned because other researchers have very different explanations for what might have happened, manifesting once again that at every step and detail of the Hess Mess, several interpretations are possible.

Finally, Thomas points out a disturbing comparison between Rudolf Hess, the pilot, sitting in the cockpit of a Messerschmitt 110, and "Rudolf Hess" the potential double: the real Hess had a very real, and visible, gap between the upper incisor front teeth; "Nuremberg" Hess did not:

[56] W. Hugh Thomas, op. cit., pp. 136-137.

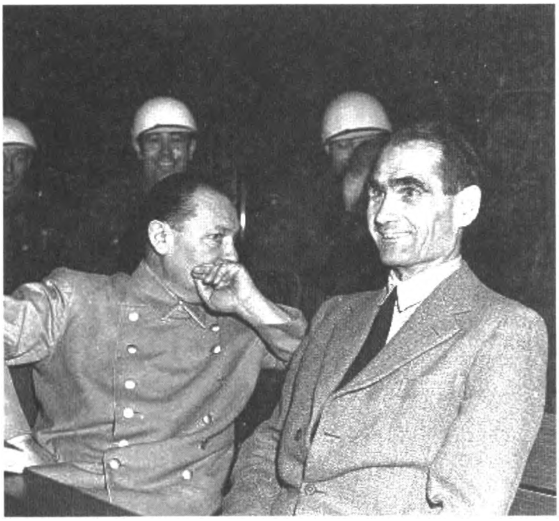
There were yet other behavioral anomalies noted by Thomas that when viewed in conjunction with all the other evidence of missing war wound scars, the wrong flight suit, and different dental characteristics, seemed to synch the case for a double that he was making. All of the psychiatrists knew the real Deputy Führer was not only a vegetarian, but, having been raised as an upper middle class German, had very fastidious eating habit" and impeccable table manners, the man in their captivity ate "enormous quantities of all kinds of indifferent food, including beef and chicken curry, at a positively alarming rate," the "Hess" in British captivity hardly had the table manners of:

> ...a strictly-brought-up German of the upper middle class. He sat slumped at meals with his elbows splayed out sideways on the table; he tore bread into great chunks, drained his soup by raising the plate to his lips, and shoveled solid food into his mouth like a boy racing for a second helping.[58]

Additionally, the "Hess" in British captivity did not know anything about tennis, whereas Hess himself, born in Alexandria, Egypt, grew up around the game, and according to Frau Hess herself, "played tennis well and with enthusiasm".[59]



A picture is worth a thousand words:
A goofily smiling Nuremberg "Hess" with a skeptical-looking Göring in the dock at Nuremberg. It is worth remembering that pre-flight pictures of Hess seldom show him smiling because of his overbite.

3. Picknett, Prince, and Prior Weigh in on the Doppelgänger Dilemma

As might be expected Thomas' theory of a Doppelgänger was not universally accepted. Certainly Frau Hess and Wolf-Rüdiger never accepted it, maintaining until their deaths that the man in Spandau was indeed their husband and father. Others, while accepting the theory, challenged Thomas' scenario that the double was substituted by the Nazis during "Hess'" flight to Scotland. This, as we shall see when we examine the flight itself, is problematic in the extreme.

---

[58] W. Hugh Thomas, op. cit., pp. 118-119.

Picknett, Prince, and Prior not only did not dismiss the Double Hypothesis, they uncovered new information and—pardoning the pun—doubled down on it. Acknowledging that the problem with any double theory is getting the double to accept Rudolf Hess' fate, they nonetheless accept that "Thomas is on to something. However, his theory is much less plausible when it comes to providing a motive for using a double, and when the substitution was made".[60]

Thomas claimed that Hess' original flight was to Sweden, but Göring, getting wind of the plot, ordered Hess shot down. At this point, the Nazis, who just happened to have a Hess double who was also a pilot (!), and who was also carrying his wife's Leica camera, as the real Hess most certainly was, waiting at Aalborg, Denmark, then had the double fly to Scotland. To "synch" this difficult scenario, Thomas points out that the British doctors examining Hess in Scotland make no mention of Hess' war wound to his left lung, though they did note some small "calcified area" in the "upper right zone," a detail that is, as we shall see, highly significant, and indicative that it was, indeed, the real Hess who abandoned his Messerschmitt 110 and parachuted into Scotland.[61]

The chief difficulties, beyond the obvious "logistical" requirements of Thomas' scenario, are to provide a motivation as to why Göring and Company would should Hess down, and why the British, once they knew they had a double on their hands, would play along with the Nazis in the farce from that point on. Indeed, one of the obvious puzzlements about the Hess Mess is the fact that on this one point—Hess himself—the Churchill and Hitler governments were entirely agreed on two points: prior to the flight, Hess was the third most powerful Nazi in Germany, a man of reason, of some education and culture and sophistication, the

"conscience" of the Nazi party; both British and German propaganda agreed. But after the flight, Hess was insane, stupid, and of no consequence, a complete reversal of public propaganda in a matter of mere days!

For Picknett, Prince, and Prior, and indeed for many other researchers who have concluded that, double or not, the Hess mission was about trying to negotiate a peace between Great Britain and Nazi Germany, the "lone madman narrative" was a convenient narrative to disguise the fact that elements of the British Royal family had been involved on the British side of his "peace mission" scheme.[62] That involvement, of course, adds a new element to the Hess Mess that makes it even more problematic: was, and is, is this the real reason that aspects of the affair remain classified to this day? We shall explore this question more completely in the next chapter, but for the present, it is worth noting that this royal involvement, at whatever level, is the reason most authors give for the continued cover-up.

a. The Actual War Wounds, and the Implication: The Real Hess Parachuted into Scotland

As was seen previously, Prisoner Number Seven, "Hess" had two autopsies performed on him, the first by J. Malcolm Cameron, and the second private autopsy arranged by Wolf Hess. Neither of these autopsies mentioned any scarring commensurate with Hess' World War One wound to his lung.[63] The only scaring visible and mentioned in both autopsies was a small scar over the heart, which resulted from a suicide attempt of "Hess" while in British custody and confinement at Maindiff Court, which, as Picknett, Prince, and Prior point out, only proves that the man in Maindiff and the man in Spandau were the same,[64] but it falls short—in the absence of a scar to the left lung—of proving that both were the real Hess.

Thomas' Doppelgänger theory spurred the British Foreign Office to "prove" that Spandau's Prisoner Number Seven was indeed Rudolf Hess. Or at least, in the estimation of Picknett, Prince, and

---

[62] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 296

[63] Ibid., p. 360.

[64] Ibid.

Prior, “they tried hard” to do so, for over a year after “Hess’” suspicious death in Spandau, the Foreign Office announced > ...that there was: ‘a fibrous, irregular roughly circular old scar typical of an exit wound... in a posterior position on the left side of the chest’.

But the “proof” was no proof at all, and raised even more unsettling questions:

> As this was over a year after Prisoner Number Seven’s death and burial, the ‘finding’ seems a trifle suspicious. Why hadn’t this information been provided when they had the body? And if this description is correct, why had no previous examination noticed the scar?
> Clearly, Hess’ medical records at the British Military Hospital where he had been treated for over twenty years did not record either the front or back scar. Either they were astonishingly inefficient, or the scars simply did not exist.

At this juncture, Picknett, Prince, and Prior point out that one glaring problem has dogged the “war wounds-Doppelgänger” argument from the outset, namely, prior to the actual discovery of Hess’ military record in Bavarian archives in 1989[65]—ten years after the appearance of Thomas’ book—no one knew exactly where the entrance and exit wounds really were, and hence no one really knew where to look.[66]

What was known of the wounds prior to this point were summaries from other files, and, of course, “Hess’” statements themselves. What the actual Bavarian records state, however, is that the bullet entered Hess in the upper left armpit, proceeded at an angle downward, grazing the top of his lung, and exiting under his shoulder blade.[67] This is a crucial point, for Wolf Rüdiger Hess informed them that after he had read Dr. Thomas’ book, he asked “Hess” about that bullet wound, to which his father replied that while he could not see the wound on his back, he could see the wound on his chest.[68] "It seems," they quip, "that not even 'Hess' himself knew where the scar was supposed to be".[69] Of course, this would be another argument that "Hess" was not Hess.

[65] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 358

[66] Ibid., p. 361. The discovery, of course, was used to discredit Thomas’ Doppelgänger theory but, if anything, seemed to make it even more certain.

[67] Ibid., p. 362.

But there is more.

Somehow Prisoner Number Seven was able to read a newspaper article about Thomas' book shortly after it came out, in spite of strict regulations at Spandau that absolutely nothing about Hess or Hitler could enter the prisoner's "reading list". When the French pastor visited Prisoner Number Seven after this, he was informed by "Hess" that "a bullet had passed right through his chest, brushing the heart and exiting under the left shoulder blade".[70] But once again, this only serves to raise the question once again of whether "Hess" was a Doppelgänger, because the path of the bullet, according to the Bavarian archival discovery in 1989, was not through the chest, but through the armpit, and did not graze the heart.

As if the Hess Mess could not absorb any more mystification, there is the matter of his British dental charts, one from September 1941 from "Hess'" stay at Mytchett Place, and the other, from April 1943 from Maindiff Court. While the "fillings and bridgework are similar, though not identical,"[71] a glaring problem emerges with the fact that the 1941 chart records a crown and a gold tooth which are missing from the 1943 chart. Such a discrepancy could be the result of mere sloppy record keeping, as Picknett, Prince, and Prior observe,[72] or it could be the result of very accurate recording-keeping, and hence, also be an oversight on the part of British intelligence which forgot to "scrub" this incriminating fact from the records. But in either case, as Picknett, Prince, and Prior aptly put it: "we find records that should demolish the doppelgänger theory do not".[73]

[69] Ibid. One can imagine—though Picknett, Prince, and Prior do not describe Wolfs reaction—how the knowledge of the real placement of his father's war wounds might have affected him, having learned to love a man who may not have been his father, and to fight for his release for years, to pay for private autopsies, and then to bury him with full Lutheran funeral services as a member of the family. I emphasize this aspect of the cruelty to highlight, in yet another way, the One Question at the heart of the Hess Mess.

b. The Secret Measurement of Hess for a Duplicate Uniform: Substitution and Assassination Theories

Not all the anomalous behavior that seemed to confirm that at some point after his arrival in Britain, one was dealing with a Doppelgänger, came entirely from "Hess". Some of it came from the British themselves, and of these episodes, none is more suggestive than the "affair of the second uniform".

When Hess parachuted into Scotland, he was quickly taken into custody, and from there, eventually wound up for a brief period in the Tower of London, before spending approximately two years in confinement at Mytchett Place, prior to being moved to Maindiff Court, where he spent the rest of his years in British captivity. We shall have more to say about these periods and places in due course, but for the moment, our focus is on the brief period when Hess was in the Tower of London, a period about which little is known.

The "suggestive" episode occurred when Charles Fraser-Smith, the man after whom the gadget-wizard character "Q" in the James Bond films is modeled, was contacted by MI5 to assemble textiles and tailors to make an exact copy of the Luftwaffe captain's uniform that Hess had donned for his infamous flight. Informed that Hess had been drugged in the tower and that they would have to measure him quickly, Fraser-Smith and his team took all the measurements. Besides being proof of the fact that Hess was drugged on more than one occasion, the question inevitably arises as to why British intelligence would need an exact copy of Hess' Luftwaffe uniform.[74]

Fraser-Smith himself speculated that the British intelligence services were possibly contemplating sending a double back to Nazi Germany to penetrate the Nazi high command, and who better to do this than a double of the Deputy Führer himself? For Picknett,

[73] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 366.

Prince, and Prior, this event also has another implication, namely, that the idea of substituting a double had already occurred to MI-5 and MI-6 shortly after Hess arrived.[75] In later life Fraser-Smith went further, maintaining that high level doubts always existed in MI-6 about whether or not the prisoner in British custody was, in fact, Hess. And as Picknett, Prince and Prior also note, a double would also explain why the British prohibition of photographs of their infamous prisoner was so rigorously enforced.[76]

There is, however, another possibility for why British intelligence was keen to create a Hess Double, namely, the threat of assassination attempts, either from the various governments-in-exile in Great Britain, or by the Nazis themselves. Additionally, the British may have wanted to convey the impression that Hess, or "Hess," was "cooperating". In this respect, Picknett, Prince and Prior record that while one Hess was in Mytchett Palace, another was retained in the Tower of London, and actually—and very secretly—taken to a meeting in Whitehall with none other than Churchill himself! And this was not apparently the only meeting between the two.[77]

One cannot discount the assassination possibility, for Picknett, Prince, and Prior also record the fact that the notorious SS General and "Reichprotektor" of Bohemia, Reinhard Heydrich, composed a memorandum to the Nazi Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop (who, let it be noted, would be seated with "Hess" in the dock at Nuremberg, along with Göring). In his report, Heydrich told Ribbentrop that his agents had informed him that Hess was being held in Scotland at a villa.[78] While this is not the place to investigate these Hess-in-Scotland reports nor their significance to Picknett's, Prince's and Prior's theory, it does attest to the fact that the Nazis were attempting to monitor his whereabouts.

Before we can review their scenario in more detail, however, we must now turn, finally, to address the matters of Hess' flight, the motivations for it, and his capture.

C. The Flight of Fancy and Hess' Capture

1. The Strange "Shoot Down" Order and Conveying the News of Hess' Flight to Hitler

a. The Hess Flight in Some Standard Histories

In standard histories of the Second World War, the May 10, 1941 flight of Deputy Führer Rudolf Hess to Great Britain is mentioned only cursorily, if at all. It is a curiosity, the insane mission of an insane man to stave off disaster for Germany and Europe. Yet, even in those brief accounts, one senses that something is amiss. For example, in Leonard Mosley's biography of Hermann Göring, The Reich Marshal, after briefly mentioning Hess' occult interests and membership in the Thule Society,[79] his role in the Beer Hall Putsch, subsequent flight to and return from Austria,[80] we are then informed that Hess had misgivings about Hitler's immanent invasion of the Soviet Union, Unternehmung Barbarossa, misgivings that, notes Mosley, the Reichsmarschall also apparently shared.[81]

For Hess, as we shall eventually discover, Barbarossa was indeed one of the motivations that impelled him to make his now infamous flight to negotiate a peace with Great Britain. But Hess' motivations were fundamentally military in nature; he was not so much opposed to Barbarossa, but to undertaking the risky strategy while Britain was still in the war, with the potentiality of an American entry into the war looming.

In the midst of this cursory treatment, we are informed that Luftwaffe General Adolf Galland, in command of the Luftwaffe's air defenses over Germany and Western Europe, was concerned about Barbarossa as well, and concerned that the only major Nazi leader who shared his misgivings was Rudolf Hess. After this revelation, Mosley continues:

> On May 10, 1941, Hess suddenly took off from Germany in a purloined Messerschmitt 110 and flew to England. A subsequent communiqué announced that "he harbored the illusion that he > could bring about peace between Germany and England by a personal intervention".

> Galland decided in his own mind that Hess had heard about the plan to invade Russia, and had made a desperate attempt to prevent the two-front war that would follow.[82]

The implication of all of this is that Hess' flight was a more-or-less spontaneous affair, ill-thought-out and sloppily planned, a desperation mission to prevent a desperate situation.

Then in a footnote, Mosley adds:

> Shortly after Hess' flight, Galland was ordered by Göring to put up his fighters and intercept the Deputy Führer. "The order I received was mad," said Galland. It was impossible to find a plane at that hour, as darkness was falling. "Just as a token, I ordered a takeoff. Each wing commander was to send up one or two planes. I did not tell them why. They must have thought I had gone off my head". Hess bailed out over Scotland and was made a prisoner-of-war. His peace overtures got nowhere.[83]

Implicit in this short treatment are three questions: (1) When did the Reichsmarschall become aware of Hess' flight, (2) How was he made aware of it, and (3) What was his motivation for the shoot-down order?

The last question assumes greater significance when we recall that Göring, according to Mosley, harbored the same misgivings about the wisdom of Barbarossa as did Hess: a two-front war was, with American entry a looming possibility, an extremely risky strategy. But if Britain exited the war, then an American entry, and ability to prosecute a war with Germany became equally problematical to America without the forward bases of deployment that Britain could provide.

In other words, why would Göring, always a practical military man, want to stop Hess and his peace mission, assuming he knew the purpose of Hess' flight?

As General Galland noted, Göring's order came too late for an interception to have much of a chance of success. Was Göring perhaps giving the order to cover his own involvement in a much larger plot? We shall return to this possibility much later.

One gains a few more suggestive details in John Toland's celebrated two volume biography of Hitler. There we are informed of the close relationship between Hess and the Haushofers, and Hess and Hitler, and the famous professor of geopolitics' visits to both men while they were serving time in Landsberg Prison for their roles in the Beer Hall Putsch. All of this, of course, is to stress Hess' membership in Adolf Hitler's inner circle.[84]

Again, we are informed of Hess' opposition to Barbarossa so long as England was in the war, but gone are the suggestions his flight was an entirely ad hoc spontaneous affair. Rather, we are informed not only of secret meetings between Hess and General Haushofer and his son Albrecht to discuss the feasibility of peace overtures to Great Britain,[85] but we are additionally informed that Hitler himself gave tacit approval for the idea, and that Albrecht Haushofer then utilized his pre-war contacts and friendship with the Duke of Hamilton to contact the Duke to propose a meeting between him and Hess.[86]

Toland then outlines how Hess had practiced flights in the twin-engine Messerschmitt 110, and persuaded the head of the company, Willi Messerschmitt himself, to add two 700 litre drop tanks to the wings and special radio equipment to the two-man cockpit. Additionally, we are informed that Hess obtained a very secret map of the Luftwaffe's air defense and forbidden flying zones from Hitler's personal pilot, Hans Baur.[87]

This anticipates the question that many readers by now have probably been asking: How is it that Hess took off from Augsburg in southern Germany in a fast twin-engine fighter on an unauthorized flight, then managed to evade German radar and air defenses—then state of the art—to fly to Great Britain where, again, he apparently was able to bail out before being shot down by the Royal Air Force in response to activating British air defenses, also state-of-the-art!

Answer, Hitler's pilot provided him with maps!

This fact, coupled with Göring's phone call to Galland, now raises the prospect that Hess had "assistance" in his flight—very covert assistance—from inside Hitler's highest command structure to a more definite possibility.

As for the flight itself, it is best to allow Toland to present it in his own words, for this version is more or less the version of the standard narrative, and hence the version that most people—insofar as they are aware of Hess' flight at all—have come to understand it:

> Hess rose early on the morning of May 10, a Saturday, and, upon learning that the weather forecast was good, he made arrangements for the flight. Never had he been more gallant to his wife. After tea he kissed her hand and then stood gravely at the door of the nursery, "with an air of one deep in thought and almost hesitating". She asked him when he was returning and, told it would be Monday at the latest, she bluntly said, "I cannot believe it. You will not come back as soon as that!" She guessed he was bound for a meeting with someone like Pétain but he feared that she had guessed the truth. He "turned hot and cold in turns" and, before she could say anything more, he dashed into the nursery to take a last look at their slumbering son.
> At 6 P.M., after giving his adjutant a letter for Hitler...

This is the letter, the reader will recall, that Nuremberg "Hess" recorded in his diary that Göring told him he should have written!

> ...Hess took off from the Augsburg airport and headed for the North Sea. Abruptly, contrary to the weather report, the cloud cover vanished and for a moment he thought of turning back. But he kept going and found England covered by a veil of mist. Seeking shelter, he dived down with full throttle, at first unaware that a Spitfire was on his tail. Outdistancing the pursuer, he hedgehopped over the dark countryside at more than 450 miles an hour, narrowly skimming trees and houses. Baur had always claimed Hess was the type of pilot who liked to fly through open hangar doors and it was in this barnstormer's spirit that he aimed at the mountain looming ahead. It was his guidepost and he literally climbed up the steep slope and slid down the other side, always keeping within a few yards of the ground. Just before 11 P.M. he turned east and picked out a > railway and small lake which he remembered were just south of the duke's residence. He climbed to 6000 feet, a safe height from which to parachute, and switched off the motor. He opened the hatch—then suddenly realized he had overlooked one step in his elaborate training: "I had never asked how to jump; I thought it was too simple!" As the ME-110 plummeted, he recalled a friend mentioning the plane should be on its back. After a half roll, he found himself upside down, held inside by centrifugal force. He began to see stars; just before passing out, he thought: "Soon the crash must come!" Regaining consciousness, he saw the speed gauge indicate zero. He flung himself out of the plane, pulled at the parachute ring. Fortunately, while unconscious, he had automatically brought the plane out of its semi-looping curve to finish almost perpendicular on its tail. And so, to his amazement, he found himself safely in mid-air.

> He hit the ground, stumbled forward and blacked out a second time. He was found by a farmer, marched off to the Home Guard and brought to a barracks in Glasgow. Insisting that he was one Oberleutnant Alfred Horn, he asked to see the Duke of Hamilton.[88]

And that, more or less, is the version everyone has come to believe (overlooking the fact that 450 miles per hour was beyond the actual top speed of a ME-110, especially at low altitude!).

But what about the letter he had given his adjutant prior to taking off from Augsburg? Toland notes that this was delivered to Hitler the following Sunday morning at his Berghof mansion on the Obersalzburg. Hitler was in conference when Martin Bormann's brother interrupted the meeting and informed Hitler that Hess' aide wanted to see the Führer. After some confusion, Hess' letter was delivered, and Hitler "put on his glasses and began to read indifferently but as soon as he saw the words 'My Führer, when you receive this letter I shall be in England', he dropped into a chair and shouted so loudly he could be heard downstairs, "Oh, my God, my God! He has flown to England!"[89] Hess added that he had kept the whole thing secret, because had he been forthcoming with his plan, Hitler "would have forbidden it," but that he was attempting to bring to pass an end to the war with England, which Hitler had never wanted. Then, closing, Hess stated "And if, my Führer, this project—which I admit has but very little chance of success—ends in failure and the fates decide against me, this can have no detrimental results either for you or for Germany; it will always be possible for you to deny all responsibility. Simply say I am crazy".[90]

[88] Toland, Volume II, pp. 759-760.

Hitler then became a frenzy of action, ordering his aids to phone Göring, and get Bormann and Ribbentrop to the Berghof, and immediately placed Hess' adjutant under arrest. At this juncture, Hitler inquired to Luftwaffe General Ernst Udet, present for the conference, whether or not a ME-110 could even reach Britain; Udet replied "No".[91] Again, this is a hint that something is amiss with the standard narrative, for very obviously, Hess' 110 did reach England, and Udet, as a Luftwaffe General, would have known that a one-way flight was at least possibility with drop tanks or even re-fueling.

For the rest of the day, according to the standard narrative once again, Hitler raged and fulminated, fearing that Hess' flight would be interpreted by Germany's Axis partners Italy and Japan that Germany was trying to procure a separate peace. Finally, after some debate—a debate which took place without the expert input of propaganda minister Goebbels—a communiqué was prepared that simply stated that Hess had commandeered an aircraft against orders, and that he was missing, and had presumably crashed. The communiqué also stated that a letter had been left behind showing "traces of a mental disturbance which justifies the fear that Hess was a victim of hallucination".[92]

This of course was a propaganda blunder of the first order, since it implied that one of Nazi Germany's top leaders was insane, and that the rest of the leadership had not detected it![93] Within a few hours of the German press statement, the British followed with one of their own, stating that Hess had come to Great Britain. Beyond this, there were no more details, but it did force the Germans to "update" their previous statement, and in the process, they made matters much worse. In a new release issued on Tuesday, September 13, 1941, they stated:

[90] Toland, Volume II, p. 761.

[93] Ibid., p. 763.

> As is well known in party circles, Hess had undergone severe physical suffering for some years. Recently he had sought relief to an increasing extent in various methods practiced by mesmerists and astrologers, etc. An attempt is also being made to determine to what extent these persons are responsible for bringing about the condition of mental distraction which led him to take this step...[94]

With that, the "standard narrative" comes to an end: Hess, via contacts to the Haushofers, flew to Britain to negotiate a peace for which, according to his own letter to Hitler, he held out little chance of success. He was denounced as insane by both the Nazi and later the Churchill governments, and remained to rot in confinement for the rest of his (many) days.

Except, in Toland's version it is suggested that Hitler gave the mission his tacit approval. Hence, his rage and fulminations on "learning" of the mission from Hess' letter was a bit of very convincing theater.

In this respect Toland mentions one more strange incident indicative, perhaps, that Hitler knew more about the Hess flight than he ever let on. During a meeting with a Frau Bruckmann to console her on the recent death of her husband, an unusual exchange occurred; Hitler's words were not those of a man raging against Hess:

> "We all have our graves and grow more and more lonely, but we have to overcome and go on living, my dear gracious lady! I, too, am now deprived of the only two human beings among all those around me to whom I have been truly and inwardly attached: Dr. Todt (builder of the Westwall and Autobahn) is dead and Hess has flown away from me!"
> "That is what you say now and to me," reportedly replied Frau Bruckmann, who had a reputation for frankness, "but what does your official press say? Year after year we all go to Bayreuth and are deeply moved, but who understands the real meaning? When our unhappy age at last produces a man who, like the Valkyrie, fulfills the deeper meaning of Wotan's command—seeks to carry out your most sacred wish with heroism and self-sacrifice—then he is described as insane!" She expected the Führer would retort

---

[94] Toland, Volume II, p. 762.

> sharply but he remained quiet and thoughtful. "Is it not enough, what I have said to you—and to you alone—about my real feeling?" he finally said. "Is that not enough for you?"[95]

This strange episode paints Hitler's response to the Hess flight in dramatically different colors than the usual narrative, for it suggests that in some deep way he never recovered from the personal loss, and that it affected the day-to-day governance of the Third Reich. This, as we shall come to see during our subsequent review of Hess' relationship to his secretary, Martin Bormann, may not be as odd as it initially sounds.

For the present, however, we must remain focused on Hess' flight, and its details.

I have employed these two standard and well-known biographies to highlight something very important in the "standard narrative," for not only is Hitler's emotional closeness to Hess on display, his own role and foreknowledge—even in that standard narrative!—is open to question and debate. Additionally, as we have seen, we have a clear indication that Reich Marshal Göring himself had some sort of prior foreknowledge.

W. Hugh Thomas zeros in on Göring's orders to Galland and fleshes out its bizarre nature even more. In his memoirs published in 1953, Galland, according to Thomas, reveals additional details that call Göring's role into sharp relief, for early in the evening of May 10, 1941, Galland received a telephone call from Göring,

> ...who sounded "very agitated" and ordered Galland to take off immediately with his entire wing. When Galland pointed out that there were no reports of any enemy aircraft flying in, Göring shouted, "Flying in? What do you mean by flying in? You're supposed to stop an aircraft flying out! The Deputy Führer has gone mad and is flying to England in an Me 110. He must be brought down".[96]

Note that according to Galland, Göring had specific information that Hess was flying a Messerschmitt 110, and that he had ordered

[95] Toland, Volume II, pp. 764-765.

[96] W. Hugh Thomas, op. cit., p. 47, emphasis added.

Galland to bring him down, in effect, ordering Galland to shoot down Hess.

But Thomas highlights just how bizarre this phone call really was, and the questions and implications that it raises:

> To Galland, it seemed that "someone had made a last-minute attempt to pull the emergency cord of a fast train speeding over the wrong points". He described the whole incident as "one of the most mysterious affairs" of the war. That seems to me an understatement. To be rung up suddenly by the Reichsmarschall commanding the air force and ordered to shoot down the Deputy Leader of the country must have been an astonishing experience, and Galland's published account of it is far from satisfactory. Yet when I tried to interview Galland to glean more information, it was made clear to me that my inquiries were not welcome.
> Göring's telephone call on the evening of May 10th, 1941, is in itself extremely suspicious. Next day, when summoned to Hitler's mountain headquarters, the Berghof, he pretended to know nothing about Hess' departure. Yet, according to Galland, he did know about it. Not only was he aware of Hess' flight on the evening of the 10th, he had positively ordered the Luftwaffe to shoot the Deputy Führer down. This alone argues the existence of a plot. How did Göring know that Hess was about to do a bunk? Who had told him? How long had he known? On whose orders, or with whose consent, did he command the Deputy Führer's assassination? So desperate an action would surely have needed the direct approval of Hitler himself. Yet Göring did not even tell the Führer what was happening, let alone seek his consent. And why, when Göring did call Galland, was he in such a panic? His haste suggests that he feared part of the plot had misfired.
> The timing of the telephone call also seems odd. Galland says it came only about ten minutes before dark. Yet on the north coast of Germany darkness did not fall until after nine p.m. that evening. By nine p.m. Hess—supposing he had carried straight on—would have been at least ninety minutes, or some 300 miles, beyond the coast, and far beyond the reach of any fighters based on the Continent. If Göring knew the time of Hess' take-off, he must have realized this. There would therefore have been no > point in telephoning just before dark. Could the call have come through much earlier than Galland relates?[97]

Indeed, could the call have come through much earlier, or did Göring in fact place the call when Galland says he did, but for very different reasons than Thomas surmises? Was Göring perhaps trying to cover his tracks by issuing an order to shoot down Hess when he already knew it would be impossible to do so*, in case his involvement in a plot with Hess should be discovered*?

In spite of the fact that Göring and Hess were rivals, there is enough to suggest this possibility might be true. In order to see this possibility, however, it is necessary to examine the flight itself.

2. The Flight Itself and Its Implications: British and German Air Defenses

The most recent detailed studies of the Hess Mess and the infamous flight at the center of it are Peter Padfield's Night Flight to Dungavel, and John Harris' and Richard Wilbourn's Rudolf Hess: A New Technical Analysis of the Hess Flight, May 1941. Padfield's book also has the advantage of being one of the few books that remembers that Rudolf Hess was actually a Nazi, and not simply a "martyr for peace" as revisionist literature often portrays him. The Harris-Wilbourn book has the advantage that it is one of the few books to subject Hess' Messerschmitt 110 to a thorough examination of its performance characteristics, and to subject the flight itself to careful analysis. Both books examine the problems posed by the British and German air defenses and the implications of those problems for collusion with Hess from high-ranking elements in both countries, and both books also offer widely divergent theories of the motivations for the flight. For the authors of both books, the Hess flight was not the spontaneous affair of "the lone madman". It was an international conspiracy of the highest order, involving powerful elements within both the United Kingdom and Nazi Germany.

a. The Strategic Positions of Britain and Germany in the Spring of 1941 and the Oft-Overlooked Factor: The Atomic Bomb

The Hess flight was motivated at least in part by the strategic position in which both Germany and Great Britain found themselves in early 1941. On the German side, on paper, everything looked good: Germany was master of Western Europe from the Pyrenees to the Norwegian Arctic. In Eastern Europe Germany and her allies Italy, Bulgaria, and Hungary had overrun pro-British Yugoslavia, and unceremoniously ejected British forces from Greece and Crete. Yet, as preparations for Operation Barbarossa moved forward, the Churchill government continued to woo America to enter the war. Sooner or later, Berlin knew this would happen. Time was on Britain's, and not Germany's, side.

On the British side of this equation, things looked no better, for the above reasons, and more besides. Britain simply was not strong enough to prosecute a successful war against Germany on its own.[98] The string of losses placed the Churchill government under severe pressure, for it had essentially two choices: it could hold out until American entry, thus virtually dooming the British Empire as the dominant world power and ensuring its replacement by the U.S.A., or it could preserve the Empire at the cost of a negotiated peace with Germany.[99]

Like many other researchers into the Hess Mess, however, John Harris and Richard Wilbourn, whose book Rudolf Hess, A New Technical Analysis of the Hess Flight, May 1941 we shall review in this section, point out yet a third problem faced by the Churchill government. The British Royal Family "were half German, and saw Germany as a natural ally, albeit preferably without Hitler as leader. They were certainly in the 'those with much to lose' camp".[100] In actuality, as we shall see, the Royal family were the tip of the iceberg of a pro-peace party in Britain, a party that had some representation in the British peerage, and in the various organs of government.

[98] John Harris and Richard Wilbourn, Rudolf Hess: A New Technical Analysis of the Hess Flight, May 1941 (Stroud, Glocestershire: The History Press, 2014), p. 33.

It is the existence of a peace faction both in Germany and in Great Britain that most researchers—including this author—believe was the ultimate context in which the Hess flight, and resulting Mess, occurred, as both sides covertly attempted to contact and negotiate. Harris and Wilbourn, however, suggest other motivating factors, including the Nazi A-bomb, and Hess' knowledge of it, for after all, as has already been discovered, up to the time of his flight virtually nothing was done in the Third Reich that Hess did not know about, Harris and Wilbourn suggest

> If the Germans believed that they were close, did this underpin Hitler's confidence in winning what was seen by many as an unwinnable war with Russia? We believe it significant that Hitler (and Hess) chose to play on this uncertainty. When Hitler attended the Reichstag on 4 May 1941, just six days before the Hess flight, he observed that '... the scourge of modern weapons of warfare, once they were brought into action, would inevitably ravage vast territories'.
> As will be described later, when Hess was in captivity, if he wanted attention, he too would speak of the bomb. He knew the British would want to know the reality of German nuclear production. Hess knew that there was no German nuclear bomb and he may have wondered if there ever would be. Did he know that Hitler was not holding any aces?[101]

However, as I argued in my very first book of "revisionist history" of the Nazi Period, Reich of the Black Sun: Nazi Secret Weapons and the Cold War Allied Legend, there is enough evidence to argue that the Nazis were much farther along in their atomic bomb project, perhaps even achieving tests of actual bombs in October of 1944, and then again in March of 1945.[102] As I also argued in that book, an actual existing atomic bomb project, one moreover achieving some success, does rationalize Hitler's confidence in his invasion plans for Russia, and also rationalizes his otherwise irrational and inexplicable decision to declare war on the USA as his armies were freezing before the gates of Moscow.[103]

[102] Joseph P. Farrell, Reich of the Black Sun: Nazi Secret Weapons and the Cold War Allied Legend (Kempton, Illinois: Adventures Unlimited Press, 2005), see pp. 18-20, 70-80 for the October 1944 test, and pp. 80-88 for the March 1945 test.

If these arguments are true, then Harris' and Wilbourn's observations, based as they are on that postwar Allied legend of German nuclear incompetence, changes color completely, for it adds additional military and political pressure on the Churchill government, and additional pressure on the British peace faction to come to an agreement. The atomic bomb, in other words, may be a key hidden factor to the Hess Mess that is seldom considered. Once one factors it in, however, the "negotiations" no longer have quite the aura of make-believe, and the air of desperation one senses on both the British and German sides finds additional grounding. Harris and Wilbourn also point out, quite correctly, that the British were monitoring German progress as closely as they could, monitoring that eventually led to the commando attack on the Norsk heavy water plant in Norway.[104]

As I point out in Reich of the Black Sun, there is a consideration that makes this atomic bomb context for the Hess Mess quite plausible, for in October of 1944, at approximately the same time as the first alleged Nazi nuclear test in the Baltic, the British government secretly placed its entire constabulary and emergency fire and medical services in the country on secret high alert. The reason? They had intelligence of a possible German atomic bomb attack.[105]

The atom-bomb relationship to the Hess flight is not without its own contextual corroboration, for Hess was also the Commissar of All Technological Matters and Organization within the Third Reich, and thus, he knew more than almost anyone at that time the full extent of the Third Reich's black projects world.[106] This important post will, as we shall see, bear important implications when we consider little-known aspects of the Hess Mess.

These considerations are important for two reasons; Harris and Wilbourn suggest that Hess' arrival was the last thing that Churchill wanted, since it put the Prime Minister and his government in a very awkward position, for it made it look like he could be double-dealing the USA, on the one hand trying to woo an American entry into the war, and on the other, covertly negotiating a peace with Nazi Germany. Churchill, in other words, was placed in exactly the same position vis-à-vis his potential allies by the Hess flight as Germany was placed vis-à-vis its allies, Italy and Japan. The fear was that the flight would give new strength to yet another "peace faction," the American isolationists.[107]

(1) A Speculation on the "Lure" Hypothesis

Harris and Wilbourn point out that the contemporary American reaction to the Hess flight was summed up by two magazine articles, one in Liberty magazine from July 1941, and the other in an article in 1943 in American Mercury. Both articles maintained that Hess was lured to Great Britain by British intelligence,[108] the implication being that there was no "peace party" nor realistic hope that a negotiated peace with the Churchill government was possible.

One difficulty with the "Lure" hypothesis often pointed out by investigators of the Hess Mess is that if Hess was lured to Great Britain, why did Britain not seek to capitalize on the propaganda value of his capture much more than it did? If anything, the British reaction was inexplicably muted and low-key. It is my suspicion, however, that the "Lure" hypothesis itself is as much a fiction, or, as we would call it today, a "spinning" of the event, a legend created to reassure America that Britain was not double-dealing and to extricate the Churchill government from the diplomatic difficulty caused by the Hess flight.

(2) Churchill's 1942 Address to the House of Commons: Conspiracy Confirmed

By 1942, the USA had, of course, entered World War Two with the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, and Hitler's declaration of war on the USA two days after the attack. Buoyed by the new alliance with the USA and the Soviet Union, Churchill at last answered a question about Hess on the floor of the House of Commons. This crucial exchange is a pivotal feature of Harris' and Wilbourn's argument, and hence, we reproduce it in full:

> The Prime Minister: Surely the (honourable) Gentleman is not the man to be frightened of a Whip? The House of Commons, which is at present the most powerful representative Assembly in the world, must also—I am sure, will also—bear in mind the effect produced abroad by all its proceeding. We have also to remember how oddly foreigners view our country and its way of doing things. When Rudolf Hess flew over here some months ago he firmly believed that he had only to gain access to certain circles in this country for what he described as 'the Churchill clique'.
> Mr. Thorne (Plaistow): Where is he now?
> The Prime Minister: Where he ought to be—to be thrown out of power and for a Government to be set up with which Hitler could negotiate a magnanimous peace. The only importance attaching to the opinions of Hess is the fact that he was fresh from the atmosphere of Hitler's intimate table. But, sir, I can assure you that since I have been back in this country I have had anxious inquiries from a dozen countries, and reports of enemy propaganda in a score of countries; all turning upon the point whether His Majesty's present Government is to be dismissed from power or not".[109]

Harris and Wilbourn quite correctly point out that this speech—more revealing than Mr. Churchill perhaps cared to admit—is "the beginning of the conundrum" for he is clearly revealing the motivation of the Hess Hight, namely, "to gain access to the certain circles that could remove Churchill and his government from power".[110]

3. "Sealing the Deal":

a. Harris and Wilbourn's Examination of the British Constitution

As this juncture, Harris and Wilbourn supply a nuance to their version of the Hess Mess that is worth very careful consideration, for they point out the obvious fact—known to all Hess Mess researchers—that by the time of his flight to Scotland, several contacts had already been made been made between the German and British "peace parties," and that several discussions had already secretly taken place, in Sweden, Switzerland, and Spain. From this obvious fact, however, comes a stunning thesis: "Hess was not flying to add to the detail—that had already been agreed. He was flying in to seal the deal and his arrival was to demonstrate his commitment—at the highest level".[111] Like other researchers, they also believe that Hess' selection of Scotland rather than England as the ultimate destination was precisely because of these prior covert contacts between Hess and the German "peace party" and the Duke of Hamilton, Scotland's highest ranking peer, who, as such, could provide Hess with entre to the Royal Family.[112]

Did this have any chance of success?

Indeed it did, and the reason lies in the British Constitution itself, which Harris and Wilbourn take great pains to explicate, for their thesis that Hess came not for further discussion and negotiation but rather to "seal the deal" rests upon a close and tightly-argued examination of that constitution. This is, indeed, one of the most brilliant parts of their book, which is filled with many brilliant observations and arguments. The British Constitution, as most people are aware, is not a "written document," but rather has evolved from various covenants, conventions, precedents and courses of performance over time. One of these "courses of performance" well-established in British constitutional practice is that the Monarch "should act upon ministerial advice".[103] This precedent, however, has been a very moot point of discussion and debate, as one may imagine, and there were and are cases in recent British history where the Monarch acted independently from the ministerial advice of his or her own government, and actually created British policy.

[111] Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit., p. 22, emphasis added.

In this regard they cite perhaps the most famous case of all: King Edward VII, Queen Victoria's son, who in 1903 made his famous trip to Paris, beginning the British diplomatic offensive that turned France—long a continental nemesis—into a British ally. This initiative was almost wholly Edward VII's, made after quiet discussion with various key members of the British peerage. Other examples were the threat of a Monarchical veto during the parliamentary debates over Irish home rule in the years immediately prior to World War One, and finally, the role of the Monarchy in placing Stanley Baldwin into the premiership in 1923.[114]

More importantly, however, there are "the 'reserve powers the sovereign has accumulated over the years. They are rarely used and, indeed, only ever considered in times of constitutional crisis".[115] These reserved powers of the Crown ultimately stem from the 1688 settlement during the era of the "Glorious Revolution," and as part of the common law do not become "extinct merely through lack of use".[116] Harris and Wilbourn expand on the nature of these powers and their relationship to the Hess Mess as follows:

> Amongst others, the powers included the appointment and dismissal of ministers; the summoning, prorogation and dissolution of Parliament; royal assent to bills; the appointment and regulation of the civil service; the commissioning of officers in the armed forces; and directing the disposition of the armed forces in the UK. In foreign policy: the making of treaties; declaration of war; deployment of armed forces overseas; recognition of foreign states; and the accreditation and reception of their diplomats. So in a time of constitutional crisis, the King or Queen could, in theory, act virtually independently of the government of the day.

[114] Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit., p. 35.

[115] Ibid., emphasis added.

> This is the reason that Hess was obtaining books on the British Constitution in April 1941. He could request the monarch to invoke royal prerogative, dismiss the prime minister and, presumably, appoint in his place a prime minister who would act in accordance with the King's wish—to make a peace treaty with Germany.[117]

Harris and Wilbourn, on this basis, then argue that these constitutional considerations form the context from which Hess' motivations must be interpreted, for he was not trying to negotiate with the Duke of Hamilton, or, for that matter, any other peer, but rather, because peers had right of access to the Monarch, was attempting to use that connection to be introduced to King George VI, whom he hoped would invoke this constitutional process, and dismiss "the Churchill clique".[118] The conclusion that they draw from this is that, contrary to popular views, Hess was "quite able" under the British constitution to achieve an overthrow of the British government of Winston Churchill.[119] It was to be, in effect, another "Churchill-Halifax moment," for after all, it was George VI who made the decision to appoint Churchill using precisely the royal prerogative, and not Lord Halifax, to the premiership in May of 1940.[120]

[117] Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit., p. 35, all emphases added. Harris and Wilbourn point out that this enumeration of the reserve Crown powers and prerogative were the result of a study commissioned by the Blair Labour Government of 2003.

[118] Ibid., p. 36. They point out that the right of peers to access to the monarch is a principle acknowledged by Blackstone, the famous Oxford scholar of British jurisprudence. See p. 37.

[119] Ibid., p. 38.

[120] It should be noted that, in that instance, George VI did heed the "ministerial advice" of the then exiting Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain, who advised the King to choose Churchill over Halifax. In what is a strange irony, however, Churchill was also sympathetic to the previous King, Edward VIII, who was pressured to abdicate the throne in favor of his brother over his desire to marry the American divorcee, Wallis Simpson, which, eventually, he did. Edward VIII was, in turn, also known for his sympathies with the Nazi regime, and after his abdication, as Duke of Windsor, he and his new wife actually met and dined with the Hesses in Munich!

b. The Haushofer Letters: The German Side: No Peace with Churchill; The British Side: No Peace with Hitler

As we have already seen, the Deputy Führer had a close relationship with General Karl Haushofer and his son Albrecht, under whose tutelage Hess then mediated their geopolitical ideas to Hitler. It was the Haushofer-Hess peace faction in Germany that carried on the secretive discussions with the British peace faction via the Haushofers' extensive network of connections to it. In the preparations for Hess' flight, the "peace mission" was extensively discussed between the three men in a series of private and personal letters and memoranda. These documents form the core, in virtually all Hess Mess research, of the "Peace Plan Hypothesis" of the Hess flight.

In a September 3, 1940 letter to his son Albrecht, General Haushofer recounts a meeting that he had just had with Hess, revealing that severe attacks against Britain were planned and that "the highest ranking person only has to press a button to set it off". He and Hess—who is referred to throughout the Haushofer correspondences by the Japanese codename "Tomo"—had discussed the prospects of a negotiated peace, using Portuguese national celebrations as an occasion to meet on neutral ground with high-ranking British counterparts. The General reveals that he has heard from an old British friend, one Mrs. Violet Roberts, via the British war postage service in Lisbon, and that they should attempt to use her to communicate with the Duke of Hamilton. This letter is apparently in response to previous efforts by Albrecht, as his father is indicating to him to proceed to make contact, and gives him her address via the Lisbon address she had provided in her letter. [121]

Hess himself wrote General Haushofer on September 10, 1940. In the letter, Hess urges that the contact between Albrecht and his "old friend," i.e., the Duke of Hamilton, be initiated via Mrs. Roberts, and to inquire if he would be willing to meet on neutral territory, presumably Lisbon, which both the British and Germans could easily get to. Hess then writes something very peculiar:

[121] Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit., pp. 43-44.

> The prerequisite naturally was that the inquiry in question and the reply would not go through official channels, for you would not in any case want to cause your friends over there any trouble.
> It would be best to have the letter to the old lady with whom you are acquainted delivered through a confidential agent of the AO[122] to the address that is known to you. For this purpose Albrecht would have to speak either with Bohle or my brother. At the same time the lady would have to be given the address of this agent in L.[123] or if the latter does not live there permanently, to which the reply can in turn be delivered.
> As for the neutral, I have in mind; I would like to speak to you face-to-face about it for some time. There is no hurry about this since, in any case, there would first have to be a reply received here from over there.[124]

What emerges from this letter is that Hess and the Haushofers had been engaged in these covert discussions for some time, but much more importantly, Hess is attempting to avoid "official channels," and his reason is that he wishes to avoid compromising the Haushofers' British contacts.

However, the question that has constantly hovered over the Hess Mess is how much—if anything—did Hitler know of the flight. Clearly, someone in the Nazi hierarchy knew about it, for we have already encountered the fact that Göring knew about it, ordered General Galland to shoot him down, and then, a day later in front of Hitler, claimed no knowledge at all! Consequently, the question arises, was Hess also trying to avoid German official channels as well, by recommending that Albrecht use not the German diplomatic service in the Foreign Ministry, but rather, the party apparatus of the Auslands Organization? If so, why?

My speculative thesis is that Hitler was kept in the loop to a certain extent, but not entirely, for reasons that we shall disclose momentarily, for there is something known to Göring, which he is attempting to keep from Hitler, by feigning ignorance of Hess' flight. In all likelihood, whatever Göring knew, Hess knew.

---

[122] AO, i.e., the Auslands Organization, the Nazi Party's own overseas intelligence service, which Hess, of course, commanded.

[125] "L"., i.e., presumably Lisbon.

[124] Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit., p. 45, emphasis added.

In this respect, it is worth noting that Albrecht Haushofer suspected that there was something amiss with Hess' request not to use official channels, for on September 15 he writes a comprehensive memo in Berlin on the prospects of peace negotiations with the British. At the very beginning of this comprehensive memorandum, he states that it is a memorialization of the points he had discussed with Hess during a meeting in Bad Godesberg that Hess had ordered him to attend. Albrecht Haushofer states that he "had the opportunity to speak in all frankness".[125] In this memorandum, which Albrecht had probably drawn up for his father, he makes it clear that:

> ...all Englishmen who mattered, regarded a treaty signed by the Führer as a worthless scrap of paper. To the question as to why this was so, I referred to the 10-year term of our Polish Treaty, to the Non-Aggression Pact with Denmark signed only a year ago, to the "final" frontier demarcation of Munich. What guarantee did England have that a new treaty would not be broken again at once if it suited us? It must be realized that, even in the Anglo-Saxon world, the Führer was regarded as Satan's representative on earth and had to be fought.
> If the worst came to the worst, the English would rather transfer their whole Empire bit by bit to the Americans than sign a peace that left to National Socialist Germany the mastery of Europe.

Albrecht Haushofer continued to observe that the only genuine solution to European peace and security was a European federation, and a "fusion" between Germany and Britain with a joint navy and air force, with joint defense of all territories, a fusion that "the English are now about to conclude with the United States".[127]

Note firstly that Albrecht is not talking about an alliance of the UK and USA, but of fusion, the old goal of Cecil Rhodes.[128] If true, then it provides yet another motivation for Hess' flight, for such a "fusion" had to be prevented at all costs, and in spite of any chances of the success of a "peace mission," the risks of not doing so were far higher. As we shall see, there is in fact evidence that something along these lines might indeed have been being discussed at the highest levels. Hess' mission, as we have seen previously, put the Churchill government into the dubious diplomatic position of looking like it was double dealing, and thus, merely by landing in Great Britain, regardless of the success of the other parts of his mission, Hess may have forestalled and collapsed these plans. The USA would not and could not negotiate such a fusion if there was the remotest hint of double dealing.

[128] In this respect, see the celebrated book by Dr. Carroll Quigley, The Anglo-American Establishment (New York: Books in Focus, Inc., 1981), pp. 33-101.

However, note secondly that according to his memorandum, Albrecht Haushofer was very frank and blunt with Hess, clearly implying to him that there was very little possibility of a negotiated peace with Hitler. He then nevertheless continues by recommending to Hess that approaches could possibly be made through the British ambassador to Hungary, O'Malley, or through Sir Samuel Hoare, the British ambassador in Madrid.[129] Then, toward the very end of the memorandum, Albrecht discloses something quite unusual, requiring rather close parsing of his words:

> For this extremely ticklish case and in the event that I might possibly have to make a trip alone—I asked for very precise directives from the highest authority.

Before proceeding to the very next sentence in the memorandum, pause and consider the possible implications of this statement, for Hess' request not to use "official channels" might have alerted Albrecht that something was amiss, and that, perhaps, the meeting he was attending with Hess was not with Hitler's, or perhaps, other high-ranking Nazis', knowledge. If one suspected this, then someone in Albrecht's position, being involved in such high-level and covert discussions, would then do what he did: he would seek to cover or guarantee his safety by having definite written orders "from the highest authority," namely, Hitler himself. Why ask for such directives unless there was a suspicion that not everything was entirely "right" about the situation?

---

But then, in the very next sentence, there is this statement:

> From the whole conversation I had the strong impression that it was not conducted without the prior knowledge of the Führer, and that I probably would not hear any more about the matter unless a new understanding had been reached between him and his Deputy.[130]

At first glance, these two statements appear somewhat contradictory, but there is a possible resolution to the situation, namely, that Hitler was generally aware of the meeting between his Deputy and Albrecht Haushofer, and of the purposes of that meeting, but not the precise details. In other words, Albrecht may have suspected that Hitler knew of the meeting, but he may also have suspected that Hess may not have informed him of the full details of the discussion and that Hess was holding something back, for whatever reason. Hence, he requests specific instructions.

Albrecht was taking no chances.

In any case, a return letter from Albrecht to Mrs. Roberts for forwarding to the Duke of Hamilton was apparently carefully composed and then sent. Why was Mrs. Roberts the involved? Because the Roberts and Haushofers met during visits to England by the Haushofers as part of Kaiser Wilhelm's entourage (1903), and during the Roberts' visits to the Haushofers in Germany (1925 and 1926).[131] This letter from Albrecht Haushofer, via Mrs. Roberts, to the Duke of Hamilton was duly intercepted by British intelligence, which was now alerted to the fact that covert discussions were being attempted.[132]

Albrecht Haushofer had good reasons for his skepticism about a peace settlement with Hitler in power, for the Hess initiative was not the only peace feelers being sent out. In fact, many levels of the Nazi regime were involved, all of them leading back to Hitler himself, who repeatedly indicated that Germany and Britain were not natural enemies, an idea that he had, of course, absorbed from Karl Haushofer via his influence on his own Deputy, Hess, who had inserted Haushofer's ideas almost whole cloth into Mein Kampf. One such attempt was made via the Swiss diplomat Carl Burckhardt, the head of the International Red Cross. Buckhardt attempted to convey such peace feelers to Britain on July 9, 1940, via a telegram which was the subject of a meeting at Downing Street at which Churchill, Chamberlain, Clement Attlee, Lord Halifax and others were present.[133] The British legation in Switzerland stated that it had responded to Burckhardt's feelers by stating that "our distrust of Hitler, apart from anything else, was a fatal obstacle to any peace".[134] This pattern was repeated again when Burckhardt met with a Finnish art dealer, Lars Borenius, a businessman with connections both to the Royal Family and with MI-6.[135] Borenius apparently conveyed a message to Burckhardt that Germany would have to vacate Holland and Belgium, restore "some kind of Poland," and, most of all, that no peace was possible with Hitler.

[130] Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit., p. 48

Thus, the by-now familiar pattern is repeated again: no peace is possible with Hitler. Notably absent, however, is any reference to peace with Germany. In the ways of diplomacy, precision is required both in what is said, and what is not said, and by this point, the message was increasingly clear: "We'll talk, but not with Hitler". On the German side, the response to this was the exact opposite.

On May 4, 1941, Hitler and Hess had their last face to face meeting in Berlin, which lasted some time, before Hitler was scheduled to speak to the Reichstag. At some juncture, General Haushofer, who was also in Berlin at the same time, telephoned Hitler. It is likely that both Hess and Haushofer were in Berlin in connection with Hess' impending flight, for Hitler allegedly made substantial changes in the text of his speech. Harris and Wilbourn observe that the speech was a long, direct, and personal attack and harangue on Churchill. Because of this, they suggest that it was a speech that was designed to send messages to the British peace faction to remove the Churchill government.[136]

[133] Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit., p. 71.

[134] Ibid., p. 72, see also Harris' and Wilbourn's remarks on p. 73.

For the German side, it was "get rid of Churchill," and for the British it was "get rid of Hitler".

The conclusion: no peace was possible with either government, and thus, if there was to be a negotiated peace, both governments would have to go. Consequently, yet another possibility arises in the Hess Mess, namely, that his flight was not simply to "seal a peace deal" but that, in order to seal that deal, it was also a component in a wider scheme to overthrow both governments in internationally and bilaterally coordinated coups d'etat. This, as we shall see subsequently, is not as crazy as it sounds.

(1) The 1938 Army Plot and the 1939 Göring-Dahlerus Peace Effort

Before we can look at that possibility in more detail, it is necessary to put the Hess peace mission into an even wider context, for if there was an element of a potential coup d'etat involved in the mix, then this could not occur without strong support; Hess could not undertake it on his own. In this respect it is worth recalling the "Generals' Plot" that was brewing in the German Army during the 1938 crisis over the Sudetenland. Hitler, as is now known, desperately wanted to launch a war against Czechoslovakia, a war that would inevitably not only have involved the powerful Czech military, but potentially France, Britain, and even Poland and the Soviet Union. Russia had in fact extended a guarantee to Czechoslovakia similar in nature to the guarantee that France and Britain would extend to Poland a year later. Faced with the prospects of a war which Hitler was determined to launch, the General Staff had determined to overthrow Hitler and place the military in control of the government, arresting other major Nazi leaders. The plot failed, of course, because of Neville Chamberlain's diplomacy, and the subsequent "Munich Agreement" of 1938 between Germany, France, and Britain, which surrendered the Sudetenland to Germany, effectively stripping Czechoslovakia of its frontier defenses and leaving it easy prey to its eventual complete occupation. With war averted, and Hitler's popularity at an all-time high, the military did not dare to move against Hitler, and the Generals' Plot collapsed.

What is not well-known, however, was that Hermann Göring himself, the very next year, in August of 1939, as war was immanent with Poland and the West, sponsored a secret three-day conference on the small German island of Sylt in the North Sea with British businessmen. This conference came after initial feelers between Göring and Lord Halifax conducted by Göring's emissary, the Swedish businessman Birger Dahlerus.[137] At this secret island conference, the British made clear that the guarantee to Poland was firm, but they also proposed another Munich-style conference between the leaders of France, Germany, Italy, and Britain to resolve the Polish corridor-Danzig problems and avert war. Poland, like Czechoslovakia, was not, apparently, to be invited to its own dismemberment. One effect of these Göring-initiated contacts, however, was that the British businessmen—along with Lord Halifax himself—were persuaded of Göring's trustworthiness and straight talk. "From the British side," writes Peter Padfield, "it confirmed Göring as the acceptable face of the Nazi leadership. These impressions would persist".[138]

This is potentially highly significant, for it would place Göring himself in the "peace faction" inside of Germany, and with the means and contacts to pursue it. In other words, from 1939 to 1941, the two highest ranking Nazis after Hitler himself were both involved in peace initiatives with the British, Göring, as Hitler's designated successor in the offices of state, and Hess, as Hitler's designated successor in the offices of the Nazi Party. If indeed Hess' mission was a part of a wider international effort to coordinate coups d'etat against both Hitler's and Churchill's governments, then who better to guarantee the success of such a scheme—at least on the German side—than the two most powerful men in the Nazi state and Party?

With respect to the "coup" possibility it is worth noting that Padfield maintains that in July, 1940, after the Fall of France,

[137] Göring, it will be recalled, went to Sweden after World War One where he was, in effect, a barnstormer pilot, and then returned there after the failure of the Beer Hall Putsch, and married his first wife, a Swede from high Swedish society.

[138] Padfield. op. cit., pp. 52-53.

Reichsmarschall Göring[139] extended an extensive peace feeler to the British embassy in Stockholm via his nephew by marriage, Carl-Gustav von Rosen. While simultaneously other peace feelers were being sent via Dublin, Lisbon, Washington and Berne,[140] the one from Stockholm from Göring himself was apparently not committed to paper because of the Reichsmarschall's reluctance to do so.[141] According to Padfield, the offer was standard fare: Germany was to be allowed a "free hand in Europe" in return for a cessation of hostilities, and a "helping hand" for Britain to defend itself against Japan.

However, this raises the question of why Göring should be reluctant to commit anything to paper. One explanation was, of course, that he was acting ex officio as a back-channel diplomatic effort, by-passing the Foreign Ministry. Hence, to protect Germany from possible embarrassment should anything be leaked, nothing was committed to paper. But another explanation would be that perhaps Göring had communicated more than just the "standard fare," namely, an acknowledgement of some sort that the British would not negotiate with Hitler.

4. The Aircraft: Messerschmitt Bf 110

a. The Fuel Tanks and Drop Tanks

Few analyses of the Hess Mess have dealt with the details of the actual flight itself, with most accounts stressing the basic outline of events: the Deputy Führer's take off from Augsburg Saturday evening, May 10, his flight northward over the Rhineland and thence out over the Frisian coast and into the North Sea, his subsequent turn westward, his "nose dive" to low altitude to confuse British radar, his full-throttle dash across the Scottish landscape, and finally, with fuel running low and darkness approaching and his failure to find his alleged landing place, his desperate parachuting into the nighttime Scottish landscape, where he was caught by a local farmer doing last-minute chores on his land. This is for all intents and purposes the "standard narrative," and with it the other component of the standard narrative, that Hess acted more or less alone, with a minimum of help extending no further than his own personal adjutants.

---

[139] Prior to the Fall of France Göring's Luftwaffe rank had been Field Marshal.

[140] Padfield, op. cit., p. 86.

It is this gap that the study of John Harris and Richard Wilbourn's book is meant to fill, for as they demonstrate, a technical analysis of the flight reveals that Hess could no more have attempted such a flight without significant amounts of high-level help and collusion both on the German and on the British sides, than the 9/11 hijackers could have successfully accomplished their airplane operations six decades later without significant "inside help". It most definitely could not have been, nor was it, a "solo effort," for the very simple reason that it was "extremely well planned, as it needed to be, and required considerable input from various German agencies if it was to succeed. This input alone raises obvious questions as to the level of German involvement".[142] Their argument focuses on the actual performance characteristics of Hess' Messerschmitt 110 twin-engine fighter, Hess' captured maps, and the details of the German air defense and air-guidance beacon system in 1941.

With respect to the aircraft, the Me 110 itself, the formula was quite simple: fuel consumption, plus average cruising speed, plus time, plus available fuel equals "what was possible".[143] In this respect, identification of the exact type of Me 110 became crucial, for the engines, speed, and fuel consumption differed among various types depending on the engines fitted. In the case of Hess' aircraft, through careful consideration of serial numbers of production runs and the serial number on Hess' crashed aircraft, Harris and Wilbourn were able to identify the production run as belonging to the 110E-2/N series.[144]

It is well-known that Hess had contacted Willi Messerschmitt himself to request specific modifications to his aircraft, among them the fitting of drop tanks beneath the wings for extra fuel, a common World War Two practice to extend the operational range of aircraft, as well as modifications to the radio equipment, which was placed in the rear cockpit of what normally was a two-seater aircraft. With the largest possible drop tanks of 900 litres each, the 110's operational cruising range could support up to eight hours of flight at cruising speed, and since Hess himself described his flight as being of five hours and twenty-four minutes' duration to his British captors in 1942, the flight, with this modification, was possible.

b. The Oil Tanks

Fuel and drop tanks were not the only technical factors to be evaluated, however. The Messerschmitt 110, as a high-performance high-speed fighter—indeed, at that time one of the fastest in the world—consumed massive amounts of oil to lubricate and cool its engines. While the aircraft could be fitted with auxiliary external oil tanks, the remains of Hess' aircraft in Britain had no such fittings. Relying only on the internal oil tank, Harris and Wilbourn, based on the Messerschmitt firm's own performance documents, conclude that Hess would only have had enough oil for a flight of approximately four and two-thirds hours' duration before the engines would have seized, sending Hess crashing into the North Sea.[145] This discovery is, as Harris and Wilbourn point out, "one of the most significant in respect of the Hess flight for the past seventy years. Its implication is stark—Hess could not have flown for as long as he claimed; he may well have had enough fuel, but he did not have enough oil".[146] Accordingly, they conclude that Hess had to have landed in Germany at some point during his flight to replenish the oil tank for the remainder of the flight. That of course means that there had to be other people involved in his flight than just his personal adjutants at Augsberg.

[145] Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit., pp. 114-115.

By careful consideration of the flight plan maps, which we shall review more completely in the next section, Harris and Wilbourn come to a conclusion that this author finds enormously suggestive and pregnant with implications, and here it is best to cite their own stunning conclusion; they state that given the extraordinary secrecy surrounding the flight, and based on the maps, Gottingen emerged as a high probable contender for the place of Hess' stop to replenish his oil tanks. Why Gottingen? Because Gottingen "was then the research site for the Horten brothers, who were pursuing their revolutionary 'flying wing' designs. We are aware that Hess was known to them and so this would seem to he a sensible choice".[147] The implications of this discovery are indeed profound, for it suggests that Hess made use of the Third Reich's existing secret black projects research infrastructure in order to accomplish this mission, in this case, the Luftwaffe's black projects infrastructure, with which as Deputy Führer he was doubtless aware. It is this possibility that may also inform why, and how, Göring was aware of the mission and perhaps involved with it, since these projects would also clearly be known to him.

c. The Maps, Flight Plans, and Their Implications

Harris and Wilbourn next turn to a detailed and thorough examination of the so-called Lennoxlove Map, which is part of an exhibit at Lennoxlove House in Scotland that commemorates the wartime career of the Duke of Hamilton. This map is actually two conjoined maps that appear to be based upon British Ordnance Survey maps, but of German manufacture. Harris and Wilbourn also note that this map contains various handwritten markings and notes, with various points on the Scottish landscape clearly marked. Notably, Dungavel House, the residence of the Hamiltons and supposed goal of the Hess Flight in many investigations of the Hess Mess is not marked, while various RAF airfield maintenance units at Prestwick and Carlisle are marked.[148] While the lack of any markings for Dungavel House form part of Harris' and Wilbourn's argument that the Hamilton home and its small airfield were not Hess' goal, they do raise the important question of why the map was given to the Hamilton family after the war, if indeed the Hess flight had nothing whatsoever to do with them.[149]

---

[146] Ibid., p. 119, emphasis added.

[147] Harris and Wilbourn, op cit., p. 195, emphasis added.

The Lennoxlove map, as noted, was covered with careful handwritten notes and markings and was quite large, and they observe that the markings appear to have been carefully made so as not to reveal either his target, or any German military secrets, too readily.[150] Curiously, there were numbered markings all over the map, some in the North Sea, which meant that not all the markings were of geographical features. Because of this feature, they concluded that the map was actually Hess' meticulously crafted "radio navigational chart, interspersed with a host of visual recognition markers".[151] Thus the authors believe that the British Ordnance survey maps were chosen and marked in an attempt to disguise the fact that Hess charted his flight plan using the German radio beacon guidance systems.[152] One of these, the Kalundborg transmitter, was in Denmark and was the principle east-west guidance beacon for central England and southern Scotland.

This point becomes a crucial feature of their analysis, and to see how and why, we must now briefly review another component of the standard narrative: Hess, we are told, made landfall over Scotland at the wrong place, south of where he intended to be. In the failing sunlight and approaching darkness, he flew his aircraft over Scotland full throttle, at tree-top level, frantically looking for landmarks and his landing target. After flying across the entire peninsula and reaching the Irish Sea, he turned around again and flew inland for a few more miles, apparently looking for his target. Being unable to find it, he took the aircraft up to 6000 feet, and bailed out.[153]

[151] Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit., p. 127.

[152] Ibid., p. 139.

So, why did Hess arrive so late over the Scottish coast, in fading sunlight, when the rest of the mission had been so meticulously planned? Their answer is contained in the Lennoxlove map, for on it there is marked a point "C" approximately twelve minutes from the Scottish coast, with the handwritten notes indicating that at this point, the drop tanks were to be jettisoned, and the aircraft put into a full throttle power dive for twelve minutes. The purpose of this maneuver seems obvious, for Hess' aircraft would have been spotted by British radar, and most likely British air defenses might have assumed it was the pathfinding plane for a nighttime bombing raid on Glasgow or other Scottish targets. By diving into a power dive, he would slip under any scrambled British fighters sent to dispatch him, as well as slip under the radar itself.[154] Point "C" however, was apparently a beam intersection point, which Hess failed to detect on his initial approach. Hess later sketched his flight plan for his captors on August 8, 1941, detailing the mystifying "rectangle" of his flight plan, where, according to Hess, he "zig-zagged" to the east, then flew back to the north, and then once again to the west.

---

[153] Ibid., pp. 172, 174: Harris and Wilbourn point out that Britain had gone on "double summer time" in 1941, i.e., added two hours to Greenwich Mean Time, to avoid civilian traffic accidents during the blackouts due to the Blitz. Germany, which typically is one hour ahead of Greenwich time, had itself adopted "summer time" and added one hour to the time. Thus, in 1941, Germany and Britain were on the same time. This places Hess' landfall over Scotland at about 10 p.m., and his arrival near Dungavel House at about 10:40 p.m.

Hess' 1941 Sketch and Notes of his flight path for his British captors while at Mytchett palace; note the absurd rectangular "jog" or "zig-zag to the east".

But why would Hess have created such an absurd flight plan, one increasing the risk of his flight by consuming precious fuel and oil? Harris and Wilbourn hypothesize—I believe correctly—that Hess' real zigzag occurred much further north and later into the flight, when he was unable to locate the crucial point "C". He then did what all pilots would do: he attempted to retrace his steps and locate the crucial point again. The "Rectangle" zig-zag was thus most likely a story designed not to disclose any secrets about the German directional beam system.[155]

d. The Response of the British Air Defenses, and the Difficulty of Dungavel

British Fighter Command's response has always been suspect in the estimations of most Hess Mess researchers, for it is known that British radar did track Hess' flight,[156] but the response has always seemed lack-luster. Sergeant Maurice Pocock was scrambled in a Spitfire, and three Hawker Hurricanes of the nearby Polish squadron were also in the air. Four aircraft were now searching for Hess. The problem was, Pocock climbed to 15,000 feet, and Hess was already far below. Additionally, one RAF radio and radar operator, Cecil Bryant, maintained that he was given orders to relay to aircraft that the incoming German airplane was not to be attacked.[157] But as Harris and Wilbourn point out, whether or not one chooses to believe Bryant's story is, in effect, immaterial, because the grim reality of the statistical efficiency of British night fighters in May 1941 was only a little less than 3 percent, giving Hess a chance of survival of over 97 percent,[158] and looking for a lone Messerschmitt traveling full throttle over Scotland in darkening twilight would be like trying to find a needle in a haystack.

There is another suspicious factor, however.

Harris and Wilbourn observe that in February 1941, the eastern coastal wings of the Royal Air Force received a new group commander, Air Vice Marshal John Andrews. Andrews' appointment, they note, was a little unusual in that he lacked combat command experience, but he was proficient in intelligence matters, had spent time in Germany between the wars as part of aircraft compliance monitoring for the Treaty of Versailles, and hence spoke German. His appointment at that time might therefore have to do with the possibility that someone was expected.[159]

The most damning bit of evidence that the RAF was "pulling its punches" on the late evening of May 10, 1941, is in the fact that Fighter Command was almost insistent that the German aircraft was targeting the RAF base at Dundonald on the west coast of Scotland, yet, only one aircraft was scrambled to deal with this possibility. This, they argue, is clear indication that at least some in the Royal Air Force command structure in Scotland were well aware of where Hess intended to land.[160] Most decidedly, it could not have been Dungavel house that Hess was targeting—as both the standard narrative, and most other revisionist histories, would have it—for Hess intended to land his aircraft, not bail out, and the airstrip at Dungavel was, quite simply, not long enough to accommodate an aircraft of the Me 110's size.[161]

Thus, if the target was an operational R.A.F. base, then this implies not only collusion, involvement and conspiracy at some level on the part of the R.A.F. in that region with the Hess flight, it also indicates the profile of who might have been dealing with Hess. In short, Hess needed (1) someone with R.A.F. command authority; and (2) he needed a peer, i.e., someone with access to the Monarch, and the Duke of Hamilton was both.[162]

It is important at this juncture that the reader understands that Harris and Wilbourn are not contesting the larger picture that other researchers have argued, namely, that the personal target of Hess' flight was the Duke of Hamilton and the "peace faction" that Hess thought he represented, but rather, that he intended—as other researchers also believe—to land his aircraft, rather than parachute into Scotland. A landing at a prearranged and agreed upon site would allow the mission to go forward, since Hess would be sure that he was dealing with whom he was intended to deal. By parachuting, however, Hess was placing the entire mission at risk, for he might be apprehended by parties not privy to the whole scheme, which, of course, is exactly what happened.

[161] Ibid., pp. 180-182. This puts Harris and Wilbourn in sharp opposition to the scenario of Picknett, Prince, and Prior, who maintain that the airstrip at Dungavel was the target.

There is one final aspect of Harris' and Wilbourn's version of the Hess Mess that must also be mentioned, for it bears directly upon our review of the research in the next two sections: they do not subscribe to the hypothesis of Picknett, Prince, and Prior, that the Hess flight is connected to the death of the King's younger brother, the Duke of Kent, in an air crash in August, 1942.

But as we shall now discover, Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's hypothesis of a connection between the Hess flight and the Duke of Kent's death in an air crash a little over a year later, may be one of the most brilliant and tightly argued cases in the whole Hess Mess.

D. The Difficulties with the Dukes

1. The British Peace Faction

I stated previously that the research of Picknett, Prince, and Prior in their book Double Standards, the Rudolf Hess Cover-up, represented the most thorough one-volume book covering all aspects of the Hess Mess; if there is one book to own on the matter, this is it, for while they do not discuss all the details nor all the hypotheses, theirs is still the most sweeping synthesis of the case. They cast a very wide net.

One of the central aspects of the standard narrative which they review and analyze in some detail is the view that Hess' flight was the flight of a "lone madman," the narrative that both British and German propaganda curiously agreed upon after the flight had taken place. According to the standard narrative, then, Hess, in his delusions, assumed there was a peace faction in Britain large enough to afford his mission at least some chance of success, even if only a minimal one. According to the standard narrative however, there was no such faction. If anything, "lure" hypothesis advocates maintain that this was a carefully crafted psychological operation to "lure" an unstable high ranking Nazi leader to Great Britain. Picknett, Prince, and Prior ask the pertinent question, "But what if there was such a powerful British cabal?"[164] One of the high merits of their work is that they devote considerable time and detail in an attempt to answer this question. Accordingly, while it is impossible, obviously to capture all of their data and all of the subtle nuances of their argument, a review of their case is necessary if one is to see why the idea of a joint British German coup plot might not be so far-fetched.

They point out that there were, indeed, several powerful "pro-peace" elements in Britain, and that indeed, "substantial elements" of what we would now call Britain's "deep state" were behind a push to an early negotiated peace in Germany.[165] Among these groups, there was the "Right Club," easily the most rabidly pro-Nazi, and yet whose membership included "prominent peers of the realm" including the Duke of Wellington, and William Joyce, the notorious "British version" of Tokyo Rose, infamous for his English language broadcasts from Berlin that earned him the nickname "Lord Haw Haw," and a hangman's noose for treason after the war.

Yet another of these groups was "the Link" a group fostering closer ties between Nazi Germany and Great Britain, whose rolls swelled to a membership of 4300 people, many of these peers or military officers themselves, including the Duke of Westminster and Admiral Sir Barry Domville, "director of naval intelligence, and a firm believer in the existence of a Jewish-Masonic conspiracy".[166] The Duke of Westminster is intriguing for another reason, for he provides a linkage between the anti-war peerage and the "City," Britain's financial district which was in Picknett, Prince, and Prior's words, "almost to a man" opposed to a war with Germany and which "desired Britain to extricate itself as soon as possible".[167] For these high-ranking elements of the British establishment, the financial district and the anti-war peers, the fundamental problem was that they feared Britain would further in-debt itself to the United States, leading to an eventual breakup of the Empire. At the same time, these individuals also—rightly—saw the Soviet Union as the other major threat to Britain's Empire and hence, caught between the "bi-polar" world that would actually emerge after the war, these men argued for a "third position" of an entente or understanding with Germany, and perhaps, an eventual alliance, for Germany alone in Europe possessed enough weight to challenge the Soviet Union and offered the only counter-balancing weight to growing American power.

[165] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op cit., p. 83. At this juncture, Picknett, Prince, and Prior are referencing an academic study of these groups conducted by Dr Scott Newton of the University of Cardiff's history faculty, and his 1996 study Profits of Peace.

[166] Ibid., pp. 82-82. The authors also note that Domville, not surprisingly, was detained as a threat to British security.

One of the more important pro-peace factions or groups was the Anglo-German Fellowship, a group which, like the Link, attempted to foster contacts and cooperation between the two nations. In the case of this group, however, its British membership reached very high indeed, and included the Duke of Hamilton and two of his brothers on its membership rolls; when peace feelers were advanced through neutral Sweden from Germany to Britain, it was very often the Duke of Hamilton's brothers, Nigel and David, members of the Anglo-German Fellowship, that were the targets.[168]

Picknett, Prince, and Prior also note something else of great significance with respect to the Hamiltons, for in 1938, the Duke (at that time, the Marques of Clydesdale) had received a personal invitation from Adolf Hitler himself to attend the 1938 Nuremberg Party rally. For these researchers, the significance of this invitation is that Hitler himself recognized the importance of the Hamiltons and their contacts within the British establishment and peerage, but also because the invitation was not delivered via the German Foreign Ministry, but rather through the "unofficial channels" of the Anglo-German Fellowship. This leads them to wonder if, in fact, the Anglo-German Fellowship had any ties with the Nazi Party's own party intelligence service, the Auslands Organization, which Hess controlled.[169] Given that both General Haushofer and his son, plus many others, were connected with the Fellowship, I strongly suspect that this is, in fact, the case.

Why would Hitler himself single out the future Duke of Hamilton for a personal invitation to the 1938 Nuremberg rally? One very significant answer is that the future Duke had been invited "to join a German study group set up by the then Prince of Wales (later King Edward VIII and then the Duke of Windsor), proof at least that his interest in such matters was well known in

---

[168] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., pp. 145, 148. They also note that Kim Philby was ordered to join this group to report to Moscow. (p. 259) royal circles".[170] Many Hess Mess researchers also believe that the real reasons for parliamentary pressure on Edward VIII to abdicate was precisely his pro-German stance, rather than his stated intentions to marry the American divorcee, Wallis Simpson. In the case of Edward VIII, later Duke of Windsor, after his abdication and marriage, he and his wife did dine with the Hesses at their home in Munich. This important point must be appreciated for what it is, for it is yet another indicator that not only did the Deputy Führer's contacts reach directly into the Royal Family itself, but also because it shows that at least some elements of the Royal Family were indeed favorable to the "peace faction".

There were other prominent members of the various peace groups, and three of them require mention. The first of these is Sir Samuel Hoare, the British ambassador to the sensitive embassy post in Madrid, a post requiring considerable finesse and diplomatic skill since Britain had been a supporter of the Republicans during the Spanish Civil War. Hoare had to overcome this difficulty and keep the fascist, Nationalist Spain of Franco out of the war. A Spanish entry into the war on the side of the Axis would open the country to German and Italian Axis forces, and therefore endanger Gibraltar. The loss of that key British base would unhinge its entire position in the Mediterranean and endanger its lifeline trade to its far eastern Empire, for it would no longer be able to travel through the Mediterranean, but would have to go around Africa, and then still be subject to heavy interdiction from Iberia. Additionally, the loss of Gibraltar would allow elements of the powerful Italian fleet to have direct access to the Atlantic. It would have been a loss that would be difficult for Britain to recover from, and perhaps a fatal loss.

In such a circumstance Hoare was the perfect man for the post, for he had no sympathies for Bolshevism, having seen its effects first hand during a posting in Russia during World War One and hence could play to Franco's anti-Bolshevik passions and fears. Hoare had also cultivated personal contacts with Mussolini after World War One, "encouraging him in his anti-Communist activities".[171]

---

[170] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 146, emphasis added.

Another prominent figure in the "peace faction" was Hoare's friend, Lord Beaverbrook, a Canadian industrialist who had emigrated to Britain.[172] Then there is the head of British foreign intelligence, MI-6, Sir Stewart Menzies, who was also a part of this "pro-peace faction," and who viewed British friendship with Germany as an essential component for that nation to be strong enough to challenge the Soviet Union openly and directly. Menzies' view was entirely cynical, for he knew that both countries would fight themselves to exhaustion (as actually happened) and that whoever emerged as the victor in such a conflict would be in a weakened state, and easier for the British Empire to deal with.[173] Additionally, Menzies had a vast network of contacts and friends in the City.[174] And finally, the former World War One Prime Minister Lloyd George was also a member of this pro-peace faction.

We have previously made reference to the Duke of Westminster, and it is crucial to note his key role in the coordination of these various "pro-peace" factions and groups, for he actually organized the anti-war peers into a powerful lobbying group within the House of Lords. One of these was the Duke of Buccleuch a key figure in the British establishment of that day. His sister was married to King George VI's younger brother, the Duke of Gloucester, More importantly, Picknett, Prince and Prior point out that he was also appointed to be the Keeper of His Majesty's Household in 1937, an appointment that automatically enrolled him as a Privy Councillor. Effectively, the Duke of Buccleuch was George VI's personal liaison to and from the House of Lords. Buccleuch was also part of the pro-German peace faction within the peerage, and obviously, a very powerful one. Buccleuch's views were well-known and it is thus significant that the King would appoint him to that liaising position; the sensitivity of that appointment was acknowledged when Churchill, having come to power by appointment from the same King, removed Buccleuch from his liaison position.[175]

Consequently, the pro-peace group was hardly non-existent, as some versions of the standard narrative would have it, nor was it a small affair from any perspective, unable to effect any change in British policy or bring down the Churchill government. On the contrary, these various groups and their many networks and connections, leading all the way to the peerage and Royal Family itself, constituted

> ...an enormously powerful upswelling (sic) of opinion that was by no means as unpopular in its day as some historians would have us believe. We have the King, the Queen, the mother of the King, a former Prime Minister and two potential Premiers, a large part of the aristocracy and many of the country's leading industrialists and financiers all sharing the same desire to make peace with Germany. However, although all these different parties wanted to negotiate with the enemy, it was not to be peace at any price. Although they firmly believed that it was either in Britain's or their own best interests not to become embroiled in a war, they were not advocating surrender. Then terms would have to be acceptable, but what could they have been? Obviously they would have varied from group to group. Halifax ... for example, wanted Hitler to be removed from power, whereas other insisted that the safety of German Jews was part of the deal. Others still would probably simply have been happy for Britain to get out of the war in one piece, without giving anything up to Germany. Yet although they had their different variants on the same theme, together they formed one great organic whole, a large and powerful body of opinion highly receptive to offers of negotiations.
> Their power can be illustrated by Churchill's riposte, when on 8 June 1940—his premiership just a month old—there were calls for an inquiry into the 'appeasement party' with a view to prosecuting members. He replied that this would be 'foolish' as 'There are too many in it'.[176]

Note once again that one of the primary "sticking points" for the British was Hitler himself; it is as if we are looking at a replay of the European Allies after Napoleon Bonaparte's return from Elbe and the "ninety days" of his short-lived "return reign" prior to Waterloo, when the governments of Austria, Prussia, France, and Russia declared war, not on France, but on Bonaparte himself.

2. Anglo-American Union, Altered Speeches, and Strange Messages

As was seen previously, Albrecht Haushofer made allusion to his fears that an act of union, or a "fusion" as he called it, of the USA and the UK would soon be enacted, and that this meant that any peace mission from Germany had little chance of success. Nonetheless, because of the strategic implications of such a fusion, the mission had to be attempted.[177] Such a fusion was, as I noted previously, always the stated goal of Cecil Rhodes, and his Rhodes scholarships were established as one of the mechanisms to effect this goal.

But Picknett, Prince, and Prior uncover a sliver of evidence to suggest that Albrecht Haushofer's intelligence may have been well-informed:

> Astonishingly, there is evidence that such a union was being seriously contemplated at that time—and that its timing was directly related to Hess' flight. According to White House spokesmen, President Roosevelt was to make a speech to the Pan-American Conference on 14 May 1941 of a 'historic' nature. The White House leaks left the media buzzing with speculation, mostly about the possibility that the President was going to announce the union of Britain and the USA. The respected Washington-based journalist Leonard Engel, wrote:
> "I have strong reason to believe Roosevelt will come out in favour of a union of the United States and Britain. He will probably specify the end of the war as the occasion for such a merger of the two great English-speaking nations, but I believe he will suggest an earlier date.
> "I am making a guess, but that guess is supported by a considerable amount of evidence".
>
> Because virtually no one seems to know about this proposal, it is tempting to deny that such a thing was even a possibility. But after the fall of France and before its armistice with Germany, the

[177] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 136

> British government seriously proposed an Act of Union between Britain and France. Not surprisingly, this peculiarly unrealistic notion was rejected out of hand by the French cabinet.
> In the event, two days before Roosevelt was scheduled to give his momentous speech—and two days after Hess' arrival—he cancelled it.[178]

Let us pause briefly to speculate a bit further than Picknett, Prince, and Prior have done, based on our earlier reference to the work of Georgetown professor, Dr. Carroll Quigley, and his celebrated underground "conspiracy theory" classic, The Anglo-American Establishment.

In that work, Quigley details the "pro Atlanticist-unionists" within the United States and the United Kingdom who did, indeed, seek an actual union of the two countries. In the hands of Cecil Rhodes and his secret society, this was to be based on a reincorporation of the United States into the British Commonwealth, i.e., by integrating it back into the British empire system. There was thus, within British aristocracy at that time, not only a widespread "pro-Germany" peace movement, there was also another movement ideologically at loggerheads with this goal, represented by Rhodes and his own deep contacts within the aristocracy that wished for Britain, not to cast its lot with Germany, but with the USA. Churchill was a half-American himself and his ancestral homes included residences near Oxford, where the heart and hub of Rhodes' society and plans, were located. In other words, one may speculate that the tug-of-war within Britain was between a "treasonous" pro-Germany peace group represented by the Dukes of Hamilton, Westminster, Gloucester, Windsor and(as we shall see, Kent) and thus implicating significant swaths of the Royal Family, and a "treasonous" pro-America-unionist or Atlanticist group represented by Churchill and his associations to Rhodes.

In any case, the "peace group," as Picknett, Prince and Prior point out, was actively engaged in sending messages back to Hess and the Haushofers, and whoever else that was part of their group.[179] On the 6th of October, 1939, a month after the beginning of the Second World War, and after Poland was crushed beneath the German invasion, the future Duke of Hamilton wrote a letter to the London Times. Initially, the letter had been intended as a group effort, since it was to have been signed by various members of Parliament who supported its contents. It was also shown to Prime Minister Chamberlain, who in effect approved of its contents, but who did not wish it to be a group letter for fear it would undermine the efforts of the armed forces. In this original "group letter" version, the future Duke of Hamilton's letter to the Times began with the following paragraph:

[178] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., pp. 136-137.

[179] Göring? Army generals? One might include even the possibility of Grand Admiral Räder, since he was opposed to beginning the war any earlier than 1944-

> We are Members of Parliament, representing all parties and at the same time serving officers in the Royal Navy, Army and Royal Air Force. We believe that we speak for the young men and women of the Empire in saying that Britain has no choice but to accept the challenge of Hitler's aggression.[180]

When the letter was actually published in the Times, per Chamberlain's "request," this opening paragraph was removed.

The letter itself, however, coming as it did from Scotland's highest ranking peer, was nevertheless stunning in its implications, and Picknett, Prince, and Prior reprint it in full. As it is a large component not only of their argument, but of mine, I do so again here:

> Sir,
> Many, like yourself, have had the opportunity of hearing a great deal of what the men and women of my generation are thinking. There is no doubt in any quarter, irrespective of any party, that this country had no choice but to accept the challenge of Hitler's aggression against one country in Europe after another. If Hitler is right when he claims that the whole of the German nation is with him in his cruelties and treacheries, both within Germany and without, then this war must be fought to the bitter end. It may

---

45, when his planned expansion of the German Navy would have been complete. There is no evidence of Rader ever having been a component of the early anti-Hitler coup groups, but certainly the generals were always wary of the Hitler government, and Göring, as has been seen, hovers uneasily over the Hess Mess in some as yet unknown and undiscovered role.

[180] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 148f.

> well last for many years, but the people of the British Empire will not falter in their determination to see it through.
> But I believe that the moment the menace of aggression and bad faith has been removed, war against Germany becomes wrong and meaningless. This generation is conscious that injustices were done to the German people in the era after the last war. There must be no repetition of that. To seek anything but a just and comprehensive peace to lay at rest the fears and discords in Europe would be a betrayal of our fallen.
> I look forward to the day when a trusted Germany will again come into her own and believe that there is such a Germany, which would be loath to inflict wrongs on other nations such as she would not like to suffer herself. That day may be far off, but when it comes, then hostilities could and should cease, and all efforts be concentrated on righting the wrongs in Europe by free negotiations between the disputing parties, all parties binding themselves to submit their disputes to an impartial equity tribunal in case they cannot reach agreement.
> We do not grudge Germany Lebensraum, provided that Lebensraum is not made the grave of other nations. We should be ready to search for and find a colonial settlement, just to all peoples concerned, as soon as there exist effective guarantees that no race will be exposed to being treated as Hitler treated the Jews on 9 November last year (Kristallnacht). We shall, I trust, live to see the day when such a healing peace is negotiated between honourable men and the bitter memories of twenty-five years of unhappy tension between Germany and the Western democracies are wiped away in the responsible co-operation for building a better Europe.
> Yours truly,
> Clydesdale[181]

It is important to note the following things:

1) The letter refers to Hitler's aggression, not to Germany's;
2) The letter recognizes the principle of Lebensraum, and further mentions the post-World War One injustices, an implicit way of evoking the "injustices" of the Versailles treaty: when these statements are read together, what it appears to be saying is that German territorial claims in central Europe would be acceptable to the British if it did not result in secondary status for non-Germans in those territories of the Reich;[182]

---

[181] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., pp. 143-144, citing the Marques of Clydesdale's Oct 6 1939 letter to the Times of London, emphases added.

3) Then a curious statement appears regarding "colonial settlements," a strange phrase, especially when following so closely on the reference to Lebensraum. The British peace faction could hardly have been ignorant of General Haushofer's understanding of the term, since it had been in open contact with him and his son Albrecht before the outbreak of the war. As we have seen, Haushofer's concept was elaborated in part as a rejection of the imperial policies of the German Empire prior to the First World War, namely, the acquisition of overseas colonies and a large—and to Britain therefore a very threatening—navy. For Haushofer, the Lebensraum concept meant eastward expansion of the borders of the Reich to incorporate the resource-rich regions of Eastern Europe and European Russia, not the acquisition of overseas colonies. Thus, while Hitler from time to time had made reacquisition of Germany's lost African and Pacific colonies and bases a matter of public discussion, it was not high on his list of priorities. Why, then, does a reference to colonies appear in Clydesdale's letter? As will be seen, this is not an "overly-nuanced" point. It may be one of the most important points in the whole Hess Mess, raising often overlooked questions;
4) Finally, note the reference to the Reichskristallnacht, the infamous night when Jewish shops and synagogues were vandalized and burned throughout Germany, and the immediately following sentence referring to "a healing peace negotiated between honourable men". Again, a clear though not explicitly stated signal is being sent: we are willing to negotiate with anyone we consider honorable, but that cannot be Hitler. This means that Hess was willing to negotiate on the "Jewish Question", and implies that the > failure of his mission sealed their fate. This will become a very crucial point, when we finally consider the "Holocaust hypothesis".

---

[182] Indeed, in the German Empire prior to World War One, Poles were one large minority in the eastern territories of Silesia, Pommerania, and Prussia, and were regarded as full citizens of the Reich.

Interestingly enough, Hess, while a co-signatory to the Nuremberg Race laws and, as most Nazis were, a thorough-going anti-Semite and believer in international Jewish-Zionist plots, nevertheless protected the Haushofers since Frau Haushofer was one-half Jewish. More importantly, however, it appears that Hess had been appalled by the Kristallnacht, and sought to mitigate its harsher measures as leader of the Party; Padfield records that Hess' friends had observed him in despair because of the pogrom, urging Hitler to "stop the outrages, without success".[183] The Marques of Clydesdale's appeal may thus have been a direct appeal to parties in Germany that it knew to be quite uncomfortable with the direction Hitler's Reich was taking, namely, the Haushofers, and through them, the connections to the Germany Army, and to Hess himself, whose discomfort with the Kristallnacht was probably known to British intelligence, and whose despair over it might have driven him to contemplate an overthrow of Hitler.

3. Was the Peace Plan also a Coup d'Etat Plan?

The future Duke of Hamilton's "peace message" letter in the Times was not, however, the only channel through which the British "peace faction" attempted to send the message, for the BBC German service broadcast the letter the same day.[184] But the message was much more subtle, and here, Picknett's, Prince's and Prior's assessment of this maneuver must be looked at carefully, for it carries huge implications:

> There is another important subtext, however. They were looking forward to a time when they could make peace with 'honourable men'—in which category the peace lobby did not include Hitler. The implication is that they were only willing to discuss peace if he was replaced as leader. The letter also makes clear that a > settlement must take account of the plight of Germany's Jews, but the most important message being sent is that Clydesdale is to he the contact within the peace group. Should anyone in Germany be willing to discuss these terms they should talk to him. It is therefore clearly aimed at those in Germany who opposed Hitler, into which camp both Haushofers fell.[185]

This may be one of the most important conclusions any researchers have come to in the Hess Mess, for it implies vis-à-vis an interpretation of Hess' motives and Hess himself, that he either undertook his mission with the intention of dissembling to the British, concluding a peace, and keeping Hitler in power; or he undertook his mission with the intention of participating in the overthrow of Hitler's government, in order to procure a peace with Britain.

While this may seem to be utterly out of character for Hess, whose loyalty to Hitler almost approached adoration and even infatuation, these considerations do rationalize another strange occurrence in the Hess Mess: Reichsmarschall Göring's apparent foreknowledge of the scheme, his strange telephone call to General Galland, made far too late to shoot down Hess but just in time to cover his own possible role should it ever be discovered. In this respect, it is worth recalling once again that Göring, who had already conducted peace negotiations with the British, and who was also viewed as "acceptable," was Hitler's designated successor in offices of state, while Hess was his designated representative and successor in the party. In other words, there never was a potential "colonels' coup" with more powerful colonels, for between them, Hess and Göring had the power and connections to pull it off.[186]

[186] Picknett, Prince, and Prior also note that General Walther von Reichenau, one of the few "ardent Nazis" within the General Staff, and a very capable tactician, was a close collaborator with Hess in the latter's many political intelligence networks. This gave Hess entré and influence in the General Staff that few if any other Nazis with the exception of Göring, had. (See Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 150). It may be that the so-called rivalry between Hess and Göring, while real, has been greatly exaggerated, and perhaps deliberately so, for it would disguise the much deeper ties and agendas that possibly united these two very powerful men.

In any case, recall now that a reply to British inquiries had been sent back to the Duke of Hamilton, via his and the Haushofers' mutual contact, Mrs. Roberts. Here, as Picknett, Prince, and Prior argue, a strange circumstance occurs. The letter reached the Duke of Hamilton in early 1941, and arrangements were process of being made for a meeting between Hamilton and Hess on neutral territory, namely Lisbon, as the initial British and German plans suggested. To this end, the Duke had shown the letter to Lord Halifax, who was of the peace party that wanted to see Hitler removed. Halifax, in turn, did not share the letter with Churchill(whom, it will be recalled, had been chosen prime minister over Halifax just a few months previously!) However, the Haushofer response letter was also copied and forwarded not only to the Duke of Hamilton, but also, because Hamilton was also an RAF officer, the Haushofer reply was also forwarded to counter-intelligence, that is, to MI-5, which unlike MI-6, was not infested with pro-peace party advocates, but, on the contrary, with pro-war "Atlanticist" and "Churchill" elements. When confronted by MI-5 with this letter, the Duke and his powerful backers had to shelve the Lisbon meeting until actual authorization came from Churchill's war cabinet.[187] in the meantime on the German side, preparations for a meeting continued, and notably, these preparations utterly invalidate the notion that Hess decided—on some "crazy lark"—to seize the initiative and like the Mountain going to Mohammed, fly to the Duke of Hamilton and drop in on him unannounced. Quite the contrary: the Nazi Party Ausland Organization was busily translating various documents into English, which Hess would eventually take with him on the flight, and this indicates planning.[188] Additionally, in early February of 1941, Albrecht Haushofer made a trip to Sweden, and while the purpose of this visit is not known, it is likely it had something to do with the planned negotiations, since his visit coincided with a period when the Duke of Hamilton was on leave from the Royal Air Force.[189]

[189] Ibid., pp. 161-162.

Most importantly and "at Hess' express bidding"[190] Albrecht Haushofer had opened negotiating channels to the British ambassador in Madrid, Sir Samuel Hoare. As a result of these preliminary negotiations, Haushofer and Hoare agreed on the principle that a negotiated peace could not be reached without the removal from power both of Hitler and of Churchill.[191]

Note what has happened:

1) Albrecht Haushofer was dispatched to Madrid to confer with Sir Samuel Hoare, a man many considered as eligible for the British premiership, on the express orders of Rudolf Hess, Deputy Führer;
2) As a result, Haushofer and Hoare agree on the principle that a negotiated peace—per Clydesdale/Hamilton's October 1939 letter to the London Times—cannot take place except between "honourable men," and that this translated into the removal from power of Churchill and Hitler!

In other words, like it or not, Hoare and the men and factions behind him, and Hess and the men and factions behind him, are now both involved in de facto and de jure treason; the peace plot is now, by agreed principle, also an international bilateral coup d'etat plot.[192]

There is yet another fact uncovered by Picknett, Prince, and Prior, that indicates just how high-level this meeting between Albrecht Haushofer and Sir Samuel Hoare really was, for in 1959, Albrecht Haushofer's Spanish representative, Heinrich Stahmer, claimed that Albrecht, Hess himself, Sir Samuel Hoare and Lord Halifax himself had planned a secret meeting somewhere in Portugal or Spain in early 1941.[193] If this meeting really did take place, then the alleged meeting between Haushofer and Hess on the one hand, and Hoare and Halifax on the other, was most likely a follow-up meeting to iron out more details. The problem is, there is no evidence for it as Stahmer never stated whether or not the four men actually met.

[192] See in this connection the remarks of Harris and Wilbourn, op. cit. p. 252: "As far as the Germans are concerned, this course of action would get over the stumbling block of the Churchill government not negotiating with Hitler; firstly the Churchill government would be replaced, and secondly the replacement would be negotiating with Rudolf Hess—not Hitler".

However, citing again the research of Cardiff University history professor Scott Newton, Picknett, Prince, and Prior point out that the Vichy French press did indeed report that Hess was in Spain in early 1941. Not only that, but the German press even went so far as to issue a denial of the French story![194] But there's more:

> The British Foreign Office contacted King Carol of Romania—then exiled in Seville—for details. He confirmed that Hess had visited Madrid. Puzzled by Hoare's silence on the presence of such a high-ranking Nazi, the Foreign Office demanded to know if this was true: Sir Samuel's reply is a masterpiece of diplomatic—but curiously transparent—evasion. He said that if Hess were in Spain 'his arrival has been kept remarkably secret and his presence in town is not even rumoured yet'. Most telling of all is that, although the files of correspondence between the Madrid Embassy and the Foreign Office were routinely released to the Public Record Office after fifty years, all the documents relating to the weekend of 20-2 April 1941 have been held back until...

(You guessed it!)

Of course, as we've already discovered, by that 2017—this year and the year this book is being written—there will have been plenty of time to remove the occasional embarrassing file, to doctor file equally embarrassing indices of files, and, if necessary, to plant new files and false information.

What might have been discussed at a Madrid meeting of Hoare, Halifax, Hess, and Albrecht Haushofer? Oddly enough, three of these men—Hess, Haushofer, and Halifax—had something in common: they all were deeply disturbed by the policies of the Nazi regime toward the Jews. Haushofer was, of course, himself part Jewish, and because of this, he and his family were under the personal protection of Hess himself. Hess, as we have seen, was in despair over the nation-wide pogrom of the Reichkristallnacht in 1938, and Lord Halifax had attempted to initiate discussions in the War Cabinet about providing a Jewish homeland in Western Australia or British Guiana.[196]

4. The Coup Hypothesis, and Hess' University Essay

There is an additional bit of debris that researchers of the Hess Mess usually mention in connection with the "coup" hypothesis, and this is an essay that Hess composed shortly after enrolling in the University of Munch after World War One. As previously observed, the idea that Hess, the Deputy Führer himself, would be involved in a peace negotiation that was also a coup d'etat plot seems, on first glance, to be absurd. But we have also seen that the Hoare-Haushofer meeting, which occurred under Hess' express orders, had made the removal of Churchill and Hitler a sine qua non of any further negotiations, and, as Picknett, Prince, and Prior conclude, "it is inconceivable that Hess, as the most high-ranking go-between, was not aware of this".[197]

However, in this university essay on leadership, Hess—already under the spell of Hitler's oratory—outlined what characteristics the future German leader should have. He would have to be severe and ruthless, but notably, once he had succeeded in restoring Germany's power and standing in the world, he would have to stand aside, and allow a more moderate government to assume power. As Picknett, Prince, and Prior point out, in his initial contacts with the British after his capture in Scotland, he indicated that he was not speaking for Hitler, but for Germany,[198] an obvious and calculated reference, perhaps, to the London Times letter of Clydesdale/Hamilton, and perhaps as a reinforcement of the principles of the meeting in Madrid. "As Hitler's secretary in 1925 Hess had also written that he would not always be beholden to his

Führer. Just as he deemed it necessary for Germany that Hitler should become leader, he might just as easily have advocated his standing down if he believed it to be in Germany's best interests".[199] In this respect they go on to note that the German press, in the weeks and even days immediately prior to Hess' now infamous flight, the Deputy Führer was being given even more attention than usual by the Nazi-controlled German media, stressing his importance to the regime and to Germany.[200] The implication is clear: Hess not only was capable of being involved in such a scheme, but there may have been a quiet, concerted propaganda campaign to prepare the German people for his assumption of power with a more moderate coalition government, perhaps one, as we have seen, including Göring.

With all the careful preparations for a meeting on neutral ground, however, why did Hess finally decide on the far riskier expedient of an actual flight to Great Britain itself, and to Scotland in particular, a flight that as Harris and Wilbourn superbly demonstrated, was fraught with risk, demanding a high degree of planning and technical competence?

Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's answer to this question is simple, and in terms of their reconstruction of the Hess Mess, quite brilliant: Hess had to go to Britain, because his British counterpart, for whatever reason, was unable to meet Hess on "neutral territory".[201]

With this, we now need to deal with yet more debris in the Hess Mess, namely, the bizarre set of anomalies surrounding his arrival in, and his planned, but never successfully concluded, departure from Britain, and the equally bizarre behavior that he exhibited during his four years in British captivity prior to being brought back to Germany to stand trial at Nuremberg for war crimes, after having missed most of the war!

"HESS" IN BRITAIN, 1941-1945: MORE MIND MANIPULATION, DUCAL DILEMMAS, AND DOUBLES DIFFICULTIES

"Though a good deal is too strange to be believed, nothing is too strange to have happened".
Thomas Hardy, Personal Notebooks

RUDOLF HESS PARACHUTED INTO HISTORY over Scotland in the closing twilight minutes of Saturday, May 10, 1941, his mission from that point forward becoming the subject of analysis, speculation, and of course, a baffling secrecy that continues to this day. It should therefore come as no surprise, even though there are a number of publicly-known and available details about his four year stay in Britain, that those details and facts raise more questions than they answer. Quite simply put, the mystery deepens during this period because according to some, it would appear that at some point Hess became "Hess," and a double entered the picture.

It was, of course, W. Hugh Thomas that first proposed the double theory after discovering the discrepancies between Prisoner Number Seven's lack of wounds where he thought the real Hess had suffered them. In Thomas' view, the double was substituted during Hess' flight itself; a theory which we have previously discounted. If that is the case, however, exactly when was the substitution made, and, more importantly, why?

It is this question that lies at the center of Picknett, Prince, and Prior's meticulous combing and sifting of the known data and facts of Hess' stay in Great Britain. Whether or not one agrees with their analyses and conclusions, one must contend with them for the simple reason that the interpretation of the total Hess Mess depends upon this point, and changes dramatically depending on whether or not "Spandau Hess" was the Rudolf Hess that took off from Germany. Mere "academic dismissal" of their case and arguments is simply dodging an uncomfortable issue. One must confront it head on.

Their qualification of this period is an apt one, for people "slip in and out of the action"[1] at the oddest points. Or to use a different simile, it is like a Mozart opera, with all the main characters not only slipping in and out of the action, but wearing several masks to boot, constantly in disguise and never appearing as themselves. Indeed, the title of this chapter—'"Hess in Britain"—could easily be the title of an opera or even a part of some Wagnerian operatic cycle: "The Ring of the H's" (the Haushofers, Hess, Hitler, Hoare, and Halifax), with Siegfried being played by a stocky Scotch-and-whiskey-loving, cigar-smoking man who wore bowler hats.

A. Capture and Immediate Aftermath

1. The "Manifestation" of Morris and McBride

No composer or librettist, however, could possibly have put together the story which Picknett, Prince, and Prior uncovered nor made of such a messy plot a plausible structure and argument. They begin their lengthy review of Hess' time in Britain by recounting the standard narrative of the night of Hess' apprehension by the British, and the first days of his captivity. In that narrative, Hess' parachute landed him in a farmer's field, which farmer promptly took Hess captive and held him in his cottage. From there, Hess—who called himself Captain (Hauptman) Alfred Horn—was taken into official custody by the Home Guard, and he was moved about from various points until he finally ended up in the Maryhill Barracks in Glasgow. Throughout this entire episode, Hess/Horn insisted he had flown to Scotland to meet the Duke of Hamilton, and constantly requested that he be taken to him. During this episode, the standard narrative also maintains that no one recognized "Hauptmann Horn's" peculiar resemblance to Rudolf Hess. Supposedly, his real identity remained completely unknown.[2]

Hess had landed on a farm outside of Eaglesham owned by Basil Baird, just a few hundred yards from the cottage of David McLean and his wife, a farmer and ploughman who took care of the land. The reader will recall that by this point of his flight, Hess was flying his Messerschmitt 110 twin-engine aircraft at full throttle, and very low over the countryside, the engines producing a deafening roar. McLean, hearing the low aircraft and then the subsequent crash, ran outside to see the burning aircraft some distance away, and Hess descending slowly on his parachute. McLean, finding only a pitchfork for a weapon, took the man prisoner.

[1] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 193.

[2] Ibid., p. 194.

From here on out everything is a muddle.

Once he was taken prisoner, according to McLean's account, Hess' first words were "Am I on the estate of the Duke of Hamilton?"[3] An early American account indicated that Hess later stated to the police and Home Guard that he was on a mission to see the Duke, his original intention having been to land at Dungavel, the Duke's residence which had a small landing strip.[4]

How does one interpret this?

The real Hess would have known that the airstrip at Dungavel was simply inadequate to land a Messerschmitt 110. An imposter Hess may not have known this, but as we have seen previously, it was indeed the real Hess who parachuted into Scotland; the difficulties of substituting a double and a plane ala the Thomas scenario being too difficult. So why would the real Hess dissemble on this point? The answer has to be that he was protecting someone, or something, or both.

In any case, whatever Hess' first words to the police and Home Guard were, he was taken to the McLean's cottage where Mrs. McLean offered to make him some tea, which Hess declined in good English, albeit with his heavy German accent. At this point, the two soldiers in the McLean cottage who had heard the crash, responded that beer was what they drank in Britain, to which Hess replied that they drank it in Munich, where he came from.[5]

The reader may well ask, "Wait a minute, where did these guys come from and when did they get there?" And that is the problem: this is an opera, after all, and McLean never gave any explanation of when the soldiers had arrived. They are just suddenly "there," onstage, participating in the action.[6] Even more interestingly, these two soldiers, Emyr Morris and Daniel McBride, were from a nearby top secret anti-aircraft signals unit.[7]

---

[3] Picknett, Prince and Prior, op. cit., p. 194.

[4] Ibid., p. 195.

[5] Ibid., p. 195f.

a. The McBride Anomalies

Soldiers that "suddenly manifest themselves" into the action are not the only anomaly in the early minutes of Hess' stay in Britain, for two years after the end of World War Two, McBride gave his version of the story to the Hongkong Telegraph, in which he stated that "high-ranking Government officials were aware of his coming," giving as his reason for this assertion the fact that no air-raid warnings were sounded, nor were the anti-aircraft gunnery control rooms plotting the course of Hess' plane altered. Then, in a telling statement, McBride states that it was he, not Daniel McLean, who first apprehended Hess.[8]

At this juncture, Picknett, Prince and Prior ask the obvious question: if McBride's story about being the first to find and apprehend Hess is true, then why was this information suppressed from the Scottish news reports and only revealed two years after the war, and in Hong Kong at that?[8] McBride then gives his version of the "beer remarks" exchanged between them,[9] and then the article continues by stating that his companion from the secret anti-aircraft signals station began to notice that the man looked "familiar". Asking his name, the German pilot gave it as "Alfred Horn," and then, according to the article, he removed from one of his pockets a picture of his wife and son, and reiterated in his German-accented English that he had not come to bomb Scotland, but to see the Duke of Hamilton, emphasizing that his aircraft was not outfitted to carry bombs.[10]

Then follows what can only be said to be a remarkable exchange and event; according to McBride's Hongkong Telegraph article:

---

[6] Ibid., p. 196.

[7] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 197.

[8] Ibid., pp. 199-200. While space considerations prevent us from posting McBride's Hongkong Times article, Picknett, Prince, and Prior reproduce the article, with a much more in-depth analysis, on pp. 199-201.

[9] Ibid., p. 201.

[10] Ibid., p. 203.

> (Horn/Hess) asked me to take him to the Duke's home, which, he said, was not far away. To this I could only reply that I had no power to do so but my superiors would probably do so later on.
> Shortly afterwards there was a commotion outside. The door was flung open and a Home Guard officer rushed in, followed by a number of his men.
>
> The pilot said to the officer: 'I wish to see the Duke of Hamilton. Will you take me to him?'
>
> 'You can save all that for the people concerned', said the officer. 'At present you are coming with me'.
> I resented this attitude and protested to the officer that the prisoner was in my charge awaiting an escort from my HQ.
> 'Are you questioning my authority?' demanded the officer truculently.
> 'I cannot leave my prisoner, sir', I said. 'If you take him I must go with you'.[11]

Why the "commotion" and the apparent hostility between the various groups of Hess' captors?

Again, time and space do not allow us the luxury of a complete review of all the subtle details and nuances of Picknett, Prince, and Prior's analysis and argument; suffice it to say that it appears two factions were looking for Hess in western Scotland that night: the pro-peace party, which was, of course, expecting him, and another faction representing Prime Minister Churchill and his government which had got wind of the plot (possibly through MI-5's copy of the Haushofer response to Violet Roberts).[12] If so, then at this moment, neither faction has complete or secure control over Hess.

There is one more strange fact about McBride that suggests that even his Hongkong Telegraph article was not entirely forthcoming, for after his death, in his papers, a letter from his former commander, W.B. Howieson, dated 8 May 1974, was discovered. It advised McBride in no uncertain terms to "drop this Hess business" lest continued exposure of something to which they had both subscribed to the British Official Secrets Act "stir up a hornets' nest".[13] Once again, this draws us nearer to that One Nagging Question that hovers over the entire Hess Mess from beginning to end:

[12] See their discussions on pp. 222, 261.

> How could this story 'stir up a hornets' nest' in 1974? Howieson's letter implies that if the seemingly minor point of who captured Hess is admitted, other—much more damaging—information will somehow naturally flow from it, which is presumably why McBride's official report is still withheld. It seems that Howieson knew that something passed between McBride and Hess that night that is not even mentioned in the signaller's papers, which he seems to have been about to make public. Presumably Howieson's words of caution persuaded McBride not to do so. But something significant must have passed between the two, because Rudolf Hess gave McBride his Iron Cross that night.[14]

Whatever it was that threatened to "stir up a hornets' nest" that night certainly had the phone lines in Scotland buzzing late that Saturday evening, for shortly after the "commotion" caused by the arrival of the Home Guard in the McLean cottage, and after some transfers from one small local hut to another, its commander attempted to place a call to the local army headquarters to ask for a prisoner's escort. "All the lines were busy," according to Picknett, Prince, and Prior, and this is "another sign that there was a major flap on in the area that night".[15]

One is tempted to offer a reason for the busy phone lines, for if Hess was expected, as McBride's Hongkong Telegraph article stated, then when he did not show up on schedule, this must have provoked a flurry of phone call-conveyed "BOLO" (Be On the Look Out for") alerts, as the peace plan plotters realized the gravity of their situation if Hess should be apprehended by units not privy to their plans.

By this time, Hess/Horn was at Giffnock scout hall, where he was finally searched, with an inventory made of his belongings, which included a variety of homeopathic medicines, a syringe, his wife's Leica camera, the calling cards of Karl and Albrecht Haushofer and most likely a letter to the Duke of Hamilton and, presumably, several papers prepared by the Ausland Organization. One does not know exactly what this inventory consisted of, for the simple reason that it has never been disclosed,[16] though most accounts do mention the homeopathic medicine.

However, we have seen in our review of Harris and Wilbourn's research that Hess took with him at least one large map, meticulously covered with his own hand-written notes, the so-called Lennoxlove map. Additionally, we have also noted that the Auslands Organization also undertook extensive translations of documents into English, presumably for the meeting in neutral country that never materialized. One may assume, therefore, that whatever these documents were—drafts of a treaty based on previous discussions, perhaps?—that Hess brought them with him in his aircraft, and perhaps on his person, to Scotland.

There is also an interesting though unsubstantiated allegation that appeared recently on the Internet, and therefore, after Picknett, Prince, and Prior published their research in their book. According to this short article, the ancient Celtic text, the Lebor Feasa Runda, had come to the attention of the Reichsfuhrer SS, Heinrich Himmler. The text was part of a larger document, an old Irish text called the Black Book of Laoughcrew.

> The Nazi's [sic] interest in the Lebor Feasa Runa stemmed from the fact that the text mentions a mysterious island called Tir nan'Og that once existed in the Atlantic Ocean and was considered to be the equivalent of Thule, an island they considered to be the original homeland of the Aryan race.
> The Lebor Feasa Runda also mentions four great treasures possessed by the Celtic gods which were believed to weild [sic] amazing powers. Convinced that these mystical objects were the equivalents of such legendary artifacts as the Holy Grail, the Spear of Destiny, the Stone of Scone and the Sword Excalibur, Reichsfuhrer Heinrich Himmler sent the Ahnenerbe across the > continent of Europe on a scavenger hunt to acquire these renowned treasures.[17]

The article also notes that the manuscript had been brought to Prague by Queen Elizabeth I's occult advisor and spy, Dr. John Dee during his visit to the court of German Holy Roman Emperor Rudolf II. By the 1930s, however, the article states that it had come into the hands of the Thule Society, whence Himmler's SS confiscated it, presumably after the Nazi assumption of power. From there, it made its way into the archives of the SS Ahnenerbedienst, the SS' secret "archeology and occult research bureau," whence the manuscript disappeared, supposedly on the day of May 10, 1941, the day of Hess' flight. The article also states that an "old book" had been seen by "a young man by the name of John Peterson" among the items inventoried with Hess, who said he intended to present it to the Duke of Hamilton as a gift.[18] An English translation of the text, which allegedly also deals with the ancient practices and belief system of the Druids, was made by Heinrich Thorensen, a German army officer and linguist on assignment to the Ahnenerbe.

While there is no substantiation within the article for these allegations, it is worth noting that it is diplomatic custom, especially during negotiation or during state visits to present one's host, or negotiating party, with a gift, and an ancient Celtic manuscript, especially one brought from England to Prague by John Dee, would be a highly appropriate gift to bring. More importantly, it is to be remembered that Himmler himself, later in the war, would also attempt to conduct his own peace overtures to the Western Powers, using many of the same intermediaries and channels. It is thus not necessary to assume that Hess, himself a general in the SS, stole the manuscript from under Himmler's nose. If the allegations in the article are at all true, it is much more probable that Himmler was a party to the peace-and-coup d'etat plot, since it is well known that Himmler entertained notions of replacing Hitler, and his own later peace initiatives were conducted with that in mind. It is thus also probable, if this speculation be true, that Himmler's later peace proposals grew out of his possible and very covert participation in the Hess Mess, where, as we have seen, the sine qua non of any negotiated peace in the West was the removal of Hitler from power.

c. Major Graham Donald Identifies Hess by means of Another Absurd Conversation about Beer

Returning to Picknett, Prince, and Prior's analysis, they next concentrate on Major Graham Donald's role. Donald was an officer in the Royal Observer Corps, and sat on the board of directors of the Glasgow-based company, Graham & Donald Ltd., a machine-tool company. Donald's version of meeting Hess on the night of May to, 1941, appeared in the Observer Corps' journal in October 1942, almost a year and a half later. Major Donald claimed to have been alerted to the crash of Hess' aircraft and set off to find the scene. He arrived at the farm and the McLean's cottage prior to Hess having been moved, and followed the entourage to Giffnock where he questioned Hess. There, Donald also records that there was a tension in the air because of the presence of a Polish officer.[11]'

According to Donald, Hess then repeated what he had told others, namely, that he was on a mission to Britain, that his destination had been Dungavel and the Duke of Hamilton. At this point, Hess allegedly produced his flight map and showed Major Donald a red circle around Dungavel, clearly marking the Hamilton residence. Donald then turned the conversation to Munich and its good beer, the second time—they note—that the conversation has turned to the absurd, for Donald then goes on to assert that Hess reacted very disapprovingly at the mention of beer. Donald concluded that he was a teetotaler, and since there were only two teetotalers in the upper echelons of the Reich—Hitler and Hess—and since the man in front of him obviously was not Hitler, he had to be Hess![20]

[20] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 210.

This is, of course, a long way to go—around Harvey's Barn once again—to explain an obvious thing by unobvious and completely absurd deductive processes, for Hess was a familiar face in newsreels of the period; one had only to look at him and see that it was Hess, or at least, a close facsimile thereof. One did not need absurd explanations about "teetotalers in the Nazi regime".

2. Anomalies:
Glaring Absences, and a Polish Officer Talks to Hess

There are other odd anomalies that occur in the very first hours and days, in the "first act" of "'Hess' in Britain," anomalies that point consistently to the idea that Hess, or at least, someone high ranking in the Nazi hierarchy, was arriving. One of the most glaring examples is the Hess Mess version of the Sherlock Holmes "dog that didn't bark in the night". One of those glaringly non-barking dogs in the night was the fact that the Messerschmitt 110 was a two-man aircraft, and that there was no search on the night of May 10-11 for a second crew member.[21]

There is yet another glaring absence that night. We have already seen that Hess dressed in the Luftwaffe uniform of a captain, and hence, for all his initial captors knew, Hess was a Luftwaffe pilot. Yet, on that night and contrary to all standard procedure, the Royal Air Force was kept carefully excluded from the initial encounters with the "officer".[22]

The most peculiar "non-barking-dog" that night, however, is that there are two very divergent accounts of where the Duke of Hamilton himself was. The Duke, after all, was the very individual whom Hess and his backers had hoped to contact. However, according to the standard narrative that was eventually to evolve, Hamilton received a call about the mysterious visitor in the middle of the night in his capacity as an R.A.F. operational commander, and promptly went back to sleep. But not so, according to a story from the Glasgow Herald of May 16, 1941, a story that appeared prior to the finalizing of the standard narrative, for according to it, the Duke of Hamilton did meet Hess, along with members of the

---

Foreign Office and unspecified intelligence services while the latter was being transferred to a hospital to treat the sprain in his ankle that he had sustained after parachuting into Scotland. Nor was this story merely unsubstantiated rumor, for Hamilton's wife confirmed that after receiving the phone call, the Duke departed, and did not return home until the afternoon of Sunday.[23]

Another strange event that night was the mysterious appearance of a Polish officer, Roman Battaglia, at Glasgow Police Headquarters to interrogate Hess. Battaglia was an intelligence officer to General Sikorski's Polish government-in-exile, and proceeded to interrogate Hess for two hours, unsupervised, and in German, which, again, is highly unusual, since no one else present during this session spoke German![24] This suspicious incident, as will be seen, is a crucial component to Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's scenario of what was happening that night, and why.

In any case, the reactions of the R.A.F. in breaking its standard protocols for the interrogation of German pilots, the strange two hour session with Battaglia, the Glasgow Herald article, all point to the conclusion the Hess—or someone—was expected that night. Indeed, the daughter of one observer corps officer, Nancy Moore, was told by her father that though he was breaching his security procedures, the pilot was none other than the Deputy Führer himself.[25]

We have seen that Harris and Wilbourn, through careful analysis of the technical features of the Messerschmitt 110, concluded that the small airstrip at the Duke of Hamilton's residence at Dungavel could not have been Hess' landing target that night. For many, this ends the speculative scenario that Picknett, Prince, and Prior have carefully pieced together and argued. They opined, instead, that one of the local R.A.F. airfields alone had landing strips adequate to handle the landing (and takeoff!) lengths required for a Me 110.

However, I do not believe that Harris and Wilbourn's reconstruction does any damage to Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's larger scenario at all. To see why, one must review their conclusions and reconstructions very carefully and closely, for they realize that such an elaborate plot would have factored in the need for contingencies from the very beginning:

[23] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, p. 215.

[25] Ibid., p. 219.

> From start to finish the story of Hess' arrival and capture looks like one of the most serious indictments of British military—and intelligence—incompetence ever recorded. It is littered with bungling, indifference and blatant dereliction of duty, often by top men, and in a crisis—a matter of national security. If that is a fair summary, then perhaps it is understandable why the authorities should try to bury the whole thing and forget it ever happened. But if it isn't a case of wide-ranging ineptitude, we can only understand all the anomalies in terms of quite another scenario.[26]

This, of course, is true, for the standard narrative asks us to believe that the British military and intelligence services, among the most competent in the world, suddenly took leave of their senses and reason on the night of May 10, 1941, and only in Scotland!

In their scenario, the Duke of Hamilton represented that peace faction that was in a position to assist on the British end, both with the particulars of Hess' flight and landing, but also on the particulars of the scheme itself. This would explain, in part, the obfuscation of when the Duke of Hamilton actually met with Hess. But because the flight had gone wrong and Hess had to bail out, not being able to find his targeted landing area—Dungavel in Picknett's, Prince's and Prior's scenario, and nearby airbases of the R.A.F. that could accommodate his Messerschmitt 110 In Harris' and Wilbourn's—the plan had gone wrong at a crucial juncture.[27] That juncture, as we saw, was the point at which Hess failed to make contact with the beacon signal at point "C," and had to retrace his steps, using both critical fuel and critical sunlight he needed to identify landmarks once over Scotland. As we also saw, Hess made landfall a few miles south of his intended landfall target, according to the reconstructions of Harris and Wilbourn. Note, however, that the change of landing target does not really collapse the larger scenario of Picknett, Prince, and Prior.

[26] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 220, emphasis added.

What went wrong was that Hess, in making landfall at the wrong point and behind schedule, set into motion a cascading series of errors that meant that he was apprehended by the Home Guard, in other words, by "outsiders" who were not part of the plot having become aware of the arrival of the Deputy Führer. In this respect, they point out that Hess himself attempted to correct the situation by repeatedly insisting that he wanted to see the Duke of Hamilton.[28] At this juncture the necessity of a contingency plan, in case something went wrong, becomes active; they argue that on the British side, there would be a contingency if in fact Hess was unable to land at his designated site, which, in Picknett's, Prince's and Prior's scenario, is Dungavel, the Duke's residence. However, it is crucial to note that this would have been the case, on the British side, regardless of what the actual target landing site was. Their overall scenario does not collapse simply because one detail may be off.

In fact, as they also convincingly argue, the idea of a contingency also rationalizes Hess' response to his initial situation in the United Kingdom, for he "would have been viewing each new arrival on the scene as a potential ally, but how was he to tell a friend from a foe? Presumably some form of password would have been pre-arranged, which would account for the surreal rerun of the conversation about German beer."..[29]

This scenario also rationalizes, in a way that other considerations of the Hess Mess do not, the manner in which the Duke of Hamilton responded, for the Deputy Führer was in the custody of those not part of the scheme. Hence their immediate problems were twofold: they had to gain custody of him, or somehow communicate to him. This consideration, in their opinion, explains the odd appearance of a Polish intelligence officer of the Polish government-in-exile, Roman Battaglia, conversing with Hess in German for two hours, while no one else present at the time understood German or was present with Battaglia and Hess when the conversation was held (or, at least, so we are told!).

Finally, there is the problem of the Duke of Hamilton himself: peer of the realm and an officer in the Royal Air Force. At any juncture after his involvement in the proceedings, he could have

[28] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p.. 220.

[29] Ibid.

"pulled rank enough to take charge of Hess,"[30] so why didn't he? The answer is evident from the implications and outlines of the plot itself: the British component of the conspiracy was not acting under orders or sanctions of the government; it was Churchill's government after all, and as has been seen, one of the previously agreed-upon principles of both parties was that Churchill and Hitler both had to go. But Hess had already fallen into the hands of those not involved in the scheme. Hence, Picknett, Prince, and Prior conclude that the British side of the plot was now "engaged in a damage-limitation exercise: too many people were now aware of the mystery airman who kept asking for the Duke of Hamilton. Sooner or later questions would be asked, and Churchill would get to hear of it".[31] At the very minimum, the British component of the plot had to assume this, whether or not it had actually happened, lest not doing so, it would misstep.

Another consideration has raised questions about their scenario, and it is worth briefly mentioning it, for again, this author does not believe it damages Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's overall scenario.

In some versions of the Hess Mess, there is a "reception party" supposedly waiting at Dungavel for Hess' arrival. Some argue that a reception party at Dungavel makes no sense simply because (once again) Hess' Messerschmitt 110 could never have safely landed on its small airstrip, and the implication that might be drawn from this is that no such party existed. I contend, however, that the existence of such a party at Dungavel does not invalidate their scenario, but rather, strengthens it, for such a reception party makes sense simply from the protocols of the situation itself. But why wait at Dungavel? The answer is that it would be the logical place to gather, whether or not Hess' intended landing site was there, for from there they could proceed with the Duke—an RAF officer—to Hess' intended RAF landing site, or arrangements may have been made to bring Hess from his landing site to them. This reception committee was composed of Red Cross officials, which in effect made their environment neutral territory, plus representatives of General Sikorski's Polish government-in-exile. The significance of this point will be explained in due course, but it does rationalize why a Polish officer was able to converse with Hess in German unsupervised.[32]

3. Telegrams, Coville's Strange Statement, and the Marx Brothers

According to the "standard narrative," the Duke of Hamilton did not see Hess until ordered to do so on the morning of May 11, 1941, at 10 A.M. at the Maryhill Barracks, and was not supposed to have known his actual identity, the implication of which is that the Deputy Führer's arrival was already being discussed.[33] As we have seen, however, the Glasgow Herald gave indication that there might have been a prior meeting between the Duke and Hess.

In any case, the standard narrative has it that after the Sunday morning meeting, the Duke then contacted London to apprise Prime Minister Churchill of his arrival, and then immediately flew south to meet Churchill personally at Ditchley Hall—Churchill's secret wartime country residence—and apprise him of the development. This was supposedly done after dinner that night, May 11, 1941. The next day, Churchill ordered Ivone Kirkpatrick to Scotland in order to identity the prisoner. Kirkpatrick served in the Foreign Office, had been in the British Embassy before the war, and personally knew Hess.[34]

While all of this is going on, something very important was not happening in Germany. As has been seen, in a plot such as this, contingency plans, passwords, and so on, would have been worked out in case something went wrong (which it very much did). Equally, however, it would have been necessary to work out a contingency for the German side of this conspiracy, to indicate a safe arrival of Hess in Britain. It is worth noting that in his contact with Hamilton, Hess did make the unusual request that a telegram be sent to an aunt in Zurich (one Emma Rothacker), an obvious "signal that he had arrived safely".[35] This message, more importantly, was to have been delivered via the Red Cross, which again invokes the presence of Dr. Burkhart. The telegram, of course, did not arrive.

[32] Picknett, Prince and Prior, op. cit., p. 286.

[33] Ibid., p. 224.

[34] Ibid., p. 223.

It is worth pausing to consider this point in more detail, and I am not aware that anyone else investigating the Hess Mess has advanced the following extremely speculative scenario concerning the telegram's "non-arrival". The non-arrival itself was also, of course, a predetermined signal, indicating that something had gone wrong, and that the "plan" was "off". But assume, for a moment, that the telegram had been sent, and assume also that (1) Hitler had some knowledge, but not full knowledge, of the scheme, and (2) that the component of the scheme he did not know about was a putative plot to overthrow him and install a government more acceptable to the British. One may argue that for Hess to participate in such a plot and yet to conceal its true purpose, that Hitler had to have been made aware of the intended flight, and its ostensible purpose to conclude a peace with Great Britain, which Hitler certainly favored. Including Hitler in the plot to partial knowledge was, in essence, essential to its success.

However, the telegram—which Wolf-Rüdiger Hess maintained that his mother insisted was intended for her, which she would have then conveyed to Hitler)!)[36]—was actually, on the view that the scheme was a plot to overthrow both Churchill's and Hitler's governments, a double signal, which Hitler, unknowingly, would then have revealed to his senior hierarchy, Göring among them, signaling that the moment had come for his overthrow.

When the telegram did not arrive, Hitler flew into his tirade—an act, if one is of the view that Hitler knew of the flight beforehand—and Göring, as we have seen, put on another act and pretended to know nothing about the whole thing, even though he also "covered his tracks" by ordering General Galland to shoot Hess down, long after it was even possible to do so!

While this (possible) circus was taking place in Germany, things would have been no less messy on the British side, for the Duke of Hamilton, on his account of the events, made no attempt to contact London until the afternoon of May 11th, after he had seen Hess and after he had visited the crash site of his Me 110. When he did contact London, he phoned the Permanent Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office, Alexander Cadogan. Cadogan, however, was away, and a heated exchange occurred between the Duke and another official who refused to put a call through to Cadogan without knowing the reason. Fortunately, perhaps, for the blood pressure of both men, Churchill's private secretary, John Colville suddenly showed up, and the call was given to him![37]

[36] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 226.

If one suspects that Colville's arrival at this precise juncture is a little too much like a badly written libretto, just wait, for Colville and Hamilton both wrote accounts of this incident, which "make somewhat odd reading, not least because of the extraordinary discrepancies between them".[38] In the Duke's account, Coville is alleged to have stated that the Prime Minister ordered him to the Foreign Office because the Duke had "some interesting information" to convey.[39]

Coville's account, however, is pure Mozart.

According to his version published in 1985, his very first words to the Duke of Hamilton were "Has somebody arrived?," a statement that suggests that "he, at least, was expecting a certain 'somebody'".[40] But his explanation for why he expected a "certain 'somebody'" is pure farce, for he claimed to have been thinking "unaccountably" of a novel by Peter Fleming—and yes, that's the brother of Ian Fleming, the author of the James Bond novels—titled Flying Visit, published in 1940. In the novel, Hitler himself parachutes into Great Britain, whereupon he has some "adventures" which include "winning first prize in a village fête fancy-dress competition"![41] More importantly, in his version, the conversation between him and Hamilton took place in the morning and not, as Hamilton maintained in his account, in the afternoon. Why concoct such a silly tale? In Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's opinion, it was because his first question "gave the game away".[42]

[40] Ibid.

[41] Ibid.

In any case, phone calls were made, and the Duke of Hamilton did fly to have dinner with Churchill at Ditchley Hall. It was after dinner that Hamilton briefed Churchill, when

> Churchill uttered words that have become the stuff of legend: 'Well, Hess or no Hess, I'm going to see the Marx Brothers'. This insouciance is usually taken to show the true bulldog spirit at its best. Deputy Führers may fall out of planes, but old Winnie is so unimpressed that he calmly watches Groucho and the gang as planned. However, as with much else in this story, Churchill's words might not have meant quite what they seemed.[43]

Who were the "Marx brothers"? This was not a reference to a film, but rather, a code that Churchill used with the Duke of Hamilton to refer to the Royal Family, and in particular, the brother-princes of King George VI.[44]

B. From the Tower to Maindiff

Much of Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's work is concerned with a very careful reconstruction and analysis of Hess' stay in Great Britain, based on the work of David Irving and others, and a careful analysis and well-argued speculation on what the various moves meant. Accordingly, it is simply too lengthy to be reviewed here. There are, however, certain features of these moves that must be mentioned. As has already been seen, Hess was eventually brought to the Tower of London under conditions of extreme secrecy, where he remained briefly, during which period he was drugged, and measured for a duplicate of his Luftwaffe uniform. From there until June 25, 1942, Hess was held at Mytchett Place under very tight security. Here, all accounts agree: Hess' mental and emotional behavior appeared to deteriorate dramatically, with Hess claiming he was suffering from amnesia, unable to recall the circumstances of how he had come to be captive, and even at times unable to recall prominent features of his life and family.

On June 25, 1942 Hess was moved to Maindiff Court in Wales. This move, however, occurred with no military escort. Hess was simply driven to Maindiff minus any of the normal security one would assume a prisoner of his stature merited. The reason for the move appears in part to have been because the British learned of a plot by the Polish government-in-exile to try to kidnap Hess.[45] Oddly, however, in spite of this apparent threat, news of Hess' transfer and location was carefully leaked to the Daily Mail, a national tabloid published a further article on his life in captivity in September 1943.[46]

[43] Picknett, prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 229.

Yet in early May, 1942, SS Obergruppenführer Reinhard Heydrich circulated a report to Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop stating that his agents had placed Hess in Scotland at the same time that according to the standard narrative he was supposed to be in Mytchett, soon to be transferred to Maindiff.[47] According to Peter Padfield, this report was generated by contacts between one of his agents and a Briton who had contact with an influential circles in Great Britain, which one may reasonably assume to be the "peace group" Hess came to see. According to the report.

> The Englishman stated that in December last year he had spent four days in London with Hess at his (Hess') express with with the approval of Churchill. Hess was housed in a villa in Scotland, had his personal servants and wanted for nothing. Churchill had expressly decreed that Hess, on account of his rank as SS Gruppenfürer, should be accommodated as a general. On the agent asking whether the Englishman had the impression that Hess was, perhaps, somewhat mentally confused, he received the answer that the Englishman had not gained this impression.[48]

The rest of this report has an incredible element, for far from being imprisoned in the Tower of London, Heydrich's report states that the Englishman had Hess driving around London under escort. These features lead Padfield to conclude that the report may have been part of an intelligence deception campaign.[49]

---

[45] Picknett, prince, and Prior, op. cit., pp. 353-354.

[46] Ibid., p. 355.

[48] Padfield, op. cit., p. 280f, citing R. Heyrdrich to Reichsaussenminister, 4 May 1942, F & CO 434005, Annex, pp. 1-2, 434006-7.

[49] Padfield, op. cit., p. 288.

But like everything else in the Hess Mess, the report is capable of more than one interpretation depending on the scenario one is arguing. For Picknett, Prince, and Prior, the Heydrich report poses a much more significant problem, for if one assumed that its basic premise that Hess was in Scotland was true, then "what was going on at Maindiff Court? If he was not there in the period between June 1942 and October 1945, what about the carefully stage-managed 'public appearances': the drives in the country, the picnics and the walks?"[50]

Their answer, simply, is that the fact that the "Hess" who returned to Nuremberg in 1945 lacked the proper scaring from World War One war wounds means that at some point during his stay in Britain, a double was substituted for the real Hess, who remained, in their view, in Scotland.

Thus, on their view, the drugging sessions "Hess" underwent, particularly after his arrival at Maindiff in Wales, were mind-control sessions, to create the necessary "memories" in the double and to test their resiliency under drugged interrogation.[51] Recall, in this respect, not only "Hess'" own strange statements in this regard, but his peculiar behavior at Nuremberg, and American intelligence mandarin Allen Dulles own suspicions. One may add an additional speculation here: why did the British build an entire "Hess suite" at their military hospital in Berlin? One answer might be that an elaborate, and secure, facility was needed to conduct any memory "reinforcement" mind control sessions that a double may have required. In this respect, the strange visit of Wolf-Rüdiger to Spandau, and his father's equally strange behavior that caused the visit, should be borne in mind.

This hypothesis has its difficulties, not the least of which, as Picknett, Prince and Prior admit, is persuading a double to accept the real Hess' fate,[52] yet, this difficulty disappears if, indeed, sophisticated mind-control techniques were employed on the double. In any case, a double does appear to have been planted, and very early on at that. This rationalizes a number of things, including the strict prohibition of taking pictures of "Hess" while he was in captivity, plus the duplicate uniform. Indeed, Fraser-Smith, the man whom we saw was tasked to create this uniform, entertained doubts about the identity of "Hess".[53]

[50] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 356f.

There is other anecdotal evidence to support this hypothesis, for Picknett, Prince, and Prior indicate that a Scots Guards member, who was a member of Hess' guard detail, asserted Hess was in the Tower of London, and had been taken to secret meetings with Churchill in late June 1941. This story of secret meetings between Hess and Churchill were corroborated by RAF military police. The problem is, these meetings took place while "Hess," according to official accounts, was at Mytchett Place.[54]

Politically, there could be any number of reasons for the creation and substitution of a double, from the need to protect the real Hess from assassination, kidnapping, or rescue attempts,[55] to the need of the Churchill government to present a façade that "Hess was cooperating" with the sitting British government and not trying to topple it.[56]

C. Ducal Difficulties, Royal Protection and Reception Committees

The various versions of the double hypothesis—from Thomas' to Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's—also raise a very different question: If a double was indeed inserted into the opera in Britain, then what happened to the real Hess?

In my estimation it is here that Picknett, Prince, and Prior have offered the most complete scenario, one that makes the most sense of the most data points in the whole Hess Mess, and which, in turn, raises in even starker relief that as yet One Unstated Question. The key to this scenario is one very significant fact: when Hess realized his situation and that he had fallen into the hands of people who were not part of the scheme, he repeatedly stated that he had come, and was under, "the King's personal protection," and repeatedly insisted that messages be taken directly to George VI.[57]

[53] Picknett, Prince, and Prior., p. 370.

[54] Ibid., p. 371.

[55] Ibid. They note that the rumored Polish kidnapping or assassination plot, one of the ostensible causes of Hess' move from Mytchett Place to Maindiff Court, may actually have been a rescue attempt. This fits with the composition of the "reception" committee that was in Scotland to meet Hess, some of which was comprised of representatives of the Polish government in exile. As we shall discover, the likelihood of such an attempt grows once one knows the full scope of their scenario.

In other words, the Crown itself may have been one component of the British "peace faction" with which Hess had been indirectly negotiating.

In this respect, Picknett, Prince, and Prior make mention of a bit of information that came from a "confidential source" in Britain's Ministry of Defence, who had high-level contacts with the Foreign Office. Like all information from anonymous contacts, it should be evaluated accordingly. However, this bit of information is so significant that it must be mentioned. Their contact, whom they codenamed "Alexander," was asked about Hess' claim to be under Royal Protection. His answer concerned a British colonel named Pilcher, whom the Royal family had ordered to be held incommunicado at Balmoral Palace from 1941 to his death in 1970. Why had Pilcher been subject to such a "palatial prison"? Because according to "Alexander," Colonel Pilcher had signed "a letter of safe conduct in the King's name".[58] This, as they point out, would explain a great deal about the apparent confusion on the night of Hess' capture, for if he indeed had on his person a letter of safe conduct, what were the apprehending authorities to do? Was the letter fake? Was it real? As we shall see in a moment, the possibility of such a letter does rationalize the mysterious presence of the Polish officer Battaglia that night.

For the moment, however, one must inquire whether or not there is any corroborating fact of royal involvement in the scheme at such a high level; was the Crown itself possibly involved.

There does appear to be one intriguing fact that would indicate Royal family interest in such a negotiated peace with Germany, beyond Edward VIII, the Duke of Windsor's, own personal friendliness toward the Nazis. This is the fact that the Queen Mother's brother, David Bowes Lyon, was a member of the Anglo-

German Fellowship,[59] an organization also heavily suffused with peers and other members of British high society.

All of this brings us finally to Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's masterstroke: the relationship of the Hess Flight to the death of the Duke of Kent, King George VI's younger brother, in a tragic air crash in Scotland in August 1942. The Duke of Kent was urbane, sophisticated, multi-lingual, and most importantly, functioned as a kind of personal intelligence officer to his brother the King, and had personally met and dined with Hess, Rosenberg, and Ribbentrop before the war.[60]

He was also allegedly a member of the "reception committee" waiting at Dungavel for Hess' arrival, along with representatives of the Polish government in exile and the international Red Cross. With the mention of the Poles, we arrive at one crucial element of their scenario, for they point out that the head of the Polish government in exile had offered the throne of Poland—long vacant—to the Duke of Kent.[61] The presence of the Poles in the reception committee thus is logical from two points of view: (1) the Poles would have to have been involved in any general peace settlement between Britain and Germany, because of the former's guarantee and the latter's military occupation of the country, and (2) in this author's opinion, because the offer of the Polish throne to the Duke of Kent may have been a component of the peace plan previously negotiated between Hess and his British counterparts; for the Germans, the Duke would have represented an acceptable head of state for any reestablished Polish rump state. This now rationalizes why a Polish officer was allowed to speak to Hess for two hours in German without supervision. One may even speculate that, perhaps, he was a personal liaison from the Duke of Kent.[62]

All of these things suggest additionally that the "peace plan's" details were already worked out in considerable depth; Hess, in other words, had come not to continue negotiations, but rather, to "finalize" the deal. This also explains another fact previously mentioned: the strange and sudden decline in the intensity of the two countries' bombing campaigns against each other.[63] It had become a "second phony war".[64] This near cessation of intense bombing suggests once again that not only was there coordination between the British and German sides surrounding Hess' peace mission, but that Hess and Göring were both involved in the plot. This idea was confirmed by Hess himself in his statements to Churchill's representative, Ivone Kirkpatrick, for he stated that "he and Göring were working to the same agenda".[65]

[62] Ibid., p. 284f.: They also point out that in the records that speak of meetings between Hess and "the Duke" that in some cases this may not be the Duke of Hamilton, but the King's younger brother, the Duke of Kent.

We have seen that at some point, a "double" is created and makes his appearance in the opera. But this does not resolve yet another problem, for as we have seen, the real Hess was in the hands, not of the "peace party" but of Churchill's government.

Enter the Duke of Kent.

Picknett, Prince, and Prior recount the story of Evelyn Criddle, whose father was related to the Earl of Pembroke, a relationship whose significance will be evident in a moment. According to her story, when she was a little girl she spent time near Maindiff Court in Wales, and saw a "very tall man" whom her father told her was Rudolf Hess. The only problem was, Hess was not in Maindiff Court itself, but in a small house nearby owned by the Herbert family, i.e., by the Earl of Pembroke![66] The real problem, however, is not the apparently "bi-locating" Hess, but that Hess was in the home of the Earl of Pembroke. Why is this significant? Because the Earl was "the equerry to the Duke of Kent,"[67] a point that indicates that the "peace party" had regained control of the real Hess.

[63] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 323.

[64] Ibid., pp. 324-325. It should be noted, however, that there was another problem as far as the British, and later, the American bombing campaigns were concerned, and this was the extensive network of radars, anti-aircraft guns, and fighter air defense coordination that Germany had constructed in Western Europe that was making bomber losses too high even for nighttime raids. This system had to be degraded sufficiently for the bomber offensive to have any real hope of success, and this degradation did not really begin to show its signs until 1943. This system was so effective that the British staged a commando raid on the coast of France in 1942 to literally steal one of the German radar equipments in order to learn its secrets and to aid in the air defense system degradation campaign.

The real Hess was apparently returned to Scotland, where he was seen in 1942 by Robin Sinclair, the Lord Thurso, in 1942, while "Hess" stayed in Maindiff Court.[68] According to Thurso, Hess was quartered in Braemore Lodge. At this juncture, the Duke of Kent and his tragic flight enter the picture.[69]

On the 25th of August, 1942, the Duke of Kent took off in a Short-Sunderland flying boat, allegedly on a good-will flight to visit British troops stationed in Iceland. Tragically, his aircraft crashed on a rocky crag in Scotland known as Eagle's Rock. The Duke was killed, becoming the first member of the Royal Family to die in military service in five centuries.

However, it appears that the Duke may not have been flying to Iceland, but rather, that this was a cover story. For one thing, the Duke's flying boat, curiously, was painted white, the color for aircraft flying to and from neutral Sweden,[70] suggesting that Sweden, not Iceland, was the destination. After all, a flight from Scotland to Iceland would be unlikely to encounter hostile Luftwaffe aircraft. A flight to Sweden, however, easily could.

There is another anomaly, however, and that is by careful consultation and comparison of various records, there appears to have been an unaccounted-for body on the Duke of Kent's aircraft, a body, moreover, that it appears that King George VI himself personally made inquiries about when he visited his younger brother's crash site.[71] Additionally, the flight plan itself has disappeared, and the weather service personnel on the east coast of Scotland were sworn to secrecy and forced to sign Britain's Official Secrets Act. Why the weather personnel on the east coast of Scotland? Because the Duke of Kent's aircraft had taken off from the east coast and not, as one would expect for a flight to Iceland, the west coast.[72]

[69] Again, space simply does not permit a thorough review of the Duke of Kent's flight. This is one of the most fascinating and meticulously researched and detailed components of Picknett's, Prince's and Prior's reconstructions, and they subject the Duke of Kent's final flight to a very thorough and intense analysis from pp. 377-408.

[70] Ibid., p. 423.

[71] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., pp. 406-408.

It seems reasonable to conclude along with Picknett, Prince and Prior that the Duke of Kent perished in a flight that was designed to return the real Hess to Germany via Sweden, a country through which Göring had conducted his own peace discussions. Whether the Duke was acting out of the protocols of war and returning an envoy who had come under a flag of truce, or was flying on to Germany to complete final arrangements in the deal, or was simply removing Hess from imminent danger from Churchill’s government, is unknown.[73] I suspect that the Duke’s flight was about more than mere chivalry, but in any case, they are correct to note all the other possibilities for his flight, because like everything else in the Hess Mess, it is open to interpretation.

There is one final and quite disturbing possibility about the Duke of Kent’s flight. Noting that the memorial in Scotland erected to him and his companions on the flight reads that they were “on a special mission,”[74] they also produce a cable from the German Ambassador in Portugal to his boss, von Ribbentrop, in the German Foreign Ministry. The subject of the cable was the Duke of Kent’s death in the crash of his flying boat:

> As the Embassy has learned, confidentially, the death of the Duke of Kent has been discussed recently in the innermost circles of the British Club here. The gist of the talk being that an act of sabotage was involved. It is said that the Duke, like the Duke of Windsor, was sympathetic towards an understanding with Germany and so gradually had become a problem for the government clique. The people who were accompanying him were supposed to have expressed themselves along similar lines, so that getting them out of the way would also have been an advantage.[75]

Similarly, General Sikorski, head of the Polish government in exile and who had offered the Polish crown to the Duke of Kent, also died, mere months later, in July 1943, in an air crash off Gibraltar.[76]

In other words, two principal players had been eliminated, Hess himself and the Duke of Kent, and with them were removed key components of the possible peace plan—the Duke of Kent as proposed Polish monarch, and Hess as acceptable replacement for Hitler—had been removed from the equation. Additionally, a very serious message had been sent to the King and Royal family, one indicating that further interference would not be acceptable. And finally, of course, the head of the Polish government in exile might also have been "taken out". Everyone who could talk about the "details" of the plan—many of which have not yet been discussed, were eliminated.

D. A Short but Necessary Final Tangent: The Hess Flight and the Rise of Martin Bormann

There is a final aspect of Hess' flight, one that, unusually, is not considered by the main Hess Mess investigators, but which is normally only mentioned in books not concentrating on Hess' flight. That aspect is the relationship of Hess' flight to the rise of Martin Bormann, for Hess, of course, was replaced by Bormann as the head of the Nazi Party itself, when Hitler abolished the office of Stellvertreter (Deputy) and made Bormann Party Reichsleiter.

This has caused some, such as William Stevenson, to view Bormann as a hidden architect in the affair, not so much participating in the Hess-Göring scheme, as simply encouraging Hess to undertake the mission as a purely selfish political maneuver to remove Hess from power and allow Bormann to advance himself into the powerful position of commanding the party hierarchy.[77] In Stevenson's hands, Hess was the gullible fool, and Haushofer the "crackpot genius" that was used by the master manipulator Bormann to manipulate Hess.[78]

This, as we have seen, relies far too heavily on the post-flight "narrative" that Hess was a fool, insane, weak, and stupid. As we have seen, he was anything but. Additionally, one gets the measure of Hess the man because it was Hess who spotted Bormann's unique "talents" and promoted him to the post of being his personal secretary, the "deputy" of the Deputy Führer.

[77] William Stevenson, The Bormann Brotherhood: A New Investigation of the Escape and Survival of Nazi War Criminals (New York: Bantam Books, 1973), p. 52.

If anything, what emerges from this is that Bormann probably knew, along with Göring and Hitler, that his boss intended to fly to Britain to conclude secret peace negotiations. What Bormann and Göring also possibly knew that Hitler did not, was that those negotiations perhaps included a plan, not only for the removal of Churchill's government, but of Hitler himself. This turns the narrative of those who believe Bormann played Hess in order to advance his own personal power on its head, for had Hess become the head of state, or even retained his role as head of the party in a non-Hitler government, Bormann's power would in all likelihood increased beyond what it did under Hitler.[79]

It is in this context that I believe one must examine another fantastic allegation of Stevenson, namely, that Bormann may have had Heydrich assassinated. He notes that Heinrich "Gestapo" Müller and Walter Schellenberg both thought that Bormann was behind Heydrich's death.[80] If so, then I doubt this was simply a personal maneuver to get rid of a powerful rival, for as we have seen, Heydrich kept a close watch on the Hess affair and was attempting to track his movements in Britain, making his reports to Ribbentrop's Foreign Ministry, and thus by-passing Bormann in the Party headquarters. If Bormann was involved in a plot with Hess (his boss) and Göring to conclude a peace with Britain at the cost of overturning Hitler, sooner or later, Heydrich would have discovered it. Under such circumstances, Bormann had to act, and under such circumstances probably did so with Göring's full knowledge and consent.

As a final note in the Hess Mess, it should be observed that Bormann took over the Hess compound south of Munich in Pullach, which, of course, eventually became the actual headquarters of the Gehlen Organization of German intelligence after the war.[81]

The reader will, of course, have been asking himself a significant question throughout this chapter and, indeed, throughout the book thus far: does any of this really explain the vast amount of secrecy surrounding the Hess Mess?

[79] Bormann's big rival was, of course, Göring, who hated him and who recognized his "talents" for removing and eliminating rivals in the Nazi hierarchy.

[81] Stevenson, op. cit., p. 113.

Does a secret peace plan and coup-plot between elements of the British peerage and the Royal Family on the one hand, and powerful elements of the Nazi hierarchy like Hess and Göring, and possibly Bormann as well, really explain that secrecy to this day? In the contemporary cynical atmosphere toward political institutions and leaders, are we surprised that the Royal Family or elements thereof, or the British nobility, or Nazis, would be kept secret simply to save any of them or their memories potential embarrassment?

As has been outlined thus far, is such a plot really weighty enough to warrant secrecy to this day, Royals or no Royals?

I would contend that it simply is not, and that the biggest question in the whole Hess Mess of doubles, covert operations, planned coups-d'etat against Churchill or Hitler or both—what is the Big Secret?—remains unanswered, and that to appreciate the reason that London and Berlin both went into a tailspin of panic has yet to be answered. The trouble is, no one can answer it.

All we have is speculation, and a few clues in the statements and research of the principals, to which we shall add our own dataset. What emerges is something horrifyingly grandiose, and grandiosely horrifying.

SACRIFICES, SURRENDERS, STATEMENTS, AND STATES

"... after one of the Berlin crises, the Western Powers should have immediately declared that now they also no longer felt bound by the agreements with the Soviet Union on joint responsibility for Spandau. But, as it is, they never made such a declaration. On the contrary, the Western Powers continued to emphasize the Four-Power agreement on Berlin of 1972... the Four Powers again reaffirmed their intention to maintain their joint responsibility for Germany and Berlin, i.e., including Spandau".
Wolf Rudiger Hess[1]

"To deal with these peoples, thus regarded as only semi-human, Lanz recommended variously: ...deportation to Madagascar; enslavement, incineration as a sacrifice to God; and use as beasts of burden".
Joscelyn Godwin[2]

ONE OF THE MOST OBVIOUS BITS OF DEBRIS in the whole Hess Mess, and therefore, one of the most overlooked things about the Hess Mess because of that very obviousness, is the fact that for four decades and two years after the end of the Second World War, through all the vicissitudes of the Cold War including the Cuban Missile Crisis, the four powers, even as they were on the brink of nuclear war with each other, remained oddly united about the matter of Rudolf Hess; though the ICBMs might fly and hydrogen bombs might burn and fallout flake down in a deadly rain, Hess—or his double—had to remain imprisoned at Spandau.

To put that astonishing consideration in simpler terms: Prisoner Number Seven transcended the momentary Cold War confrontations and geopolitics, and this fact alone suggests the immensity of whatever secret lies buried in all the debris of the Hess Mess.

[1] Wolf Rudiger Hess, My Father Rudolf Hess (1986), pp. 303-304.

[2] Joscelyn Godwin, Arktos: The Polar Myth in Science, Symbolism, and Nazi Survival, p. 49.

When put this way, the implication follows that whatever the secret is, all four powers knew it, or, knew at least a part of it, and were thus complicit in... "something".

It might be objected that at the time of the Cuban Missile Crisis that Hess, or his double, was not the sole remaining Nazi in Spandau Prison, and this is true. But this only highlights another glaring problem, namely, that Grand Admiral Karl Dönitz, the actual legal head of state and government at the end of World War Two, had been in Allied custody since its end. Yet, they had taken no steps to ensure that he personally signed any document of the surrender of the German state itself, nor any document outlawing the Nazi Party. After his death, this left only Speer—released the same day as Dönitz—and "Hess" as the last remaining individuals who could have any legal claim to any offices of the Reich, and between the two, "Hess," as we have seen, held far more official posts both within the state and, as Hitler's Deputy, the Nazi Party. Yet, no effort was undertaken to tidy up the legal niceties, and that indeed may have been the point: so long as "Hess" was alive, those niceties remained to connect the modern German state to the previous one in an unbroken chain of legal ties dating—if one wanted to assemble the mountain of documentation to sustain the argument—all the way back to the Holy Roman Empire. Perhaps, for whatever reason, the Four Allied Powers wished to break that link entirely.

The peculiarities of the surrender of the Nazi Party (or rather, the lack thereof) notwithstanding, the uneasy fact is that "Hess" remained a point of odd and anomalous unanimity among the Four Powers even at other moments of heightened tension during the Cold War, long after the other Spandau Nazis were dead.

The One Question, in other words, does not disappear with these considerations; they only serve to emphasize its immensity. In this connection, it will be recalled that "Hess" himself stated to his nurse, Abdallah Melaouhi, that if the Soviets reversed their veto on his release, then the British, at least, would murder him, and it is unlikely that the Soviets would not have known this. Their offer was thus quite cynical, given the fact that it was the Soviets had who had pressed for the death sentence for "Hess" at Nuremberg in the first place.

His death itself, and its timing, also forms part of the mystery, for it is as if "Hess'" death was the agreed-upon signal to flip a switch, for within half of a decade of his death, the leaders of three of the countries that had stood guard over him—Gorbachev, Reagan, and Thatcher—were gone; Reagan's vice president, George Herbert Walker Bush, whose father had his own odd connections to the Nazis, was President; Germany was reunified, and within months, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia were broken up; Margaret Thatcher was ousted from her premiership and from the Conservative Party leadership, fulminating against the growing signs of a European Union from the back benches, warning of the dangers of a common currency and the loss of British sovereignty.

Lest any connection between the Hess Mess and the sudden and dramatic fall of Mrs. Thatcher seem to be stretching a point, Picknett, Prince and Prior revealed that during their contacts with their anonymous whistleblower "Alexander," the latter had mentioned that the Prime Minister's personal secretary, Ian Gow "had told Hugh Thomas that in return for the latter's dropping of his allegations that Hess was murdered, the government would be prepared to admit that there was doubt about the identity of the prisoner. We were able to confirm this".[3] That corroboration came in the form of an appearance of Thomas on Dutch television in 1998, where he stated that a group of "Tory Dry"[4] members of Parliament had approached him, claiming to represent Mr. Gow and wanting to "clear the cupboard of skeletons" first.[5] Thomas, of course, refused to drop his murder allegations and the negotiations ended. Perhaps one should not be surprised that Mr. Gow was murdered by a car bomb a few months later, with the murder, which remains unsolved, said to be the work of the IRA.[6] While there might be many possible motivations for Mr. Gow's murder, the Hess Mess must remain as one of those possibilities.

Like all dark operas, however, the last analytical act is usually the most dramatic and foreboding.

A. Israel, Hess, and the Grand Dame of Conspiracy Theory

1. The Israelis and Hess

While Picknett, Prince, and Prior have done yeomen's work in filtering, examining, and analyzing a veritable mountain of details of the Hess Mess and constructing one of the most comprehensive scenarios, it is Peter Padfield who has analyzed details that suggest new twists to their own scenario of Royal involvement with Hess' peace plan, and their corollary scenario of a possible international and bi-lateral coup d'etat plot against Churchill and Hitler. Padfield's analysis, when integrated with theirs, and with additional information uncovered by this author in the 1980s and disclosed in a previous book, gives hitherto unknown—and horrific—depths to the Hess Mess, and begins to approach a real basis from which to rationalize all the secrecy, obfuscated data, and "removed files".

The core of Padfield's analysis integrates the other great tragedy of World War Two—the Holocaust and the so-called "Jewish Question"—into the parameters of Hess' peace plan. In this respect, it is worth pointing out a few details that that strongly suggest this factor not only is in play, but may be a principal element.

Other researchers, however, have uncovered indicators of a relationship to Hess' peace mission and the so-called "Jewish Question". For example, Picknett, Prince, and Prior point out that the government of Israel made numerous requests to Great Britain to be able to interview "Spandau Hess" about his peace proposals. These requests were always refused.[7] One may, of course, speculate as to why these refusals were made. If "Spandau Hess" was a double, there was a risk that the Israelis would discover this, and this discovery would in turn ignite inquiries about what had happened to the real Hess, and when, and why. If "Spandau Hess" was the real Hess then this might jeopardize a much larger secret, which I will advance in this chapter for the first time.

Wolf-Rüdiger Hess went further, stating that during the Camp David accord meetings in September, 1978 between President Jimmy Carter, Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, and Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin, that Begin allegedly privately and secretly warned Carter that "Hess" must not leave Spandau alive. Wolf Hess records no source for this allegation, nor does he indicate whether or not Begin communicated the reason for this solemn warning to Carter or not.[8] As will be seen, the speculative scenario I will offer in this chapter might explain, in part, why such a warning might have been made, if indeed Wolf Hess' allegation is true.

[7] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 499.

It was Wolf Hess who was the first researcher who thought that there was a connection between "the Jewish Question" and his father's peace mission:

> As is known, my father presented Churchill with the plan for a world peace conference. Perhaps the European Jewish Question was to be solved at this meeting as well. For years, Germany had had an interest in the emigration of as many Jews as possible. Due to the Haavara Agreement, which enabled Jewish emigrants to transfer their entire fortune—albeit only to Palestine—emigration was no problem. In 1939, however, the British had imposed strict quotas on the immigration of Jews into Palestine—a country which did not even belong to the British—and restricted such immigration to wealthy Jews only. So the Haavara Agreement saw to it that Jews with insufficient wealth could get a loan large enough for them to meet the immigration criteria so that they could leave Germany nevertheless. And in fact, Jews left Germany for Palestine as late as 1941. (This is proven, for example, by Werner Feilchenfeld, Haavara-Transfer nach Palästina... Tübingen, 1972...) Despite that, the stubborn anti-Jewish attitude of the British hampered Germany's plans and incidentally does not shine a very positive light on British policies with respect to Jews. It is not impossible that my father was to negotiate with the British on this issue.[9]

Obviously, Wolf Hess' statements should be taken cautiously, for whatever British policies may have been towards its Jews, it certainly was not rounding them up, shipping them to camps, forcing them to work exhausting hard labor on a starvation diet, gassing them to death, and cremating them!

[8] Wolf-Rüdiger Hess, Who Murdered My Father, Rudolf Hess?, p. 156.

[9] Ibid., p. 158.

Or... did Wolf Hess perhaps suspect something, a deeper story? There is a deeper story, one outlined by Peter Padfield, but as we shall now discover, even that story has a much deeper root than anyone ever imagined.

2. Hess, Halifax, Hamilton, Chamberlain, Churchill, the Reichskristallnacht, The Balfour Declaration, and the "Jewish Question"

Padfield notes that Hess, as the "Conscience of the Party," lived up to his nickname. During the planning for the "Night of the Long Knives," Hitler's abrupt counter-coup and murder of Ernst Rohm and other top leaders of the SA, it was Hess who, according to witnesses, could be heard arguing with Hitler behind closed doors, insisting that this or that name on Hitler's death list be spared. After the Night of the Long Knives, Hitler's brutality had aged Hess by several years, and even changed his signature. Hess' stomach problems and insomnia date from this time.[10] It was, in Padfield's estimation, the first of two major "psychic shocks" to Hess' system.

The other was the nation-wide pogrom against Germany's Jews, the Reichskristallnacht, which had a similarly profound effect on Hess. Padfield states that "The oppositionist von Hassell recorded in his diary how Hess' old Munich friends, the Bruckmanns, had told him of Hess' despair at the nation-wide pogrom; he had been depressed 'as never before' and beseeched the Führer to stop the outrages, without success".[11] Interestingly enough, Lord Halifax, an alleged member of the British "peace faction" which Hess was trying to contact on the night of his infamous flight, was similarly disgusted by the pogrom. Halifax initiated a discussion in the cabinet to try to help Germany's Jews. The idea of a Jewish homeland inevitably occurred, and even though the British had a mandate in Palestine, this solution was rejected for fear of angering the region's Arabs. Western Australia and British Guiana "were considered briefly as possible Jewish homelands".[12]

Later, with war looming, the Chamberlain government actually published a White Paper on the Jewish Question in May 1939. In the paper, the Chamberlain government outlined a proposal for Palestine to become an independent state in ten years[13] with the population ratio of Arabs to Jews to be carefully regulated at a ratio of two to one, with initial Jewish immigration to be limited to 75,000 people for the first five years, and after that, no further immigration without Arab consent. Churchill, appealing to the Balfour Declaration of 1917, "denounced this blatant propitiation of the Arabs as a repudiation of Balfour's pledge to the Zionists, which it was".[14] Nonetheless, Parliament approved the plan.

The Balfour Declaration itself may be one of the shortest yet most explosive political documents in history:

> Foreign Office, November 2nd, 1917
> Dear Lord Rothschild,
>
> I have much pleasure in conveying to you on behalf of His Majesty's Government the following declaration of sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations, which has been submitted to and approved by the Cabinet:
>
> "His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country".
> I should be grateful if you would bring this Declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.
>
> Yours sincerely,
> Arthur James Balfour[15]

---

[13] It is interesting to note that the timing was unusually accurate in one respect, for Israel was recognized as a nation in 1948.

The Balfour Declaration

The Zionist movement cast a wide net of influence prior to and during World War One[16] and this network of influence continued up to World War Two, and included prominent Nazis in its network. Padfield, for example, points out that none other than Adolf Eichmann visited Palestine in November 1937, with the express purpose of visiting Zionist leaders there, four months after the Peel Commission had published its recommendations. This commission was yet another British government study on Palestine. It recommended dividing the region into two states, a Jewish one in the north, and a larger Arab state in the south. The Zionist leaders in Palestine "told Eichmann that if the English showed an inclination to postpone partition, the Jewish defence organisation would open hostilities against them. They further said they were delighted by the 'radical' German Jewish policy which would drive more Jews to emigrate to Palestine and give them a majority over the Arabs within foreseeable time".[17] Eichmann's visit was not without fruits, for noted scholar Christopher Simpson records that an arrangement was made between the Zionist guerilla-terrorist organization Haganah and the SS, with the latter actually providing funds to the Zionist organization in return for intelligence on British activities in Palestine.[18] The Zionists, in other words, were prepared to deal with anyone, even the sworn enemies of their own people, if it served to advance their cause.

[16] Robert John, op. cit., pp. 50-51, 54. John notes that, peculiarly, the central executive of the Zionist organization was in Berlin, and that it had memberships throughout Eastern Europe, the bulk of its membership strength being in Austria-Hungary and Imperial Russia. This state of affairs moved Chaim Weizmann, who would later figure so prominently in the affairs of the state of Israel, to locate provisional executive offices in the USA. This was done, with prominent Jewish-Americans formally becoming a part of this committee, including US Supreme Court justice Louis Brandeis, Felix Frankfurter, and the famous Rabbi Stephen Wise, who would later organize the pre-World War Two Jewish boycott of Nazi Germany. Both the European and American branches of this movement viewed Tsarist Russia as their principal target during World War One, while continuing to lobby both the Western Allied Powers and the Central Powers for the creation of a Jewish homeland. Henry Morgenthau, for example, became a major contributor for President Wilson's campaign, and was rewarded by an ambassadorship to Turkey. (John, op. cit. p. 53). Later, of course, he became Franklin Roosevelt's Treasury Secretary, and a feature of the bearer bonds scandals, as well as authoring the notorious "Morgenthau" plan for the sterilization of Germans after World War Two, and the breakup of Germany into three smaller, agrarian states. While Zionists in Britain lobbied through Lord Rothschild for a Palestinian Jewish state, their counterparts in Berlin during World War One dangled the prospect of a puppet Turkish government in front of Berlin, a new market for German goods, in return (again) for a declaration in favor of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, and soliciting friendly declarations for this purpose from the German Foreign Ministry. Konstantin von Neurath drew up such a declaration, and it was signed by then Reich Chancellor Theobald von Bettmann-Hollweg in 1915. (John, p. 54) Von Neurath, of course, was one of "Hess'" fellow prisoners in Spandau Prison, and was the German Foreign Minister from 1932-1938, and Reich Protector of Bohemia from 1939-1943.

What emerges from this is a pattern, both on the Zionist side of the equation, and on the Great Powers side of the equation, of a concerted interest in having an established Zionist-Jewish state. In the interwar period, several versions of the "international Zionist-Socialist" conspiracy raged, not only on the continent of Europe, but in Great Britain as well, where the "grand Dame of conspiracy theory," the scholarly but erratic Nesta Webster, influenced the peace-circles which were connected to the Duke of Hamilton.[19]

3. Lord Victor Rothschild, MI-5, the Communists, and Colonel Pilcher Again

Unfortunately, these ideas of international Zionist-Socialist conspiracies were not entirely unfounded. Before World War Two, Lord Victor Rothschild became a member of a Cambridge secret society called the Apostles society, a group enamored of Communism ostensibly because of its "scientific Marxist" views. But Rothschild had unusual friends in this society: Anthony Blunt and Guy Burgess—two of the notorious "Cambridge Five," the five moles for Soviet intelligence in British society, government and intelligence.[20] One researcher actually believes that it was Victor Rothschild who was the unknown "fifth man" in the notorious spy ring, and who actually recruited Philby, Blunt, MacLean and Burgess. It was, for example, Rothschild who joined MI-5's counter-sabotage division in 1940, and then sponsored his friend, Blunt, into MI-5.[21] Much more importantly, Victor Rothschild may have exercised influence via the Churchill government to have Colonel Pilcher neutralized and, effectively, internally exiled.[22] Pilcher, it will be recalled, was on the King's personal staff, and allegedly wrote the cover letter for Hess granting Royal protection.

[20] Padfield, op. cit., p. 271.

It is with Colonel Pilcher that Padfield's scenario really begins, for the mysterious British colonel apparently communicated a note to another 1970s Hess Mess researcher, De Courcy, outlining what the Hess mission had really been all about. Here it is necessary to cite Padfield extensively, and his citations of De Courcy's note about Pilcher. According to Padfield, Pilcher's note to De Courcy

> ...suggested that Hess came over with the knowledge of the Abwehr chief, Admiral Canaris, and the real object was to topple Hitler. This runs counter to everything known about Hess' character and his blind loyalty to the Führer... The note continued:
> "Hess had become alarmed about the war and coming Nazi excesses. He believed a total reversal of strategy and policy to be essential. He had heard stories that Queen Mary, the Duke of Windsor, the Dukes of Westminster and Bucclech, the Marquis of Londonderry, Lords Halifax and Rushcliffe, Basil Liddell Hart and R.A. Butler thought so too.
>
> "His idea was the evacuation of France, Belgium, Holland, Norway and Denmark, peace with England and placement of the Jews to Palestine...
> "War with Russia would however be prosecuted".
>
> The Special Office brief went on:
> "It was that factor which aroused the profound anxieties of the pro-Russian Party in Britain which brought vast pressure upon Churchill to stifle the whole project.

Before continuing, note what is really being said here: the "pro-Russia" party is that faction that Picknett, Prince, and Prior, and other Hess Mess researchers, have called variously the “Churchill party” or “Churchill clique”. Indeed, this was its name among Hess and his German co-conspirators. But this party, we now note, is comprised of a certain circle within MI-5, with direct ties to Victor Rothschild, whose family was pro-Zionist, and who sponsored at least one later-known Soviet mole—Blunt—into MI-5, and who was certainly suspiciously associated with the rest of the Cambridge spy group of Burgess, MacLean, Blunt, and Philby. We continue with the citation of Padfield:

---

[21] Ibid., p. 272.

[22] Ibid., p. 273.

> “One man threatened to leak the facts—Colonel W.S. Pilcher... commanding the Grenadier Guards at Windsor. He was dealt with, relieved of his command... and thereafter ordered to Scotland. He lived the rest of his life a virtual recluse until he died in 1970... His exit from a former social life was remarkable.”..
> In a confidential memo headed ‘Colonel W.S. Pilcher, de Courcy expanded on the aim of toppling Hitler:
> “When Hess arrived Pilcher learned something at (sic) his mission which, to a limited extent, fitted into his opinions—at least it was clear that Germany could be turned East, would reduce in the West to a substantial extent and that as Germany became weaker powerful elements within the armed forces and upper classes would turn against Hitler.[23]

This isn’t even second-hand dead man’s testimony, but fourth-hand dead man’s testimony, with the ultimate and penultimate sources, Hess and Pilcher respectively, both long dead. We are thus dependent on a claim about the peace plan that runs from Hess to Pilcher to de Courcy and finally to Padfield.

Nevertheless, there are certain features to note here: Hess’ peace plane was also

1) A comprehensive peace plan that included all of Western Europe’s German occupied territories in France, Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg, Denmark, and Norway; in return for

---

[23] Padfield, op. cit., p. 274f.

2) A British guarantee of a German free hand in Eastern Europe; and,
3) A Jewish homeland component.

In this, Hess' plan does not vary with other researchers' conclusions except in two details: the Jewish homeland component, and, here for the first time, the mention of Norway, which, as we shall see in part two, carries further deep implications.

Given what Padfield himself already noted about Hess' character, namely, that he appeared to suffer psychosomatically from Hitler's brutality toward his enemies during the Night of the Long Knives, and later, during the Reichskristallnacht, it is not in my opinion unlikely that Hess would have participated in a coup d'etat against Hitler. As was seen in previous chapters, the peace plan mission has all the hallmarks of being a simultaneous coup plot in London and Berlin.

But with the addition of Padfield's information, one may speculate why such desperate measures were being considered in Germany and Britain, for note that the coup plotters, both British and German, were attempting to provide a Jewish-Zionist homeland, whereas the government they were trying to overthrow in London was opposed to this measure, and the government in Berlin that they were trying to overthrow was prepared to pursue extermination of Jews in the absence of a peace with Britain and a Jewish-Zionist homeland. In this respect, it should be noted that Churchill himself believed that the influential American-Jewish lobby was highly successful in mobilizing support for America's entry into World War One,[24] and thus, from his point of view, could be influential in doing the same in World War Two. To pursue a peace with Germany at the expense of throwing the Soviet Union to the Nazi wolf would only activate those influential lobbies against his government and the British Empire, for those lobbies were, as noted previously, very pro-Soviet.

Padfield, let it be noted, believes that wholesale extermination of Jews was the intention of the Nazi leadership ab initio, and that the various "homeland" proposals, such as Eichmann's proposal for a Jewish-SS (!) state in Madagascar was simply a propaganda ploy to lull Europe's Jewish population into inaction. He cites the fact that long before there was a continent-wide organization of extermination and genocide machinery—the notorious "Final Solution" machinery decided upon at the notorious and infamous Wannsee conference in early 1942—that there were local exterminations and atrocities against Jews.[25] Indeed, it should also be remembered that Hitler conceived operation Barbarossa and the invasion of the Soviet Union as a genocidal war against what he viewed as the Great Power that was home, host, and shelter to the international "Bolshevist-Jewish conspiracy".[26]

However, the standard view that the Final Solution was only given the 'Green light" after 1942 may not be so easily dismissed, for it also cannot be denied that the machinery of a continent-wide genocide was not completely enacted or authorized until after it became clear that a negotiated peace settlement with Britain was no longer possible.

These two views—that (1) local extermination activity presaged the later organized continent-wide activity, and that the latter was planned, and (2) that the plan was activated when a homeland option was no longer feasible—need not be mutually exclusive. For the German peace party, including Hess, it was likely that they knew of the extermination plans, and knew that they would be activated come what may, unless a peace could be concluded that would allow the anti-Hitler factions to topple his government.[27]

[25] Padfield, op. cit., p. 79.

[26] Nor should it be forgotten that Hitler apparently "changed his mind" between the publication of Mein Kampf, in which he advocates a Jewish homeland in Madagascar or other place, and the actual beginning of the war in the east. By that time, Hitler came to hold the opinion that a "Jewish homeland" would only become a kind of Jewish Vatican, a sovereign entity playing home and host to various conspiracies all around the world, and taking special advantage of the "dual status" this would confer. Linder such circumstances, it is clear that the "extermination option" was favored by Hitler. But in this regard, it should also be recalled that Hess was largely responsible for those passages in Mein Kampf—which was also his title for Hitler's "memoirs"—that dealt with questions of geopolitics. The homeland solution was favored by his mentor, General Haushofer, whose wife, let it be recalled, was half Jewish. I therefore do not have difficulty believing that Hess' "homeland" views conflicted with Hitler's growing tendency to favor genocide, and that this would possibly have led Hess to the crisis of conscience and participation in a wider plot against Hitler, in order to stave off the genocide.

Lest this anti-Hitler faction be thought to be a fiction, recall that the brother to the famous author of the James Bond spy novels, Peter Fleming himself, authored a spy novel that was published in 1940 during the height of the German bombing of Britain. In this novel, it will be recalled, Hitler himself parachutes into Great Britain. There is some truth to this novel, for Padfield records that > ...Air Intelligence was confronted with an extraordinary proposal said to have come from Hitler's personal pilot, General Hans Bauer. It originated in Sofia, Bulgaria, in late December 1940. A peasant farmer named Kiroff approached the British Military Attache claiming his daughter was married to Baur. As proof he produced family photographs, Baur, he said, had lost two brothers in the war and had become 'fed up' with the continuous duty for Hitler. He was prepared to aid world peace by attempting a forced landing in England with the Führer and his entourage aboard his plane.

> The Military Attaché passed the matter to the Air Attaché, who reported it to the Air Ministry and the Foreign Office. No one could be found to identify the 'Baur family' photographs; nonetheless the contact was approved by Cadogan; Kiroff was handed instructions detailing signals Baur should fire when approaching the English coast, and special instructions for receiving him in Hitler's four-engined Focke-Wulf Kondor were sent to Lympne aerodrome in Kent.
>
> In the event Baur's Kondor did not arrive. The special arrangements for receiving him were nonetheless kept in force.

---

[27] Padfield, op. cit., pp. 85-86: Padfield here mentions yet another peace initiative that came from Sweden via personal representatives of Reichsmarschall Göring in July 1940, in which the offer was essentially that Britain had to recognize all German conquests in Europe, and allow Germany a "free hand" on the continent in return for German support and recognition of British imperial interests. In this proposal, Germany was apparently ready to throw off its pending alliance with Japan, and to contribute to British defense against the Japanese! This initiative is noteworthy because it resembles the components of Hess' plan insofar as the "free hand in Eastern Europe" is concerned, but omits the general peace plan parameters regarding Western Europe and "the Jewish Question". It does, however, show that Göring was also involved in these peace efforts. Padfield maintained that this effort was done with Hitler's knowledge.

> They were about to be called off in May (1941), but Hess' arrival in Scotland caused the Air Ministry to continue them until the end of the month. Finally on 1 June they were annulled...
> It is possible that this curious plot had some connection with Hess' mission.[28]

Again, Padfield dismisses the idea that Baur could be involved in such a plot on the basis of his loyalty to Hitler,[29] but it should also be noted that according to Padfield, it was Baur who supplied Hess with the highly secret air defense maps of Germany that enabled the first leg of Hess' flight![30]

Like everything else in the Hess Mess, Padfield's reconstruction is certainly possible: certainly one can view the whole Baur plot as a strange footnote, and dismiss the whole idea that Baur would ever have flown Hitler and his entourage to Britain. But psychology and personal loyalty are a flimsy basis on which to argue a scenario in which mind control drugs and doppelgängers have already made a heavy appearance!

So let us consider the alternative, that the Baur story is true, and that Hitler's personal pilot did offer to fly Hitler himself, and his entourage, in their big Focke-Wulf Condor into Britain and hand the whole rotten ring of rogues over to the British. Does this make sense in the wider scenario of a peace plan that, moreover, was a possible bi-lateral coup-d'etat plot against both Hitler and Churchill? I contend it makes eminent sense, for a very important reason: the capture of Hitler and his staff would represent not only a coup d'etat successfully accomplished, it would be the seal of bona fides on whatever deal had already been concluded by Hess and his backers on the one hand, and Hamilton and his on the other. In this respect, let us recall that Baur was the one who gave Hess his flight map. Baur might thus, additionally, explain the curiously ambiguous presence and behavior of Göring himself in the Hess Mess, who is involved in one peace initiative with Hitler via Sweden, and yet feigning ignorance of Hess' initiative when summoned to the Berghof after Hess' flight, which he fully knew about, since he ordered General Galland to shoot Hess down, long after it was possible to do so! Göring is the clue that suggests that Hitler knew of the Hess mission, but only to a limited extent; he was obviously kept out of any knowledge that the "peace plan" was also a coup d'etat plan. With Hitler out of the way in Britain, the British faction could have moved against Churchill, while Hess returned to Germany to "take control".[31]

[29] Ibid., p. 122.

B. The Holocaust Hypothesis and the Hess Peace Plan

Whatever one makes of the previous speculations, or of the case that Hess' mission included proposals for dealing with the "Jewish question" in terms of a homeland, Padfield notes something else;

> It is probably significant that on 20 May, 1941, ten days after Hess had taken off on his flight for peace, and still nothing having been heard from the British, the Reich Central Office of Emigration issued instructions on Göring's authority banning further emigration of Jews from the Reich; the reason given was the 'doubtless approaching final solution (Endlösung)...
> If these orders are indeed linked to the apparent failure of Hess' mission they add credibility to de Courcy's claim that the peace proposals Hess brought included the resettlement of European Jews in Palestine.[32]

Indeed, Göring's role in the Hess Mess is once again under suspicion, for if he was involved in Hess' plans and more thoroughly briefed about them than was Hitler, he would have wanted to conceal his involvement in trying to thwart the "extermination option" favored by Hitler for the far more benign "homeland" options apparently negotiated by Hess and his British counterparts.

With this decree, he did so, and then some.

In this respect it should also be recalled that—in the view of Picknett, Prince, and Prior—Hess was not coming to Britain to discuss the peace plan, but rather, to conclude and seal a deal that had already been negotiated.

---

[31] Assuming of course, that Göring would have allowed him to do so!

[32] Padfield, op. cit., p. 277, emphasis added.

This implies that extreme pressure was placed on the deal's demise, and, as Picknett, Prince, and Prior have suggested, may have been a factor in the Duke of Kent's tragic demise in an airplane crash, along with, as they aver, the real Rudolf Hess himself. It was a return flight. If the features of Hess' peace plan, including those for a Jewish-Zionist homeland were known, this in turn implies something truly profound, and tragic, for it implies that someone on the British side wanted the extermination and genocide to proceed: "It is not difficult to see why these proposals had to be buried," Padfield writes,

> ...If they had leaked to the governments of the occupied western countries in exile in London, and to the dedicated advocates of compromise peace in Parliament and the City of London and among the country's great landowners, or to isolationists in the United States, then arming Britain to continue the struggle, Churchill would have been in dire trouble. The plan Hess brought with him showed diabolical ingenuity: the proposals could hardly be refused, yet they came from a man, Hitler, who had broken every treaty and solemn undertaking he had made, and could not be trusted".

This was, indeed, as we have seen, a sine qua non of the British peace faction: Hitler had to go before a peace could be concluded. But if that is the case, then Hess' arrival to "seal a deal already negotiated" implies that on the German side, there was agreement to remove Hitler, and this implies that Hess was a part of it. Thus,

> There is another possible reason for the continuing secrecy over Hess' mission: that is, if he brought a warning about the impending fate of European Jewry.

This, of course, makes sense, for given Hess' position atop the Nazi Party hierarchy itself, plus all his other state, party, and intelligence appointments and connections, and as we have observed previously, there was little that happened in the Third Reich before 1941, including atomic bombs and "final solutions," that Hess was not privy to. Consequently:

[33] Padfield, op. cit., pp. 346-347.

> Hess also knew of the preparations for the Endlösung, the 'final solution' to the Jewish problem in Europe. If he revealed that too, Churchill's failure either to denounce or act to stop the coming slaughter could so damage perceptions of his and Britain's wartime record as to justify hiding the fact for ever.
> There was, of course, nothing Churchill could have done. Had he accepted the peace plan it would only have made the assault on Russia more certain, and Hitler could not have been relied on to keep any promise to deport rather than physically annihilate the Jews.[34]

But as we have seen, Churchill had already acted contrary to the desires of the Chamberlain government and Peel Commission for a Jewish homeland, and in any case, Hess had not come to negotiate with Churchill, but with other parties altogether, and under Royal protection—as he claimed—to boot. He aim was to replace Churchill's government with one more amenable to peace, and ultimately to replace Hitler's government. With both new governments in favor of a Jewish-Zionist homeland, a peace could be concluded.

All of these considerations suggest that somewhere within the bowels of the deep states of Britain, the USA, and Nazi Germany itself, a decision either had been taken—or had been manipulated—for genocide. And that implies a transnational network to manipulate that decision, with an agenda of its own.

Is there any evidence to suggest something so monstrous and hideous?

Sadly, there is, and it is a little known but highly suggestive and explosive fact lurking in the center of the Hess Mess that, as far as I am aware, no other author has ever previously considered in relationship to it.

---

[34] Padfield, op. cit., pp. 347-348. See also Padfield's statement on p. 349: "...if Hess gave advance warning of German preparations for genocide in the east Churchill would certainly have communicated this explosive information to Roosevelt, and both would have borne equal responsibility for the subsequent silence and inaction". But "inaction" may have served someone else's goals perfectly.

C. The Nordau Quotation and Its Implications for the Hess Mess

To explain this explosive fact, I must first resort to some personal history. I first became aware of this sensational bit of information in 1983, after reading a trilogy of fictional novels by Gloria Vitanze Basile—a noted authoress of romance novels in the 1970s and 1980s—called the Global 2000 Trilogy. This trilogy was, however, a complete departure for Ms. Basile from her normal romance novel fare, for these were a thoroughly researched but fictionalized version of grand conspiracy theory novels.

In the second of the novels comprising this trilogy, The Eye of the Eagle, Ms. Basile began certain chapters or sections of the novel with carefully chosen epigraphs from various sources dating back to the French Revolution, and even including some statements by the famous 19th century British Prime Minister Benjamin Disraeli. Over the years, I was able to verify the veracity of these quotations, all except one, this one, by the prominent Zionist leader Max Nordau;

> How dare the smooth talker, the clever official babblers, open their mouths and boast of progress? Here they hold jubilant Peace Conferences, talk against war. But these same righteous governments who are so noble, industriously active to establish eternal peace are preparing, by their own confession, the complete annihilation of six million Jews and there is nobody, except the doomed themselves, to raise his voice in protest, although this is a worse crime than any war'.[5]

The problem with the Nordau Quotation (as I and the few with whom I shared it began to call it) was that it was allegedly made in 1911, fully three years before the beginning of World War One, and therefore, obviously fully thirty-one years prior to the 1942 Wannsee conference authorizing the Final Solution. In fact, this quotation, if true, was the first occurrence of the number "six million" in connection with the Holocaust, long before the Holocaust had even occurred!

I cannot convey to the reader my stunned shock, and the nauseating, horrifying feeling, that overtook me when I read this.

[55] Gloria Vitanze Basile, The Eye of the Eagle (New York: Pinnacle Books, 1983). p. 127, citing Max Nordau, 1911.

And the disturbing problem was, every other epigraph Ms. Basile had cited was verifiable, which put this quotation in the disturbing context that it might be true.

Stop for a moment and ponder its implications, taking Mr. Nordau's statements at face value, for when one does so what emerges is the following set of assertions:

1) A mass human sacrifice of Jews was being pre-planned;
2) The European powers knew about and were to some extent involved in the plan; but,
3) His quotation also implies that the Zionist leaders also somehow knew about the plan, and this implies their own potential involvement in it at some level, if only that of knowing about it; and,
4) This is the first occurrence of the number of "six million" in connection with it; and finally,
5) All of the above implies some international network of vast proportions, capable of pulling all this off.

Needless to say, I spent several years quietly and cautiously trying to verify the existence of this quotation.

Verification of the quotation finally came almost a decade later, when a friend of mine and I made a trip to the Library of Congress in Washington, D.C., for the express purpose of doing so. We were looking for a specific book, edited by Rabbi Stephen Wise (!) called Max Nordau to his People. In that book, several of Nordau's speeches to pre-World War One Zionist congresses were translated, and there Nordau's quotation exists, although in Wise's version, the phrase refers not to six million Jews but six million "creatures", although Wise, in a footnote, remarks that this was "said before World War One!"[36]

[36] While I'm telling a personal history, I might as well add that initially my friend and I used the computer system to find the book, and then filled out the call slip and presented it at the desk in the main reference room of the Library of Congress. Approximately a half an hour later, the clerk informed us that the book could not be found in the stacks! I refused to believe this, and, for a reason I can only write down to providence, decided to look on the shelves in the main reference room which included a number of books on Judaica, and sure enough, there on the shelves, where it should not have been, was Rabbi Wise's book! My

Subsequently, I was able to verify yet another form of the same quotation in the book by famous Jewish playwright and sometime contributor of teleplays to Rod Serling's Twilight Zone, Ben Hecht, in his book Perfidy, about the trial of a Zionist doctor, Rudolf Kastner, in Israel for his complicity with Adolf Eichmann in helping round up Jews for the Holocaust! It is worth quoting Hecht's own astonishment, and his version of the Quotation:

> In the Zionist Congress of 1911, 22 years before Hitler came to power, and three years before World War I, Nordau said, "How dare the smooth talkers, the clever official blabbers, open their mouths and boast of progress... Here they hold jubilant peace conferences in which they talk against war.... But the same righteous Governments, who are so nobly, industriously active to establish the eternal peace, are preparing, by their own confession, complete annihilation for six million people, and there is nobody, except the doomed themselves, to raise his voice in protest although this is a worse crime than any war."..[37]

What must be noted is the discrepancies between various versions of the Nordau Quotation:

1) Basile's version: six million Jews;
2) Wise's version: six million creatures;
3) Hecht's version: six million people;
4) Robert John's version: six million people[38]

Ultimately of course, the original German would resolve the issue, but all my attempts to locate this have proven to meet—uncannily—with a complete lack of success. The original German, Stenographisches Protokollen der Zionisten Kongressen, is available, friend and I quickly photocopied the copyright deposit notice—which, incidentally, indicated the book had been accepted for copyright deposit in December, 1941, a few days after Pearl Harbor—and we photocopied the actual page on which the Nordau Quotation occurred, and then beat a very hasty retreat from Washington D.C.!

---

[37] Ben Hecht, Perfidy (New York: Julian Messner, Inc., 1961), p. 254, n.4, emphasis in the original.

[38] See Robert John, op. cit., p. 44, n., where the Quotation exists in the form of "six million people".

but curiously, in versions I have been able to find, the Nordau Quotation is curiously absent. The important point to note, however, is that the fact that these minutes of the Zionist congresses were in German means that Hess may have known of it.[39]

Nonetheless, the four secondary sources for it comprise an interesting mix, for Rabbi Wise was certainly pro-Zionist, while Robert John and Basile could certainly be called anti-Zionist, or at least in Basile's case, highly skeptical, with Ben Hecht, a Jew himself, occupying a curious middle ground of someone appalled, and one might say, surprised and mystified at the very idea of a Zionist (Dr. Kastner) collaborating with a notorious Nazi such as Eichmann.

D. Taking Stock

What emerges from this are a set of implications that, when considered together, begin to approach an answer to that One Question that has been hovering uneasily over the whole landscape of the Hess Mess: what was the big secret that had to be kept, and kept secret to this day? In this respect, we take note again that the Hess files—as various researchers have pointed out—have already been carefully weeded, and thus, even with the presumed declassification of some Hess files this year, one must regard this source as tainted, for we will simply not know the extent of this weeding, nor, indeed, the extent to which files have been falsified, planted, or obfuscated.

In any case, what has emerged thus far is a disturbing picture:

1) Hess undertook his peace mission with the knowledge of Hitler, but this knowledge on Hitler's part was limited, and probably designed to throw him off the scent of a plot that was ultimately designed to overthrow his government;

---

[39] Speculating further, it also means that some knowledge of the implications of the Nordau Quotation might be lurking in the background of Hitler's notorious and chilling speech to the Reichstag in January, 1939, which begins "Ich will wieder ein Prophet sein.".. (I will today again be a prophet...).

2) Hess was also apparently involved in this plot with Hermann Göring, whose own role was suspiciously ambiguous, as has been pointed out in the previous chapters;
    a) Göring called General Adolf Galland and ordered him to scramble fighters to intercept Hess and shoot him down, but did so after any chance of success in this respect was doomed to failure. Göring thus demonstrated inside knowledge of Hess' mission before it became more widely known throughout the rest of the Nazi hierarchy.
    b) Göring then subsequently denied knowing anything about it at the conference at the Berghof following the flight, and then
    c) Göring promulgated an order that prohibited emigration of Jews from the Reich after no British response to Hess' flight had been forthcoming;
    d) Göring's role is further, though indirectly, implicated by the Baur Plot, since Baur allegedly had contacted the British via Bulgaria to fly Hitler and his staff into captivity. While this plot has never been verified, Baur did supply Hess with a very secret map of forbidden "no fly" zones in the Reich's air defense system, and this implies that authorization for supplying such a map to Hess would have come from the highest Luftwaffe authority, i.e., Göring.
3) Hess undertook his flight with the belief that he was under Royal protection, a belief he repeatedly signaled to his British captors, to seal a peace deal with elements of the British deep state, represented by the Duke of Hamilton and the Duke of Kent;
4) Once in Britain, however, due to miscalculations during the course of the flight, Hess had to bail out of his aircraft, while a reception committee comprising the Duke of Hamilton was waiting to be informed of his arrival at an RAF base.
5) Because of the bail-out, Hess was apprehended by elements not involved in the scheme, and it was some time before the pro-peace faction—in the scenario of Picknett, Prince, and Prior—was able to re-establish control over the real Hess;

6) During his first days in captivity, Hess was drugged, and covertly measured for a duplicate Luftwaffe captain's uniform, which many involved at the time thought was to be for the use of a double;
7) Then, at some point—probably at Maindiff or shortly before his transfer to Maindiff—the real Hess, according to Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's scenario, is transferred to Scotland, while a double is created and undergoes drugging and other tests to implant false memories;
8) The real Hess, in Picknett's, Prince's, and Prior's scenario, then crashes with the Duke of Kent, who appeared to be on a highly secret mission to fly him to Sweden;
9) The other "Hess" then takes the real Hess' place at Nuremberg, where "Hess" then exhibits very erratic behavior, claiming amnesia, and then, recovered memories, and at first does not recognize Göring. Allen Dulles, leader of the American OSS in Switzerland, suspects that "Hess" is really a double, and brings in Dr. Ewen Cameron of subsequent MK-Ultra fame, to examine the prisoner. The presence of Dr. Cameron suggests that Dulles might also have suspected some mind control was in evidence;
10) Dr. Ewen Cameron, as was pointed out in previous pages, has the same clan surname of the British forensic pathologist, Dr. James MacDonald Cameron, who performed the official autopsy on "Hess" after the latter was "suicide" in Spandau in August 1987. As was pointed out, both Camerons did their medical studies in the same medical school in Glasgow;
11) Dr. W. Hugh Thomas subsequently alleges that Spandau Hess lacks the appropriate scarring from his World War One wounds, and claims that Spandau Hess is a double;
12) Adding fuel to the double theory is the fact that Spandau Hess, as the last surviving "Reich Minister," was never approached, nor did he ever sign, any official document outlawing the Nazi Party, which, presumably, he had at least some status in law to do, since he was Hitler's Deputy to the Party! Of course, if he was a double, he had no legitimate authority to do so, nor, if he was not a double, would any such document have been legitimate since it was signed under duress. Adding to the legal complications, we also saw that, according to Hess' son Wolf-Rüdiger, Stalin had offered to allow German reunification both to then Chancellor Adenauer, and to Spandau Hess, who refused whatever terms might have been communicated to him!

13) In the midst of all the other confusion, Hess appears to have offered, as part of his peace plan, to allow a Jewish-Zionist homeland in Palestine, and since his mission was less to discuss rather than to seal a deal, one must assume that the British factions with which he was in contact also agreed to this plan. The fact that the plan fell through suggests that in this respect someone wanted the genocide to proceed, a disturbing implication, given the pattern of examples of Nazi-Zionist complicity documented in this chapter.

14) A scenario thus emerges—though, like everything else in the Hess Mess, can remain only an argued speculation and hypothesis—that Hess was on a coup-d'etat and peace mission—to replace Hitler, negotiate a peace with elements in Britain that were to replace Churchill. If one adds the alleged "Baur airplane-kidnapping" plot to the mix, then the latter may be viewed as the establishing of bona fides on the German side, for the British peace faction had repeatedly insisted that no peace was possible with Hitler in power. What better way to establish the good faith of the German side, than to deliver Hitler to the British, in Hitler's own plane, to boot?

Yet, even with all of this, we have still not examined all the debris in the junkyard of the Hess Mess.

There's one more important thing to be examined...

... and that's The Penguin Problem.

PART TWO:

THE PENGUIN PROBLEM.

OR,

A FINAL BIT OF ICING ON THE HESS MESS

"By these various means we aim to expose the fallacy of reasoning of Szabo, Robert, Stevens, Farrell, Bernhart, Friedrich, Mattern and others, and to convince the reader that the supposed mysteries surrounding German, British and American activities in Antarctica in this period result from a combination of inadequate research, vivid imagination, pure fakery and wishful thinking".

PENGUINS AND THE PEACE PLAN

"As commissioner for the Four-Year Plan, Göring knew the importance for Germany of whaling in Antarctica, and how essential it was to ensure this, and to open up new fishing grounds. It seemed high time for him to send a large expedition to Antarctica.
"On May 9, 1938, a plan for an Antarctic expedition, drawn up by the staff of his ministry, which was to he carried out in the Antarctic summer of 1938/39, was presented to him. He approved, and commissioned Helmut Wohlthat as Minister-Director for special projects, with the preparation of the expedition, and conferred upon him all his powers of authority".
Heinz Schön[1]

AND THEN THERE'S THE "PENGUIN PART" of the Hess Mess. Most readers of my books, blogs, and regular listeners to my interviews, will know that I have never subscribed to the idea that there was a big German "secret base" in Antarctica, whether for submarines or, as one version of the story has it, for "secret research on flying saucers". I have pointed out any number of commonplace and very ordinary problems with these ideas, chief among them that (1) during World War Two, the German Navy would simply not be up to the logistical challenge of building and supplying such a base, and (2) one would have to have a source of power for the base, and that would require a power plant, with materials and construction and technical personnel having to be lugged from Germany, and so on. From the standpoint of the massive war effort Germany was to deploy in Europe, such a massive undertaking would have taxed powers with even larger industrial bases, such as the United States, or powerful navies, such as Great Britain, let alone Germany.

All of this, of course, argues quite strongly against secret Antarctic UFO basis, U-boat bases and so on. If anything, as I have stated in numerous interviews, at best the Germans might have been able to construct—and possibly maintain—a small automated weather station such as those that they deployed in the Arctic.

The implication of the epigraph beginning this chapter is that the Göring Antarctic expedition was largely a scientific expedition, as indeed it was. Germany needed lubricants, food, and the whaling and fishing resources, and the southern polar region fit the bill perfectly. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine Hermann Göring sponsoring anything—expeditions or otherwise—that did not have an immediate or long-term benefit to the German economy or armed forces. Antarctica represented a vast, untapped continent of resources.

However, I have consistently maintained through the years that Hess was involved in this expedition. Yet, there has been, until recently, little evidence to connect Hess to the expedition. Hess' involvement—if any—changes the complexion of the expedition. But what, if any, is the evidence for Hess' involvement in the matter?

A. Heinz Schön and Operation Highjump

1. A Brief Review of Antarctic Strangeness

The problem with the "resources" explanation, however, is that it does not seem to explain the strange history of the people associated with the southern continent. It might, for example, explain the interest of Hermann Göring, or after the war, of American polar explorer Admiral Byrd and the U.S. military. It might explain the interest of U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, who visited the southern continent in late 2016 while on a diplomatic junket, and during one of the most hotly contested and important U.S. elections in decades. It might explain even the visit of King Juan Carlos of Spain.

But resources as the sole interest in Antarctica begin to break down when one contemplates the visit to Antarctica in 2016 of former Apollo 11 astronaut Buzz Aldrin, or the 2016 visit of the Patriarch of Moscow, Kiril III. Other stories, at this point, had to be contrived to explain the strange list of visitors. Secretary Kerry's visit was explained as having to do with global warming; there never was a cover story for Aldrin, but in Kiril Ill's case the official explanation was that he was there to bless the Orthodox chapel in the Russian mission. It was, in other words, it was a patriarchal photo op.

None of this, of course, mentioned or included Rudolf Hess. Even so, it is a strange list of people when looked at "whole":

1) Reichsmarschall Hermann Goring, creator of the Luftwaffe and the Gestapo;
2) Admiral Richard Byrd, famed American polar explorer;
3) Secretary of State John Kerry;
4) The Patriarch of Moscow Kiril III;
5) Apollo 11 astronaut Buzz Aldrin; and
6) King Juan Carlos of Spain and other royals.

The list could be added to, and made much stranger, but perhaps the point is made, for the list would appear to be too strange for the simple "resources" or even the global warming/climate change explanations. Add Rudolf Hess to this list, and it becomes downright bizarre.

2. Disturbing Questions about Highjump

a. The German Antarctic Expedition and State Councillor Wohlthat

Just how strange Antarctica is can be measured by a more detailed—though unfortunately, necessarily brief—glance at the post-war American Operation Highjump. On the face of it, neither the pre-war German expedition, nor the post-war American expedition appear all that strange. For example, Heinz Schön, who has written the only thorough survey of both expeditions, writes that the scientific tasks of the German expedition were well-thought-out and thoroughly practical; the German expedition was to:

1) Survey the coast and interior by photogrammetry and thus produce more accurate maps;
2) Obtain meteorological data of upper atmospheric conditions by means of weather balloons and radiosondes and aircraft mapping of prevailing winds, and so on;

3) Obtain a profile of the ocean ground by echo sounding, survey currents and temperature conditions;
4) Make careful observations on whales, birds, and wildlife conditions;
5) Test nautical equipment and current German maps, tables, and depth measurements.

In other words, the expedition was to make as thorough a survey, in as brief a time of the Antarctic summer as it could, in the areas of geography, oceanography, biology, and navigational science.[2]

Görings interest, in other words, was entirely economic, and thus, in the long term, military. Here, however, one encounters a "strangeness" that will only be revealed when viewed in connection to the Hess Mess:

> As commissioner for the Four-Year Plan, Göring knew the importance for Germany of whaling in Antarctica, and how essential it was to ensure this, and to open up new fishing grounds. It seemed high time for him to send a large expedition to Antarctica.
> On May 9, 1938, a plan for an Antarctic expedition, drawn up by the staff of his ministry, which was to be carried out in the Antarctic summer of 1938/39, was presented to him. He approved, and commissioned Helmut Wohlthat as Minister-Director for special projects, with the preparation of the expedition, and conferred upon him all his powers of authority.[3]

State Councilor (Staatsrat) Helmut Wohlthat

---

[2] Heinz Schön, op. cit., p. 12.

[3] Ibid., p. 11, my translation from the German.

What is so unusual about Helmut Wohlthat, besides being Göring's "plenipotentiary" for the Antarctic expedition? Wohlthtat also became one of Göring's own "peace ambassadors" as the German representative to the International Whaling Commission in London in June 1939. There he attempted to make back-channel contacts with the Chamberlain Government via one of the Prime Minister's advisors on industrial affairs.[4]

What this implies is that in any comprehensive peace negotiation with Britain, Antarctica would inevitably be included. Wohlthat's role was crucial, for in effect it was he who planned the details of the Antarctic expedition, including the choice of its captain, Alfred Ritscher.[5] There is a hint that Antarctica figured in some greater long term design—at least as far as Göring was concerned—in his congratulatory telegram sent to Captain Ritscher on the expedition's return to Germany in early 1939. The telegram reads:

> To Captain Ritscher,
> Leader of the German Antarctic Expedition,
> 7 March, 1939:
> I congratulate you most cordially on the important success which you and your expedition have earned in the exploration of a large area of Antarctica. I am proud of the excellent commitment of the pilots, the successful work of the scientists and the exemplary attitude of the whole crew. You and your expedition have been able to build on the greatest tradition of German research and have performed a service worthy of the position of Greater Germany in the world, (signed) Göring, Reichsmarschall.[6]

The final phrase of this telegram implies that Göring viewed the German expedition as connected to "Greater Germany's" geopolitical position, and that the expedition was not, therefore, simply an exercise in detached, altruistic "science," and thus, the use of Wohlthat as a personal peace emissary and representative of Göring himself, whom it will be recalled from previous chapters was viewed by the British as a "reliable" German, is telling. Wohlthat's position as Göring's emissary suggests that Antarctica figured largely in Göring's views of a postwar world, and therefore, in whatever peace was to be negotiated.

An Kapitän Ritscher
Leiter der „Deutschen antarktischen Expedition"
7. III. 1939

Zu dem bedeutenden Erfolg, den Sie und Ihre Expedition mit der Erforschung eines großen Gebietes der Antarktis errungen haben, beglückwünsche ich Sie auf das herzlichste. Ich bin stolz auf den hervorragenden Einsatz der Flieger, auf die erfolgreiche Arbeit der Wissenschaftler und auf die vorbildliche Haltung der ganzen Besatzung. Sie und Ihre Expedition haben an die große Tradition deutscher Forschung anknüpfen können und eine Leistung vollbracht, die der Stellung Großdeutschlands in der Welt würdig ist.

Göring
Reichsmarschall

Hermann Göring's Congratulatory Telegram to Captain Alfred Ritscher

This is not simply argued speculation, for it is clear that Germany was not simply engaged in "scientific research," but was staking a claim in Antarctica, for on his return to Germany, Captain Ritscher

> ...was astonished to learn, in conversation with the State Councilor Wohlthat, that on January 18 1939, before the Motorship Schwabenland had even arrived in the working region of the Antarctic Expedition, that the Reich Foreign Ministry in Berlin had received a Royal Resolution from Oslo, dated January 14 1939, which stated that the Queen Maud region of the Antarctic was claimed by Norway, and that the intention of the German Antarctic Expedition was therefore illegal. The Norwegian > injunction against the German activities was justified by the fact that this area had been taken over by Norway after several Norwegian expeditions.

> The Ministry of Foreign Affairs reacted immediately. It informed the Norwegian ambassador in Berlin that the Government of the German Reich rejected the possession of this area by Norway.
> The fact was that Norwegians had not researched and entered any part of Queen Maud Land, which received the name Neu-Schwabenland by the German research conducted there, and that at no time had this territory been explored until the Antarctic expedition of 1938/39.[7]

In effect, what the German Foreign Ministry was claiming was two-fold: (1) the Norwegian government had not mounted nor sustained any recent exploration of the region and therefore had forfeited claim to the territory;[8] and (2) it had no claim in any case to Neu-Schwabenland, because it had never explored that far inland.

The bottom line, however, was that Germany was staking a sovereign claim, and that Norway recognized that fact and was rejecting it. The matter, in so far as Norway and Germany were concerned, was settled with the German invasion and occupation of the country in 1940. But the matter was not settled, so far as the Norwegian government in exile, nor Great Britain were concerned.

At this point, of course, one is back to Hess and the Hess Mess, for it stands to reason that Antarctica would have been a component of his peace proposals. But is there any evidence to suggest this? Indeed there is, but this will have to wait. In the meantime, we must deal with the other curious expedition to Antarctica,

b. The Post-war American Expedition of Admiral Richard Byrd in 1946-47.

If there are suspicious smoke signals hovering over the German Antarctic expedition of 1938-39, this is even more the case with the American Expedition of 1946-47, codenamed "Operation

[8] Ibid.

Highjump". Again, like the pre-war German expedition, its purpose was ostensibly scientific, for the expedition included civilian researchers, many of whom, however, as Heinz Schon notes, worked for the US Army or Navy. There were scientists from the American Geological Survey, The Fish and Wildlife Service, the Coast and Geodetic Survey.[9] There were also, however, over four thousand people involved, an aircraft carrier, a submarine, aircraft, helicopters, and a variety of special land transport equipment including tracked vehicles.

The explanation for all this military equipment? At that time, the Arctic was viewed as a potential theater of operations should war break out between the Soviet Bloc and the West, and therefore, it became essential to "test equipment" in the harsh polar environment... of Antarctica.[10] To this day, this explanation is employed by various people to debunk the idea that there was anything unusual going on, either in Antarctica, or with Operation Highjump. Admiral Byrd even published a one-hundred-page plus article in National Geographic to underscore this idea.[11]

It was just to test equipment, and demonstrate the necessity of the Navy and Arctic operational proficiency of men and equipment should war ever break out.

This explanation has never made sense to me, for it has always seemed to have more the feeling of "convenient explanation". After all, the USA possessed Alaska, which had equally rugged terrain in which to "test equipment" in Arctic conditions. Additionally, Alaska was closer to hand, easier to reach, and so one question immediately arises: Why haul all those men and all that equipment to Antarctica, and at great expense at that?

Even Heinz Schon, who, like this author, is not buying the idea of secret Nazi UFO and/or U-boat bases, and who for the most part sticks very closely to the documentation, seems uncomfortable with the public explanations: "Why this excitement so soon after the ending of the Second World War?" he asks. "What new war did the

US have in mind when Byrd spoke of himself and the navy 'between the wars?'"[12]

The oddities of Operation Highjump do not end simply with its size nor with the public narratives advanced to explain it. Much more strange were the people involved in its planning, which began in 1946. Schon observes that the importance of Highjump to the USA is revealed by who was involved in its detailed planning, for the operational planning commission involved not just Admiral Byrd, but Rear Admirals Good and Cruzen, Vice-Admiral Forrest Sherman, the naval Chief of Staff, Fleet Admiral Chester Nimitz himself, and, perhaps most importantly, the Secretary of the Navy, James V. Forrestal.[13]

With the mention of Forrestal, we are once again in strange territory, for Forrestal would, of course, go on to become Secretary of Defense under President Truman, only to die a mysterious death when he allegedly committed suicide during a stay in Bethesda Naval Hospital, by tying a crude rope of towels and such, and leaping from his window. It is the same James Forrestal who appears as a member of the alleged Majic-12 or Majestic-12 UFO research committee in the Majic-12 documents, a fact which many Ufologists suspect is related to his alleged suicide, or perhaps, murder. His presence in the extraordinarily high level of planning for Operation Highjump would thus seem to suggest other possible motivations for his suicide or murder.

Before continuing with this brief review of Highjump, it is worth pausing to consider the strange parallels between the German-Göring Expedition of 1938-39, and the American Byrd-Forrestal expedition of 1946-47:

1) Both expeditions were planned at an extraordinarily high level, in effect, at sub-cabinet level, in the American case, and at cabinet level in the German case, since Forrestal as Secretary of the Navy is one step removed from the Federal Cabinet (which he would subsequently occupy as Secretary of Defense), and Göring as Reichsmarschall, Four-Year Commissioner, Hitler's designated successor in offices of state, and as Reichsminister, occupies a cabinet-level position;

---

[12] Ibid., p. 122, my translation from the German.

[13] Heinz Schon, op. cit., p. 119.

2) Both expeditions are planned at an extraordinarily high level of military participation, with Fleet Admiral Chester Nimitz and Reichsmarschall Göring both being the commanders-in-chief of their respective service branches;
3) Both expeditions have similar missions and equipment: both are charged with making extensive aerial photogrammetric surveys of vast regions, for cartographic purposes. Both expeditions to this end employ aircraft carriers. The chief difference between the two expeditions is one of scale: the German expedition is a one-ship, seaplane-tender expedition with a small personnel commitment, and only two seaplanes to conduct its survey. The American expedition is much more substantial in terms of its financial and material commitments, with an actual aircraft carrier supplemented by a much larger land-based personnel contingent.

3. The Operational Plan of Highjump

While these parallels are quite remarkable, there are other oddities about Highjump. When Admiral Byrd made his report of the expedition, he strangely omitted all reference to the 1938-39 German Neu-Schwabenland expedition,[14] a fact made even more strange by the additional fact that Byrd himself was brought to Nazi Germany prior to the German expedition in order to brief its captain and crew on conditions!

More importantly, the operational plan for Highjump involved three special groups, making landfall at three separate points on the continent, and then moving inland with aerial reconnaissance and photogrammetric efforts. Notably, none of the landing points were in Queen Maud-Neu-Schwabenland. These points might induce some to conclude, not unreasonably, that Operation Highjump had nothing whatsoever to do with the German Antarctic Expedition, or, to put it into cruder but starker relief, that Forrestal had nothing to do with Göring.

[14] Heinz Schön, op. cit., p. 122.

Unfortunately, however, Admiral Byrd himself made statements that could be taken to undermine such an interpretation, and to place Highjump into a clear relationship with the earlier German expedition, for in the operational plan, two of the groups landing on the continent were to move toward the null longitude, that is to say, eastward, for the null longitude laid within the claimed area of Queen Maud Land/Neu-Schwabenland. As Byrd himself expressed it, it was an "encirclement of conquest" and an "attack from three fronts".[15]

[15] Heinz Schön, op. cit., p. 122.

Or to put it country simple: even though Highjump's three main operational groups made landfall away from Neu-Schwabenland, the purpose of doing so was to create a continental-scaled "Kesselschlacht" or "encirclement battle" condition. Whatever one may make of this, Byrd's very non-scientific but very precisely military terms are suggestive that something else, besides mere scientific and cartographical or equipment-testing exercises were being conducted.

While there is absolutely nothing in the documentary evidence to suggest this, I have long suspected that both the German and American expeditions were looking for something with all the aerial photogrammetry and cartography that they were doing. Such a photogrammetry purpose would be the perfect public explanation for a much more covert and secret purpose of looking for something. That the American expedition seemed to be following an operational plan deliberately avoiding any initial venture into Neu-Schwabenland-Queen Maud Land suggests both the "advance on three fronts" of Admiral Byrd, but also that the American expedition was deliberately exploring areas left unexplored by its German antecedent. If the American expedition was an "advance on three fronts," then the question inevitably occurs: an advance against whom?

As already indicated, I do not adhere to the notion of a German base in Antarctica, at least, not of the large size suggested by all the "Last Battalion" mythologies. Highjump itself is testimony to the difficulties of sustaining large-scale military operations on that continent, even when backed by an economy and navy larger than anything the Third Reich was capable of during World War Two. So, if it was not Germans, then against whom were the Americans "advancing on three fronts"? Or were Admiral Byrd's remarks to be taken in a merely rhetorical and metaphorical sense, as implying an advance and conquest of the continent itself?

The heavy military presence in Highjump is underscored by its almost complete absence in the prewar German expedition, and suggests that Byrd was not speaking merely metaphorically; which leaves the question of "who was he advancing against?" hovering uncomfortably in the air.

4. The Strange Death of Admiral Richard Byrd's Son

Every now and then when writing these books, I encounter the oddest synchronicity: someone will send me information or material which I was not aware of, whose relevance to whatever project I am writing about is astonishing.

Such is the case here, for three days prior to writing this very chapter, I received from not one but no less than four individuals—none of whom, I am certain, know each other—the following story by Peter Kerr, which appeared in the New York Times on October 9, 1988: "Body of Adm. Byrd's Son, 68, Found in Empty Warehouse". The initial paragraphs of the article make for intriguing reading, to say the least:

> Richard E. Byrd Jr., who lived his life in the shadow of his father, the admiral and Arctic explorer, was found dead last week in the darkness of an abandoned warehouse in Baltimore, his emaciated body clad in dirt-blackened clothes and one scuffed shoe, the police there said yesterday.
> The 68-yeard-old Mr. Byrd, a graduate of Harvard University who as a young naval officer escorted his father on a journey to Antarctica in 1947, apparently died of malnutrition and dehydration, the police said.
> The body was discovered Monday by a custodian who said he had chased Mr. Byrd and another man from the area on Sept. 28, according to Detective Charles Gilbert of the Baltimore police homicide squad. It was unclear, the police said, how the elderly member of a prominent Massachusetts family had come to wander and sleep in an area of warehouses and factories in the city's Hampden section.
> "He was just wearing a shirt and pants and one shoe, and they all looked dirty," Detective Gilbert said, adding that the custodian who had chased Mr. Byrd and the other man recalled that "they had booze with them in a paper bag at the time".
>
> Mr. Byrd's family described him as a resident of the affluent Beacon Hill section of Boston.
> His son, Leverett Byrd of Needham, Mass., was quoted in The Baltimore Sun yesterday as saying that Mr. Byrd left Boston on Sept. 13 to attend a ceremony at the Washington headquarters of the National Geographic Society. The ceremony honored his father, Adm. Richard E. Byrd, the pioneer aviator and polar explorer, who achieved fame with his long-distance flights over the Arctic and expeditions to Antarctica from 1924 to 1956.

> "I put him on a train, and my wife was supposed to meet him," Leverett Byrd said. "What happened in between, I don't know. It's very strange, this whole thing. We're trying to come to grips with it".
> Admiral Byrd died in 1957. Richard Jr. was born in Boston, attended the Milton Academy and Harvard, joined the Navy and served as an officer in the Pacific during World War II. In 1948, he married Emily Saltonstall, the daughter of Senator Levertt Saltonstall of Massachusetts.[16]

While Richard Byrd Jr.'s death might be viewed as entirely unrelated to the strange goings-on in Antarctica, or to the wider "Hess Mess," it is worth noting that the entire purpose of his visit to Washington DC was to attend an honorarium for his father at the National Geographic headquarters, the very magazine that ran his father's lengthy article about Operation Highjump in 1947, an expedition he himself accompanied his father on. He might thus have "known something" that others feared might have come out. In any case, his well-to-do background belies his end as a starving and dehydrated tramp and hobo in an empty Baltimore warehouse, being seen in the company of another man. This strange episode raises the prospect that the other unknown man—who to my knowledge was never found or questioned—might have been a "handler," someone whose job was to ensure that Byrd Jr. never made his appointment. The fact that the whole episode was handled by a Baltimore homicide detective raises this possibility even more.

B. Penguins, the Peace Plan, and the Hess Mess: What About Norway?

So how does all this relate to the Hess Mess? One may argue, and persuasively at that, that the sheer number of positions that Hess filled and occupied both in the Nazi Party as its leader and Hitler's Deputy, and in the Reich government itself, and the vast number of intelligence agencies to which he was thereby linked and networked, made Hess privy to whatever discoveries the German Antarctic Expedition of 1938-39 uncovered, whether disclosed or classified.

However, Picknett, Prince, and Prior uncovered information in their dogged researches that make such awareness on Hess' part almost certain. On May 20, 1941, a mere ten days after Hess' arrival in Great Britain, the Foreign Secretary, Anthony Eden, wrote the following letter to Prime Minister Winston Churchill:

> I saw (Sir John) Simon and I think he will be willing to undertake the task of which we spoke. He has asked for 24 hours to consider the matter. We are agreed that he should make it plain that the Government know of the interview but that it would be unwise for him to indicate close collaboration with you and me—rather the reverse. Simon will be fully briefed before he goes to the interview and I propose to write him a letter saying that you and I would be glad if he would undertake this take.
> All this will be kept most secret and only Cadogan and I in the office are aware of the project.[17]

What was this "project"? The project was a meeting with Hess.

During the meeting, however, Simon asked Hess explicitly if he had come with Hitler's knowledge. Hess' reply was that he had come without the Führer's knowledge, to which he then added "Absolut!"[18] He then laughed and informed Simon that the terms that he, Hess, had written down for the British were the terms he had heard Hitler make on numerous occasions. Picknett, Prince, and Prior state that all of this slightly "spoiled" the effect of his reply that he had come without Hitler's knowledge.

But perhaps one needs to parse Hess' "Absolut!" response and subsequent laughter a bit more closely. As was argued in previous chapters, it would have been quite risky to keep any peace feelers entirely secret from Hitler. Rather, what I believe happened was that Hitler was apprised of those negotiations but only to a limited extent, since those negotiations had communicated both to Göring and to Hess and the Haushofers that no peace was negotiable so long as Hitler remained in power. Thus, the peace negotiations were also a complex bi-lateral coup d'etat process that included the overthrow of the Hitler and Churchill governments. Hess' "Absolut!" comment may thus be understood as a statement that Hitler was not informed of the full "absolute" extent of the peace being discussed.

But whatever one makes of this very speculative possibility, Simon's next inquiry is quite the crucial point, for he continued by asking Hess "about how the proposal would affect other countries such as Norway and Greece, to which Hess replied stiffly, 'The Führer had not pronounced'".[19] This is highly significant, for as has been seen, Norway rejected the German claim in Antarctica, and Germany rejected Norway's rejection, laying claim to Neu-Schwabenland on the basis that the German explorations of the interior extended beyond the region explored by Norway.

In short, I believe that the real context of Lord Simon's question about "Norway" should be understood to be an inquiry about Norway and all its claimed territories. The question, in other words, was about Antarctica. In this respect, it is worth mentioning that Hess brought with him a written peace proposal, both in German and English translation.[20] In other words, Hess brought with him an actual treaty, which makes eminent sense in view of what has been argued in previous chapters, that Hess came not to continue negotiations but rather to conclude them.

In any case, this document, which has not surfaced to this day, was taken to the BBC where various translation teams worked on their own translations of the German of various sections of the document.[21] This treaty document

> ... was taken very seriously. It was no vague list of demands or threats, but a detailed set of proposals intended to form the basis of a treaty between the two countries. It set our Germany's plans for eastward expansion and conflict with Russia and defined the respective spheres of influence of Germany and Britain. Although many of the proposals are by now familiar, there were others concerning areas other than the British Empire, such as the Suez Canal. Apparently, the document recognized that there were

> parts of the world where their respective interests could come into conflict, and made it clear that Hitler regarded the USSR as being within Germany's sphere of influence.[22]

In other words, the document was comprehensive in its scope, and Lord Simon's query about "Norway" should be seen and interpreted from that context and the previous disputes between Germany and Norway, the real implication being the large unclaimed areas of Antarctica, and what was to be done with spheres of interest on the strategically located and mineral-rich continent. Indeed, as we saw previously, the Polish government-in-exile figured into the negotiations between Hess and the British peace faction, and thus it would stand to reason that the Norway-Antarctica question figured into the mix as well.

The penguins were very much a part of the Hess Mess.

As for the document itself, the Hess Mess takes yet more strange turns and twists. Picknett, Prince, and Prior note that given its comprehensive scope and its dual translations, it was probably a bulky document, and therefore probably not capable of being carried on Hess' person, but in a briefcase which he had taken with him on his flight. The document may have burned with the briefcase along with Hess' Messerschmitt 110 when it crashed. In any case, it is not mentioned in any inventory of Hess' belongings.[23] They note, however, that it is also possible that the document was sent ahead of Hess, perhaps via Burkhart and the International Red Cross,[24] or that it may have been sent after Hess arrived, a circumstance which, they argue, also makes sense of "a cluster of three mysterious incidents that followed in the wake of Hess' arrival".[25]

The first of these incidents occurred on May 20, 1941, the very day that Anthony Eden was writing to Churchill about Lord Simon's upcoming visit with Hess, and ten days after the latter's arrival in Great Britain! On this occasion, a Dornier 217 flew from the German airbase at Alborg, Denmark, to an RAF airbase in Lincoln without any interference from the Royal Air Force, landed, and handed over a package to a waiting RAF officer, before taking off and returning to Alborg! All of this is in the record because the German pilot, Heinrich Scmitt, told of the episode in a 1970s interview. Additionally, Schmitt stated that the RAF undertook similar highly secret missions to Germany, with RAF planes and pilots landing at German airbases without any interference from the Luftwaffe,[26] a point which, again, implicates Göring in whatever ongoing processes were occurring.

[25] Ibid., p. 308.

The final incident was revealed in 1979 by John McCowen, who in 1941 was a major with the 11th Fighter Group. According to McCowen, he was summoned by the group commander, Air Vice-Marshal Trafford Mallory, who informed him the group had received "a message from Germany" alerting them to an immanent raid by SS commandos, who would land at or near Luton, Bedfordshire during an air raid. McGowen was ordered to move an anti-aircraft gun unit to the area to intercept the raid, as its intended mission was to assassinate Hess! Picknett, Prince, and Prior state that the would-be SS assassins were apprehended by the British, with maps to Dungavel, and promptly executed without trial, the only two spies allegedly executed without any surviving record of a trial or of their execution![27] This raises, once again, the prospect that someone in Germany did not want the mission to succeed, just as elements in Britain did not, and that, similarly, there were elements in Germany that did want it to succeed, just as there were in Britain. In this case, the German element is betraying an assassination plot to the British, with the clear intent of asking the British to intervene and prevent it, which the latter obligingly do!

C. A Brief Review

So where have we ended up?

I believe that the main theses of the various researchers into the Hess Mess are correct in their general conceptual outlines, but that specific details need adjustment. For example:

---

[26] Picknett, Prince, and Prior, op. cit., p. 308.

1) W. Hugh Thomas and other advocates of the doubles hypothesis are correct: a double was replaced for Hess. Unlike Thomas, this replacement was not made by the Germans during the flight itself, but subsequently in Great Britain, where, according to the scenario outlined by Picknett, Prince, and Prior, Hess briefly fell out of the control of the Peace Faction, which ultimately regained control of him, and hid him in Scotland, awaiting a return flight with the Duke of Kent;
2) During his stay in Britain, both Hess and his double underwent sessions of drugging, the full extent and purpose of which we do not know. However, we do know that the original and real Hess was measured for a duplicate Luftwaffe captain's uniform, while the double "Hess" underwent what was most probably extensive drugging and psychological "programming" to become Hess. In this respect, we saw that there were unusual and possible connections between Ewen Cameron, the psychologist who would become such a central component of the postwar CIA's MK-Ultra mind control program, and who was the very doctor brought in by Allen Dulles to examine "Hess" at Nuremberg because of the latter's suspicion that "Hess" was a double, and Dr. James Macdonald Cameron, the British forensic pathologist who performed the official autopsy on "Hess" after his suspicious "suicide" in Spandau Prison in August 1987. In short, Hess, and/or his double, became the first, and most infamous, example of mind-control on record. In this respect, it should also be recalled that "Hess" maintained consistently that he—and others—were victims of some such technology, and attempted to rationalize and justify the Nazis' murderous and genocidal acts on this basis.
3) Hess and Göring both appeared to have been involved in peace negotiations with the British, both immediately prior to, and after, the outbreak of war. As noted in previous pages, Göring most certainly knew of Hess' plans, because he telephoned General Adolf Galland to shoot Hess' plane down long after it was operationally possible to do so. Hess could not have undertaken a flight over Germany secretly without knowledge of the Luftwaffe's air defense grid, which was allegedly supplied to him in a map provided, in some accounts, by Hitler's personal pilot, Hans Baur himself! Baur, it will be recalled, was also implicated in a plot to fly Hitler and his personal entourage to Great Britain. While this may sound unfeasible, the basic outlines of the scenario as Picknett, Prince, and Prior have reconstructed it, is that both the German and the British ends of the peace negotiations were also involved in plans to remove their respective governments, Churchill in Great Britain, and Hitler in Germany. The reason for this aspect of the scenario was because, during the course of negotiations, both sides made it clear to the other that the current governments of both countries were unacceptable to the negotiators. On the British side, this included offers by the Polish government-in-exile of General Sikorski for the Duke of Kent to assume the long-vacant Polish throne.

4) Included in the peace plan, as Padfield revealed, was an attempt to settle "the Jewish question" without a genocide, but rather, with the establishment of a Jewish-Zionist state. In this respect, the Nordau Quotation enters the equation, for it implied the existence of a genocidal plan before World War One, in which the great powers, and the Zionist movement itself, are implicated. While such an assertion seems on the surface to be completely impossible, there is a pattern of unusual Zionist-Nazi collaboration during the war, as exemplified by the case of Dr. Rudolf Kastner, a Zionist doctor implicated, and tried, in Israel after the war, as covered by the famous Jewish American playwright Ben Hecht in his book Perfidy, in which Hecht makes explicit reference to Nordau's mysterious, supremely important, and highly troubling, statement. This is not only a crucial point but a horrifying one, for it implies that the failure of the Hess Mission, or a decision taken by either the German or British side of the equation to ensure that his mission was a failure, was also a decision taken to exercise and complete whatever plot existed for such, and to which the Zionist leader Max Nordau referred in his unbelievable statement made prior to World War One. That there may be some such scheme in the background, whose exact lineaments are unknown to this day, would seem to be corroborated by the attempts of Israel to interview "Hess" while he was imprisoned at Spandau, attempts which the British government consistently rebuffed. Additionally, there is the strange allegation of Wolf Hess that Menachim Begin informed President Jimmy Carter during the Camp David peace summit with Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, that "Hess" must never leave Spandau alive. Israel did apparently follow the Hess Mess closely, because there were also the allegations made to Wolf Hess' wife, via a South African source, that Israel knew that "Hess" had been murdered by operatives of the SAS.

5) And to top off this explosive fuel tank, in the strangest bit of debris in the entire Hess Mess, it would appear that Antarctica was very much a subject of the covert and very secret negotiations made between Britain and Germany, with the inquiry of Lord Simon about Norway, in this final context, it is to be noted, that not only does Hess receive specific inquiry from Simon about Norway, but that one of Göring's own go-betweens for peace feelers with Great Britain was the very same State Councilor whom he appointed to oversee and manage the details of the German Antarctic Expedition of 1938-39, Staatsrat Helmut Wohlthat.
6) And finally, to round out this bizarre dataset, Admiral Richard Byrd described his Antarctic expedition as an "assault on three fronts," a kind of continental-scaled Kesselschlacht (battle of encirclement), against either a metaphorical enemy—the continent itself—or possibly against a much more literal, but unnamed one. Putting the biggest question mark of them all over this affair, Byrd's own son, who accompanied him on the expedition, dies under suspicious an unusual circumstances, emaciated, and dehydrated, in a Baltimore warehouse, when he was to be a > guest of honor at a National Geographic event celebrating and honoring his father.

As promised, the Hess Mess is indeed a colossal, gigantic, inexplicable mess. There are no easy answers here; there are only uncomfortable synchronicities and questions bordering on the absurd and bizarre, and speculative scenarios whose sweep and scope or truly immense, bizarre, and horrifying.

But there is yet one more uncomfortable and bizarre synchronicity with which we must deal...

EPILOGUE: SPANDAU BALLET (AND YES, THIS TIME WE DO MEAN THE 1980s MUSIC GROUP)

"So true
Funny how it seems,
Always in time, but never in line for dreams,
Head over heels when toe to toe
This is the sound of my soul
This is the sound".
"True" lyrics, Spandau Ballet

WE BEGAN THIS ADVENTURE into the strange landscape of the Hess Mess by pointing out that the phrase "Spandau Ballet," which became the name of a successful 1980s rock group, was actually a German colloquialism or slang for the spasms of nerves in prisoners executed in the prison by hanging. As noted in the first chapter, I took this slang and colloquialism to refer also to the absurd dance of the four Allied powers once Prisoner Number Seven's death had been announced, and the equally absurd problems that emerged and then were rather weakly explained away. I noted in chapter one that the 1980s music group did appear to take their name from the slang expression, at least, that's the way Wikipedia put it, and of course, one must take anything at that source with several bags of salt.

As I wrote this book, however, it began to dawn on me that there may be more than just a synchronous connection of the group's name to the Hess Mess. One article, "Band Name Explained: Spandau Ballet—Almost Inescapable Artifacts," explained the name of the group—and the slang expression behind it—this way; Spandau Ballet designated > Performers of a number of genres conveniently categorized under the common denominator 'new romance'. The band is from Islington, London.

> It is an almost inescapable fact that the band name was linked to the group in an indirect war. Journalist and disc jockey Robert Elms is said to have seen the words 'Spandau Ballet' on the wall of > a Berlin loo, as part of a few lines jotted down there that, translated from German, come down to: ‘Rudolf Hess dances his Spandau ballet all alone’.

> Hess, was, as practically anyone over forty will know, the last Hitler-era prisoner, detained in Spandau Prison in the Berlin district of the same name.
> Yet the term ‘Spandau Ballet’ does not originate from this Berlin clink.
> Occasionally movies demonstrate how people have a tendency to dance a hasty little dance when bullets zing by their shins.
> Allied soldiers who were taken under fire by the German Spandau machine gun, spitting out 1,200 bullets per minute, were no different in that respect.[1]

Needless to say, the story of the band name’s origin in a bit of graffiti scrawled in a Berlin men’s toilet, whether true or not, caught my eye, as did the specific mention of Rudolf Hess.

Then the lyrics of two of that group’s major hits—“Gold” and “True”—began to run through my mind, and both revealed cryptic, perhaps unintentional, perhaps intentional, or perhaps merely synchronous, references to Hess. Consider the italicized lines from “Gold ”:

Thank you for coming home
I’m sorry that the chairs are all worn’
I left them here I could have sworn

These are my salad days
Slowly being eaten away
Just another play for today
Oh but I’m proud of you, I’m proud of you

Nothing left to make me feel small
Luck has left me standing to tall
Gold
Always believe in your soul
You’ve got the power to know
You’re indestructible

Always believe in, because you are
Gold
Glad that you're bound to return
There's something I could have learned
You're indestructible, always believing

After the rush has gone
I hope you find a little more time
Remember we were partners in crime

It's only two years ago
The man with the suit and the face
You knew that he was there on the case
Now he's in love with you, he's in love with you
My love is like a high prison wall
But you could leave me standing so tall

Gold
Always believe in your soul
You've got the power to know
You're indestructible
Always believe in, because you are
Gold
I'm glad that you're bound to return
Something I could have learned
You're indestructible, always believing

My love is like a high prison wall
But you could leave me standing so tall
Gold
Always believe in your soul
You've got the power to know
You're indestructible
Always believe in, because you are
Gold
I'm glad that you're bound to return
Something I could have learned
You're indestructible, always believing.[2]

Worn chairs, an individual coming home, swearing that he left them in a certain place, a reference, perhaps, to "Hess'" claimed memory losses, love like a high prison wall... all words evocative in a way of Rudolf Hess, his state of mind, and his actual physical circumstances, and of the Hess Mess. There was a weird synchronicity, too, with the timing of the emergence of the group into fame and popularity: the early 1980s, in the last years of Spandau Hess' life.

Coincidence? Perhaps... probably.

But then there were the lyrics of Spandau Ballet's greatest, and most well-known hit, "True":

> True
> (ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
> (ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
>
> So true
> Funny how it seems,
> Always in time, but never in line for dreams
> Head over heels when toe to toe
> This is the sound of my soul
> This is the sound
> I bought a ticket to the world
> But now I've come back again
> Why do I find it hard to write the next line?
> Oh, I want the truth to be said.
>
> (ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
> I know this much is true
> (ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
> On know this much is true.
>
> With a thrill in my head and a pill on my tongue
> Dissolve the nerves that have just begun
> Listening to Marvin (All night long)
> This is the sound of my soul
> This is the sound
> Always slipping from my hands

Sand's a time of its own
Take your seaside arms and write the next line
Oh, I want the truth to be known

(ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
I know this much is true
(ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
I know this much is true.

I bought a ticket to the world
But now I've come back again
Why do I find it hard to write the next line?
Oh, I want the truth to be said.

(ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
I know this much is true
(ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
I know this much is true

(This much is a-true-oo)
(This much is a-true-oo-oo)

I know, I know, I know this much is true
(This much is a-true-oo)
(This much is a-true-oo-oo)

(This much is a-true-oo_
(Ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
(This much is a-true-oo)
I know this much is true
(This much is a-true-oo)
(Ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
(This much is a-true-oo-oo)
Know this much is true
(This mush is a-true-oo)
(ha-ha-ha, ha-ah-hi)
(This much is a-true-oo-oo_
(Know this much is true)
I know, I know, I know this much is true.[3]

[3] www.azlyrics.com/lyrics/spandauballet/true.html

A calm, dreamy harmony and melody, laughter, drugs, buying "a ticket to the world," was this a reference to the flight of Hess? "Now I've come back again?" a reference to his return to Germany, and imprisonment?

Maybe.

But then there's the reference to being "in time, but never in line for dreams". This began to hit closer to home, for as we have seen in the previous pages, Hess was certainly "on time" and expected in Britain, but he was in "the wrong line," the wrong place. And then, he's "head over heels when toe to toe," was this an odd poetical way to express his bailout from the Messerschmitt 110, tumbling head over heels until his parachute opens?

More strange was the lyrical reference to confusion of mind, "Why do I find it hard to write the next line? Oh I want the truth to be said". As we have seen, "Hess" certainly exhibited confusion of mind, whether acted, or genuine. Certainly such confusion could be explained "with a thrill in my head and a pill on my tongue," as the effects of a drug-induced state of mind. Here, again, was an unusual synchronicity, for "Hess" and Hess both were drugged.

Then, from out of nowhere, another image is invoked in the lyrics: "take your seaside arms and write the next line, oh I want the truth to be known". Seaside? A reference, perhaps, to Hess bailing out near the west coast of Scotland?

Once again, perhaps.

Maybe, perhaps, possibly...

Unintended synchronicities.

Nothing more.

On their own, with no context, the lyrics of one of the most popular songs of the 1980s are dreamy, flitting from one image to another, without context, without much meaning.

But...

... within the context of the Hess Mess, they begin, at last, to make sense...*

The Bizarre Case of Rudolf Hess, Antarctica and Spandau Prison!

Pursuing his investigations of WWII machinations, secret international agreements, breakaway civilizations and hidden wars in Antarctica, author and researcher Joseph P. Farrell examines the continuing mystery of Rudolf Hess, his sudden flight to Scotland, his supposed imprisonment at Spandau Prison in Berlin and how his flight affected affairs in Europe, Israel, Antarctica and elsewhere. Farrell looks at Hess' mission to make peace with Britain and get rid of Hitler—even a plot to fly Hitler to Britain for capture! How much did Göring and Hitler know of Rudolf Hess' subversive plot, and what happened to Hess? Why was a doppleganger put in Spandau Prison and then "suicided"? Did the British use an early form of mind control on Hess' double? John Foster Dulles of the OSS and CIA suspected as much. Farrell also uncovers the strange death of Admiral Richard Byrd's son in 1988, about the same time of the death of Hess. What was Hess' connection to Antarctica? It is Farrell at his best—uncovering the special operations and still-secret activities of WWII and the breakaway civilization.

The astonishing topics in this book include:

- Hess, Antarctica and the Thule Society
- Two different Rudolf Hesses
- Why was "Hess" kept locked up in Spandau Prison—its only prisoner—by four governments?
- Allen Dulles met with Hess at Nuremberg and suspected some form of British mind control
- The astonishing plan to fly Hitler to Britain for capture to end the war on the Western Front
- Operation Highjump and the strange death of Admiral Byrd's son, Richard Byrd, Jr.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

First of all, I want to thank all the clients who, over the past twenty years, have shared with me their painful stories of ritual abuse and mind control. They have been my most important teachers, and without them I would not have been able to even conceive of writing such a book. Some of them will recognize themselves in these pages, and I know it will be important to them to know they have contributed to the knowledge and skills of many therapists.

Beyond that, words cannot express how grateful I am to those courageous survivors who contributed to this book: Old Lady, Adriana Green, Trish Fotheringham, Jeannie Riseman, Stella Katz, LisaBri, Robin Morgan, Carol Rutz, and Jen Callow. Their bravery in facing their experiences, their hard-won internal cooperation and maturity, and their willingness to speak up constitute a unique contribution to our understanding both of these abuses and to their healing process.

I want to express my appreciation to my local friend, Adrienne Carter, who uses her vacations to work with trauma survivors in disaster areas all over the planet. She has been my support for many years in facing my clients' difficult memories and recovery issues.

Over the years of my learning, many online friends and colleagues have been an ongoing support system, as we all struggle together to understand and deal with these monstrosities. I particularly appreciate the contributions of Eroca Shaler and Jeannie Riseman in reading some early chapters of this book and giving me feedback, as well as all the "critters" with whom I have had dialogue over the years. (They will know what that message means, and who they are.)

There is one person without whom this book would never have come to fruition: my online friend, author and therapist E. Sue Blume, whom I have never met in person. She has supported me, insisted on the importance of my book, criticized my writing, found synonyms, sorted out my paragraphs, told me what is missing, and been the most creative and practical editor anyone can imagine, all before my publisher, Karnac Books, became involved. Thank you so much, E. Sue.

Disclaimer

This book is designed to give information to licensed and credentialed psychotherapists for the purpose of understanding and helping clients or patients who report memories of ritual abuse or mind control.

It is not designed for individuals who believe they may have had these experiences themselves, and want to explore what that entails.

This area is one about which understanding is developing slowly, as the practices of organized child abusing perpetrator groups are generally hidden from view, and often intentionally disguised by the perpetrators. Therefore, some of the information in here may be either incomplete or inaccurate.

The author and Karnac Books shall have neither liability nor responsibility to any person or entity with respect to any loss or damage caused, or alleged to have been caused, directly or indirectly, by the information contained in this book.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Alison Miller is a clinical psychologist in private practice in Victoria, British Columbia, Canada. She worked for many years in child and youth mental health services, treating children and families. She is the original developer of the Living in Families Effectively (LIFE) Seminars (www.lifeseminars.com), and has co-authored two books on parenting with Dr Allison Rees. Since 1991, Dr Miller has been treating and learning from persons with dissociative disorders, in particular survivors of ritual abuse and mind control, and has developed a protocol for effective treatment.

PREFACE

"In a time of universal deceit, telling the truth becomes a revolutionary act"

(George Orwell)

From the beginning, ritual abuse and other forms of child abuse aimed at creating mind control have presented unique challenges to treatment professionals. After all, when we therapists first heard about these crimes in our offices, we were only in the infancy of understanding childhood sexual trauma. Available texts on incest could be counted on the fingers of one hand. In the late 1980s, when I was preparing my own book, Secret Survivors: Uncovering Incest and its Aftereffects in Women, I knew nothing of ritual abuse. I had to negotiate with my first publisher, John Wiley, to allow me to add a brief mention of it just before the book went to press.

Ritual abuse was a complex and intimidating phenomenon for which we were totally unprepared, both professionally and personally. Therapists in the USA, Canada, the UK, and elsewhere around the world found themselves listening to horrifying, shocking, and sometimes unbelievable disclosures by terrorized clients. Survivors reported being accessed and abused while in treatment. They also conveyed threats that were made against us, some of which were carried out. Clients—and often therapists—became convinced that they were being tracked by an invisible network of omnipresent and omnipotent abusers, with no escape. These abuses continued even when survivors appeared to follow all the recommended rules of self-protection. Desperate staffs turned hospital-based inpatient treatment protocols on their ears to protect patients from a force no one totally understood, but some patients reported being abused while in hospitals.

The treatment process itself would also prove endlessly complicated, even dangerous. Survivors often began therapy with determination and resolve, only to drop out because their memories flooded them, or because self-destructive behaviors took them over. The training and skills we brought to these clients often seemed to make things worse. The normal rules just did not apply. On a desperate journey to meet our clients' needs, we reached out for guidance from some pioneering professionals and brave survivors (the real experts). What they had to offer was invaluable, but we still could not figure out what the new rules needed to be.

Some healed. Many did not. They tried. We tried. Treating ritual abuse felt frightening, overwhelming, confusing, and, frankly, sometimes impossible.

And now we found ourselves facing a new challenge. In the USA, although its tentacles spread to other places, a curious group of people launched a campaign to discredit and destroy all of those involved with helping survivors of hidden (dissociated) trauma, in particular ritual abuse, and its survivors. The media colluded with the agenda of this movement, and society welcomed it.

Someone once said that there is no taboo against incest, just a taboo against talking about it. That was certainly what we saw now regarding ritual abuse and mind control. Anyone attempting to recognize this still new and alien occurrence was blacklisted. The conspiracy of silence about child abuse had now become a conspiracy of censorship, even within the profession charged with its treatment. As a result, the truth about ritual abuse could no longer find a forum. Research and education ground to a halt.

Yet, somehow, in this oppressive climate, without support from any professional organizations or literature—or, in many cases, their peers—many therapists quietly continued to do their jobs.

Fortunately, one of those people was Alison Miller. Now, in Treating the Unimaginable, Dr Miller spells out the step-by-step protocol she developed over decades of working with, and learning from, survivors. This straightforward and sensible guide provides the tools you need to break "mind control" programming and recovery into practical explanations and orderly tasks.

Treating the Unimaginable reveals that abusers have relied on lies and tricks to control their victims' thinking from infancy onward. It provides the explanations and guidelines necessary to make the challenging task of treating survivors both possible and manageable. After discussing the clear differences between spontaneously developed dissociative disorders and those intentionally structured and implanted by such abusers, Dr Miller offers information that is precise, indispensable, and long overdue: in example after example, she describes exactly how abusers execute mind control that ensures ongoing contact and control, the psychological and cognitive impact it is designed to have on developing children, and the tasks necessary for clients to break free of the programs their abusers have devised.

Treating the Unimaginable is a reasonable, understandable, non-threatening book. It is calm in the face of confusion: exactly what this issue has needed from the beginning. And it is revolutionary. Because she tells the truth about ritual abuse. And that continues to be as important as ever, because—whether we want to acknowledge it or not—ritual abuse and other forms of mind control do happen, and there are survivors who need you. Now, with Dr Miller's wise and experienced guidance, those of you who choose to accept the formidable honor of treating those survivors will find encouragement here.

FOREWORD

Those of us who work in the field of trauma and abuse, whether psychologists, psychoanalysts, social workers, doctors, counselors, or psychotherapists, have been provided with beautiful tools for understanding the impact of trauma. We become adept at understanding the dynamic of why the messenger is always shot and broadcast the Bionic insight of why the visionary is not bearable to the group.

However, when it comes to military mind control, abuse within religious belief groups or cults, and deliberately created dissociative identity disorder, we enter the least resourced field of all. This makes a new book on the subject have a far greater impact. While some new books fail to justify a historical, theoretical, or clinical place, this is a book that will provide immediate psychological aid to the practitioner who takes on mind control work. Or, as more usually happens, this will aid the clinician of integrity who never knew about such work, never intended to work in this field, but has slowly uncovered the traumatic reasons for why a mind has become splintered.

This book is necessary because, for many professionals who are not survivor-professionals, as well as for some who are, all psychic tools can temporarily disappear in the face of this work. We succumb to a variety of defenses, become numbed, dissociative, overwhelmed, over-zealous, over-skeptical, over-theoretical, over-academic, or speechless.

How do we find words for describing levels of betrayal and emotional, physical, sexual, and spiritual torture that fragment and destroy a child or adult and cast traumatic shadows over the whole of their adult life? We might, as a society, slowly find it possible to accept that one in four citizens are likely to have experienced some form of emotional, physical, sexual, or spiritual abuse (McQueen, Itzin, Kennedy, Sinason, & Maxted, 2008), in itself a figure unimaginable and hidden twenty years ago. However, accepting the way a hurt and hurting parent or stranger re-enacts their disturbance with a vulnerable child or children remains far easier to digest than to consider the intellectually planned, scientific, methodical procedures of organized child-abusing perpetrators—in other words, torture.

While we might hold to the sentiment that humani nihil a me alienum puto (nothing human is alien to me), it needs to be faced that there are areas of torture we have not imagined, that, indeed, are unimaginable to us. Bearing witness and sitting alongside such trauma can also be unimaginable and lead to secondary traumatization.

When I first encountered organized ritual abuse and mind control (Badouk-Epstein, Schwartz, & Wingfield, 2011; Sachs & Galton, 2008; Sinason, 1994), I was reminded only too well of Nietzsche's comment "Beware. When you look into the abyss, the abyss looks into you". Although a consultant psychotherapist at a leading clinical training and treatment center in the UK (the Tavistock Clinic), like Alison Miller, nothing in my training initially prepared me for this work except for the psychological strengthening that came from my own psychoanalytic treatment. I will always be grateful to my former psychoanalyst, the late Dr Mervin Glasser, for his support and to Dr Robert Hale, former Director of the Portman Clinic, who shared the pain of our ritual abuse project.

The abyss is the unimaginable, the place worse than nightmares. When it looks into us, to find a home, to find a mirror, to find someone, somewhere who can face the "daymare" that some people's lives consist of, we indeed face the worst that humans are capable of.

What does it mean to work with those whose days are worse than the worst nightmare we could imagine having? Who inhabits Orwell's Room 101? Whose truth means facing the reality not just of what the hurt and hurting loner is capable of, but what highly functioning middle class groups might do?

Dr Alison Miller waited twenty years for someone to write this book and finally decided to write it herself. Although a licensed psychologist in Canada, her thoughts and work are well known internationally, despite the initial low profile that often comes with this work. However, there is an important transition to be made when a key thinker moves from verbal communications in talks to writing a book for Karnac, a major psychodynamic publishing house that is based in the UK and respected worldwide.

This is the book that I and many other colleagues in the UK and the rest of Europe have also waited for and not written.

If you do not have a patient who has gone through these experiences, this is initially a deeply frightening book as well as a crucial book. It is not a book that soft-soaps the reader along the grades of obscene hierarchy between "mild" trauma and major. It goes straight to the jugular of the worst realities that exist, and is not trying to apologize for, or justify, their existence. Enough research has been carried out; enough survivors have come forward with their unique constellations of physical and mental pain. Alison Miller is writing for those who know what exists and want and need help in understanding it further.

In addition to her own insights, honed from years of practice, gained from her survivor-teachers, the book is also strengthened by the direct contributions of experts through terrible lived experience. Some are already known to UK specialists through their published work or websites (Jeannie Riseman, Carol Rutz, LisaBri) or through speaking at the Conferences held by the Clinic for Dissociative Studies, Bowlby Centre (Badouk-Epstein, Schwartz, & Wingfield, 2011) and Paracelsus Trust (Trish Fotheringham), and some are new, bringing different pearls from their painful paths (LisaBri, Jen Callow, Adrianna Green, Stella Katz, "Old Lady", and Robin Morgan).

Although there is such a strong advisory survivor presence, Alison Miller is clear that she is writing for the professionals who work with this subject and warns survivors of the dangers of accessing this book.

Within the UK, the newly formed Campaign for the Understanding and Inclusion of DID held a historic meeting at the London Voluntary Resource Centre on March 12th 2011, at which all fifteen keynote plenary talks and exhibitions were given by survivors. Mind Control was a key theme. This was followed by a smaller presentation at Church House, Westminster with the aim of educating MPs and Peers as well as Health Service commissioners on the way children and adults who have gone through these experiences face a further trauma due to the national lack of training in this subject.

Karnac Books is to be thanked for aiding the new generations of trauma workers to understand the problems in work with mind control patients. Dr Alison Miller and her Survivor Teachers are to be thanked for this painful, clear, knowledgeable, and yet also unwelcome gift for those who have yet to face this work.

For those who are facing this work, whatever their theoretical orientation, this is a book which helps the novice and experienced clinician alike understand the meaning of mind control and how to deal with it, step by step. Instead of feeling overwhelmed and referring on, the new clinician armed with this book will feel they have a guide with them.

The details of cult programming desribed here are largely Western based. It needs to be understood that such cruelty is not restricted to the West and that all around the world there are equivalent programs that come from a different military, ritual, religious, and social history.

Cultural relativism aside, this book takes care to remind the reader and clinician that all DID systems are different. There is no short-cut to learning the meaning and experience of the universe that is each person. However, aided by a book like this, the initially unprepared professional can deal more wisely with the paradigm shift that follows.

Mind control is built on lies and manipulation of attachment needs. This book breaks down the lies, the structures and the tasks ahead into manageable pieces. It provides hope that is not delusional. It makes it possible to consider undertaking this work, whether in private practice or in the public Health Service. It also reminds all of us that we are citizens of a global culture and we, as citizens, are also responsible for the kind of culture our children grow up in.

Valerie Sinason

Introduction

I waited twenty years for someone else to write this book. Every day I became more aware of how much a book such as this was needed. Finally, I decided to write it myself.

My first awareness that I was working with ritually abused and mind controlled clients came in 1991. They were the most challenging clients I had ever encountered. Not only had they endured the worst abuses I had ever heard of, they had been forced to participate in the torture, rape, and murder of others. Just listening to them was traumatizing.

Since the 1980s, therapists have reported encountering clients or patients who had experienced extreme abuses featuring physical, sexual, emotional, spiritual, and cognitive aspects, along with a premeditated structure of torture-enforced lessons. The phenomena was first labeled "ritual abuse," and, later, as our understanding developed, "mind control." A few pioneers came forward who specialized in ritual abuse treatment, but, as much as they understood and as many effective interventions as they were able to develop, they were muddling along just like I was. Many others found themselves working with one, or a few, identified survivors of these abuses, and they were really struggling. This population can overwhelm an unprepared therapist, and without proper knowledge the therapist cannot protect the client from numerous pitfalls inherent in recovery from these experiences.

Then, suddenly, the work became dangerous, not only for clients but for therapists as well. A well-funded, highly organized opposition appeared, seemingly out of nowhere, in the early 1990s. Its goal was to discredit the existence of ritual abuse, and one of its tactics was to actively undermine any effort to discover what had been done to these clients and anyone who attempted to help them recover. This movement capitalized on every mistake those pioneers made. When one of my early teachers, for instance, recognized that many ritually abused clients were still being abused while in treatment, she insisted that they could not be treated on an outpatient basis, but should be hospitalized and kept from their families. She was targeted with a series of court cases involving false accusations that she had allegedly abused clients in hospital. The experience was devastating to her.

And she was not alone. Many others faced persistent attempts to discredit their professional expertise, or legal assaults that robbed them of time, energy, and even the courage to continue to treat clients, write, or teach. Therapy professionals in both direct services and policy making, members of the criminal and civil justice systems, and the general public were systematically indoctrinated via the media. Many now share the view that people who disclose ritual abuse or mind control content suffer from "false memories" induced by "over-zealous therapists," and that dissociative disorders are iatrogenic (or else they do not exist at all).

Although the issue disappeared from the media, and, therefore, became invisible to society (which, to many, means it no longer exists), a recent survey (Rutz et al., 2008) that looked at the experiences of over 1400 survivors of extreme abuse in thirty-one countries found that almost four out of five reported either ritual abuse, or mind control, or both.

I have spent the past twenty years looking for help, and what I found was very limited. I looked for a manual to tell me what was going on in these people, and to give me some clear guidelines for treating them, but I found none. I immersed myself in learning the fundamentals of dissociative disorders, the psychiatric diagnosis most commonly associated with this population, disorders which themselves were just beginning to be understood. This knowledge was basic to my work, but it was not enough to fully address the needs of these clients. Since those early years, much has been written about dissociation, and many professional workshops, courses, and conferences have taken place. However, an understanding of the relationship between dissociative disorders and ritual abuse and mind control survivors (and, therefore, the specific needs) has yet to reach the mainstream of professionals in that field, or any other.

A number of books were published, mostly edited collections of articles, that discussed ritual abuse and mind control, but, unfortunately, most of the articles addressed either "the existence problem" (giving continuing and undue credibility to the claim of that political movement), the horrific and sometimes sensationalized specifics of the abuses perpetrated, or the characteristics of survivors. Yet, still, no one told us how to treat them. Many websites also appeared in the past two decades, many by survivors and professionals who have studied them. They can provide a great deal of useful information, but there is much disinformation out there as well.

At first, it felt as if nothing in my training as a psychologist or my (then) fifteen years' experience had prepared me for the particular demands of treating this population. I knew there was a long road ahead. Fortunately, however, everything I had studied and worked with so far had prepared me to undertake the journey. I had considerable experience in child development, family systems, and attachment issues. I had developed educational seminars for parents who had suffered from abuse and neglect in their own childhoods, and I was beginning to understand the effect of childhood trauma in creating what I clearly understood to be "mental injuries" (not mental illnesses) that can last a lifetime. And I had the ability to respect and be open to the wisdom and expertise of my clients, the persons who had experienced these atrocities, who could, I knew, be my greatest teachers.

Soon, I understood what made this population, and therefore this treatment, different from anything we had ever encountered before: not only the total separation between the "inner children" found in certain dissociative disorders, but the deliberately splitting of children's psyches by these "organized perpetrator groups" to create and control alternate personalities. Not only the inner systems that exist in persons with "DID" (dissociative identity disorder, formerly MPD) and "DDNOS" (a similar disorder, labeled "Dissociative disorder not otherwise specified") but complex personality systems, intentionally structured into multi-layered hierarchies. Not only the hideous abuses that children can be subjected to, often by their most trusted caregivers, out of hedonism or sadism, but the elaborate, premeditated, and incredibly inhumane lengths that human beings will go to to harm children in the service of ideologies, for profit and power.

And so I learnt as I went. My first years of doing this unique work were like trying to find my way around a new country. I had to make a lot of quick decisions that had major consequences for my clients. I was drained by the complexity of the work. It was unnerving and exhausting. I suffered vicarious traumatization from the horror of my clients' life experiences, which included, as my beleaguered colleague and others had previously recognized, their continuing abduction and torture by perpetrator groups even as I worked with them. These were clients who faced a constant risk of self-harm and suicide. There was a minefield of things I did not yet understand.

However, over the course of the twenty years I spent working with these clients, dialoguing with survivors who were in all stages of healing, and studying everything I could find, I am no longer overwhelmed. I understand what needs to be done for successful treatment of survivors of ritual abuse and mind control, and I have developed a protocol that makes it manageable. I offer it now to you.

Healing the Unimaginable is the book I wish I had had in 1991. My goal is to provide you with a practical, down-to-earth treatment manual, an updated road map that corrects the errors of those that preceded it. It cannot provide you with any treatment shortcut that bypasses the time-consuming tasks ahead. However, it will, I hope, get you there faster than the previous maps, because it will not lead you astray.

That is not to say you should take every word I say as gospel. You will still need to honor your own journey, and your clients'. You should never allow anyone to dictate how you think. This is the lesson your clients will be learning, but it is also something you should be aware of.

In the spring of 2009 I had an experience that highlighted all these truths for me, which I would like to share with you.

I was on my way to be a plenary speaker on the topic of mind control at a conference in the UK. The organizers had sent me a map on which a road called the A6 ran east across the country from near Manchester airport to the main British motorway, the M1. It appeared to be a direct route. However, when I attempted to drive from the airport to the conference center, I could not find it. Several times, I stopped to ask for help, but the hand-drawn maps and conflicting directions I got were not helpful. Repeatedly, I would follow a supposed route, only to have it peter out into a maze of ordinary streets.

Finally, someone explained to me that the A6 was not a highway at all, but a historical route that was no longer identified by signage, but goes along many different roads with different names. Rather than cutting across the middle of the country on the A6, I would have to go back to the main ring road, follow it north, take one motorway east, and yet another south. This was a big disappointment. The conference's map had seemed so clear and direct. But it offered me a route that did not exist.

As I tried to get back to the Manchester ring road, I found myself in the middle of a huge traffic jam. I drove around lost for about three hours. I was not only jetlagged, but dazed. I needed food and a bathroom break, yet there was something strangely comforting about this traffic jam. After all, how could I go wrong when the path I was on was being traveled by so many others?

I kept having to remind myself that even if that path did lead somewhere worthwhile, it very probably did not lead to my destination.

It took considerable willpower, but I left this stream of cars behind and forged off on my own. Once again, I was wandering blindly. Finally, I saw a sign that directed me back to the ring road. And, after following a series of highways north, east, and then south, I arrived at the conference center, just as the first meeting was starting.

As late, stressed, and exhausted as I was, I understood the symbolic value of my ordeal. It paralleled my experience of learning to work with survivors of ritual abuse and mind control. In my early work with these clients, I had kept trying to follow road maps developed by others, only to find them inadequate, or just plain wrong. The therapeutic approaches in vogue at the time were largely irrelevant to this population, and consultations based on these approaches got me nowhere. Without accurate direction, it would be possible to waste years of my clients' lives while they continued to suffer and to be traumatized. With no accurate professional text or training program to be found, I had no choice but to take the big risk of going "off the beaten track" to help these people. Fortunately, I was willing to honor the guidance my clients provided. I might not have known where I was going, but they had had the experience, they knew how my interventions were affecting them, and they knew what worked for their recovery. And so it is even today: experience has taught me that although not everything every survivor says is accurate, people who have done their recovery work are still our most fruitful sources of knowledge about ritual abuse and mind control, as those subjects cannot be studied directly when they occur.

For that reason, I have asked some of my survivor teachers to be contributors to this book. I value their involvement enormously. Their contributions illustrate the nature of the abuse, the problems encountered in the healing process, and the creative ways survivors have found to make their way to recovery. Nine courageous survivors made contributions to this book, and others have granted me permission to quote their writings. They have been so generous in sharing their priceless wisdom, creativity, and knowledge, all with brutal honesty, no matter how painful. I owe a debt of gratitude to them, and believe the field of psychotherapy—and society—do as well.

That is not to say that one should assume that every client who talks about such things is necessarily a survivor of these experiences, or that everything such a survivor discloses is accurate or even literally true. My book will address that, and help you to know how to correctly assess what your clients present to you. This point corresponds to the other lesson that I learnt that day as I traveled across England. The humbling experience of getting lost before my first venture into the big world of being a plenary conference speaker taught me that the road map I was giving to the conference participants that day could not be assumed to be 100% accurate. I would not have wanted my audience to trust me so deeply that I would lead them astray. Likewise, although I do believe that in many or most cases you will discover this map, derived in part from the disclosures of survivors, to be correct, I must also warn you that parts might not always be so. It will need to change over time as the roads to recovery change. As I tell my clients, do not trust me so much that you turn your thought process over to me. Trust has to be earned. Experiment with this map, make corrections, improve it. And, please, let others know where it is wrong. Just as I have invited some of the most knowledgeable contributors I know to participate in this treatment manual, the more people who bring their evolving knowledge and experience to this difficult issue, the more we can all remain current and effective in what we are trying to do for our clients.

What you will find here

Healing the Unimaginable is grounded in the assumption that ritual abuse and mind control abuses do exist. It does not indulge the debate about the existence of these phenomena. (For those interested in these questions, I recommend the books and articles listed in Appendix 1.)

The first section focuses on understanding the phenomena of ritual abuse and mind control: how they work, and their results in the people who have undergone experiences which begin in childhood but might continue in a variety of ways into adulthood as well. It addresses how working with survivors of such horrendous abuse affects the therapist. It humanizes this experience through five first-person contributions by survivors. In one, a survivor who served as a programmer in a ritually abusive cult training center shares a unique insider's view of the methods and thought process employed by these groups. I evaluate checklists that have been developed over the years to help therapists recognize those who might be survivors of these abuses, and provide a checklist that I developed, through which the internal, structural characteristics of the personality systems installed by abusers can be used by therapists to recognize mind control or ritual abuse survivors among their clients or patients. The original purpose of the implantation of such designs is also addressed. Finally, a chapter looks at the indoctrination or "programming" that characterizes these abuses.

The second section of the book provides a step-by-step guide to treatment. It includes: understanding the experience of having a dissociative disorder and the basics of treatment, developing a secure therapeutic relationship, working with structured personality systems and clients' inner worlds, the critical and often misunderstood issues of external and internal safety, and how to counter the lies and tricks on which mind control is based. Special attention is given to sexuality, and also guilt and shame over forced perpetration. "Deprogramming" and attempted removal of "spiritual attachments" or "demons" are discussed and evaluated. Managing and working through traumatic memories is addressed in this section, as is the widespread question of belief and disbelief. The final chapter looks at successful resolution, either through integration of the personality or through cooperative co-consciousness. Here, the reader will find stories of successful recovery.

Working with survivors of ritual abuse and mind control can be the biggest challenge of your professional career. As you read this book, and the references I provide, your intellect and your courage might well to be challenged to their limits. But you will have learnt, as I have in my own journey, an enormous amount about how human beings work, and how to help those who, when they were the most vulnerable, were the most damaged.

A word to survivors

Most therapists do not yet have specific training in working with persons who are or may be survivors of ritual abuse and/or mind control, and Healing the Unimaginable is written specifically to help them. I do not recommend that you read it.

If you are wondering whether or not you are a survivor of ritual abuse or mind control, Healing the Unimaginable is not for you. If you know you are such a survivor and have done considerable recovery work already, Healing the Unimaginable is not for you.

Here's why:

1. You do not want your memories to be contaminated by reading the details contained on these pages about what ritual abusers and mind controllers do. Genuine survivors have difficulty in any case believing their memories, and it is easier to believe what comes up from within you if you do not have other people's information to confuse you.
2. There are some graphic details of abuses here, and they can trigger flashbacks or trained behaviors in people who are actually survivors of such abuses. This can be unpleasant and destabilizing for you.

If you want to benefit from this book, recommend it to your therapist. What she or he learns will "trickle down," and you will benefit through your recovery. Certain sections were written by survivors who have stated that their work may be shared with other survivors. Your therapist is urged to share these with you if they are right for you. Feel free to discuss this with your therapist.

So here is what this means: if you are a survivor, and determined to read this book, you do so at your own risk. Please do not let your "detective" parts have the final say, but evaluate carefully whether or not reading this information yourself will be beneficial to you. Remember that your safety—not only physical, but emotional—and your successful recovery are what is most important.

CHAPTER ONE

A therapist's first experience with ritual abuse and mind control

Working with ritual abuse and mind control survivors is probably the biggest challenge you will ever have in your professional life. For many therapists, one of the most demanding, upsetting and exciting periods occurs at the very beginning of such work. It is a kind of "hit the ground running" time. They must deal with disclosures that force them to face unimaginable realities for the first time, which will almost immediately demand new skills and knowledge. And sometimes, they must also contend with whether or not the other healthcare systems involved in their clients' care will be willing and able to help them appropriately.

My initiation into this work came through a group of four ritually abused clients, one of whom was "Lorraine."

In memoriam Lorraine

A few weeks before it happened, she asked me earnestly, "Is it a mortal sin if you kill yourself?" And I said no. I knew I was giving her permission, in a sense. I had told the parts of her that wanted to die that if they killed the parts that did not want to die it would be murder. They kept taking an internal vote, and each time more of them wanted to go. I never told them not to.

Lorraine was one of my first few clients with what was then called MPD, multiple personality disorder. She was crippled with severe osteoarthritis, and had to use a wheelchair. When she was Lorraine, she was a sweet-natured, gentle, considerate, laughing, roly-poly woman who loved to read and to sew. When she was Big Susie, she was a playful five-year-old who had a collection of giant dolls and a huge stuffed gorilla. Lorraine sewed clothes for the dolls. When she was Little Susie, she was a terrified, mute three-year-old. I was also acquainted with Morgue, pronounced Mor-Gew, who called for the suicide votes.

I got to know Lorraine because she was the best friend of another client who also suffered from what we now call DID, dissociative identity disorder. (The name change reflected the revised view that someone with the disorder was one fragmented person rather than a lot of different people sharing one body. But most who have the disorder feel more as if it is MPD.) My other client, whom I will call Teresa, thought Lorraine had MPD and hoped I could help her. Almost no one recognized this condition in those days.

Lorraine was forty years old and had been in and out of psychiatric hospitals since she was thirteen. She had had various diagnoses, mainly severe depression, and she had made quite a few serious suicide attempts before I even met her. She had been given many courses of electric shock therapy, which would confuse her so much that she could not get together a coherent suicide plan for quite a while.

Lorraine's psychiatrist was initially opposed to my seeing her, as her friend Teresa had been stigmatized with the "borderline personality disorder" diagnosis when in hospital, so was seen as a bad influence on her. But after Lorraine spent a couple of months in hospital calling herself Susie and acting consistently like a child, he was humble enough to acknowledge that perhaps he could learn some new things, and someone else's help might be a good idea.

It had taken me a while to recognize MPD in any of my clients. Teresa was the first. She kept talking about her "inner child." And I did not realize how real this child was until one day she stole a wheelchair from the hospital to which my clinic was attached, and took it for a joyride around the grounds. When confronted by hospital staff, she told them she was my employee. I began to pay attention to this "inner child," named Stuffy, from having been stuffed in a closet.

As soon as realized that I was treating MPD clients, I read the few existing books on the condition, attended a workshop at the Justice Institute, and used some sexual abuse prevention money to organize a workshop where therapists could exchange information and educate each other about dissociation. There, I learnt something that I found really shocking. Many people suffering from MPD had been severely abused throughout their childhood years by organized groups, including Satanic and other "dark-side" religious cults. Moreover, quite a few of them were still involved in those groups, although they were not aware of their involvement, because it was other "personalities"—dissociated parts of them—who went off to the groups' rituals. I was skeptical, to say the least.

Shortly after I began work with Teresa, I acquired another MPD client, a supposedly schizophrenic young man I will call Tony. He called in to the clinic on a day I was on telephone duty, saying he was having flashbacks of "ritual abuse." I did not yet know what that was. Tony became my client. He could be quite entertaining. I have a vivid memory of him as a three-year-old, "Tiny Tony," standing on his head on my office couch, and running down the hall to try unsuccessfully to make it to the bathroom. He had in his head the entire rock band of Guns'n'Roses, and I got to know Axl, the band leader, quite well. I remember the time Tony was in hospital and I went to visit him; Axl popped out and said, "Remember, we're schizophrenic in here!"

The last of my first four was a teenage girl whom I will call Jennifer, who had been removed from her home because she had disclosed sexually abusing her younger brother. Although she was in foster care, Jennifer told me that she kept seeing her mother, with whom she was supposed to have no contact, outside her foster home or at the bus stop she used. I did not know what this meant. Then one day Tony told me that he'd "woken up" at midnight standing on the corner at the gas station near where he lived, apparently waiting for a ride.

One day, I gave Teresa a ride home from treatment. Her ancient grandmother was at her apartment helping her pack her things for a move. By this time Teresa had disclosed sexual abuse by her father as well as both her parents being alcoholics. I took this opportunity for a confrontation, as people did in those days. I said to the grandmother triumphantly, "Teresa has told me all about what happened to her!" "Oh?" the old woman said in a creaky voice. "And just what has she told you?" "Alcoholism and sexual abuse!" I proclaimed triumphantly. The grandmother breathed what appeared to be a sigh of relief, and said, "Oh, I'm just an old woman, I wouldn't know about those things." It was a very strange response.

Then another strange thing happened. Teresa was the single parent of a very young child, and had been seeing me about her parenting difficulties. Her child was in and out of foster care. One day, she called both me and the child protection worker and said she could not handle the little girl any longer and had to give her up for adoption. She was determined to sign the papers and give her up, but I was mystified by it, because Teresa's parenting had improved considerably and I knew she really loved her daughter. I would not be able to make sense of these mysteries until I had learnt all about the lives of the rest of my "first four."

Gradually, the story came out. Teresa mentioned that she had known Tony in junior high school. It turned out that she still knew him—he was part of the cult group she still attended, along with her family. So was Jennifer (and her family). And Lorraine, whom at that point I had only been seeing for a short time. Tony's mother was the cult's high priestess, his stepfather was a kind of regional manager. All four of these clients not only had been abused by the same people, mostly their family members, but they were still being abused and forced to take part in abusive rituals. So, of course, was Teresa's little daughter, until Teresa gave her up permanently. It was not until Teresa gave up the child for adoption that she began to disclose her own ritual abuse.

My initial excitement at working with this newly understood diagnosis was rapidly diminishing. At the same time I was developing compassion for these people who lived part of their lives in a living hell, and this motivated me to embrace the challenges they presented. I worked hard with them, and I soon discovered that other people—the cult—were working with them, too. They lurked outside my office waiting to kidnap my clients and take them somewhere to re-abuse them as a punishment for talking to me. They set off "programs," the conditioned responses which my clients' child parts had been trained to perform, such as falling asleep in session, calling them and reporting what we'd talked about, being unable to understand English, cutting themselves, or trying to hurt me. They made various threats to terrified child parts of my clients, that they would harm or kill them or me or other people they cared for if they did not stop coming to therapy and stop talking about what had happened and was happening to them. (I did not believe they would be stupid enough to kill me, since I knew their names and had given them to the police.)

Also, I discovered that the cult had a regular pick-up system for their members outside the mental hospital at dinnertime, so any members who were currently hospitalized would go out there for a "smoke", and be picked up and returned before hospital staff could check on them. I shared this information with Lorraine's psychiatrist. He began putting her in the general hospital rather than the psychiatric hospital when she needed respite. She did much better there, though she told me that cult members had come by at night and threatened her. Lorraine had been living in a group home for the mentally ill, but now she had the new MPD diagnosis, the managers refused to house her. She was given an apartment on the top floor of a seniors' building. From there she would venture out in her wheelchair to go to the library or shopping. I soon discovered that she was not safe, that cult people would ambush her whenever she was out and took great sport in harming her. They obtained a key to her apartment and could get in whenever they wanted. They would get her to invite Teresa over, then show up and hurt both of them. It was a nightmare.

I could not cancel everything else in my life because I was seeing these people. In the summer I took a month-long vacation with my family, traveling around Europe; it was something I had to do before my eldest child left home. When I returned, Lorraine was in the psychiatric emergency ward, where she had apparently been almost the entire time. The hospital had scheduled a meeting regarding her for the day I returned, a Wednesday. She was to be discharged the next day.

I visited Lorraine in hospital just before the meeting. She told me that she had been picked up on the street by some cult people, who had told her that if she did not kill herself properly this time, they would kill me, her psychiatrist, her sister in a neighboring city, and her sister's children. Most parts of Lorraine were children, and they believed this threat. She had been tortured enough to know these people were indeed capable of murder. On leaving, I wrote a note in the ward's book, which was only for hospital staff, saying, "Do not discharge her until I've had a chance to see her again. If you do, she will kill herself." I described the threat. Then I went to the meeting at the hospital. There, I learned that the powers-that-be had decided Lorraine was too much trouble, so she was to be transferred to housing in another city, where I could not see her any longer.

The psychiatrist called me that night. He had read my note and believed me. He said that he would not be able to keep Lorraine in hospital until I could see her the next week, and asked whether it would make a difference if he discharged her on Thursday or Sunday. I said no, she was not safe either way. I had a full schedule for the first two weeks, since a lot of people had been waiting to see me. I could not see her until Monday at the earliest. He discharged her on Thursday. Early on Saturday morning, he called to tell me that Lorraine had fallen, or jumped, out of the window of her apartment to her death. There was no investigation. She had been suicidal for many years, so it was assumed to be suicide, not murder.

But to me, it was very suspicious. The bathroom window Lorraine had gone out of was a tiny one, and almost impossible to open, let alone to squeeze through, as it was quite high up from the floor. Lorraine was fat and had no muscle tone; I could not imagine her doing it alone. Her apartment door was locked.

Lorraine had no relatives in town who cared about her. She had grown up in a group home, where her original cult abuse had happened, as the group home parents were cult-involved and used the children they looked after in the cult rituals and other evil activities.

Lorraine's younger sister came to town to dispose of her possessions, and there was a brief memorial service at the funeral chapel. I was one of the people who spoke about Lorraine and Susie to those who attended, including several suspicious-looking people. I was sad, but not as sad as I had been when Lorraine was alive and constantly being re-abused and tortured by people who were not acknowledged to exist. At least she was no longer subject to this lack of safety. It was over. She could not go through that any longer. I made it clear to the cult at the memorial service that on this subject at least I agreed with them.

Teresa, overcome with grief, was hospitalized shortly after Lorraine's death. I was aware that she and Lorraine had made a suicide pact years earlier that if one of them died the other would follow. When I tried to visit her in the hospital, I was met at the door by the psychiatrist in charge of the ward, whose job was specifically to exclude me. He gave me a story about how therapists who were not on the hospital staff could not do therapy in the hospital as it could subject the hospital to liability if anything then happened to their patients. Oh, yes. That was their main concern, liability. Of course, if the psychiatric hospital system had only taken the threats and disclosures seriously and kept Lorraine safe, none of this would have happened. If some outside therapist had exposed their failure to care for the most vulnerable of their patients, what would have happened?

They did not invite her psychiatrist or me to her obligatory "death review." They were probably glad to be rid of her.

Teresa did not kill herself, despite ongoing abuse. Both she and Jennifer survived murder attempts disguised as suicide, but this time there was no question: people broke into their apartments and stuffed all their pills down their throats. Teresa was sufficiently recovered to make contacts in another city far away. She moved there, and is now doing well.

I managed to get Tony's father, who lived on the other side of the continent, to take custody of him and try to get him help there, but Tony disappeared the next summer and reappeared in our city with his mother, once more diagnosed "schizophrenic." I completed therapy with Jennifer, and she moved to another country, where she is also doing well. So, two out of the four made it to safety and relative health. Two were lost.

I remember Lorraine's freckled face, her sweet smile, and her gentle nature. I still have her stuffed bear, which other clients hold when they need comfort. I wish I had been able to keep her safe. I wish the mental health system had recognized the evil that they were abetting when they misdiagnosed her and kept her subject to so many more years of abuse. I applaud the psychiatrist who had the courage to look at a new diagnosis and break rank to attempt to work with me. I sincerely hope Lorraine's next life, or her afterlife (if she has one), is the opposite of what this one was.

As some of you already know, the first experience of a therapist working with ritual abuse or mind control survivors involves shock, disbelief, and confusion. I remember that with Teresa, I became first shocked, then disbelieving, as she disclosed sexual abuse by one person after another before the ritual abuse became evident. I thought, "How could one person be abused by so many people?" It did not occur to me initially that these abusers were all connected to the cult or to her parents. I could not conceive the true nature of the abuse that would unfold.

I was also very confused about Teresa's multiplicity, and discounted her "inner child" as part of the latest self-help fad. I did not really realize that it was possible for a person to have different self-states separated by walls of amnesia, so total that one state would not remember what another state had done. Teresa had a habit of confabulating to cover when she did not remember what happened, and she had acquired quite a reputation among service providers because of what they called "lying." In actual fact, she just did not remember, so she made something up. My first task with her and my other dissociative clients was to learn about dissociative disorders. If you do not know about dissociative disorders, stop right here. You will need to read some of the books recommended in Appendix I before you proceed. The deliberate creation of dissociative disorders is basic to ritual abuse and mind control, and unless you understand how dissociative disorders work, you will be very confused by these clients and will not be able to help them.

The second reaction of most therapists working with these clients is a combination of horror and fear. First of all, there is the sheer horror of the memories they are disclosing. Sadistic torture, murder of fetuses, painful electroshock to infants and children, gang rapes, necrophilia, bestiality, drowning, near-death experiences . . . you name it, you will hear about it. Your clients need you to be able to hear these memories with calm compassion. You need to be strong enough to hear these things and not have the color drain from your face. Your client will see such involuntary reactions as indicators that you cannot handle what they are disclosing, and you will hear no more.

We are all traumatized, especially by the first few clients with these kinds of experiences that we encounter. We have to pay attention to our own vicarious traumatization (see Pearlman & Saakvitne, 1995), and make sure we take care of ourselves so that we are not constantly living in a state of trauma. Any of our own past trauma, too, can be activated by what our clients disclose. So it is important to have competent supervision or consultation and, if necessary, our own therapy. It is important that the supervision and consultation be with someone who is experienced with dissociative disorders and ideally with ritual abuse and mind control, too, although at this point not many experienced therapists have such a background.

And we must address the risk to the clients. Many of our ritually abused or mind-controlled clients engage in self-harming behavior, which is actually the behavior of parts who have been trained to do this as punishment for disclosures. Most therapists do not realize this, and spend a lot of time and energy on trying to convince clients not to “act out.” The clients commonly attempt suicide, also a trained behavior, induced by parts of the mind who either think they must kill themselves before the perpetrators kill them in a gruesome manner, think someone they love will be killed if they do not (like Lorraine), or believe they will not die but will be rewarded when the body dies.

This is very stressful for therapists. We spend a lot of time and energy worrying about our clients’ safety, and feeling helpless in the face of these behaviors. These behaviors can also get our clients involved in the psychiatric hospital system, which can, in some cases, be helpful, but in other cases can be problematic, bringing on peer pressure to treat the clients with medication and confinement and give them other diagnoses than the correct one of dissociative disorder.

But this is only the beginning of the feeling of risk. When we discover that in many, though not all cases, the clients are still being abused and are being forced to take part in abuse of others, our protective instincts go on constant alert. If the clients have children, we realize that these children are at risk and we have to make decisions about reporting something that will probably not be believed. We become anxious about every cult or family holiday time, along with our client, and we imagine the horrors they might be going through.

Acknowledging that our clients are often in “current contact” with their abusers is frustrating and, often, frightening. As therapy progresses with “current contact” clients, and the clients stop going back to the group when they are supposed to, the risk to the clients does increase.

The teenager, Jennifer, came to one session late with her arms badly slashed. She told me that she had not done it; a cult person had waylaid her on the way to the office and done it in the hope of getting her admitted to hospital where they could have more access to her. I chose to believe her, since she had never lied to me. Remember that both she and Teresa experienced attempted murder disguised as suicide attempts, and Lorraine's death was either murder or forced suicide. I felt as if I were living in a horror movie.

Then there is the fear for ourselves and our families. The first generation of therapists doing this work were told by their clients that the one massive cult was everywhere, knew everything, had access to state-of-the-art technology, and was willing to kill both clients and therapists to stop the information from getting out. When I worked with my first ritually abused clients, I was constantly hearing threats to my life. Teresa, in particular, would come for an appointment and relate in great detail how the cult high priest (whose identity I knew) was going to lie in wait in the hallway of my office building and how he would kill me. The worst threat was when I found out from one of these first four clients that the cult leaders had taken them all in a van to the driveway of my home, had them abused while drugged by a woman impersonating me, and then told them my address and instructed them to go there and set fire to my house while my children and I were asleep. This event was corroborated about a year later by another one of these clients. I took precautions, leaving copies of my records with a lawyer, and the abusers' names in a sealed envelope with the police. I calculated (correctly) that killing me would be a greater security risk to the group than leaving me alive and trying to discredit me in professional circles. But still, I was afraid. It is difficult not to keep on imagining these horrors when you hear them in such detail.

The reality is that even before stories of ritual abuse and mind control began coming out to therapists, the groups had agreed on what kind of disinformation to spread, so that clients would be afraid to tell their therapists what had happened to them, and therapists would be afraid to work with these clients. It is true that keeping the secrets is crucial to all groups who use mind control. But this is also a reason why they are highly unlikely to kill therapists—they do not want any formal investigations. The issue of safety for clients and therapists will be explored in detail in Chapter Eleven, "'Stabilization' takes on a new meaning".

The last major stressor on the therapist working with these clients is isolation and peer pressure. It was particularly bad during the "memory wars" of the 1990s. The diagnosis of dissociative disorder was not widely accepted, and an organized political group, the False Memory Syndrome Foundation, along with other similar groups, took up the task of informing the media that unethical therapists were suggesting to helpless clients that they had been sexually abused, or worse, by family members. A leading journal, Treating Abuse Today, was forced out of business by picketers representing supposedly innocent accused parents. Leading therapists in the dissociative disorders field, such as Bennett Braun and Judith Peterson, were targeted for lawsuits and, in Peterson's case, even criminal charges. Insurance companies chose to settle most lawsuits out of court, giving the impression that the therapists were guilty.

While some therapists were doubtless foolish and unethical, many were not, but almost all were unprepared for this well-organized political attack. Since many of the lawsuits were about cases where ritual abuse was alleged, the remaining leaders in the field of dissociative disorders pulled back and took a skeptical position regarding the existence of ritual abuse. This left the therapists such as myself, whose clients were reporting this, in a position of isolation. We were attacked by skeptics when we mentioned ritual abuse in online discussion forums. We had no local colleagues who understood what we were dealing with. There were no textbooks to guide us. We saw those from whom we had learnt being publicly ridiculed and humiliated. So, most of us learnt to do our work in private, developing our own techniques, without reporting them publicly.

The situation is somewhat better now. Because the problem of ritual abuse and mind control has not gone away—the survivors are still there—many more therapists have learnt about it. Survivors have spoken out and written their stories, and therapists have learnt a great deal from those brave survivors who have discovered what was done to them. There is a large special interest group on Ritual Abuse and Mind Control within the International Society for the Study of Dissociation. Those therapists who have learnt in isolation or in small private online forums are once again sharing their knowledge widely, and books such as this one are beginning to be published again. The work is still very difficult and challenging, but we now know so much more than we did. We know that there is not one massive Satanic cult, but many different interrelated groups, including religious, military/political, and organized crime, using mind control on children and adult survivors. We know that there are effective treatments. We know that many of the paralyzing beliefs our clients lived by are the result of lies and tricks perpetrated by their abusers. And we know that, as therapists, we can combat this evil with wise and compassionate therapy.

CHAPTER TWO

Ritual abuse and mind control: the definition evolves

The story of our evolving understanding of ritual abuse is one of many unrelated people discovering different parts of the body of a new species in a darkened room and trying to understand what the whole animal looks like. According to Child Abuse Wiki, the term "ritual abuse" was first coined in 1980 in the popular book Michelle Remembers, by Canadian psychiatrist Larry Pazder, and Michelle Smith (1989), his long-time patient. Under Pazder's care, Michelle had remembered childhood abuse in the context of a Satanic cult. He defined the phenomenon as "repeated physical, emotional, mental, and spiritual assaults combined with a systematic use of symbols, ceremonies, and machinations designed and orchestrated to attain malevolent effects" (Pazder, cited in Kahaner (1988), p. 201).

Subsequent definitions came primarily from professionals addressing alleged ritual abuse in childcare settings. Child Abuse Wiki states that Finkelhor, Williams, Burns, and Kalinowski elaborated on Pazder's definition, defining ritual abuse as "abuse that occurs in a context linked to some symbols or group activity that have a religious, magical or supernatural connotation, and where the invocations of these symbols or activities are repeated over time and used to frighten and intimidate the children" (1988, p. 52). and that Kelley referred to ritual abuse as the "repetitive and systematic sexual, physical, and psychological abuse of children by adults as part of cult or Satanic worship" (1988, p. 228).

Because Satanic cult abuse was the first to surface, these early definitions of ritual abuse focused on its religious (specifically Satanic) aspects. For a long time the phenomena were referred to as "Satanic ritual abuse" (SRA). Over time, however, more than Satanism emerged. In the religious form of the abuse, other deities than Satan were worshipped, notably Lucifer, and a Gnostic form of the Christian god who kept good and evil in balance. Various ancient gods were represented.

Most of these survivors appeared to be from intergenerational cult groups, where many generations of a family would be involved. Others were abused as young children in daycare settings, even though their parents were not part of the abuse. In fact, these parents were often dedicated advocates on their children's behalf, often at great personal and emotional expense.

As therapists continued to work with clients who described experiences of this kind of abuse, it became evident that the phenomenon was much broader than what was initially seen. Survivors began to disclose a similar manifestation, which occurred in secretive military/political and organized criminal groups. This abuse seems to be more pragmatic than spiritual or creed-based in nature. Some cases include Satanist scenarios, but these seem to be staged more for the purpose of controlling and frightening the children or for use in pornography. Different scenarios, such as experiments or military training, predominate.

As you can see, the term "ritual abuse" is a complicated thing, whose definition evolves as more survivors reveal and come to understand their experiences. Like dissociation, it appears on a spectrum, according to some. For instance, the FAQs on the website of Survivorship, a group devoted to survivors of ritual abuse, offer both broad and narrow definitions of ritual abuse. The broad definition states that

> Ritual abuse is the abuse of a child, weaker adult, or animal in a ritual setting or manner. In a broad sense, many of our overtly or covertly socially sanctioned actions can be seen as ritual abuse, such as military basic training, hazing, racism, spanking children, and partner-battering. Some abuse is private (Jeffrey Dahmer, for example), some public. Public ritual abuse may be either open or secret.

Once again we see a definition that uses the term "ritual", but separates it from religion and applies it to any repetitive abusive activity. The website also provides this narrower definition of ritual abuse: "Repeated, extreme, sadistic abuse, especially of children, within a group setting. The group's ideology is used to justify the abuse, and abuse is used to teach the group's ideology. The activities are kept secret from society at large, as they violate norms and laws." This definition could apply to abuse by an intelligence agency, as well as that by a religious group.

When therapists first discovered ritual abuse, the focus was on the horrors the child victims endured. The mind control that is created by these groups was seen as secondary, and was not well understood. Over time, we grew to understand that this mind control is primary, and is actually the goal of all such abuse. The term "ritual abuse" then came to be used to apply to both the classic religiously based abuse specifically, and generically to the universal aspect of mind control.

Although there is a large body of knowledge, including a number of websites, devoted to mind control, the term has yet to appear in the Oxford English Dictionary. The commonly accepted definition can be found in Wikipedia, which describes mind control as involving > a broad range of psychological tactics able to subvert an individual's control of his or her own thinking, behavior, emotions, or decisions . . . The goal is to have those individuals carry out actions which ordinarily would go counter to human nature. This training involves physical, sexual and emotional torture, the use of drugs, and, in some cases, the use of technologies which directly affect brain function.

In an online article entitled "Simplifying complex programming," Jeannie Riseman, a leading light in Survivorship, talks about methods of influencing or controlling thought as being on a continuum. She points out that conditioning is the way we transmit our culture to our children, through repetition and reinforcement. Some conditioning is good; other conditioning, such as that for racial prejudice, is not. The use of force and violence, however, reduces a child to a survival level in which she enters an altered state of consciousness. At this point, Riseman begins using the term "programming."

At the far end of the conditioning-programming spectrum, according to Riseman, is deliberate mind control, which is extremely complicated and malevolent. "When such violence is unexpected or unpredictable, when it is a common occurrence, when it is bizarre, and when it is done in secret or denied, it has a larger effect on the child. All these things are the case for children raised in dangerous cults."

In 1991, the report of the Los Angeles County Commission for Women's Ritual Abuse Task Force reflected their early understanding of the issue. It stated, > Mind control is the cornerstone of ritual abuse, the key element in the subjugation and silencing of its victims. Victims of ritual abuse are subjected to a rigorously applied system of mind control designed to rob them of their sense of free will and to impose upon them the will of the cult and its leaders. Most often these ritually abusive cults are motivated by a Satanic belief system. The mind control is achieved through an elaborate system of brainwashing, programming, indoctrination, hypnosis, and the use of various mind-altering drugs. The purpose of the mind control is to compel ritual abuse victims to keep the secret of their abuse, to conform to the beliefs and behaviors of the cult, and to become functioning members who serve the cult by carrying out the directives of its leaders without being detected within society at large.

Child Abuse Wiki reaffirms this, defining ritual abuse as:

> a brutal form of abuse of children, adolescents, and adults, consisting of physical, sexual, and psychological abuse, and involving the use of rituals. Ritual does not necessarily mean Satanic. However, most survivors state that they were ritually abused as part of Satanic worship for the purpose of indoctrinating them into Satanic beliefs and practices. Ritual abuse rarely consists of a single episode. It usually involves repeated abuse over an extended period of time. The physical abuse is severe, sometimes including torture and killing. The sexual abuse is usually painful, sadistic, and humiliating, intended as means of gaining dominance over the victim. The psychological abuse is devastating and involves the use of ritual/indoctrination, which includes mind control techniques and mind altering drugs, and ritual/intimidation which conveys to the victim a profound terror of the cult members and of the evil spirits they believe cult members can command. Both during and after the abuse, most victims are in a state of terror, mind control, and dissociation in which disclosure is exceedingly difficult.

Note the inclusion of the concept of dissociation in this definition.

Even when the term "mind control" is not used, many applications or definitions of the term "ritual abuse" allude to it. Authors Randy Noblitt and Pamela Perskin Noblitt (2008), authors and editors of two important books on ritual abuse, define it as "abuse that occurs in a ceremonial or circumscribed manner for the purpose of creating or manipulating already created alter mental states." You will notice that the religious aspect of the abuse has almost disappeared from this definition, and Satanism is not mentioned at all. The Noblitts believe that this is a simple and clear definition that can generate testable hypotheses.

On the other hand, some others prefer a more detailed description of what is entailed in the abusive situation or a description of alleged perpetrators or perpetrating groups. Ellen Lacter, in her extensive website devoted to the issue of ritual abuse, gives this definition:

> Ritual abuse consists of conditioning and torture carried out in a ceremonial or calculated manner for the purpose of effecting control over a victim's mind and behavior. It is international in scope, with similarities and variations across cultures.
> Ritual abuse often involves the following:
> - Extreme, sadistic, repetitious, physical abuse/torture, often to near-death
> - Exploitation of the mind's capacity to dissociate trauma, to manipulate behavior, create amnesia, and to prevent disclosure
> - Mind control and brainwashing techniques for the purpose of indoctrination and control
> - Drugs to induce immobility, pain, confusion, hallucinations, unconscious states, depersonalization and derealization
> - Systematic abuse and rituals to coerce and indoctrinate victims into the abusers' beliefs and world view
> - Force, threats, and manipulation to coerce victims to harm others
> - Sexual abuse of children and adults including rape, prostitution, pornography, snuff films, and bestiality
> - Trafficking and slavery of children and adults
> - Abuse beginning in infancy and childhood, with the goal of life-long control
> - Deprivation of basic needs and human contact, including confinement and isolation
> - Human and animal sacrifice to appease and empower humans and their deities
> - Unconsenting medical and psychological experimentation to increase the ability to control a victim's mind and behavior
> - Attempts to control or dominate the "soul", "spirit", or their equivalents cross-culturally.

Programming and mind control in visible and hidden cults

The term "cult" is often used to describe certain visible religious or ideological groups that attempt to practice mind control. Conway and Siegelman's 1978 book "Snapping" details effects of brainwashing, or mind control, attempts in visible cults. Ritually abusive cults, which are generally hidden, are usually not recognized by these descriptions, although they should be. The Advanced Bonewits Cult Danger Evaluation Frame developed by Isaac Bonewits, an influential neopagan leader and author, lists eighteen different criteria by which to evaluate the dangerousness of a cult. These include Internal Control, External Control, Wisdom/Knowledge Claimed by Leaders, Wisdom/Knowledge Credited to Leaders by Members, Dogma, Recruiting, Front Groups, Wealth, Sexual Manipulation, Sexual Favoritism, Censorship, Isolation, Dropout Control, Violence, Paranoia, Grimness, Surrender of Will, and Hypocrisy.

If Bonewits' criteria were applied to the average Satanic or Luciferian cult, or the typical military or organized crime group described by mind-controlled clients in therapy offices, we would see extremely high scores on almost all items. The tactics of these groups, however, are quite different from, and more extreme than, those found in visible cults. They are much more violent, for one thing. Their methods are more sophisticated and the consequences of those tactics more complex. Their invisibility makes them particularly dangerous, and makes treating their victims/survivors more complicated. In order to keep their existence secret, members have to maintain "normal" lives while continuing to be involved with these groups.

Additionally, unlike members of the visible cults, members of ritually abusive cults are either born into cult families or recruited as very young children through caregivers outside the family. According to survivor accounts, all these invisible cults, as well as military and organized crime groups, begin their "brainwashing" with children.

The mind control of which we speak in this book achieves its power over its victims through "programming." Survivor Robin Morgan (see Chapter Ten) defines programming as follows: "Programming is the act of installing internal, pre-established reactions to external stimuli so that a person will automatically react in a predetermined manner to things like an auditory, visual or tactile signal or perform a specific set of actions according to a date and/or time."

Popular media representations of mind control involves trained spies or assassins working for the CIA or other military/political groups or even companies without their conscious knowledge, because they have other "personalities" who engage in these activities. Think of Jason Bourne, or the hero of Conspiracy Theory, or Echo in television's Dollhouse, as well as other American television shows and films. The stories concocted about these mind-controlled special agents suggest that they are recruited in adulthood, even making a conscious choice to participate. Once they have been recruited, their previous memories are erased and new "personalities" created with special skills and manufactured memories.

The awful reality, however, is that there is only one way to create persons who can engage in activities such as spying, sex slavery, assassination, or ritual murder without any conscious awareness of this. The way is through abuse and torture of small children, separating parts of their minds that are then indoctrinated and trained individually as the abusers see fit. There is no adult who volunteers his loyalty to such a group because of thought-out belief in its goals; there are only small children who are trained by these groups through torture, and, as a consequence, grow up with major dissociative disorders. Worse, in most cases these children's own parents are involved in their torture and the training of their parts. Amnesia related to the traumatic events is much more likely if caregivers are involved in the abuse, and if it has to be kept secret, as Jennifer Freyd points out in Betrayal Trauma (1996).[1]

Systematic child abuse and its consequences

The consensus among professionals who have treated and studied people with dissociative disorders is that the vast majority have suffered severe, and often secretive, childhood trauma—usually, but not always, child abuse. This abuse often involves both betrayal and secrecy. Many people who appear in psychotherapy offices alleging histories of ritual abuse and/or mind control are found to suffer from a major dissociative disorder such as dissociative identity disorder (DID), or a close variant, "dissociative disorder not otherwise specified" (DDNOS). The traumatic dissociation that creates such disorders is usually deliberately designed by these abusers.

Mind control, including ritual abuse, is usually deliberately designed to produce traumatic dissociation particularly as found in DDNOS, in which many parts with distinct identities switch behind an apparently normal presenting personality. These disorders are very similar, in that they both involve separate ego states that switch behind an apparently normal presenting personality, who is seen by outsiders as the "real" person. However, DID is distinguished by the fact that inside parts periodically take over and act in the outside world, leaving the main personality with amnesia about what happened during these time periods. Both dissociative disorders prevent the secrets of abuser groups from being discovered. It appears that DDNOS is the intentional goal of these abusers, but DID sometimes results from a failure of programming.

What we are discussing in these pages is not new. Organized groups have always abused children for their own purposes. "Possession" is known in many cultures. It is likely that the kind of systematized abuse that created dissociative disorders was originally confined to religious groups which wanted to produce "possession" states. Eventually—in the mid to late twentieth century—the abuse appears to have become more scientific, designed to split the children's psyches in such ways that they could be used for the purposes of the abusing group. Although abusers continued to tell children they were inserting "demons" or "spirits" into them, these groups became aware that what they were really doing was creating dissociative disorders.

Dissociative disorders

Appropriate treatment for dissociative disorders requires additional knowledge, skills, and training beyond the basics required for general psychotherapy. There are several excellent books on dissociation diagnosis and treatment, and online courses offered by the International Society for the Study of Trauma and Dissociation (www.isstd.org) that contain a great deal of practical guidance. Conferences and study groups on DID and related disorders take place in various locations around the world. If you are new to the field, it is important to find a supervisor or consultant experienced in the dissociative disorders field, ideally one with RA/MC treatment experience. In the meantime, here are some basics, as they relate to the subjects of this book.

An essential component of mind control programming is the creation of a number of separate identity states, which may also be referred to as ego states or alternate identities ("alters"). Most trained "alter personalities" are created and trained in childhood. Abusers purposely create complex dissociative disorders in which additional personalities can be added at later dates in victims who have been properly prepared.

Different training is given to each state or group of similar states. Each is assigned and trained to do a specific "jobs" or to have a different function. The more complex the abuse and mind control training the child has experienced, the more complex the personality system. In this way, the perpetrator group can create the ideal sex slave, drug courier, or cult priest, who does not know he or she has been victimized by, or committed, a crime, and, thus, will genuinely and convincingly claim innocence if caught. This structuring of the personality system allows perpetrator groups to continue abusing and training children without those children breaking the secret. Child victims will, in their everyday lives, be unaware that any of this has happened.

Typically, some of these identity states will interact with the "normal" world, and others will perform functions only for the perpetrator group as a result of being cued. Some of those can take over executive function of the body. Identity states will have no access to, or memory of, the thoughts and activities of the other states. Only those who know how to activate a particular trained identity state will be able to talk to the person in that identity state. This is one thing that differentiates such structured systems from the more "organic" form of multiplicity that comes from non-mind control-based, albeit severe, child abuse. (With military / political mind control, some identity states can only be accessed through certain other specific identity states.)

Many of the states, even in adults, will continue to experience themselves as young children. Some of the parts believe their only choice is to remain loyal to the group in order for themselves, or others, to stay alive. This is essential to understand if one is to treat this population with empathy.

Typically, emotions "leak through" from the hidden states to the main everyday personality, and this leakage of anxiety or sadness or anger is what brings the person to therapy. In these cases, cognitive behavioral treatments are unsuccessful because the hidden states will continue to exist, along with the extreme emotions created by their abuse.

Trainees discarded by the perpetrator groups because they are rebellious or security risks are often programmed to self-destruct with drugs and alcohol and risky behaviors. Successfully programmed survivors are reported to be highly functional in the identity states that perform cult rituals or other tasks required by their group.

Mind control methods are constantly evolving. Jeannie Riseman of Survivorship summarizes the process succinctly:

> what we are referring to when we talk of mind-control experimentation is the deliberate and skillful manipulation of parts of a person's mind so that it becomes, and remains, under the control of another. The experimenters, trainers, and handlers have a particular goal in mind and they select the techniques that will enable them to achieve that goal. They are familiar with many different techniques and when they aren't satisfied with the results, they modify their plan. They are thorough and systematic. They know what they are doing. The technology they have at their command is much more complicated and sophisticated than what is available to the average abusive group. It's cutting edge and can be pretty expensive. This technology includes electroshock, implants, equipment to deliver information to different parts of the brain, as in split brain techniques, and many other things.

Systematic child abuse, government experimentation, and networking

Mind control abuses designed and perpetrated by US intelligence agencies and those of other countries are now widely understood to have occurred. These activities were assigned such names as MKULTRA, BLUEBIRD, and PAPERCLIP, which involved Nazi doctors and scientists who had been given asylum in the USA. The Cold War was used as justification for mind control abuses intended to create spies or assassins who lacked conscious awareness of their involvement.

Described in CIA documents that became available through the American Freedom of Information Act in the latter part of the twentieth century, these activities have been the subject of senate hearings in the USA and much media attention. Colin Ross documented them in his 2000 book, Bluebird. It is definitively documented that some mind control abuses that we identify as emanating from the government were designed, promoted, and executed by the most respected psychiatrists and psychologists of the day, in the most revered learning and behavioral health institutions. Some perpetrators have been exposed for practicing such techniques on persons who came to them for help. For example, Canada's Dr Donald Ewen Cameron was a leading Montreal psychiatrist who, in the 1950s and 1960s, with the support of CIA funding, engaged in unethical experiments on people who sought help for run-of-the-mill emotional difficulties, destroying memories of their entire previous lives (see the Wikipedia entry regarding Cameron).

We know that the dissociation created by childhood mind control can yield a perfectly invisible spy or political assassin. What is not generally known is that some of these projects involved experimentation on children. It is suspected that most documents regarding this were destroyed. In her 2001 book, A Nation Betrayed: The Chilling True Story of Secret Cold War Experiments Performed on Our Children and Other Innocent People, survivor Carol Rutz (see Chapter Twelve of this book) describes the years of government mind control experiments to which she was subjected. Her memories of sexual abuse, hypnosis, drugs, ESP, and other experiences are specific and meticulous, but she wanted more. In 1999, at the age of fifty-two, after submitting a FOIA request, she received the validation she had been waiting for. It came in the form of three CD ROMs:

> On December 17, 1999 I turned 52 years old. On that day I received three CD ROMs from the CIA in response to my FOIA request. Forty-eight years after I was first experimented on, I found solid proof of my memories—proof that was in the government vaults of the nearly 18,000 pages of declassified documents from the Bluebird/Artichoke and MKULTRA programs. One of the documents specifically stated that experimental studies of the postulated abilities of a few specially gifted subjects would be conducted. [Subproject 136 of MKULTRA CIA Mori ID#17395 ESP Research, 1961 and 1962, declassified documents from CIA]. The document states 'that in working with individual subjects, special attention will be given to dissociative states which tend to accompany spontaneous ESP experiences. Such states can be induced and controlled to some extent with hypnosis and drugs . . . The data used in the study will be obtained from special groups such as psychotics, children and mediums . . .'
> The document continues,
>
> 'Learning studies will be instituted in which the subject will be rewarded or punished for his overall performance and reinforced in various ways by being told whether he was right, by being told what the target was, with electric shock etc.'
>
> The proposal then goes on to say,
> 'In other cases drugs and psychological tricks will be used to modify his attitudes. The experimenters will be particularly interested in dissociative states, from the abaissement de niveau mental, to multiple personality in so-called mediums; and an attempt will be made to induce a number of states of this kind, using hypnosis.' The government had finally handed me the validation I had been searching for. To say my heart stopped that day is almost true.

Some of these government documents show that experiments were done on children as well as adults. One of the declassified documents from MKULTRA describes two experiments on two girls in 1951, in which children, after being taught to respond to code words which would function as post-hypnotic suggestions, were successfully trained to place an incendiary device or steal a person's belongings while in a trance state, and then be amnesic about doing it.

Survivor accounts such as that of Carol Rutz are corroborated by others who indicate that governmental groups wanting to create mind-controlled spies used not only hypnosis, but electroshock, torture, and complex technology. We know that a large number of these documents have been destroyed, and it does not defy the imagination to imagine that the perpetrators would not want the public to know they had tortured children in the name of national defense.

Perpetrator groups and connections

The CIA is not the only political group to have engaged in mind control on children. It appears that other government agencies in the USA and the intelligence agencies of other countries, as well as neo-Nazi groups, have also engaged in similar practices, with similar goals. We know that the Nazis experimented on children in ruthless ways. There is evidence that some Nazi doctors were imported to the United States (Bower, 1987), where they continued their research for a different employer (and covertly for the neo-Nazis, if they believed their original ideology). Many ritual abuse survivors report "doctors" at their cult training centers who assisted with their training.

Where did these groups access the children on whom they experimented and whom they trained? According to survivors, during the second half of the twentieth century there appears to have been some collaboration between the secretive military and political organizations and the occult religious groups who were already engaging in deliberate systematized child abuse. Many survivors report being abused by religious groups, more than one military or political group (for example, CIA and neo-Nazis and Ku Klux Klan), and also organized criminal groups. These groups apparently share children, strategies, and even trainers. Groups who use children in child pornography often borrow them from multi-generational incestuous families, such as are found in organized cults. Military mind control trainers also find cult children readily trainable as potential spies and killers because a dissociative foundation has already been created in them. Whether criminal, religious, or political/military, abusers on an international scale are aware that dissociation is the lynchpin of power and secrecy. What better source of already dissociative children than the parents who were abusing them in ritualistic cults?

All these groups employ the same torture, interrogation, and training techniques used on adults by military and police all over the world. Evidence is that many of the techniques of ritual abuse and mind control are used for child pornography, the training of child soldiers (notably in Africa) and the human trafficking of sex trade workers (Guardian, 2009). The behavior of at least some suicide bombers and terrorists is consistent with that found in programmed survivors who present for therapy.

Organized crime has also been involved, using children (often the same ones) for child prostitution and pornographic filming, and wanting ways to control those children and make sure of their secrecy. We can speculate that these enterprises are an important income source for both ritualistic cults and intelligence agencies.

When working with this population, it is extremely important to remember that you are dealing with survivors of powerful and violent organized abusive groups who have a high stake in keeping what they are doing hidden from the general public. It does not matter whether the perpetrators are parents, occult religious groups, military and intelligence operations, or traditional organized crime. They are well organized to prevent disclosures and to stop disclosures from continuing if they have been made.

> When you have eliminated the impossible, whatever remains, however improbable, must be the truth. (Sir Arthur Conan Doyle)
> Men occasionally stumble over the truth, but most of them pick themselves up and hurry off as if nothing ever happened. (Winston Churchill)
> I have sworn . . . eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man. (Thomas Jefferson)

Note

1. Adults without pre-existing dissociative disorders can apparently be coerced into a form of dissociation which Robert Jay Lifton, in his book, The Nazi Doctors, calls "doubling," in which they behave very differently at home from the way they behave in daily coercive life-threatening situations, but they do have some awareness of what they are doing and have to find ways to justify it. For example, he states that "By not quite seeing it, doctors could distance themselves from the very killing they were actively supervising" (1986, p. 199). They developed what Lifton calls an "Auschwitz self," different from the pre-war and the post-war self, who justified what they were doing by racial and religious ideologies.

CHAPTER THREE

The basics of therapy

Here are some basic points regarding treatment of persons with dissociative disorders, and mind control histories. This initial material will not be new for some of you, although others may need help to understand the internal experience of a person who is multiple, or some of the fundamentals of how to approach such clients.

Developing empathy for people with dissociative disorders

Mind control programming builds on the natural, reactive dissociative fragmenting caused by childhood trauma. The trauma-based developing of many selves that begins in early childhood and results from extreme (often life-threatening) trauma is not merely psychological. It is also a biological process in the brain. It is not something that the person chooses, and it cannot begin in adulthood. Most survivors of organized mind control and/or ritual abuse are "polyfragmented"—that is, they have a large number of alter personalities. In order to properly help them, we need to understand what it is like to be them.

Recognizing and respecting differences

People tend to assume that other people are similar to them, unless those people are in some way visibly different. It is easy for us to accept that someone who has a different skin color may be different in their background and way of thinking, but more difficult when people look and sound the same as us. Sometimes, someone may appear just like you physically, but their accent may reveal an alien background and culture. They look the same, but they are different. These differences we can also recognize.

We therapists often make inaccurate assumptions about people living with DID and DDNOS. They often appear to be "just like us," so we often assume their experience of life reflects our own. But this is profoundly untrue. It results in a communication gap, and, as a consequence, treatment errors. Because the dominant culture is one of persons with a single sense of self, most with multiple "selves" have learned to hide their multiplicity and imitate those who are singletons (that is, have a single, non-fragmented personality). Therapists who do not understand this sometimes describe their clients' alters without acknowledging their dissociation, saying only that they have different "moods." In overlooking dissociation, this description fails to recognize the essential truth of such disorders, and of the alters.

It was difficult for me to comprehend what life was like for my first few dissociative clients. I had experienced mood states in my own life, especially during my teens, but through introspection, I could eventually identify the needs they represented and make sure I met those needs. I had also experienced the usual teenage identity confusion of struggling to figure out what kind of a self could encompass all aspects of me, but, still, I had always had a strong adult self. I had never "lost time," never heard voices, and never experienced myself as being more than one person. I knew what I was doing at all times and had a relatively consistent set of skills and behaviors. In short, my daily experience of life was light years away from that of my dissociative clients.

Fortunately, my clients could teach me about their culture of multiplicity.

Those who are aware of their condition and experience themselves as "multiple" might refer to themselves as "we" rather than "I." I shall use the term "multiple" at times, in respect for their internal experience. It is important to point out, however, that I recognize that someone who is multiple is actually a single fragmented person rather than many people. On the outside, a multiple is probably not visibly different from anyone else. But that image is only an imitation: people who are multiple cannot think like the rest of us, and we cannot think like them. (In fact, since it is difficult for the multiple to understand how singletons think, some of them might think it is you who are strange.)

Just as a singleton cannot become a multiple at will, a multiple cannot become a singleton, until and unless the barriers between the parts of the self are removed. Those barriers were put up to enable the child to tolerate, and so survive, unavoidable abuse.

In addition to pursuing educational resources, ask the person you are working with to be your teacher about being multiple. Those who are aware of their condition are usually glad to be asked. It can be very lonely to not be understood by other people. Once you start meeting the insiders, you might find that the child personalities in adult bodies feel nobody else "gets" them or recognizes their existence. It is also important for you to know that they generally prefer to be talked to as the age they feel they are rather than the age the body is. However, you must be careful with recognizing and addressing them, because, like all of us, child alters are all different: some are shy and some are outgoing; some like attention and others hate it. And some inner systems are very afraid of being known.

Be careful not to treat the person you are working with as a curiosity. Perhaps you do not have a point of reference for this, but I remember how embarrassed I felt on my first night as a student in India, when, as I changed for bed in a university residence, a crowd gathered to stare at me and see whether I was the same color all over. I did not like having to perform (for me, it was singing English popular songs) for other students in India while they all giggled and talked about how cute I was. Multiples do not like having to "perform" (for example, let child alters come out) for the entertainment of singletons. Their human dignity is no less important than anyone else's.

When being multiple is someone's normal state of mind, it may be seen as normal for everyone else, too. I have met several multiples who just assume that everyone else "loses" periods of time (when another alter personality is in charge of the body), finds themselves in places without knowing how they got there, and/or hears voices inside their head. These are typical experiences for them.

Multiplicity is called a "disorder", but has served the person as a valuable, creative asset. It is not an inferior way of being. We who are singletons are well adapted for living in safety, being conscious of everything that happens to us. Being multiple is well-adapted for living with ongoing trauma. I once heard a prison psychologist say he would not treat multiples, because prison is so traumatic that you needed to be multiple to survive well.

Even in "normal" life, there are sometimes advantages to being multiple, because in some cases it permits heightened abilities. I knew a multiple whose alter, "Brain," memorized all her textbooks and was able to remember everything on exams word for word. I knew another who had alters with all kinds of special savant abilities. Without the distractions of emotions, everyday life, and other thoughts, an alter with a singular focus can sometimes do amazing things.

Here is a final point to remember: just as you should not assume that someone from another culture should want to join your culture and give up his or her own, do not assume that every multiple wants to become a singleton. Some do, some do not. Many well-adapted multiples, whose alter personalities are extremely cooperative, prefer to stay as a community of coordinated selves rather than seeking to achieve the therapeutic goal of "integration".

As you can see, understanding your clients who are multiple demands a cultural sensitivity not different from that which many of you might have employed when working with clients from other ethnic groups.

The "apparently normal personality"—the alter you view as "the client"

You should not assume that the adult who functions in the world, or who presents to you, week after week, is the "real" person, and the other personalities are less real. The client who comes to therapy is not "the" person; there are other personalities to meet and work with.

When DID was still officially called MPD, the "person" who lived life on the outside was known as the "host" personality, and the other parts known as alters. These terms, unfortunately, implied that all the parts other than the host were guests, and therefore of less importance than the host. They were somehow secondary. The currently favored theory of structural dissociation (Nijenhuis & Den Boer, 2009; van der Hart, Nijenhuis, & Steele, 2006), which more accurately describes the way personality systems operate, instead distinguishes between two kinds of states: the apparently normal personality, or ANP, and the emotional personality, or EP, both of which could include a number of parts. As Barlow and Freyd (2009) describe the distinction,

> EPs hold traumatic memory, often being stuck in the sensory experience of the memory and unaware of the passage of time. ANPs, in contrast, manage the tasks of daily life, such as working, > and the functions of attachment and caretaking. They may be emotionally unconnected to, or amnesic for, past traumatic events. [p. 101]

A child who is being abused on an ongoing basis needs to be able to function despite the trauma that dominates his or her daily life. That becomes the job of at least one ANP, whom the child creates to be unaware of the abuse and also of the multiplicity, and to "pass as normal" in the real world. The ANP is just an alter specialized for handling the adult world—in other words, the "front person" for the system.

Even therapists who are experienced at working with multiples often struggle with this, making statements such as, "Is this Jane, or one of the alters?" This is very irritating to dissociative systems who are aware of their multiplicity, and confusing to those who are not, especially if it happens not to be Jane who is "out."

Because of their countertransference with the ANP as the client, many therapists are also resistant to the fact that working to strengthen the main presenting personality might help, but is not primary, and generally will achieve only superficial improvements. Inside is where the work occurs.

ANPs, themselves, often have a great deal of difficulty accepting that they are multiple. The words "personalities" or "alters" may frighten them. In the old view of "hosts" and "alternates", "the client" has this difficulty. In reality, whether the person acknowledges that he or she is multiple at any given time depends on who is "out," or in conscious control of the body, and on how much contact the ANP has with the "inside world."

It is common that in early stages of therapy or of recovery, the ANP knows very little about the other alters. This is one reason to be careful to avoid another common mistake, one which I have made: being too blunt early in therapy with the ANP about his or her role. Having worked with many multiples who are well aware of their condition, I forget what a shock it is to receive the initial diagnosis. "What do you mean, I'm only an alter?" I rush to reassure them that they are a very specialized and important alter, perhaps the only one who can handle the adult world successfully. But that does not erase the shock.

In fact, rather than being "more" than the others, the ANP is generally one that is very limited, with little power in the system, little memory of what happened, and limited energy or emotions. Many ANPs are what used to be called "depleted hosts," alters who have very little energy or strength and are chronically depressed. Although the job of handling everyday adult life is important, some alters who attempt this are too porous to be effective in the world. Two of my long-term dissociative clients chose to replace their outside personalities with other alters who were less permeable to the emotional states of the other parts. (Yes, that is a choice that multiples can make.) In both cases the change made them much more functional.

It is unlikely that one ANP will serve as a constant throughout the person's life. Your client is, therefore, likely to have others besides the one you know, or several who you might think of as "the host". Adults with dissociative disorders often have several ANPs from earlier stages of life inside. They usually have the same name but are of different ages. Sometimes, there are several current ANPs, each of whom assumes she or he is the "real" person and is amnesic of the existence of the others. Their current knowledge and experience may overlap, while their other characteristics differ somewhat. This makes them glide easily from one to the other, and the therapist can easily miss the switch.

One client of mine has four ANPs by the same name who alternate with one another and with some teenage parts at the workplace. One of them is severely depressed and suicidal, another is just a functionary who does her job, another loves music and art and nature, and another is an investigator who wants to know what has gone on in her life to create her symptoms. What they all have in common is their ignorance about the abuse the client suffered and their ability to function somewhat in the adult world. They are not unemotional, although they do not necessarily know the sources of those emotions or recall what they relate to. Emotions from the inside parts leak into the suicidal one more than into the others.

The ANP is almost never the original person, especially in those with extensive abuse histories. You might say that the "original" is an untraumatized child, infant, or even fetus from whom the first split was made. (Two of my clients who integrated fully, and another integrated DID, found such an infant and incorporated all the life experiences of the other alters into that infant, who gradually grew older.) Or you could say that all parts are parts of the original person: some people believe that infants and babies do not have an integrated self, but are a collection of emotional and bodily states whose selfhood is knitted together by the attachment to, and reflection of, a loving caregiver. Many multiples never have this experience, so remain disintegrated.

In one of my clients, the primary ANP had integrated with other parts, and the whole multiplex system went by the body's name, but no alter had that name. In my experience, the only multiples in whom there is one strong ANP are those who were abused or traumatized for only a brief period of time, usually outside the home. Their long period of safety allows them to build a strong "outside world" personality. However, they still have hidden split-off parts who come out only occasionally, or never come out but influence the person's behavior and feelings from time to time. My client who has only three alter personalities besides the ANP was unaware of her multiplicity until she encountered a work-related trauma at age sixty. She became symptomatic as the hidden parts emerged to deal with the recent trauma. Her ANP was very strong until that trauma awakened the emotional states from the original child abuse. At that point, these emotions leaked into the ANP from the other alters. The youngest alter is probably the original person from whom the others were split. Three of her four parts were originally ANPs during her childhood and teens.

In DDNOS, ANPs are merely shells through which the other alters are manifested without overt switching. This makes the multiplicity of your client much less obvious, and supports the fact that you need to be capable of assessing and diagnosing the dissociative disorder properly. I recently consulted to a therapist who felt he had accomplished something by getting his dissociative client to remain in her ANP throughout her sessions with him. His view reflects the fundamental mistake that untrained therapists tend to make with DID and DDNOS. Although his client was properly diagnosed, he assumed that the ANP should be encouraged to take charge of the other parts at all times. He also expected her to speak for them—in other words, to do their therapy. This denied the other parts the opportunity to reveal their secrets, heal their pain, or correct their childhood-based beliefs about the world.

If you were doing family therapy, would it be a good idea to only meet with the father, especially if he had not talked with his children or his spouse in years? Would the other family members feel as if their experiences and feelings mattered? Would they be able to improve their relationships? You must work with the parts who are inside of the system. Directly.

What daily life is like for "a multiple"

Imagine that you have periods of "lost time." You may find writings or drawings which you must have done, but do not remember producing. Perhaps you find child-sized clothing or toys in your home but have no children. You might also hear voices or babies crying in your head. Imagine that you can never predict when you will be able to have certain knowledge or social skills, and your emotions and your energy level seem to change at the drop of a hat, and for no apparent reason. You cannot understand why you feel what you feel, and, if you are in therapy, you cannot explore those feelings when asked. Your life feels disjointed and often confusing. It is a frightening experience. It feels out of control, and you probably think you are going crazy. That is what it is like to be multiple, and all of it is experienced by the ANPs.

A multiple may also experience very concrete problems, even life-threatening ones. My client whose multiplicity emerged at the age of sixty came home from a meeting to find that an alter had begun to cook something and then left the pot on the stove, almost burning her house down. ANPs and EPs alike may struggle with the serious consequences of this complication.

Your client will probably not know what is responsible for these experiences, and might well have sought help from many therapists who did not know, either.

The following is a categorization of what an ANP might experience.

Amnesia

Amnesia is a major distinguishing characteristic of multiples who are DID, but not of those who are DDNOS. Most people with DID experience periods of amnesia, although they may not know it. Some alters are able to watch all of current life, so are aware of what happens; others, including most ANPs, are very unaware of what has happened while they are not "out" in the body. Some basic indicators of amnesia for persons with ritual abuse and mind control histories include discovering that you have a cut, burn, or bruises with no memory of how it happened.

When one client's brother visited, and talked incessantly in foul language, her oldest "insider" decided to tell him off. The next morning he told his little sister, "You give as good as you get; I didn't know you had it in you." She had no idea what she had said to him. I had to get the story from the alter and tell her. This protector alter was able to observe while the main person was interacting with the brother, but the main person was not able to observe when the other alter was out. It is common that other alters generally observe, although the ANP is unaware of it.

Some dissociative people dissimulate to cover for their periods of amnesia. Imagine what it must be like to experience your own life as if it were a television series, only you do not appear in many of the episodes, and you have no idea what happens in them. (Imagine never being able to recall what happened from one therapy session to the next.)

Sometimes, things happen which the ANP would never have done. One forty-year-old married woman I worked with years ago discovered her multiplicity when a teenage alter developed an online romance with a young man in another part of the continent. Believing herself to be a teenager, she made arrangements to fly to his city to meet him. Another client was caught on a store video pocketing an item without paying for it, an act that was entirely out of character for her. (In her case, it appeared to be a brief stress-related dissociative episode rather than an ongoing dissociative disorder.)

Voices and visions

Hearing voices is another of the most important parts of the experience for most multiples. The voices, of course, are usually the other alters. Those multiples who do not understand their condition frequently seek out help from churches, who perform exorcisms, or from mental health facilities, who diagnose psychosis, medicating heavily and inappropriately. Many therapists believe that these voices are distinguished from the voices of schizophrenia by the fact that they are experienced as coming from inside the head. But this is not always the case. One of my first DID clients, diagnosed with schizophrenia, heard the alters' voices coming out of his television set. I asked one of the main alters why this happened. "If we talk inside his head, he thinks we're demons and doesn't listen to us. But he believes everything he hears or sees on TV." Lesson to learn: there are as many ways to be multiple as there are multiples.

The voices may sound to the ANP like background noise in a crowded place, or they may stand out individually. In some cases, they are just experienced as thoughts rather than heard as voices, but they still feel alien to the person experiencing them, and contribute to the person feeling he or she is going crazy. They may be strong thoughts that come "out of nowhere" and do not really seem to belong to the person. "Thought-snatching," having one's thoughts disappear as inside parts take them away, is also common.

Some voices may cry or give orders or call the ANP names. They may be helpful or reassuring, coming from inner self-helpers. However, their reassurance might or might not be based on facts. Often the voices are critical. Everyone has an "inner critic," of course, but the inner critics of multiples are generally very unpleasant, and are internally audible to the person who is trying to accomplish things or carry on a conversation. No matter what one of my clients does, he hears some inside complainers complaining about it, usually in foul language. He used to speak to them out loud, and nastily. He appeared psychotic. He has now learnt to think to them, and, since he realizes they are small child alters, to reassure them and tell them he loves them. As a result, they are more cooperative, but they still complain in the only kind of language they know, the language they heard at home while attempting to grow up. You will notice that some voices often tell the person to shut up or be quiet, call him or her a liar, and say that certain events never happened. Others may suggest self-harm or suicide. These are all persecutor/protector alters, which we shall discuss in detail later. They are common in mind-controlled personality systems, where they are supposed to say these things to make sure the secrets of the abuse do not leak out. They often engage in more severe reprisals if they are not heeded.

It is common for multiples to hear the sound of infants or small children crying. Abusers often punish children severely for crying (suffocation is the treatment of choice for many cult children being trained not to cry), so the crying goes "inside." An alter who never comes out into the world holds the tears and the crying sound.

Many multiples not only hear, but also see their alters. They might be afraid of alters who resemble their perpetrators, or demons or monsters or animals. They might be afraid to go near alters who appear hurt or dirty or in the conditions in which they were abused. (They also might see their alters' faces in mirrors, which is part of why they often avoid mirrors.)

Sometimes, the voices being heard are not the other alters, but parts of traumatic memories being played back, for example, the voice of an abuser telling the child not to talk about what had happened on pain of death. This is particularly true with mind-control survivors.

Above all, remember that these voices are communicating. Some of your clients understand their condition and have developed effective inner communication. It is important to allow periods of silence in your conversations with them, so that they may consult internally when they hear something or when there is a problem. When they communicate in a way the ANP cannot understand, it is your job to facilitate.

There are some multiples who do not hear voices at all, even when they try to. That is the experience of my client with only three alters. It is difficult for the ANP to communicate with the alters, because they are unable to hear one another, and have to write in a book or talk via me.

Depersonalization and derealization

Depersonalization and derealization are dissociative problems that can exist independently or be part of a more major dissociative disorder. They can make the person feel as if he or she is no longer himself or herself, or feel that familiar places are strange. When alters first appear, the person may have the experience of watching themselves doing things they have no control over, such as harming the body. Another alter is actually "out" and is doing it, and the usual "host" is relegated to a "back seat." This situation can make the world feel unreal to the person who isn't fully present. It can be quite frightening. Imagine how out of control it must feel, as well.

Intrusions of traumatic material

Dissociation protects against overwhelming trauma. When the dissociation is reduced, the post-traumatic intrusive symptoms—flashbacks and nightmares of trauma—can be expected to increase. These may be visual, auditory, or tactile (including physical or emotional pain). Small things in the present environment could trigger flashbacks and feelings of overwhelm and an inability to cope. Intrusions are more common than we generally realize: depression, anxiety, panic attacks, obsessions and compulsions are often emotional intrusions from past traumatic memories that are not recognized as such.

In mind-controlled multiples, these flashbacks should not automatically be treated as spontaneous eruptions of dissociated material, however; they might also be deliberately administered by trained alters in response to behaviors disobedient to the perpetrators, especially telling about the abuse.

Different alters, different awarenesses

While the ANP generally has continuity of memory for most of his or her current life, and hears only some of the alters as voices or thoughts, the other parts often have much more awareness of the personality system. In the first place, unlike the ANP, they are likely to recognize that they are part of a "personality system". They may use the first person plural ("we") when referring to that system.

When someone who is multiple has been in treatment for the dissociative disorder for some time, the ANP may gain some degree of similar awareness, and may then be able to talk with insiders. In many or most cases, however, the ANP does not naturally "go inside" to interact with other parts, but simply "blanks out" while another alter takes over, while the wall of dissociation is maintained between them. It is essential for the therapist to teach the ANP to communicate with the other alters, if the ANP lacks this skill or habit. A lifelong habit of looking outward, and not speaking with the voices, is difficult to overcome. I find it helpful to frequently ask the ANPs of my multiple clients to "ask inside" when they want to know something about, for example, the source of a symptom they are experiencing.

The ANP is generally oriented to time and place, but many of the other alters might not be. They generally believe it is still the year and place where their abuse happened, and they interpret all current events in terms of the experience of that time and place.

Although all the selves of a multiple are really wounded parts of one person, in most cases they experience themselves and one another as separate people. They are just as real to themselves as people on the outside. They might actually see the other selves in locations in the inner world. It is when they are aware of the existence of other selves that they feel multiple. In addition, when mind control has been involved, some of the selves might believe things about their identities and purposes which were deliberately taught to them by their abusers.

However, all the alters are very limited, not just the ANP. The parts or selves feel themselves to be complete persons, but each tends to have a specific function and an unambiguous emotional state. And they are all specialists in only their own particular emotional positions. In those ways, most of them are one-dimensional. Alters have separate and different memories, feelings, and approaches to life, and a sense of separate identity and agency. They do not necessarily know what the other alters do or think. Many alters feel hollow, depersonalized, or uncertain of their identity, precisely because they are just part of a whole. It is together that they form a complete person.

Switching

Imagine there are a number of identical brothers or sisters who impersonate one another. You do not know when they change places, perhaps because they can do this so fast that you can not detect it, and you may talk to many different ones within one conversation. However, if you know them as individuals, you learn to recognize them not by their physical appearance but by their characteristic moods, tones of voice, facial expressions, and other body language. It is the same with alter personalities of multiples. They generally look the same, but they might act differently. You might also see physical evidence of them changing places, in overt behaviors such as eye movements, body tremors, losing track of conversation, or in other, more subtle signs, such as shifts in mood. This is what you see when you see a person with overt dissociative identity disorder.

Most multiples, however, do not show dramatic physical symptoms of switching. The larger the number of alters, the less detectable will be the switches. My client with only three alter personalities switches very visibly: she becomes sleepy, her eyes roll, and then after a few seconds one of the younger parts comes "out" into the body. There is a similar visual switching process when the part goes back inside. The ANP emerges with no memory of what just happened, but with some physical symptoms attributable to the alter, such as a dry mouth or a sore throat (belonging to an alter who had chronic tonsillitis in childhood).

Since alters in a DID system change places often, you should not assume that the person you are talking to remembers what the body has seen, heard, done, or said, even five minutes ago. Switching can be problematic even for those with DDNOS. The shell alter bridges the transitions smoothly so that the individual does not appear multiple at all. When an ANP is a shell, his or her awareness or behavior varies according to which other alters are conscious at any given time. One long-term client of mine, who had a shell ANP, used to switch constantly just behind the surface. A conversation with him was about ten conversations at the same time. He would switch in mid-sentence, and raise a completely different topic, then resume the original topic when the alter who began that topic re-emerged. It took him a long time to gain control over the switching and train his alters to take their turns, and he was unable to accomplish this until his personality system chose a different alter to be "out front" than the one who was originally there, one who had more ego strength and was less permeable to the others inside.

Multiples and responsibility

Remember not to assume that the ANP is able to control the behavior of the alters if she or he only "takes responsibility". If the ANP of a multiple tells you that someone inside wants to kill her, for example, she is telling you that she does not have control over it, and instructing her to take control will not help. You will need to work with the alters involved.

Alter personalities hold memories only of the parts of the person's life that they, as alters, have actually lived. Sometimes, to repeat a point, when an inappropriate behavior happens, the ANP just does not know about it, and is only aware of lost time, or is aware but unable to control it. An alter cannot be held responsible for events they truly do not remember or had no control over at the time. I once treated a ten-year-old girl who had just one alter personality in addition to the host, a three-year-old with the same name as her. When she got bored in school, the ten-year-old would "go inside" her head, and the three-year-old would come out into the body and behave like a three-year-old, which was inappropriate for the classroom. The ten-year-old would then find herself in the school office in trouble with the principal, without any idea of what had happened. While the whole person could be said to be responsible for the behavior, the ten-year-old was not, and the three-year-old was too young to realize what was wrong with her behavior.

In order to deal with issues of responsibility, find and talk with the alter who is actually responsible—either the one who performed the behavior, or another alter who made him or her do it. Remember to be gentle even with the alter who is responsible. Generally, multiples have been abused emotionally as well as physically and sexually, and are very sensitive to blame. The whole story of alters' lives in the outside world is of being held responsible for things they do not remember doing. They get accused of lying and of manipulating. They might, at times, lie and manipulate, especially when parts are out who are very young or who do not have access to certain parts of the brain; for example, they cannot feel pain or cannot feel guilt. But much of the time they just do not know what happened. The alters have learnt to do this because of living with severe punishment. It takes experience in a safe world to learn more direct and honest strategies for having one's needs met.

Identifying ritual abuse and mind control survivors

Once you recognize that you have a client with a major dissociative disorder, you need to determine whether he or she also has a history of ritual abuse or mind control. This may be a controversial perspective, but there is considerable evidence to support it. Here are some statistics provided by Dr Catherine Gould in 1995:

> Among 2,709 members of the American Psychological Association who responded to a poll, 2,292 cases of ritual abuse were reported (Bottoms, Shaver, & Goodman, 1993). In 1992 alone, Childhelp USA logged 1,741 calls pertaining to ritual abuse, Monarch Resources of Los Angeles logged approximately 5,000, Real Active Survivors tallied nearly 3,600, Justus Unlimited of Colorado received almost 7,000, and Looking Up of Maine handled around 6,000. Even allowing for some of these calls to have been made by people who assist survivors but are not themselves survivors, and for some survivors to have called more than one helpline or made multiple calls to the same helpline, these numbers suggest that at a minimum there must be tens of thousands of survivors of ritual abuse in the United States.

Unfortunately, no similar research has been conducted since the "memory wars" of the 1990s. However, the online Extreme Abuse Survey (Rutz, Becker, Overkamp, & Karriker, 2008), with 1471 respondents reporting extreme child abuse, found the majority had endured either ritual abuse or mind control or both. Californian psychologist Randy Noblitt, who specializes in ritual abuse, believes that there are no people with dissociative disorders who have not experienced ritual abuse or mind control. I would not go that far. On the other hand, I am suspicious when a therapist states that he or she has seen many dissociative clients and has never encountered a survivor of these atrocities.

It is possible for a therapist to work right through a dissociative client's non-mind-control memories without touching the parts of the personality system who have experienced ritual abuse or mind control. Jane Wakefield, a psychologist who has worked extensively with survivors of military/political mind control, is convinced that many ritual abuse survivors have also experienced these other kinds of mind control, but their therapists do not access the parts of their personality systems who have these memories. In the Extreme Abuse Survey, of 987 self-identified survivors of extreme child abuse, 19% stated they experienced ritual abuse, 7% stated they experienced mind control, and 52% stated they experienced both ritual abuse and mind control. Twenty-two percent stated they had experienced neither. The definition of mind control used there was: "MC refers to all mind control procedures designed to make a victim follow directives of the programmer without conscious awareness including, but not limited to, government-sponsored mind control experiments."

Ritually abusive cults deliberately divide the personality system down the middle of the head, making sure that there is no communication between the two sides. (This may not be a literal physiological fact, since alters are contained in brain circuitry rather than specific sites in the brain, but it is a belief system common to ritual abusers and their victims, and has real treatment ramifications.) "Left side" alters might be instructed to speak to no one other than the perpetrators. Although emotions may leak out from these alters, the person could go through years of therapy without the therapist ever suspecting that they exist. In ritually abused personality systems, there is often also mind control of other types, and the alters belonging to these events may be segregated in some way. One client of mine has Ku Klux Klan alters hidden "beneath the ground" in her inner world.

If you do not diagnose and treat ritual abuse and/or mind control when it is present, your survivor client will remain unhealed.

Indicator lists

There are standardized assessment tools and guidelines for diagnosing DID. However, there is nothing comparable as yet for diagnosing ritual abuse (RA) and mind control (MC). Since the beginning of the current therapeutic focus on incest recovery, therapists and survivors have been developing checklists of characteristics of such a history, one purpose of which has been to assist in assessing for such trauma. In part, these have arisen from the fact that incest frequently results in a hidden, or, as Denise Galinas has called it, a disguised presentation. (Blume's "Incest survivors aftereffects checklist" (ISAC), found in her book, Secret Survivors: Uncovering Incest and its Aftereffects in Women, is one of the most well known of such lists.) Similar checklists have been developed regarding the sub-group of survivors who have experienced RA/MC.

One early handout by Californian psychologist Pamela Reagor includes the following indicators for a child/adolescent history of ritualistic abuse, without apparent cult contact in adulthood: diagnosis of MPD or DDNOS; poor or problematic response to competent treatment for MPD/DDNOS; drawings characterized by ritual-like features, for example, lots of red and black, knives, fire, cages, robes, body parts, blood, etc.; notable preoccupation with, or avoidance of, newscasts, magazine articles, conversation, etc. about ritual abuse; involvement with, or manipulation by, other ritual abuse survivors, or reports by other survivors that that person "responds to triggers," and a pattern of decompensation and/or hospitalization during, for example, Satanic ritual holiday periods.

Ellen Lacter provides a current, and comprehensive, list of indicators on her website, (www.endritualabuse.org). Lacter's list for adult survivors of ritual abuse has forty-three items. Some that resonate with my experience of ritual abuse survivors include:

- history of significant self-mutilation, particularly cuts in patterns, shapes, or letters, and genital self-harm or introduction of sharp objects into genitalia;
- fears, phobias, and nightmares associated with religion; health care; bodily fluids and excretions; weapons; birthdays and weddings; police, jails, and cages; baths and drowning; insects, snakes, spiders, and rats; cameras and being photographed; specific colors or shapes; sexual perversion, intrusive thoughts or impulses, especially sado-masochism, pedophilia, zoophilia.

Critics associated with the "false memory syndrome" movement of the 1990s have attempted to discredit such indicator lists. The criticisms levied against Blume's checklist are typical. For one thing, it is said that individual items on the ISAC can be explained by a variety of experiences that are not the subject of the list. When we apply this to Reagor's indicators, we can see easily that not all people diagnosed with DID or DDNOS have experienced ritual trauma, even if they have a poor response to competent treatment. Drawings with ritual-like features might indicate an obsession with rock bands. Preoccupation with media portrayals of ritual abuse could indicate a "wannabe," and avoidance could indicate a sensitive soul. Decompensation around birthdays or holidays might indicate a family history of alcoholism, with drunken violence at those times. However, what might account for someone responding to mind control triggers? Or patterned self-mutilation (from Lacter's list), or a combination of all the phobias listed by Lacter?

Further, critics suggest that list originators, or therapists, conclude that if someone has one or just a few of the indicators on the lists, they must be survivors of the alleged abuse. This argument, too, is invalid, and misrepresents such lists. The ISAC, for instance, states in several places that incest should only be suspected when one has the majority of items on the list. Items in these checklists, like those on symptom lists for cancer or other diseases diagnosed by physicians, are not intended as individual indicators. Once again referencing the above example of Reagor's list, in medicine the same symptom might be indicative of a number of different conditions, some serious and some benign. It is the configuration and pattern of the symptoms that makes a difference. We see that when all the items of Reagor's list are taken together, they accurately present a profile that can alert the clinician to the possibility of a ritual abuse history. Lacter states at the start of her list, "Remember, indicator lists only provide common associated signs. Most survivors will have many indicators. The presence of indicators does not prove the existence of ritual trauma. The absence does not mean a person has no such trauma."

Dr Catherine Gould issued a comprehensive four-page long, single-spaced, small type "Signs and symptoms of ritual abuse in children" in 1988. It included problems associated with such ordinary activities as toileting and the bathroom, certain colors, eating, family relationships, play and peer relations, the doctor's office, religion and the supernatural, and sexual behavior and beliefs, as well as emotional problems including speech, sleep, and learning problems. Although these particular items could arise from many causes, Gould's list also included a number that are very specific, some of which are very suspicious for sexual abuse, and others for abuse that is specifically associated with rituals. Examples include:

- child sings odd, ritualistic songs or chants, sometimes in a language incomprehensible to the parent; sings songs with a sexual, bizarre, or "you better not tell" theme;
- child shuts pets or other children in closets, or otherwise attempts to entrap or confine them;
- child expresses fears of being tied (usually by one leg) and hung upside down;
- child states that (s)he is "practicing" to be dead, or is dead;
- child is excessively fearful of blood tests; asks if (s)he will die from blood tests or whether someone will drink the blood;.
- child refuses to ingest foods or drinks because they are red or brown (e.g., red drinks, meat); becomes agitated at meal times;

- child talks about "my other mommy", "my other daddy", or "my other family" (in the cult);
- child expresses fears that a sibling or pet will be killed, kidnapped, molested;
- child acts out death, mutilation, cannibalism, and burial themes by pretending to kill play figures, taking out eyes, pulling off heads and limbs, pretending to eat the figures or drink their blood, and burying them;
- child fears the police will come and put him/her in jail, or states that a "bad policeman" hurt or threatened him/her;
- child believes or fears there is something foreign inside her chest or stomach, for example, Satan's heart, a demon or monster, a bomb, etc.

The beliefs and behaviors in Dr Gould's list are sufficiently odd to require an explanation other than a child's imagination.

Most of the items in all the lists discussed so far are more likely to indicate cult abuse than other forms of mind control. Lacter also has a list of indicators of trauma-based mind control programming. Many of the indicators on this list can apply to ritual abuse as well as to other forms of mind control: for example, severe flinching or spasms (as if being electroshocked) when approaching trauma material. Electroshock appears to be a punishment of choice by all kinds of mind-controlling groups, as it leaves few visible marks.

One item that is not on these lists concerns spinning. If the client frequently feels vertigo or a sensation of spinning (often along with nausea), and/or if the client draws spiral shapes, that can be an indicator of abuse that involves spinning, something that is common in both ritual abuse and other kinds of mind control. (See Chapter Four, "Markers of mind control and ritual abuse".)

Like the extensive list of indicators of borderline personality disorder in the DSM, these behavioral and emotional checklists draw attention to symptoms, without stating that a particular abuse or syndrome necessarily exists in a client who merely demonstrates some of those indicators. They are designed to raise our index of suspicion for conditions or histories that we might otherwise overlook, while assuming that we know that one of the cardinal rules of good therapy is never to suggest (rather than ask, as part of a required history taking) to a client what might or might not have happened to him or her. They can be very helpful with ritual abuse and mind control survivors, especially; as hidden as an incest history might be because of inherent psychological and literal threats to survivors, mind control and ritual abuse are hidden by design.

The important thing for you as a therapist is to have your eyes open to the possibility that your client has had such experiences. At one time, a friend of mine who works for a government agency dealing with youth sent me a young woman with DID. She had worked extensively with this client, who had aged-out from her service. She stated specifically that the client had never experienced any ritual abuse. Then she sent me the client's artwork. It was filled with words like "Satan" and "Kill," as well as drawings of sacrifices, red drops of blood, and so forth. Sure enough, when I inquired of the client, she disclosed that this abuse had indeed occurred. The previous therapist had somehow missed the obvious clues. What you do not look for, you will not see.

This is not to say that everything that looks like a clue should be accepted at face value. For instance, with artwork, images may be symbolic. But when images such as these are drawn by child alters, it is my opinion that they are more likely to be literal. Children do not engage in symbolic imagery as much as adults; they are concrete thinkers. At one time, I had two clients who reported "seeing" a little girl alone in a room, covered with blood. The one client knew it was a memory; the other stated that it was symbolic. The one who believed it to be symbolic later discovered that it was literal, when the rest of the memory emerged.

So what do you do if a client is exhibiting signs of a ritual abuse or mind control history, but has not disclosed such events? You take your time. You inquire gently about the artwork or the other symptoms, and wait for alters to emerge who will tell you more. You do not make suggestions about what might have happened. This is important even if you believe the client is obviously a survivor of these things. Remain calm. It is important to convey to the client that you can handle whatever they disclose, without suggesting what they might disclose.

The key in every case is getting to know the alters and developing a trusting relationship with them. The alters are the key to finding out about the trauma, to finding out about present safety, and to healing.

What do you do if a new client starts exhibiting some out-of-control or therapy-sabotaging behaviors before you have had a chance to establish a relationship with anyone inside? Set boundaries gently but firmly about the therapeutic relationship, and bring in any other resources that might be needed. Then, slow down. Do not make inquiries about the traumatic history until the person is sufficiently stabilized and trust has been regained.

Kinds of alter personalities generally found in ritually abused and mind-controlled persons

Shell ANPs

In her online book, Svali First Series: How the Illuminati Programs People, former Illuminati programmer Svali calls the deliberate creation of shell ANPs "shell programming," which is designed to hide the person's multiplicity from the outside world. She describes how it works:

> It is important to realize that what the system is actually doing is co-presenting, although not co-consciously. For a shell program to work, the shell alters have been taught to allow co-presentation with the other alters in the systems. Other alters in the back may not always be aware that this is what is happening, and the front shell especially will not know that they are being "gone through" for co-presentation . . . Allowing both the shell alters and the other alters to recognize that this is how they have been presenting, and why, will be an important step. Back alters may then begin presenting without going through the shell, and the person may look "more multiple" than they ever have for a period, with accents or young ones coming through. What is actually happening is that the back is presenting without masking who they are through the shell. [my italics]

One ritual mind control survivor multiple with a shell ANP described herself to me as having someone like a plastic lens in the front, with four chairs just behind it, and different people occupying those chairs at different times. She described the experience of "seeing" one of her alters get up and walk out of the room during a meeting. Trish Fotheringham's account of her system in Chapter Six exemplifies this structure; she was designed to have four alters "onstage" at any given time.

Child alters

In systems created by mind-controlling child abusers, many, usually a majority, of alters feel themselves to be children or teenagers. There may be some who are too young to talk or to understand language, or who can only speak a language that has not been spoken since childhood. I believe that the child parts of any multiple split off during childhood, not later, remain developmentally children. (This may be difficult for you as the therapist to remember when many of them speak in an adult way and sound like your adult client.) They are not "normal" children, however. They are alters with a job to do. In general, one may say that there are "happy" ones who tend to deny negative reality and get themselves into abusive situations, as well as "unhappy" ones who hold strong emotions such as fear and anger.

Child alters believe themselves still to be children. They are often concrete and literal in their thought processes and awkward with their bodies. One of my clients, an adult woman, sat on the floor and put out her feet for me to tie her shoes, assuming she was in preschool. I have been in session with an adult man when he stood on his head on his couch, because the child that he "was" at that moment preferred that position. I have met with adults whose "out" personalities knew no English, but spoke languages the host had learnt in early childhood and then forgotten. And one client fell down my office stairs because a baby alter who did not know how to walk came out at the top of the stairs.

These alters might hold superstitious childish beliefs, communicated to them by abusers during the person's actual childhood. They believe things they were told under extremely traumatic conditions, and cannot readily grasp present-day reality. They will often echo the words of their adult abusers, and since the ANP (and you) cannot actually see them, will appear older than they are.

I frequently have to remind my client with the foul-mouthed critical alters to ask them their ages. There is a pause while he asks internally, then, "Oh." The one who believes her to be his abusive mother (i.e., his father's sexual partner) is four. She understands things like a four-year-old, but she swears like an old pro.

Some therapists who work with dissociative disorders believe that child alters are actually adults' conceptions of what children are like, rather than actual children. I do not believe this. I do believe that a part who says he or she is older than the body is not really older, but rather is a child's, or a young adult's, conception of an older person. And an opposite-sex alter (a male in a female body, for instance) is more like a young girl's idea of what a boy is like than like a "real" boy. Boys in women's bodies usually represent the part of the person who has traits that are traditionally considered masculine, such as bravery or anger; girls in men's bodies often have supposedly "feminine" traits such as fearfulness.

Alters who see themselves as different from the body

In addition to gender and age differences, alters may see themselves in many ways that are not "real". Some are "copy" alters (introjects) who believe they are someone else entirely, for example, a relative or an abuser. Some experience themselves as blind or deaf or mute, often as a result of a literal response to their abusers ("Don't talk about this," or "You didn't see anything.") I take particular delight in letting them know that they can recover their sight or hearing or ability to speak once we have worked through the memories that made them become handicapped. Some alters might report that certain other alters are dead. This usually indicates that those alters either have been hidden from the rest of the system, or they are caught in a memory of a trauma in which they felt they were being killed. Since the person's brain is still alive, they are not really dead. Their feelings still leak through to other alters. They can be revived.

Often a child who has been shamed, verbally abused, and told they are evil, or made to do evil things by an abuser, can believe itself to be a demon. Some perpetrator groups actually tell child alters they are demons or devils or ghosts. Trying to exorcise "demon" parts of a person will only hinder their progress. (This will be addressed in more detail in Chapter Nine.) They need to be cared for like any child, and the responsibility for their abuse given back to the abusers rather than to any part of the child.

In any case, it is not worth arguing with alters about whether or not they really are what they believe they are. It is more important to treat the whole person with respect, in whatever aspect she presents herself, and to develop real empathy for the life experiences and world view of each part. Do not deny the experience of any alter. They genuinely believe they are the person's mother, or a person of the opposite sex, or a dog. Your client had very important reasons for making alters the way they are. For example, an alter may be a boy because boys do not have vaginas so he cannot be vaginally raped, as your female client was. Or a "mother" alter in a male survivor client might be the one who was forced to have sex with the boy's father.

As you will see later in this book, alters arising from these abuses were often deliberately deceived into believing they are something they are not. In some cases, it is a relief to them to discover that they are human. I like showing a "Beast" alter that he has hands, and wondering why he may have seen furry paws when he first came out, and whether anyone else inside knows why he saw paws instead of the hands he now has. But it may also be frightening to others to recognize, for example, that they do belong to the body that was tortured or that they were instructed to kill. Timing is very important in attempting to remove alters' illusions.

Alters who have alters inside

Particularly with ritual abuse and mind control survivors, you can expect that some alters will themselves be multiple. Alters are hidden within alters. So, for example, one of my clients had several "tough guy" alters, each of whom concealed a hurt child part. Another had an in-charge "Satan" alter, whose inside parts included one who held sadness and another who held fear, emotions which Satans were not allowed to have. Jennifer had internal copies of her mother and brothers, each of which had within it copies of the alters which were in her actual mother and brothers. So, when you speak with an alter who appears to be a certain way, bear in mind that it may have internal parts who hold very different emotions.

How categories of alters relate to their origins

Because it is so overwhelming, clear conscious memory of childhood sexual and betrayal trauma does not develop, at least in an ANP. This process is both psychological and organic.

From the organic perspective, the different aspects of the traumatizing experience are stored in separated brain circuits. When the trauma is extreme and complex, begins in early childhood (under the age of six), and involves pain, betrayal, and threats to life, the various aspects of the overwhelming traumatic memories and their responses are divided between different alter personalities. One alter may be aware of the first part of the story, another alter of the next part, and so on. Or one alter may hold the pictures, another the "sound track," another the feeling of sadness, another the anger, another the physical pain, and another the sexual arousal. If there are repeated traumas of a particular kind, these aspects of experience go into the same brain circuits that held them previously, and these specialized circuits become alter personalities. Mind controllers, aware of this process, utilize it to control their victims.

Regardless of how they view themselves, you are likely to see the following categories of alter personalities in dissociative people with ritual abuse and mind control histories:

1. Parts from before the trauma: Relatively untraumatized child parts who hold positive memories. They stop growing and are put away when they experience trauma or serious deprivation.
2. Parts created during the trauma:
    (a) Hurt children who have unfulfilled needs and/or hold traumatic pain or emotions.
    (b) Protectors (including internalized perpetrators). These parts generally live in the past and think the trauma is still happening. (In some cases it might be.)
    (c) Observers, recorders, watchers, parts in the sky, etc.
3. Parts from after the trauma: Survivors, usually the body's chronological age. They have to deal with everyday life, so must not be affected by the trauma, which they often do not remember. They may be high-functioning; or may be "depleted hosts" or have PTSD. ANPs belong in this category.

It helps to think of the needs and purposes of each of these categories as you engage in therapy with multiples. Frightening or angry parts are often protectors. Observer parts can be helpful for putting memories in order and knowing what really happened (vs. what illusion the abusers created). Parts from after the trauma need to be protected from much of the trauma until it has been worked through with those parts who actually went through it.

Making and sharing the dissociative disorder diagnosis

It takes a good deal of childhood trauma to create a dissociative disorder, and it takes a long time to establish trust in the therapeutic relationship, help the client attain stability, and work through the traumatic memories sufficiently to achieve either co-consciousness or integration of the parts. These tasks are particularly difficult if the client has been subjected to ritual abuse and/or mind control. In this general overview of DID/DDNOS treatment, we address how treatment must be altered for ritually abused and mind-controlled persons.

The ANP's experiences—amnesia, hearing voices, depersonalization and derealization, and post-traumatic intrusions—might well be what drives him or her to therapy, although the outside person will generally be unaware of there being other alters inside. In that case, you should administer certain assessment tools for dissociative disorders. The Dissociative Experiences Scale (DES) is a quick and easy device. Another instrument, Dell's Multidimensional Instrument of Dissociation (MID, 2006), includes more items. New assessment tools are constantly being developed, and the ISSTD website (www.isst-d.org/) gives information about these.

Confusing or disjointed presentations are an indication of switching that may not be otherwise visible to the outsider. If the alter who was "out" when something happened has "gone inside", the ANP—your presenting client—will not remember what happened. Multiples learn to cover up for loss of time. Someone who does not yet know she (or he) is multiple, and does not realize she loses time, will deny doing things she has been seen doing. This will lead to a reputation as a liar. If she realizes that another alter may have done it, she will often pretend to remember the incident to hide the time loss, or may make up excuses or explanations such as alcoholic blackouts. This is particularly common in child multiples, who are not as adept at covering their tracks as adults are.

In DDNOS, the ANP is always present, even when another part is in control of the behavior and feelings. People with DDNOS (having shell ANPs) can be just as complex internally as people with DID, and in many ways the distinction is a relatively unimportant technicality. Treatment is essentially the same. Many things are easier for DDNOS than for DID multiples, because they do not lose time or find they have eaten six breakfasts. However, it is easier for them than for DIDs to mistakenly assume that their negative feelings are caused by present situations rather than old traumas that have been triggered by something in the present. And it is harder for a therapist to detect their multiplicity.

As happens with ritual abuse, most people, including therapists, do not see multiplicity because they do not look for it. We write off changes in demeanor as just different emotional states, and in many cases they are. But if you are attuned to multiplicity, you can detect switches, and can sense the other parts lurking behind the presenting alter. As one of my DID clients' young alters says of our work together, it is because I "look inside" that I was able to detect her multiplicity. Most people, however, do not look inside. When my client did a practicum in a mental hospital as a community mental health worker, she recognized that some of the patients also looked inside. But none of the staff did.

Once you have determined that your client has DID or DDNOS, you will need to gently introduce them to the notion of dissociation, explaining that it is a psychological and physiological response to childhood trauma. Explain it as a normal reaction to an abnormal situation. Make it clear that having a dissociative disorder like this is not the same as being crazy.

Be careful, by the way, about using the word "alter" with your client. Many multiples, especially ritual abuse survivors, have a negative reaction to that word, usually because of its resemblance to the word "altar," a central feature in both church and occult rituals. I have used the word "alter" in this book because it is less ambiguous than "parts" and less confusing (and more accurate) than "personalities" or "inside people." Respect for your client, however, demands that you call the parts whatever term is most comfortable for your client. I use different terms with different clients.

I like to tell such clients that a dissociative disorder is mental injury rather than mental illness, and, therefore, requires a different treatment. For a broken leg you would put the bone parts back together and keep them connected so they could heal, even though it might be painful. Similarly, with a broken mind, you bring the parts back together by introducing them to one another, and you clean the wound by helping the person resolve what happened to make the parts split from one another. You might recommend books such as Steinberg's The Stranger in the Mirror (2000) to help the client understand their experience, or a newsletter by and for multiples such as "Many Voices" (contact www.manyvoicespress.com/newsletter.html).

Communicating with the personality system

The following guidelines will help you to communicate with the personality system of someone who is multiple.

Talking through the presenting alter

Once you apply your solid understanding of dissociation, in many ways talking with the parts of a multiple client is no different from talking to a singleton client about his or her problems.

Although only one alter at a time can control the multiple's voice and actually talk with you, many—especially the important ones—can hear you and can send messages to you. Someone else may choose to "take the phone" and speak with you, or someone can be sent to get them. Always assume that some others inside can hear you. This applies even when the presenting alter is deaf, catatonic, or a baby. (Note that misunderstandings may happen with other parts even when the one outside understands perfectly, and you need to check for this.) You can talk through the presenting alter to others in the system. Not everyone can hear you, but many, especially the important ones, can. Remember that, especially with a ritually abused multiple, the important alter personalities are always listening in order to guard the person's safety in the outside world.

Exploring passive influences

You should also be aware of what is known as "passive influence." Alters often make themselves known by exerting influence on the "outside" or presenting part. Passive influence is very common, and can be detected simply by asking about it. When the alter who is out reports a feeling that she or he does not understand, someone inside may really be experiencing the feeling which is "leaking through" to the alter who is out. Once some internal communication has been established, you can follow the feelings to find who inside is their source. If it is voices, talk to the voices. If it is pictures, find out which alters they are coming from. Remember that the real source of the feelings is the part that needs and will benefit from your attention.

Techniques for meeting alters

In the early days of therapists' awareness of DID, there was a focus on techniques for meeting the alter personalities, as though this process needed some special (usually hypnotic) methods in order to be successful. These techniques are not necessary for that purpose, in my view, although they can be helpful in working with systems. The "Middleman technique," for instance, which simply means speaking to one part through another presenting part, can be very useful. I use it in diagnosis, while administering the Dissociative Experiences Scale. If the person says yes to the question about hearing voices, I ask if one is speaking to them right now. If yes (it is usually yes), I ask what it is saying. Then I engage it in dialogue via the presenting part, whom I instruct to "think to it and listen for the answer." Eventually the voice may agree to speak with me directly. There is nothing magical or highly technical about this: it is simply a natural result of understanding how multiples work.

Fraser's Dissociative Table Technique (1991), in which you use guided imagery to create a boardroom or table or equivalent, can be helpful with "regular" or "reactive" multiples, as can other guided fantasies such as walking to a cottage and asking people to come out. But these techniques are unlikely to access the important parts of a deliberately constructed personality system.

It shows how much we are "foreigners" to multiples when thinking we must resort to techniques to communicate with them. For the most part, we simply have to understand how multiplicity works, and communication will come naturally. It is true that, in some cases, alters have been forbidden to talk to outsiders, so it may take considerable time to build up enough trust for them to actually speak with you. In this case, it is important to "talk through" to them via the ANP. I often make it explicit, once the ANP has acknowledged that others exist inside, saying such things as "Now I'm talking to them, not you." Be aware that when people have shell ANPs, you will not see much difference as the alters come to speak through the shell.

Speaking directly with alters

One of my clients who is a mind control survivor had a therapist who believed that talking to the parts reified them (made them more real). She would only communicate with the parts through the outside adult. Unfortunately, the parts had been trained to never speak to the outside adult, in order to keep the abuse hidden from the adult part. Once I began to speak with the parts, they made fast progress.

Speaking to the alters directly is the general rule for work with this population. It is the most expedient and effective way to do this work. Once you talk to the right "person," often a simple explanation of reality can lead to big changes. I recently consulted for another therapist whose client had an inside child who kept picking at her foot until it bled. The therapist was very disturbed about this, and made all kinds of unsuccessful plans with the main personality to get it to stop. Finally, I saw the client myself, and asked to speak to the little girl alter. She came out at once. She had never come out with the original therapist simply because the therapist had not asked. I asked why she picked at the foot, and she explained it was to keep the adult from going to sleep at night, because the foster father came in and abused her at night. I told her that it hurt the adult, which the child did not know; she did not want to hurt the adult. I explained to her that the foster father was dead and could not come. When I explained to the adult what the child had told me, she arranged to sleep in a different bedroom with a lock on the door, to make the little girl feel safer.

It is not always that easy, but, again, in every case the key is communicating with the alters responsible. This is the key even with survivors of extreme organized abuse. You and the rest of the personality system have the opportunity to introduce these parts to the safe present (assuming the person has gotten away from her abusers; these issues will be discussed in Chapter Eleven). They get to see what it is like to be with a safe and caring person. They can tell you the false beliefs the abusers put into their heads, and you can explain the truth, or show them the trickery involved. Cognitive work with the alter personalities pays great dividends. As soon as one part is convinced to work together with you for healing, another will appear who is supposed to stop this process, but secretly wants you to help them too. You may have to work your way through many layers, but you will get there.

Helping newly discovered alters meet the present-day world

How do you speak with alters about the fact that they are all parts of one person, and inhabit the same body, at least in this "real" world? Some therapists minimize their separateness. For example, Spiegel (1993) stated that "these patients . . . have the bizarre delusion that their body is inhabited by more than one independent personality" (p. 87), and Putnam (1989, p. 103) wrote, "Whatever an alter personality is, it is not a separate person. It is a serious therapeutic error to relate to the alter personalities as if they were separate people. Although many alters will emphatically insist that they are separate people, the therapist must not buy into this delusion of separateness."

Sadly, the term "delusion of separateness," which became widely used in DID treatment circles, resulted in such countertherapeutic approaches as refusing to speak with all alters except the ANP, and trying to get the ANP to take responsibility for the behavior of all alters.

In a sense, the separateness is not really a delusion. Although the parts are all in one body, they represent different brain circuitry that appears to have been separated by some biological process that we do not sufficiently understand. Brain imaging studies show different brain pathways activated with different alters, and other studies show physiological differences between different personality states (Birnbaum & Thomann, 1996; Hughes, Kuhlman, Fichtner, & Gruenfeld, 1990; Miller, 1989; Miller & Triggiano, 1992; Miller, Blackburn, Scholes, White, & Mamalis, 1991; Putnam, Zahn, & Post, 1990).

Richard Kluft (personal e-mail communication, 2010), a pioneer in dissociation treatment, does not like the term, believing it to be "too strong a description, because often the awareness of the truth of commonality co-exists with the subjective truth of the genuineness and completeness of separateness, perhaps an expression of trance logic." Instead, "Taking a hint from European phenomenologists, who called an hallucination a pseudo-hallucination if the person knew it was a hallucination," he developed the term "pseudo-illusion of separateness," because it "made more sense" to him.

It takes work to help alters adjust to the fact that they live in an older body who looks like the ANP, not the way they believe they personally look. In many cases, the alters "see" one another in the inner world, and state that they experience one another as real people. An alter who emerges into the real world does not see him or herself, and assumes s/he has the body in which s/he lives in the inner world and which s/he inhabited the last time s/he was "out."

Most of the alters in mind-controlled personality systems have not come directly out into the world since childhood, so they know nothing of the present. Many of them are not supposed to emerge directly into the world unless called out by a perpetrator, so they will be very afraid or hostile when they emerge. I encourage newly discovered parts to look around my office and see that it is daylight and we have our clothes on and there are no weapons. If the alter does not know much about me and has never met me before, I ask the others inside to fill that part in on our history together and why they think I am safe. Often alters do not know that the body has grown up. I find it helpful to have a newspaper or magazine with a recent date to show them the year. I also have a mirror so they can see what their body looks like now, but I use it sparingly, especially with survivors of ritual abuse or mind control, since mirrors are used a lot in programming to deceive alters about their nature. It is more useful with multiples who have not experienced mind control. For example, I used it to show one alter that her tonsils, which had always been very painfully infected, were now gone.

Particularly with alters in a mind-controlled system, do not ask too many questions; it may feel like interrogation, and many of these people have been interrogated as part of their abuse. Just be open and sympathetic, until they are ready to talk. It can be helpful to ask the client to map the system if she is willing. However, do not insist on this, or on knowing internal names, as some parts might feel this gives you or hostile parts power over them. This is particularly true for ritual abuse survivors, where the abusers call the parts out by name.

It is important to match your communication to the kind of part who is presenting, just as you would for a singleton client. Be especially sensitive to nonverbal communication of emotions. Some parts need hugs, but others will take them as a sexual approach. Some parts cannot stand direct eye contact. Some use strong, challenging language, and will respond to dares and challenges and humor. Other parts are terrified and just need listening. Some cannot speak and may need to communicate through writing, through drawing, or through another part.

Be careful with your language, especially with mind control and ritual abuse survivors. Innocuous words have often been given sinister meanings by the perpetrator groups. If you notice your client flinching or showing other signs of distress when you use words like "love" or "safe" or "feel," you can ask the client what the word in question means to him or her, and you can train yourself to substitute another word when you speak with that particular client. With one client, I have to substitute "believe" for "think," and "sense in your body" for "feel," since the original words were used by the perpetrators as part of torture.

Remember that it is very important to treat all parts with equal kindness; do not pick favorites. Every alter is there for a purpose, and is an important part of the system. So, for instance, do not be afraid of hostile alters. It has been said that every persecutor is a misguided protector. Most hostile alters are using anger to protect vulnerable parts inside, usually younger children. If they seem dangerous, talk with them at first through another alter. But if you act scared, you will create a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Similarly, untraumatized child parts can be distracting, adorable, entertaining, and uplifting—but spending too much time with them can distract you from the task of dealing with the trauma. Watch out for good kid–bad kid dichotomies. You need to appreciate them all, just as they all need to accept each other. In the end, remember they are all parts of one person, and that person needs to know you accept all of the selves, just as he or she eventually will, including the parts she does not want or like.

Internal conflict, internal communication

Do not expect the client with untreated DID or DDNOS to be consistent or to have internal harmony.

A DID personality system is like a family. It contains polarities, boundaries, etc. For instance, if one polarity exists, the other polarity probably does as well. A knowledge of family systems therapy, particularly its application to multiples (Goulding & Schwartz, 1995) can be helpful.

At the start of therapy, most multiples have internal battles for control. The ANP usually has little or no control over switching. The alters may fight to be out, or may push others out in order to stay inside. It is important to assist your multiple client in improving internal communication, negotiation, and cooperation. Democratic decision-making is not usually learnt in the childhood of a multiple and can be incredibly difficult. "Eww, Jane got us dressed this morning," or "I don't like her having sex with my body" are typical comments that one alter will make about another. One of my first DID clients would repeatedly throw out everything given him by his abusive mother and then retrieve it from the garbage disposal when he switched to another alter. Alters will often express anger and even hatred for one another. It is hard for them to realize that they all represent legitimate parts of one person, and to respect how each part helped the person survive the extreme situation in which they grew up. Each can only see things their way.

Consider inviting other alters to speak to the one who is out and talking. I respect the ones who come out spontaneously to talk with me, but I also ask to speak to others, and if they will not (or are not permitted to) speak to me directly, then I ask that messages be relayed back and forth to them. When I know the client well, I usually target my conversations at the alters I deem to be important at any given moment, regardless of which ones are initially talking to me. It is common that alters will be put "out" to entertain the therapist so that no real work will be done in therapy.

You can help the alters to speak with one another. Although talking internally might seem to make the person "more" multiple, the long-term result will be that they will become better organized and work more like an integrated person. You are seeking to help them achieve "co-consciousness," with whichever alter is out in the body being aware of the needs and viewpoints of all the other alters, and shared understanding among all those inside, so that effective decisions can be made by the whole person rather than by just one part at a time.

Spontaneously created personality systems are more likely to be quite chaotic when the alters first begin to communicate with one another. Systems structured by perpetrator groups, on the other hand, tend to be better organized, but in a military-style hierarchy. It is wise not to interfere with this hierarchical organization at first, and over time to help the leaders change the governmental system to a more democratic one. Chapters Four and Nine are devoted to the unique characteristics of mind-controlled personality systems, and more advanced strategies for working with them.

Learning from multiplicity

It is an exciting adventure to get to know someone who is multiple. They have a lot to teach us, not only about the way the human mind can work, but also about the way the human race works. I sometimes think of the human race as one gigantic dissociative person, with myself as only one part of it. There are other parts who are very different from me, whom I do not understand. Some of them scare me, and some of them arouse my anger. But only as I—we all—learn to understand and cooperate with the other parts of the "body" of humanity, can humankind learn to stop all the dangerous and damaging things we do to one another. In this way, I feel it is a privilege to know my clients and other multiples, human beings who are learning to live as communities rather than as isolated individuals.

Working with dissociation in folks with ritual abuse or mind control histories requires specialized knowledge, built on a solid, up-to-date understanding of dissociative disorders and their treatment. This, itself, is built on the therapist's respect for all parts of your client, the willingness to listen, and sensitivity to their needs. Survivor LisaBri's simple and sincere plea to therapists (see her contributions in Chapters Nine, Twelve, and Thirteen) sums it up as well as anything I have seen:

> Please learn all you can about Dissociative Identity Disorder and ritual assault. The chances that you will have a client with one of these is great. You need to be ready to help them in a safe and healthy way. Most importantly, if you are attempting something new with your client, and she says it doesn't feel right—listen to her. She knows her system in a way no one else could ever imagine.

CHAPTER FOUR

Markers of mind control and ritual abuse

The personality systems of ritual abuse and mind control survivors are different from those of dissociative individuals whose abuse has been less systematic, such as in severe physical or sexual abuse by a family member. Even a person who was abused in a backwoods family cult, in a doomsday cult, or by teenage Satanic dabblers would not manifest the degree of internal organization seen when a person has been trained by an organized group for the purpose of achieving mind control. Such personality systems do have certain identifiable characteristics.

In Chapter Two, I discussed indicator lists for organized, group perpetrated, ritual abuse and mind control that have been developed over the years by others. These lists are based on the consequences and external manifestations of these abuses. I would like to share with you now a list of functional indicators that I developed based on my clinical work with survivors. This is a different kind of list, in that it describes internal dynamics that result from programming. These indicators will reveal themselves only after therapy with a dissociative client has proceeded long enough that the therapist can become aware of them. They are not the kind of characteristics that might be observed by the typical outsider. They are all "red flags" for organized abuse because they describe the intended (mind-controlling) consequences of such abuse.

As with other such lists, remember that other than a few "red flags", an individual item does not mean the syndrome exists. For example, introjects (internal copies) of abusers are common in dissociative disorders; occasionally a client will have alters arranged in a hierarchy as a result of abuse in a family, for example, by a militaristic father; someone raised in a strict fundamentalist religion might have "demon" alters. But these persons will not have all the other indicators on this list.

Common characteristics of the personality systems of mind-control survivors:

1. An internal structure or a complex inner world in which the dissociated identities ("alters" for short) are placed.
2. Trained alters with "jobs";
3. A "dump" for alters who have proved uncooperative and so are of no use to the perpetrators.
4. A hierarchy of alters.
5. Observer and recorder/reporter alters who know and can report everything that has happened to the person.
6. A security system including punishments for disobedience.
7. Gatekeeper alters.
8. Internal filing systems for memories, especially of training sessions.
9. Alters who believe they are animals or demons or aliens.
10. Deliberately created introjects (internal copies) of the perpetrators (i.e., there are memories of their deliberate creation).
11. Internal calendars with "jobs" to be done on certain dates.
12. Spinner alters who send out feelings or impulses to the rest of the system.
13. Deliberately placed "triggers" for learned behaviors or symptoms ("programs").
14. "Booby traps" of despair or suicidality triggered by talking about the abuse.
15. Recycling of memories and reappearance of trained behaviors.
16. Reported use of tricks and technologies in training.

Most of these things will not just be spontaneously created by children who are abused in random ways. If you have a client who has most or all of these characteristics, you may suspect he or she has been abused by an organized criminal group. You will see many of these indicators in the following two chapters, and will obtain more depth of understanding in Chapter Seven, which examines the creation of these characteristics from a programming perspective. Following is a discussion of all items listed above.

1. An internal structure (or structures) and/or a complex dissociated inner world

If a client is talking about an internal geometric structure, this can be seen as a "red flag" for organized perpetrator group abuse (including that done by both ritual abusers and mind control by political/military groups). The alters are mentally located in an internal structure with a particular shape. A typical RA/MC structure may be shaped like a pyramid, or a prism, or a tetrahedron, or a spider web. Many MC survivors have an internal world which contains several or many structures or "worlds."

These structures are neither random nor merely created for the purpose of organization. They are used by perpetrating groups to locate specific alters, and to call out specific combinations of alters for certain tasks. Often, there are codes for each space in the structure or matrix, as we will see in Jeannie Riseman's example. The adults who deliberately create these structures or inner worlds do so at a stage of the child's development when the child is able to internalize things s/he sees in the outside world. They stage settings in the real world that they want replicated in the inner world of the child's mind. Often, there is both a structure and an inner world.

In Chapter Seven, you will see how very young children are taught to create their inner world or structure, as described by Stella Katz. The child builds an actual, real-life, physical structure, while the child's trainer explains that this structure is to be replicated inside the child's mind as a place for the alters to live. The building materials vary according to what is available at the time of building; Jeannie Riseman's system, discussed in Chapter Six, created in the 1940s, might well have been built with Tinker Toys. Others use Lego or blocks. In Stella's example, a builder alter is trained to build a structure with building blocks of varying colors, and to place dolls of the same colors representing the alters in their proper places in the structure. They are instructed that everyone must be kept in their places.

The structure is gradually developed and elaborated over the years. Walls between the alters or alter groups prevent their communication. Taking down the walls will cause alters to integrate. Often the builder alter is supposed to take down certain walls when the survivor gets to a certain age; for example, some survivors are programmed for their everyday life alters to integrate with the cult-loyal ones, leaving out the pain holders. When this happens, the everyday life alters come to know that they have been involved in the cult or group, but since the pain is being held by hidden alters, the person does not realize how gruesomely they have suffered.

Knowing the nature of the structure will help the therapist discover how many alters there are and which ones are most important to work with. However, this is unlikely to be revealed until well into therapy. It does not matter much what kind of structure or structures exists; the therapeutic approach to dealing with them is still the same. Explore each part of the structure and its purpose and which alters "live" there.

Many survivors have been encouraged to create, either instead of or in addition to a structure, a complex inner world in which the alters live. It is often based on fairy tales, stories, or movies that have been shown to the child. It may have frightening places in it, some copied from the outside world (e.g., a "pit" or a "torture chamber") and some created by suggestion. Internal disasters can be triggered to happen in this inner world. The trainer gives the child suggestions about the appearance of the internal world, through showing the child a picture of a tree, or a pyramid, or a house or a box, and playing games of "Let's pretend (whatever alter is out at the time) lives in the roots of a tree." Trish Fotheringham's account in Chapter Six describes the way in which she was taught to construct her inner world. In her case, an actual theatre with a stage was used, enabling the abusers to create the "stage of life." When Trish was first involved in therapy, she believed that her alters and her own imagination had created the inner world in which the alters lived. She engaged actively with this world, going "inside" to see how each of the alters was doing and adding things to the inner world to make it more comfortable for the alters, such as a healing hot tub for those who were in pain. It was only after many years of therapy that she came to recognize that most of the features of the inner world had been deliberately installed by the abusers.

If the internal world is frightening, the therapist can help the client use his or her own imagination later to redesign it and put the alters in safer places. But first it is necessary to overcome the effects of the training that dictates that everyone inside must stay in his or her place.

A survivor of childhood trauma whose alters were not deliberately created by an organized group may also have an inside structure, but it is usually only a place for the alters to "live" inside, such as a house. One of my ritually abused clients has cult-trained alters housed in an upside-down pyramid, and abused-at-home alters living in an internal house.

Sometimes, places or structures that have been installed inside are copies of outside places, including places where abuse happened. This is true for both structured and reactive multiples, but many whose abuse was not perpetrated by an organized group have no inner world at all, and alters, when not "out", simply disappear into blackness or exercise an effect on the person's emotions without being internally visible.

In "Simplifying complex programming" on the Survivorship website, Jeannie Riseman states,

> Often the alters are arranged in complex patterns—sometimes geometric patterns (as in Cabala-based or matrix programs), sometimes patterns based on things or communities. Some people have systems that replicate an organizational structure, with a CEO, advisory boards, etc. Sometimes the pattern is more like a video game, with castles and dragons and all sorts of tricks and booby traps for the unwary.

2. Trained alters with "jobs"

All alters in a deliberately created system have jobs to do, and doing one's job is the most important expectation after compliance and silence. The "blocks" of alters described by Katz, and the "color paths" to which Fotheringham's alters belonged, exemplify the kinds of jobs.

The first alters of this kind of which a therapist is likely to become aware are the ones who punish others for disclosures. If a client appears to be experiencing pain or flashbacks right in my office, I like to casually ask whether it is someone's job to punish the person for what they have told me. If they say yes, this is a red flag for probable mind control.

Many other dissociative clients have experienced some degree of mind control and they may have internal punishers who replicate the behavior (for example, of abusive parents) even in the absence of organized group abuse, but these alters are less likely to refer to what they do as a "job."

3. A dump containing discarded alters

Stella Katz, in Chapter Seven, points out the importance of "garbage kids," alters that were discarded because they either would not comply in training, or could not learn quickly enough. Often, garbage kids are hidden pain-holders, and continue to participate in some memories. If they have been "killed," they are stuck in the memory of being unconscious, and have not actually been destroyed. I believe that it is important to find these alters, and process their part of any traumatic memories which need to be worked with. Often they have the most resistance to the perpetrators, and can become helpful allies. However, they have usually been severely traumatized. One of my mind-controlled clients refers to her dump of discarded alters as "the blue pile." When I asked why the pile of alters was blue, it turned out to be because they were black and blue with bruises. As long as the garbage kids remain hidden, the trauma cannot be worked through thoroughly; the training of the other alters will still have some power in the survivor's life, even if s/he is working hard to resist the pull of the abusers' instructions.

4. A hierarchy of alters

Most deliberately created systems are hierarchically organized. There are levels or layers, and each level has a boss, who reports to someone on the next higher level. There are often several alters with the same name but different functions, usually on different levels. The ones in charge usually have titles representing their authority. In military or political systems there are captains, leaders, and soldiers; in ritual systems there are demons, Satans, Lucifers, high priests or priestesses, as well as representations of family members who have authority in the person's life. Each layer in a Satanic system usually includes a Satan, a few demons, a high priest or priestess, a copy of the primary trainer, and various guards. Authoritative alters have the job of disciplining others under them for disobedience (such as talking about the abuse). If the disciplinarian on one level fails to do its job, the discipline moves up to a higher level.

There are usually also fail-safe alters outside the "layers" whose job it is to deal with the problem if the ones in charge prove disloyal. These have been told they are such entities as ghosts, chameleons (who can impersonate other alters), deceivers, and spiritual guides.

Not all systems are equally complicated. Some complicated systems might have several different groups of alters, each with its own layers, trained by different perpetrators or for different purposes. A "criss-cross" security system might have alters from one group disciplining those from the other groups. The alters in charge of the system are usually aware of what goes on in the outside world, but rarely intervene directly at first. As they can with any dissociative client, therapists can "talk through" the system to them, as they are usually listening.

In doing therapy with a survivor of organized abuse, a primary objective is to get through to the alters in charge of the hierarchy and convince them that they have been deceived. They often believe they know everything about what has happened to the person (which is invariably not true), and believe they have never been hurt—in fact, they might believe that they do not belong to the body at all.

By gently exposing their false beliefs, as you work up the hierarchy and talk to alters that have increasing authority, you will gradually build trust and help clients see what has really happened to them. It is necessary to understand that you cannot succeed in therapy with a survivor of organized abuse unless the alters in charge of the hierarchy allow you to proceed at first, and later actively cooperate with you.

Although these alters have observed the "real" world, they have rarely been out in it, and have very limited experience of anything in life other than group events and training. Their rewards have been sex, drugs, and power; they know nothing of love or caring or pets or snow or anything else positive in life. Other alters can share these positive experiences with them to help them see what they have been missing. We shall discuss ways to approach these alters in more detail in Chapter Nine.

5. Observer and recorder/reporter alters

When dissociative disorders were first studied in the 1980s and 1990s, much was made of "inner self-helper" alters or ISHes. It is likely that many of these were deliberately created observer or watcher alters. Survivors of organized abuse generally have observers or watchers who are trained to be aware of, and remember everything that happens. These alters tend to be told that they can see everything but cannot and must not act in the outside world. They might have been taught (through trickery) to believe they are non-human, for example, aliens or whales or spirits. These alters can be very helpful in accessing memories for processing.

The observers and recorders are often the reporters who have the job of telling the person's handler what the person has said or done. We shall learn more about their jobs in Chapter Eleven, "'Stabilization' takes on a new meaning", as getting them to cooperate is essential to maintaining the client's safety while therapy proceeds.

Also, look for "floating alters." These are not deliberately created parts of the system, but alters that were accidentally split off at the same time as others. They are able to float around the system, learning everything they can, often unnoticed by the other alters. Since the perpetrating group is unaware of them, they do not get hurt unless they get in the way accidentally or they choose to take someone's pain. They can be an incredible source of information about the system and about what has happened and of great assistance to the therapist, as they have not been instructed by the abusers. Organized perpetrator groups try to find the floaters and assign them to the dump, but if the floaters are able to hide effectively, they can be the key to undoing the programming. One of my ritually abused clients has one such alter who calls himself "The Observer"; he detected many of the tricks which deceived the trained alters, and when we process their memories he chimes in with his observations about what was really going on.

6. A security system including punishments for disobedience

The structured personality system of a mind-control survivor is always protected by a security system. The observers and reporters watch any alters who are "out" in the body, and sometimes those who speak to one another internally. They report to others in the hierarchy, who then order punishments to be administered by those alters who are trained to punish. Punishments include such things as flashbacks, flooding of unbearable emotions, painful body memories, flooding of memories in which the survivor perpetrated against others, self-harm, and suicide attempts. These will be discussed in Chapter Eleven, "'Stabilization' takes on a new meaning". Each alter who punishes has his or her place in the hierarchy, and if s/he fails to do the assigned job, a backup will do it while the disloyal punisher himself experiences punishment or is banished.

7. Gatekeeper alters

According to Stella Katz, most ritually abused systems include Gatekeeper alters, who are special kinds of guards. They are told they are in control of the mind and all emotions. They work in combination with those in charge of the pain. A Gatekeeper is never hurt himself after his initial creation or "birth", holds feelings and memories back, and observes everything that happens. I have encountered Gatekeepers who hold in memories, and Gatekeepers or Controllers who hold in alters, only permitting certain ones to come out into the body or to influence those out in the body.

8. Internal filing systems for memories, especially of training sessions

Many survivors of organized abuse have internal filing systems, usually with a "control room," files, a file manager or controller, and labels on the files which refer to such things as the type of training, age, and place where it was done. For more, see Trish Fotheringham's and Jeannie Riseman's descriptions of their filing systems in Chapter Six. When you come to working with the memories, it is very important to work with the file manager alters. In some cases, there are "program codes" which, when said in the right order, will make certain programs or pieces of training cease to work.

Usually a type of training session, or "program," is repeated at different ages, so that by the time the person reaches adulthood the training is well established and the conditioned response automatic. All the times this particular training was given will be noted in the internal files, as well as which alters were involved. These files make it easier to access the memories with mind-controlled survivors than with "ordinary" dissociative clients, once you have got past the security systems and gained the cooperation of the alters in charge of the system.

9. Alters who believe they are animals, demons, or aliens

Organized abusers often want alters to believe they are anything other than parts of an abused child. One simple way of creating non-human alters is to split off an alter by inflicting pain while the child is exposed to circumstances that lead her to believe she is not human. For example, the child is given a hallucinogenic drug while suggestions are made about demons, and the other people are wearing demon costumes. When the new alter appears, she is shown a "mirror" with a picture of a demon on it and told this is her. Or the child is put in a cage with a fierce dog, and only fed dog food when she begs for it like a dog. Or the child is given a paralyzing drug so that she cannot move, shown movies about aliens, and told she is an alien who can observe this world but cannot act in it. To add to the effect, the child may be costumed while drugged to unconsciousness. Katz gives more detail on the purposes of demon and animal alters. Demon alters are led to believe they are entirely evil and are therefore not loveable by anyone except Satan. They also believe they are very ugly, so that anyone from outside will be afraid of them.

Because alters who believe they are aliens, ghosts, or spirits typically believe they do not belong to the body, if they are created while the child is under the influence of a strong analgesic drug, they will not feel the body's pain. This makes them very useful to the perpetrator group when the person requires punishment such as self-harm or suicide attempts. They may have been taught that they will live on if the body dies, since they think their "internal bodies" are the real ones, or that they do not have bodies at all.

10. Deliberately created introjects of the perpetrators

Many perpetrators put their own stamp on to a personality system by putting "themselves" inside it. This is often done by splitting off alters during a rape, and instructing those alters that they are the perpetrator, or "born from his seed", and have to do what he does if the person is disloyal. In less cruel groups, a cardboard cut-out of the perpetrator is placed in the model of the internal world or structure, so that the alters inside will always "see" the perpetrator. This is not an alter personality, just a trick to scare the young child parts. Introjects of perpetrators are also common in personality systems that are not created by organized abuse. The internal punitive "mother" or "father" warns the child not to perform behaviors which will get the child punished by the real external mother or father, often by giving a reminder of the pain of the real parent's punishment. Organized abuser groups have capitalized on this phenomenon by deliberately creating (and therefore controlling) these introjects.

11. Internal calendars with jobs to be done on certain dates

If the group has a long-term agenda—and most ritual and political groups do—there are alters who hold a "calendar" which lays out the "jobs" to be done on certain dates. Regular ritual dates are part of the calendar for any ritual abuse survivor, and are learnt in a normal everyday way, just as we learn the dates of our birthday and Christmas. Some survivors also have alters who hold significant future dates, such as the anticipated return of Satan (in 2012), or the date of the political group's alleged battle to take over the world.

In addition, some groups implant personal dates which are years in which survivors are to return to the group, integrate real-life alters with cult-loyal alters, commit suicide, or become ill. Young adult members of ritually abusive groups are frequently let go in their twenties to create an identity in the world, then recalled to the group at a certain age. During this "growing up" period, the main identity usually is unaware of the mind control or of the other internal identities. There are often internal punishments, such as a very annoying sound, spinning, or a sensation of being shocked, if the person does not return to the group when they are supposed to.

12. Spinner alters who send out feelings or impulses to the rest of the personality system

Cults and mind control agencies often use physical spinning of the child. Katz describes in detail the purpose and nature of spinning. I do not know the neurological explanation of why spinning can have the effect of spreading post traumatic effects throughout the personality system. I only know that it does. "Spin programming," a term commonly used, is a misnomer. Spinning is not a program. It is a means to that end. It is used very generally, in many kinds of training, just as torture and rape and disgusting creatures are. Some survivors report having been spun on a huge Catherine Wheel, sometimes going in and out of water. This is also known to have been used in political torture, and has shown up in movies.

Spinner alters have the job of sending out feelings or impulses to all the other the alters, the host, or a group of selected alters. Many of the "booby traps" or "fail-safe" programs involve spinning. Often, when a certain training is in operation, the survivor feels dizzy, as though something or someone is "spinning" inside her head. If this is happening, the therapist can ask to speak to the spinning alter and ask her to stop spinning. If she is unable to do so, the therapist can talk to whoever is making her spin. This strategy, of working up through the chain of command, applies to mind control treatment in general. Another tactic a therapist can use is to ask the spinner to spin in the opposite direction, which will often put away whatever is being spun. If permitted by those alters in charge, a spinner can also replace whatever lesson she is spinning with something positive, such as a feeling of calmness, taken from a positive memory.

For a complicated target behavior that must not be set off by accident, some military/political mind control groups use sequential alters rather than a group who are spun together. For example, alters are trained to sing the songs on a record in the head to get out one alter after another in a sequence until the final one performs an assassination.

13. Deliberately placed triggers for learned behaviors or symptoms (programs)

Although all abuse and trauma survivors may be "triggered" into intrusive flashbacks by present-day experiences which remind them of the trauma, the triggers deliberately installed by mind controllers are different, in that they are cues for conditioned behaviors, only some of which are traumatic intrusions.

The basic training (compliance, loyalty and silence) is given to all alters, and cannot be turned off. However, many other specific trained behaviors, such as self-harm or disrupting therapy, have "on" and "off" triggers or switches. This training of alters functions like post-hypnotic suggestions. Triggers are installed using drugs and punishment, repeated over and over while the child is in a semi-conscious state. Classical conditioning (often aversive conditioning) is also used, as well as hypnosis. The child learns to respond to certain touches or sounds or words with a behavior that is so well learnt that it is automatic. The result is that a survivor might open the door when she hears a certain pattern of knocks, or she might fall asleep when a certain word is spoken. The MKUltra experiment described in Chapter Two gives an example of this, and Katz's chapter describes the installation of touch triggers in infancy. Carol Rutz says that whenever someone said "Knock, Knock," she would switch to a vacant, mindless person by the name of "Nobody's Home." You can see how easy it is for perpetrators to access and use their targets.

Some personality systems are set up with an inner world full of wires or strings that connect switches to their effects. These might facilitate a series of actions by a series of alters. For example, one alter watches the person function in the outside world, and presses a button if she sees the person disobeying instructions. The button is connected to a wire, which rings a bell in the ear of another alter. This alter then engages in his or her trained behavior, opening a door to release the pain of a rape, or cutting the person's arm in a certain pattern, or pushing out a child alter. So the watcher has no idea of who the other alter is or what s/he does. These events can be quite complicated.

Triggered behaviors can sometimes be temporarily stopped if the therapist can speak with the alters responsible and get them to agree to turn off the programs which have been triggered. In some systems it is possible to explore the whole chain of planned events from an outside perspective, so that all alters can be shown how the situation was set up. Once the alters see how they were tricked, and come to know that their perpetrators are no longer in their lives (if this is true), they can agree to stop their trained behaviors.

On and off triggers include sights or sounds or touches. For example, one client of mine had a habit of pushing on the fingers of her left hand with her thumb. This turned out to be the introject (inside copy) of an abuser warning her not to talk. Although many triggers are idiosyncratic, like that one, others are used widely. One common trigger looks like a reassuring rub on the crown of the head, to silence a child. The husband of one client discovered that this calmed the client down when she was upset. He had no idea he was using a pre-installed trigger. The Satanic "horned hand" (so often used by heavy metal musicians, as well as John Lennon, who was studying Alistair Crowley at the time) is a common sight trigger to identify survivors to cult members. Beeping sounds on the telephone convey particular messages, such as "go outside."

One of my early clients compiled a catalogue of "touch triggers" and what they meant. I have discovered that many of them are familiar to other clients, including unrelated people from very different geographical locations.

14. Booby traps

"Booby traps" or "fail-safes" are dangerous internal events that are triggered to happen if the client (with or without a therapist) investigates too much of his or her own training, and/or becomes aware of memories she is not supposed to know. The effects of booby traps include such things as suicide attempts, serious self-harm, or falling into terrible depression. Both Katz and Fotheringham describe these traps in detail.

A booby trap can be set off without the knowledge of the main outside personality. The person might leave a therapy session feeling just fine, then go and jump off a building. Because of such traps, it is very important to go very slowly in therapy with survivors of this kind of abuse. Even though alters are involved in setting off the booby traps, they might not know the effects of what they are doing (pushing buttons, turning switches, and so forth), and it may be difficult to anticipate what will happen.

15. Recycling of memories and reappearance of trained behaviors

A recycler (or reactivator) alter is one who has been trained to keep a small piece of each training memory, so that the survivor will be unable to recover the entire memory and thereby undo the training. The recycler may be given a name like Piece Keeper or Puzzle Maker or Collector or Juggler or Key Holder, and will be instructed to do something with the pieces, which are not kept in the files with the rest of the memories. When the therapist and client are ready to go through the training memories and undo the effects of the training, it is essential to find any recycler alters and ask them to put in their pieces as well. Otherwise, the memories that have been processed will be redissociated and the training will begin to work again.

Here is an example of a Recycle Program: In an extended programming session, Piece Keepers, Runners, a Grower, and a Collector of program pieces are created (through pain), and they are all given jobs. The result is that damaged programs (e.g., programs which have been largely undone through therapy) are "grown" from the pieces that were kept separately. When each program is made, a small part of it (some words said at the end, or a little piece of pain) are separated from the rest of the program and given to a particular group of alters, the Piece Keepers, who give them to the Collector of the pieces. If the survivor works through the memory with the main alters involved, the collector gives the saved pieces of that program to the Runners, who run and take them to the Growers, who somehow grow the program back into its original shape. (Note that this example also demonstrates the alter chains that are often involved in the installation and execution of programs.)

No doubt the development of Recycling programs was based on the observation that an incompletely worked through traumatic memory creates flashbacks more than a completely dissociated traumatic memory. Because these recycling alters exist, it is important to enlist their cooperation before you start working through the traumatic memories, especially those of training or programming events. That way the recycling pieces can be put in with the memories the first time you work on them, and the programs will not reappear.

16. Tricks and technologies used for deception and training

Stage magic is used extensively to create non-human alters and simulate various false scenarios such as murders or alien abductions. (All of this will be explored in Chapter Eight, "The programming: indoctrination, lies and tricks", where numerous other examples will be provided.) Costumes are used for demons and animals. Bags of blood are stabbed on top of bodies to make a child think s/he has murdered someone. Dentists numb children's tongues and then tell the alters in the chair that their tongues have been cut out.

I remember one of my first ritually abused clients confessing to me that for a long time she had remembered being abducted by aliens, but had not told me because she did not want me to disbelieve her other memories because of it. We worked through the "alien abduction" memory and discovered that the "spaceship" was parked in the courtyard of the cult training center. In my client who had confessed her "alien abduction" experience, an alter had been instructed that if she began to remember the ritual abuse she was to remember the alien abduction, so that nobody would believe her account of the ritual abuse. This program did not work with us, but you can imagine the larger consequences of such a ruse.

Besides stage magic props and settings, ritually abusing groups use technology, such as that described by Katz and Fotheringham. Military/political groups have the most sophisticated technologies, and much training or programming is now done with virtual reality equipment. Movies and holograms are used to deceive a child into believing in things that are unreal.

When a client says to you "I don't know if it's real; how can it be real?" remember that there are several options, not just two: (1) It happened just as s/he remembers; (2) it did not happen at all; (3) something happened, but due to technology and/or trickery it was not what s/he thinks it was; (4) the thought that the memory must be unreal is itself a program, as described in Chapter Twelve, "Maybe I made it up."

Now, let's see how these characteristics manifest in, and are created by, real people.

CHAPTER FIVE

Ritual abuse: religious and creed-based abuses

The stories in the following chapters will be difficult to read, but they can help to prepare you for what you are likely to hear from your clients. Be warned that graphic details of sexual abuse and physical torture are included, so you as a therapist can understand more fully what your clients may have experienced and be better prepared when you hear it for the first few times. It is also my hope that these testimonies will help readers to see the humanity behind what has for so long been sensationalized, misunderstood, or dismissed.

As a therapist, you will be called upon to "bear witness" to the atrocities your clients have endured. The term "unimaginable" in the title of this book does not only apply to their sexual, physical, or even emotional aspects. In this chapter, we look at examples of traditional "ritual" abuse, abuse which centers around occult religion.

One of the worst features of ritual abuse is spiritual abuse. It consists of: (1) simulation of religious figures in perverted ways; (2) forced teaching of occult beliefs; (3) forced perpetration, especially real or simulated sacrifice of animals, babies, and/or adults, followed by teaching the child that s/he is evil.

Military/political mind controllers also simulate deities and teach children to violate their own natural moral codes. However, the spiritual abuse involved is not primarily religious. Rather, hypnosis and military training of alter personalities leads victims to violate their own moral codes, much as soldiers do in war. Many survivors have experienced both religious and military/political abuse. It should be pointed out, also, that filming of such events is common in both groups, leading us to suspect that financial motives also predominate even when it appears that the motive of the abusers is religious or patriotic.

One survivor, "Old Lady" (a name given by her young alter personalities) had a particularly complex series of spiritual trainings as part of mind control by supposedly different groups.[1] It will be instructive to look at what she experienced, as any or all of these things may be the experience of your ritually abused or mind-controlled client. Her writing sometimes comes from the adult, and sometimes from the young child alters. I have corrected the grammar and spelling of the child alters' writing somewhat to make the story more comprehensible. For instance, she says, "We say 'I' cos I didn't know that there were and are brother and sister parts; the other parts today are sharing what they know and speaking through old lady's fingers." These stories are the "Christian" ritual part of Old Lady's spiritual training. (Yes, there is "Christian" ritual abuse.)

The special child's spiritual training: Old Lady

Age 3, special birthday

> When I was a baby, a priest put a cross on my forehead with his finger and blessed me. The cross symbol scares our system because we were taught and tricked by the same group of abusers, but under different group names ("Freemasons" and "Luciferians"), to fear, obey and be loyal to God and hate evil/darkness or to fear, obey and be loyal to Lucifer and hate God, the light.
> The actual spiritual training begins when I turn three. There is a special ceremony for me. It is my birthday so I am the special, holy child who gets to be sacrificed to God. I am dressed in a white frilly dress, white leotards and black shiny shoes for my birthday and I am excited because it is a special day for me.
> My mom and dad take me to a church basement. The basement is dark; only lit with candles and dimmed lights. The brightest part of the church basement is where the priest is standing. With a black and gold robe and sword hanging from his right shoulder to his left waist, he stands at the front of the church on a raised stage-like platform. The altar is a few steps below the platform. Everyone is already inside the church waiting for us to come in; they are singing "How Great Thou Art." Mom, dad and I take off our coats and hang them up in the closet. Then my parents leave and two men dressed in black hooded robes take each one of my arms and walk me down the aisle towards the altar.
> The two men put me down on my back on the altar, with my arms and legs spread apart like the position you are in when making angels in the snow. The altar is made of wood so it feels hard and cold on my back. I don't like it, but kids aren't allowed to talk: 'Children are seen and not heard'. The priest prays to God in a funny language. I have never heard it before—it sounds like rambling sounds, not real words. These are the words that they will teach me to say over and over and over again until I learn them. Then the priest says that "God is Good; God is Light", and to "fear God because He knows everything and is everywhere". And we fear the light {cq}cos the doctors used the light (a real light) to burn the bottoms of our feet and blind us when we were in the hospital in Montreal. The priest says "It is important to obey God and me, for I am the one who speaks to God on your behalf. Children are lambs of God; Children are special; Come unto me little children; Children are sacrificed to God because they are pure and innocent".
> The priest rambles his prayer again to God with his hands raised; the congregation stands up and starts walking over towards me. They are holding candles, and rambling words/sounds in a monotone that I don't understand. Two men take my clothes off and lay me back down on the altar and tape my ankles and wrists to the table so I can't move. It is so dark and I can feel the cool air on my body; I am cold and scared. I don't know what is going on. I can't see mom and dad and start crying for them.

Remember, children aren't supposed to talk. A woman in a hooded robe puts her finger up to her mouth and looks down at me to be quiet. I am scared and so I try to stop making crying sounds, but it is hard. Then I remember what the doctors did to me in the Montreal hospital—there was a priest there too but he was just standing in the left back corner of the hospital room when the men dressed in doctor uniforms did abusive things to me. These people scare me like the people in the hospital so I stop crying and just lie there.

I am told by the priest that this day is special because it is my birthday and I get to be sacrificed to God. The congregation keep circling me and saying their prayers in a low droning sound, which makes me sleepy. I am also getting dizzy watching the congregation keep circling me in a counter clock-wise motion. I go into a trance with listening to their droning noise and watching them circling me. I fall asleep and wake up with people who look like my mom and my dad on top of me naked, doing sex stuff, and a big light is shining down on us. The rest of the place looks dark—someone is filming us doing sex stuff. I pee myself. The adults don't like this. It makes them wet so they get off of me.

I don't feel special now. I feel dirty, confused and scared. I want my mom, but I don't want her because I think she will do sex stuff to me. She has never done sex stuff to me before. My dad has and so I don't really like him or want him to save me. I want my mom and then, I get mad (the beasty in me gets mad) because I am scared of her too. I have no one to save me that day.

Everyone leaves me on the altar. I am still naked, cold, frightened and wet. The priest comes over to me and says I am dirty. I need to be forgiven and cleansed for my sins. I have to go with him in a private and dark place, behind a curtain somewhere. It is very dark. I can't see, but the priest's big hand strokes the left side of my face and then the back of my head. He pulls me into him and his right hand undoes his pants. The priest pushes the back of my head into his penis. I have to put it in my mouth and not bite it—the priest will get mad if I do, just like my dad and uncle do. You have to be nice to the priest and do what he wants because you need to be forgiven and made clean again.

It is my birthday and I am special. I want to throw up when the priest has his thing in my mouth because it's too big, and slimy stuff comes into my mouth, but I'm not supposed to get sick. I have to keep doing stuff to the priest with my fingers on his wrinkly parts, and keep my mouth open for him.

After the priest pulls out of me and does his pants up, he takes me by the hand to two men in black hooded robes. They use towels on me and put my dress on but they don't know how to do the leotards very good. I have to help them by putting my hand on their shoulders and they grab each ankle and stick my feet in the leotards then put my shoes on. Then they take me to the place where our coats are on hooks and mom and dad take me home. I don't speak; I just sit in the back seat of the car and want to sleep. I feel sick, and mom and dad are quiet. Mom gives me a bath when we get home and I go to bed.

The upstairs church

Before I become four, me, mom, dad, and my sisters go to the top part of the church and listen to the priest and the Freemasons' council speak about God being Holy; God is the Light who Shines Away Darkness and Evil. Fear God when he gets mad; don't make him mad. Be good and obey your parents and the elders of the church. There is power in the blood; be a good soldier. God tests us to make sure we are good and obey him, the priest and the men elders. We can't tell our friends or people who don't go to our church that we are soldiers of God who keep secrets. We can't tell them about our special ceremonies like the sex stuff and giving baby and children's hearts to the priest and drinking blood from the special Christ cup.

When we pray together with the adults, I always feel funny, sleepy and not me. I'm a boy soldier. You say a prayer from the pew then follow people on your left or right row by row to be blessed by the priest. He makes a cross symbol with his fingers on your forehead with his ointment and takes the bread which is Christ's body broken for us. Then we say more of the same prayer and get up again to get the cross put on our forehead with the priest's finger and to drink Christ's blood—He bled for us on the cross and died to take away our sins. Blessed is he who is pure in heart, body, mind and soul, for he will go to heaven with God and live with God for eternity. There is no evil or darkness or Lucifer or Satan or Beelzebub in heaven. Heaven is good, a place of peace and tranquility, but you have to be forgiven of your sins first before you can go there. The priest speaks to God for you and tells him whether you can go to heaven or not. If you don't go to heaven, you go to hell, the place of fire, darkness and turmoil/agony for the soul.

We sing "Stand up, stand up for Jesus, ye soldiers of the cross", "There's power in the blood", "Onward Christian soldiers." The priest says we are a special group, that not everyone will understand us and will try to destroy us and break up the group, so we don't share what goes on here in our church, the family of God. We learn that God fights evil. Lucifer is the head of evil/darkness. There is no place for darkness in God's family; we have to be lanterns for God, because we aren't bright and powerful and righteous bright lights like God is. He is the only bright, righteous and just light.

Initiation

Children are taken by congregation members and tested to see if they will tell secrets or get scared and go to the devil. But first you have to be initiated into the Freemasons' group.

When I am four, Bob takes me down into the cellar of his house. This is where he keeps his home-made wine and stores stuff; this is where dead bodies are. It is stinky, musty, damp and not much light, just one light bulb. The cellar is narrow and gets dark near the end of the long bench I have to sit on. I just sit there and wait. Bob comes to get me and takes me upstairs into the living room. Men are there sitting in a circle with hooded black robes. Bob brings me into the center of the circle and has me lie down on my back with my hands and feet spread apart like when I was three, but this time I can keep my clothes on. I lie on my back and Bob is behind my head and looks down at me; I have to only look into his eyes and nowhere else. My ankles and wrists are held down by the hands of men; they say stuff that I can't understand and someone gets ointment and pins. I have to stay still, not move.

It is a test to see if I am a good and loyal soldier of God. I know that I have to obey because they are God's family, God's men, and you have to obey them or you will go to hell. So I lie there and they put pins into my hand, five of them in a circle. My fingers want to fold up and I want to close my hand. I try but the weight of the man on my left wrist keeps my hand and fingers from closing. After the second one I know what to expect and the stings make my hand go numb. My hand won't close; it is numb, like it isn't my hand. I feel like my whole body is going numb. I can't look at my hand, only into Bob's big brown ugly eyes. He is evil. I know God doesn't like him.

Meeting Beelzebub and Satan

Another time when we were four, we/I had to go to church with my uncle Bob and aunt Emily. They leave me with some men in hooded robes and I'm getting really scared because I know bad things are going to happen again, but I don't say anything to let them know I'm scared.

The priest in a white robe and a gold scarf round his shoulders comes out from the dark place and from among the other men in robes and he comes to me. He says, 'Today is a special day. You learn about good and evil and to trust your family here and to keep their secrets."

I say 'You teach me to be like you.' He says 'No, to be a follower of God. Do you love God?" I say yes. He says 'How much?' I say lots. I say 'I'm good, I don't tell lies, I behave and fear God's light. Cause God knows everything and is everywhere and hates the devil and the dark. That's why you wear white, right, cos you're special. God speaks through you and tell me to be good or else I go to hell. Right?' He says, 'Very good. You have been listening and learning about God and his rules and his power. You're a holy child and will be a good follower of God, I am sure.' This makes me feel good cos I please the priest and think maybe he won't hurt me or do things like sex stuff to me maybe, but he does it anyway. He always does sex stuff to me.

The priest leaves and the place is dark. It's only lit by candles and no chairs for pews. I think I am in the middle of the church basement but I'm not sure cos it's so dark. A black robe with no hood is put on me by a man in a hooded robe and I'm supposed to follow a flashlight or spotlight that moves somewhere. I don't know where it's going to go but it seems scary to me. I hope I please the elders and priest and God so nothing bad happens. I don't want to go to the bad place, hell, that the priest speaks about.

Then this ugly animal-looking beasty monster appears. He's really scary cause he has horns and an animal face with a long nose and tusks like an elephant. He's wearing a red robe too, so I'm not sure if he's a man playing costume games or a real monster. I just stand there and am afraid. It's not Halloween so I'm not sure what we're doing. Maybe we have to pose again for more pictures and films but there are no bright lights, just the light where I'm standing and where the beasty is standing. He says 'Come unto me, child. I am your father. The father of darkness.' I say 'You don't sound like my dad. The priest says I'm a follower of light, God's light, and you sound like some man, not my dad, and you say darkness. So I don't think it's right.' He says really loud and angrily to me, 'Don't think, child. Just do what I say and come unto me. I am your father, the father of darkness.' I'm scared now cos he's big and he may eat me with his big tusks and I'm afraid of going to hell with the devil, so I say 'No' and then 'Stop' cause the priest told me to obey the elders and obey the priest and God. But this don't look like an elder so I'm confused and then I say 'No' with a strong voice cause I'm getting angry, and Beasty inside don't like this beast monster. So I say no to the beast monster and he says 'I am Beelzebub, one of the fathers of darkness, and your father of the darkness within you. Now come here or I will destroy you.' I say 'No, I'm not going with you cause the priest says to obey the light and obey God and you're not my dad and you're of darkness.'

I say no, then suddenly the light gets brighter and I hear from somewhere, 'Good child. You passed the first test this day.'

It goes dark again and there's only a spotlight or flashlight again on the floor. The floor has red carpet. I follow the flashlight path and it takes me somewhere in the church basement again and then it stops and I stand still. Then suddenly Satan appears. He's dressed in a red robe and has black hair and a thin mustache and horns like devil horns that you see in movies. He's really scary cause he looks mad and powerful. I think I am in hell maybe, cos I see him, and I want to see the priest again cos he is of the light of God and will save me from hell, cos the priest just said I was good and will be a follower of God. I'm really scared and hope that Satan doesn't take me to hell. I've seen hell on TV and it was scary, with fire and lots of people who are dead and crying and moaning.

I'm really scared but just stand there and wait for God maybe or the priest to speak to me. He doesn't.

Satan says he's my father and the father of evil and darkness. That he is all powerful and knows everything about me and everyone. Satan's father is Lucifer and he is the ultimate father of evil and darkness, and I must be loyal to Satan, Beelzebub and Lucifer. I say 'Who are Beelzebub and Lucifer?' Satan says it is not for me to ask questions and to speak without being spoken to. Now come with me, and come now or you will be destroyed. I remember the light and God and the priest, and something inside me says no. I say no, cos before it was a test and I passed it and the priest came out and I felt better when I saw him. He is of the light and of God and will protect me from darkness and this Satan, who is really scary cos he looks like Satan on TV. He must be the real Satan cause he's in the TV and now here. He must be of the spirit world and of hell. And this makes me really scared. I say 'No I'm not going with you cause I'm a follower of God, the light and the priest, and you're not my dad or nice.' Satan then vanishes in smoke and I'm left there alone and it is really quiet. I'm really scared now and think I'm going to hell.

Easter

One time I went to church and we (me and my parts) had to give a heart to the priest. The priest says we are a Holy Child of God (Ha ma nada) and have to obey him cause he is God. We show God our loyalty to him by giving the priest of the Freemasons the baby's heart. When we hold the baby's heart in our hands, we have the power of life and death in our hands. This is the power that God has over us, and he can take our life away whenever he wants to so it is good and honorable to obey him, for he created life and can take life.

It was Easter time and I was not four yet. Me, mom and dad go to the church. We go to the basement of the church and hang up our coats again. Mom and dad leave. They go into the church while two men in black hooded robes again take me and put my black gown on. Then they take me into the church that is lit again with candles and low lights. Everyone except the priest is dressed in black hooded robes. The priest is dressed in a white robe and a gold scarf draped around his neck and straight down his chest to his feet; this time he is wearing a white hat with spikes and gold ball things on top of each spike.

The congregation is singing praise songs. The two men sit me down with them near the front of the church and the altar. I don't move or squirm cos you have to sit very still and not sneeze or say anything or else you get your hand squeezed tight and it hurts. I'm afraid of the men and women dressed in black hooded robes. It's creepy like Halloween. The priest teaches us about how Christ was sacrificed on the cross. He died for our sins, we are sinful people, bad people put him up there, but he went willingly cos he loves us and was obeying God, his father. It is important to obey God cos he has the power over life and death. You don't want to make him mad cos he can hurt you, like when he caused the flood and famines and stuff like that.

The two men in black hooded robes take me up to the altar after the singing and preaching. It is quiet and I know something bad is going to happen again, cos I see the altar with a baby in the basket on it. The altar is covered with a white cloth and two red ribbons draped on either side of it. There is a silver knife on the edge of the altar near the steps of the church's platform where the priest stands behind a podium. There is a gold (brass) cup and two white candles in gold (brass) candle holders on the altar. The baby is in the basket with white cloths in it, like Moses when his mother put him in the water so the bad people wouldn't get him. But this is not the same cos the people here scare us but we don't say nothing cause they're bigger and smarter than us.

The baby has a diaper on but he's not crying or anything. His eyes are closed. His tummy is not moving. He is white not blue so I'm not sure if he's dead or not. Sometimes people make us sleepy with a smelly cloth so we don't know, but we don't like it cos it's scary. The two men go back to their pews and I stand on one side of the altar and the priest comes down and stands at the other side. He faces the congregation, not me. He takes a silver knife from the altar and cuts the baby's tummy from the chest to above the belly button. Then the priest cuts across the baby's chest. Blood comes out but not spraying like other times. The baby doesn't cry. I'm looking, and am scared, I pee myself and hope no one sees it. I don't want the priest to do it to me. The priest looks at me and I want to cry and my tummy feels sick. Two of the men from the congregation get up and come over to me. The congregation starts chanting in a different language; it doesn't make sense; I don't know what they're saying. They keep chanting while the priest puts on his white gloves and pulls the skin back on the baby's tummy. I'm watching and am scared. I almost get sick. I gag but the man beside me puts his left hand on my shoulder and presses down on it and my body stops like a scared rabbit.

Then the man moves me to stand beside the priest. The priest cuts round the red organ thing under the shoulder bones and in the middle of the body. The knife goes right through big veins and the priest has to use a cloth to soak the blood up cause it squirts and he doesn't want to get his robe dirty. The congregation is still chanting. It's scary cause they get loud and then soft, loud then soft. The priest goes back to his podium and motions me to move closer to the baby. I don't know what he means or wants but I don't say anything. The man in the black robe comes round to me and tells me to move closer to the baby, where the priest cuts round the heart. The priest says to me 'Reach in, little one, into the baby's chest and take out his heart with your hands, feel the blood and warm fluid, feel the heart in your fingers. Don't squeeze it too hard or drop it because you will contaminate it and make it useless for God.'

I don't want to do it but I have to and the man is next to me and another across from me. They have swords across them like the priest had before when it was my birthday. I don't want them to kill me or hurt me. My legs are wobbly and I try to look around for my mom and dad but can't see them. It's too dark, only candles and low lights again are in the church. I put my fingers in and take them out cos it's warm and sticky and I don't wanna do it but the man moves closer to me and the priest says 'It's God's wish for you to obey. Hurry up and take the heart out and put it in the cup then bring it to me'. I pee myself again and do what the priest says while trying to not look at the baby. Instead I just think of it as a doll and we're playing doctor/operation. This helps me to do it and I give the heart to the priest. I'm careful not to spill the cup and I don't want to trip over my gown so I go slow and give it to the priest. He strokes the left side of my face and motions a cross on my forehead and says I'm a special child, holy child, and this is good that I obey God. 'You now know what it's like to have the power of life and death in your hands. Blessed are the children for they belong to God. You will not go to hell now for you obeyed God. You are good. Now go back to the men behind you.'

I go back down where the men are at the altar and they take me out to get my coat on and wait for mom and dad to come and get me and take me home. I'm tired and feel sick and the pee has dried on my legs. I need a bath cause I'm dirty and stinky.

Christmas

It's Christmas time, not Christmas day, and I am still not four yet, and mom and dad take me to church. We go to the church, go downstairs, and hang up our coats. Christmas decorations are up, green stuff with red cherries. Mom and dad go with other people into the church. They're wearing black hooded robes like the people of the church do. Two men in red and black robes (red sash) take me into the church. I have a white robe on (no hood) this time. This time we have to give the priest > baby Jesus's heart to cleanse our sins and make us pure. We know we're not going to like it cos we did it before, but we had to cos we're special and the priest says we have to obey God. So we do it but it's a little easier this time. It's a black baby, not like the other baby that was white. Black babies are evil. They have to go to God to be made into light. We see his tummy not move and his eyes are shut so we're not sure if he's dead or not. He's in a baby diaper too and a basket like other one. The table's the same as before, with some green stuff on it to make it look Christmassy.

> We praise Jesus and God, sing songs and take the sacrament before we cut the baby up and give his heart to the priest. Blood in a cup, blood of Christ and bread, his bones broken for us, his flesh pure as gold. It's his birthday this day but we're not sure why we're not singing 'Happy Birthday Jesus.' Instead we sing 'Power in the Blood' and some other songs. The church is little bit brighter with Christmas lights, candles and dim lights and brighter ones where the priest and the altar is. Everything is the same as before but we're not as scared.
> We're getting used to it, but still don't like seeing the priest cut the heart out. I get to help this time. I stand where the priest stands with the priest's arms on each side of me, and hold his hand as he takes the knife and cuts from the chest to the top of the belly button. 'The skin is dark meat,' dad says too, 'because he's a black nigger.' Niggers have black skin but when we cut the skin it goes pink and white. I think maybe blood makes the skin pink, but it's white too, that's funny, why white? He must be bad like bananas that go bad when they're left in the sun too long. Blood oozes out and runs like before and the priest cleans it with a cloth. The cloth goes red and soggy but we keep going and take a knife and cut across the top like before and pull the skin back. Ucky. We don't like doing that, cause it's a baby, but we have to do what the priest's hand does, and they pull the skin back to get to the heart. We cut through veins and have to saw sometimes, but we do it and we pull the heart out carefully cause we don't want to damage it.
> So then the priest leaves me and wipes his hands and goes to the podium, and the men at the altar in black and red robes tell me to put the heart in the cup and wait for the priest to tell me to bring it him. So I do, and then I have to see the priest after, to be cleansed from the blood and wish Jesus happy birthday and kiss his dick. We don't like it cos he always makes us put our mouth round it and it makes our mouth ache and choke like we're gonna get sick but can't cos we get in trouble, so we obey and be good and then get cleaned up by two men before we see mom and dad again.

Old Lady also had Luciferian training for a different set of alter personalities, with similar events. It is common that mind control survivors have several belief systems, held in different sets of alters. Just because you have unearthed one particular group of trained alters does not mean there are not others.

Here she describes the teachings of the respective different spiritual groups.

"Freemasons"[2] teachings:

- God is all knowing, all powerful and to be feared.
- God is good, eternal, light and Satan is evil, bad, darkness.
- Children are sacred, innocent and need to be sacrificed to God, as Abraham sacrificed Isaac. You hold the baby's heart in your hand and give it to the priest; there is power in the blood.

- Once I have killed babies or anyone or even animals, I am bad and need God's forgiveness through a sex act or I will go to hell.
- The priest's sperm makes you one with the priest.
- I am a holy child of God (ha ma nada) through the sex act with the priest.
- To kill myself is honorable, and is what God wants me to do if I tell you about God's group or the Freemasons' secrets.
- Killing myself is also the ultimate thing to do if I leave the group or share information about the group with anyone outside the group.
- If I kill myself I will be with God in heaven for eternity and this is the greatest place to be.
- On my birthday, I became the 'bride' of the priest. I was 'killed' (or made unconscious), then raised from the dead, raised on a cross in a ceremony with the congregation/group surrounding me.

Luciferians' teachings

- Lucifer (the same priest in a different costume) is the God of darkness; Satan is second in command, and Beelzebub is third.
- Lucifer is a spiritual being who is all knowing, all powerful, and to be feared.
- Lucifer, Satan and Beelzebub are good and God is bad.
- Darkness and evil is 'good', and light and God is 'bad'.
- The priest is human, a man and not of the same spiritual level or status as Lucifer (even though he is the same person, as we discovered in therapy).
- Light is bad (I was burned with physical light to make their point and enforce the word and imagery of light as being bad/hurtful/wrong.)
- Sacrificing animals, babies and other humans and eating them is good, it gives power ("power in the blood"). People becoming beasts who tear the bodies apart, feed on the blood and eating flesh is good.
- Lucifer's sperm makes you one with him.
- It is honorable, and righteous to kill myself. I will be with Lucifer. His sperm in me makes me spiritually powerful (not as powerful as him); I will be with Lucifer in hell if I kill myself. This is the ultimate goal.
- I am to kill myself if I share the group's information with anyone outside the group or if I escape or leave the group.
- Hell is used as a reward, and is seen as heaven.
- I was killed (unconscious) on an upside down cross and raised from the dead for the Luciferian group.

As you read these two lists, you can see how parallel the "Christian" or "Freemasons'" beliefs and the Luciferian beliefs are, just with different deities. Both groups sacrificed infants, and forced children to participate in murders and cannibalism. You will notice the references to blood giving power. Both groups embedded sexual abuse within a religious context. Those readers with backgrounds in Christian churches will notice how the "Christian" ritual abusers used ordinary hymns as part of their worship services, and how much of their doctrine was similar to that taught in many churches. Survivors of this kind of abuse who attend churches, or receive counseling or therapy from persons with overt Christian beliefs, will have alter personalities who assume that those in the churches or attempting to help them heal have the same beliefs (and perhaps, practices) as the perpetrators.

As Old Lady worked with this material to tell her story, her parts shared with one another. Initially they were very confused because different insiders worshipped opposite deities, and many of them were given the names of the Luciferian deities (she had several alters named Lucifer, Satan, and Beelzebub). The alters in the "Freemasons" group had not known the alters in the Luciferian group. As they shared with one another, they realized that there was only one perpetrator group who split parts off for both purposes, to serve their Gnostic theology of making light and darkness equal. And that the priest was also "Lucifer."

The main components of spiritual abuse are described below.

Simulation of religious figures and the afterlife

In countries where many citizens are Christians, it is common that God and Jesus are simulated. In ritual abuses based on Christianity, every aspect of the supposed nature of the Christian God is twisted: creation (creating alters through torture); judgment (rejecting and punishing the "evil" child), dying for sins (making the child hurt or kill "Jesus"), comfort (sexual abuse), forgiveness (forgiving through sex with a priest or someone dressed up as "God" or "Jesus"). Some survivors report being taken to a simulated "heaven" where "God" or Jesus rejected and verbally abused them and told them they were so evil that they could never be forgiven or enter heaven again. Children are put in graves with dead bodies, then "raised from the dead." Children and adults are abused while tied to upside-down crosses. Every Christian holiday has its perversion—killing the "baby Jesus" at Christmas, killing the adult "Jesus" at Easter.

In addition, the negative imagery associated with Christianity is exploited: a simulated "hell" is created with flames painted on the walls. Fires are used, dry ice is used to make "smoke", and people in devil or demon costumes hurt and rape children with forks or spikes. Children are encouraged to hurt others, being told that this (hell) is where they will have to spend eternity, so if they are on Satan's or Lucifer's side they will get to do the hurting instead of being hurt. What a choice!

Many Satanic and Luciferian cults have rituals in which "Satan" or "Lucifer" appears. "Satanic baptism" involves rape of a year-old infant by a man in a devil suit. "Marriage to Satan" involves dressing a child up in white to be raped by a man in a Satan costume with a spiked penis sheath.

Mind control groups that are not ritually abusive might simulate other kinds of gods. Trish Fotheringham, whose story is in Chapter Six, had a group of alters taken repeatedly to "the realm of the Gods" where Gods such as the Lord Almighty, Lady Luck, and the Three Fates instructed them to become the "voice of the gods". These gods later rejected them.

Blaming God or the child for the abuse

The inescapable nature of the abuse takes away any belief that the child might have that a benevolent deity will come to a victim's rescue. Later, survivors (and their therapists), depending on their belief system, have to face the reality of divine non-intervention, at least in any tangible sense.

This is often made explicit by the abusers. For example, a child being abused in a Satanist group is told to pray to God to come and save them. The child prays, and God does not appear. Then the child is told to pray to Satan, and a man in a Satan costume comes and tells the abusers to stop hurting the child. The child naturally assumes Satan is the benevolent deity.

The indoctrination goes one step further when God is blamed for the abuse. For example, one client shared with me that someone who was said to be God, and was dressed up in a white robe, physically and sexually abused her painfully at a young age, "creating" alters by telling them to split off. Another child was made very angry by the perpetrator group torturing her, then showing her a bearded man tied to a cross, who they said was Jesus. They told her that what was happening to her was all his fault. They gave her a weapon and told her to hurt or kill "Jesus."

These abusive groups explain divine non-intervention by making the children they abuse believe that God has chosen not to help them because they, the children, are evil to the core. One child was taken into the presence of "Jesus," tied to a cross. When she went to rescue him, he spat in her face. He said that he would rather die than be saved by her because she was so evil.

Forced perpetration

A large part of the post traumatic stress disorder experienced by war veterans is based on their having to harm or kill fellow human beings. This is not natural to us; it has to be drilled into military recruits, along with beliefs that dehumanize the enemy. Soldiers can go to war thinking they will be heroes for their country, and then have to face the devastating reality that they have killed someone just like themselves.

In the same way, one of the most heartbreaking parts of ritual abuse is the spiritual abuse that results from forced perpetration. Occult groups of various kinds force children (and adults) to participate in torture, rape, animal sacrifice, and real and simulated murders. To those who must take part, the murders are very real, even if the victim is not actually killed. And in some cases the murder is real.

Children love pets, and training in ritually abusive groups often begins with forcing them to kill a pet with which they have been allowed to bond. Because all contradictory emotions are split into different parts of a multiple, this creates a separation between the alters who feel empathy and those who are capable of perpetrating in order to save their lives.

The following are examples of what survivors have gone through in this regard.

- A little girl is given a puppy to pet. She is given a hallucinogenic drug, which causes her to see "waves" all around her. Then she is told her heart is being replaced by a black heart, and she sees a man holding a black animal heart; he hurts her chest and says he is putting it in her. Then he takes the puppy and at a signal the group pull the puppy to pieces. The little girl is told it is because of her, her black heart sent out waves which made the puppy die.
- A two-year-old is allowed to play with a puppy, then is told to kill the puppy. When she refuses, her older brother is brought in and is made to kill a baby. The child is then told > that he had to kill the baby because she refused to kill the puppy. She is then told to kill the puppy, and complies.

Those of us who have not experienced this can only imagine how destructive such things are to the spirit of the child. The indoctrination that goes on around these experiences, with the purpose of "corrupting the innocent," makes it even worse. Children, who have a natural empathy for any hurt creature, are converted to "soldiers" or "priests," able to hurt and kill without experiencing empathy. The only way this can be accomplished is through dissociation.

As in war, the "choice" presented to the child is "kill or be killed." As you will see in Stella Katz's account (Chapter Seven), perpetrator groups know that many children will choose to die rather than to kill, but this really only results in that particular alter being "killed"—tortured to the point of unconsciousness—and a new alter being split off, until the child produces an alter who will do the killing. By now the child—the alter—is likely to kill robotically, with little or no awareness of what it is doing. Abusers will continue to train and refine the alters who do the harm, making sure that they do not feel compassion.

Adriana Green, whose full story will be told in a memoir, shares her experience of a therapy session regarding where such an event was addressed.

The strangers' house: Adriana Green

> Maria is a small woman with dark eyes that witness the crimes of humanity. Her eyes reflect the capacity to believe, shine compassion when the need for kindness calls. I focus on staying the adult who moments earlier walked up the narrow flight of stairs of the historical building with its discolored runner, took off the blue duffel coat, embraced in greeting.
>
> Five years have passed since Derek referred me.
>
> "Good to see you," she says. I came to her in the latter part of her practice, with its long history of working in trauma recovery. She speaks publicly of mind control, teaches colleagues. She asks, "How are you?"
>
> The past begins to stir, rises to the surface. I notice the subtle changes, the fuller mind, the shuffling about.
>
> "This week has been more difficult."
>
> "We are getting close to what happened," she says.
>
> The small population within pushes forward, curious, listening for cues to come close. They are still getting used to the idea of moving to the top floor. For the past five years they have been walking down the narrow flight of stairs to Maria's office under ground level, where the windows ran high and narrow near the ceiling, footsteps hollow above our heads. Now we are perched high in a well lit room.
> In this light, after all these years, I am still afraid of what might be seen at the core of me.
> I do not speak this concern of mine. I know Maria's response without asking: we must find out what happened. It is not enough to only feel, we need to know the entirety of what happened, so then you can finally understand.

My headache comes in rapid waves, lasts seconds, interrupts me. I still want to trace the hurt on my face with my fingers, in search of understanding. But I refrain from raising my hands, and instead keep them interlaced on my lap. I know this to be a recurring memory, one that is linked to what is to be revealed.

Still, it stuns me.

"My face remembers."

Maria nods.

I sense someone else who noticed the hit on the face. He stands to the right of me, in my mind. I recognize him from last week, when he first appeared. He spoke quietly, making clear he was a boy. There's no protector to come and block his way, to refuse, punish the telling. A decade passed for him to learn there's help here. There's no need to stand separate.

I miss his rightful raging. I am still waiting for my anger to show.

This young boy believes he's an adult, a replica of the man who stood in front of him at the strangers' house. I have yet to learn why. Was it the utter loss of control? The confusion? Sheer survival? What did they say to him to claim such a belief? I do not trust him.

He wants to come forward, to break free from the forgotten place. I refuse to point him out. I'm afraid of what he knows. Everyone is afraid of him. He begins to fill the space beside me, leaves less room for me. I cannot keep his presence hidden from Maria. I speak loud, over the others, to make my position clear, that this moment is still mine.

I talk about hopelessness, not yet being able to connect the feeling to the small self. I say, "I wonder if this is where the healing ends."

"We need to look at what happened," Maria says. She understands the resistance, the progression to doing the work of recovery. She respects that I too, the adult, need time to speak. She listens as I try to talk it through. How can I go from mother and wife, to the child left on the strangers' doorstep, seeing the flash of grey of father's suit as he turned?

I wonder why fight so hard to face that which can help redeem the self?

"This is hard," I say.

"Yes. But he needs to share with everyone what happened," Maria says. "He is still back there, caught in time."

Many years have passed since I first remembered the pricking on the tops of the arms, the drugging, the slowing of body and breath. There was no story, only the effortless cry, the need to sleep.

The room swims in front of me, as if in water.

Now there's knowledge. Now we know this happened at the strangers' house. The memory resurfaces, persistent in saying this too is part of the story.

In my reluctance, I know too the boy's part will help complete the memory.

I'm afraid to remember, even though all the pieces are coming together, towards completing me.

"I would like to speak with him," Maria says.

"I can only see him." My voice slows, loses enunciation. I need to lay my head down, stop altogether.

"We need to let him know he's not bad, that whatever happened was not his fault."

I fill with insoluble confusion.

"Would it help to put the sleepy feelings away in a container while we go through what happened?" Maria draws an imaginary circle, describes the solid sides, the tight fitting lid that will keep the feelings at bay. "We don't have to remember all at once."

She takes care not to overwhelm the senses, knows this is the very reason for the existence of the others. "Can he come closer, show everyone what happened?"

I see the others far in the distance, their frozen cries. I do not want to know their pain. I do not want to know the crimes they are witness to, what secrets they still hold. But the dull of the sedation, being here with Maria, wise and familiar with the terrain of trauma, the intolerable wait—all this is enough to dismantle denial.

My head touches the soft mound of a pillow. And so comes the sequential telling with each step, the twist of story not grasped by the child's mind. But with patience and careful explanation, slowly the story forms, the thaw of then. When we arrive upon an empty space along the storyline, Maria will know a child, or a jagged edge of emotion, is missing. We need to find them, invite them here.

Maria asks questions in a kind investigative manner.

Everyone will listen, try to answer.

Sometimes no answer comes. Not yet.

At the center of the memory is the boy. He appeared last week in chain of recollection, promised to return today, to bring his part of the story. I wonder, is it the blank expression, the stoop of the shoulders, that Maria recognizes when she says, "You met me before. Take a look around. Those men are not here. They are probably long gone by now, or dead."

I don't want him to step to the front.

What is revealed may not give relief, in the glare of light and truth.

When Maria first met him, she said, "I like you." He heard the lightness of her voice, felt the warmth of her greeting flush across his face. Could he matter in a different way than what he was created for?

He wants to talk with Maria, to ease the pressure of keeping silent. If only he could, but learning what and how to speak takes practice, needs time and space. And these things, he did not know well.

The others stay their distance. He's not tempted to step towards them.

Besides, he's glad he's not a girl, for what happens to them.

He was created to come out in the world for only a short time. But what he did will take near a lifetime to shed the shame, to realize forgiveness.

"He doesn't like any of us," the eight-year-old tells Maria. "He doesn't like girls."

"Well, if nobody likes him, I can be his friend, until they get to know him."

"He's bad."

"I don't think he's bad. He's only five years old." She stretches out her hand horizontal to the floor near three feet to show how tall she suspects he might stand. "He's actually little. How can we find him? How can we let him know he can come out here today?"

"He did something terrible."

"There was someone who made him do what he did." Maria says. "I want him to look around the room, to see me. I will not make him do anything bad. I want him to know he's not there. He's here."

He sees with my eyes, looks for the men in the room, the one standing, the rest sitting nearby. But they are not here. He looks at Maria, and then looks around the room, takes in the painting of the lioness and her cub, the bright greens of foliage around their golden manes.

He takes a small breath now and again, wonders if they slipped through the door while he was taken by the color and light. He looks around yet once again.

But they are not here.

One night, when sleep would not come for the adult, he held firm the pencil, and drew a portrait of the stranger, with the long limbs and straight cut hair that stopped at his chin. He folded the drawing in four and brought the small piece of evidence to Derek, and said, "This is him." That was many years ago.

This is how long the memory is in the making.

Maria likes him. She told him this last week. She keeps one hand on his. Her one hand on his does not scare him. He watches her steady eyes, feels her calm. He notices that she's not afraid of him. Maybe he can stay a little while longer in the brightness.

The remembering begins to bubble upward. There's something on the ground he has to hurt, between him and the man who stands in front of him. There's a man behind him too. Large hands wrap around his to help hold the knife. The insides of his hands sting from the pressing.

He gave this memory of the stinging on the inside of the hands to the adult a long time ago, but she still does not know its meaning.

"It is all right to share what happened with everyone," Maria says.

There's a little girl that is behind him. She's still as a small statue. He came to do this for her, so she could live. They hit him on the face to keep him awake from the sleepiness. He feels the pull up and the force down on his wrist. His hands are squeezed together, the impression deeper than skin. The hands over his own leave, but he keeps on doing the up and down motion. He needs to vomit. But if he doesn't do this, the little girl who is quiet behind him will die. He came to be in her place.

Maria is still here, and he's glad for this. She watches his hands.

"Do you know what is happening?"

I need to believe he could not see what it was that he had to hurt.

"We need to be quiet," he says.

"Can you say why?"

"So nothing more will happen."

"Look around again. See? They are not here. Then what happened?

"The man says that I'm one of them." Maria's hand is still on his.

"You're not one of them," she says. "They only want you to believe this."

"I think I should be dead."

> "I don't want you dead," she says, her eyes sad. He wants to believe her more than the man. But he believes in his badness, remembers being told about the balance between the good and bad. He had to be bad, just as he was to be good. He had to believe the man in front of him.
> Maybe he can believe Maria.
> Something wet is traced on his face—there's a fleeting sensation of fingers tracing downwards on his face, like a ghost passing through him. He wants to sleep, fade away.
> "What happens then?"
> "They put it on my face." He looks at her and wants her to know, without having to say.
>
> "What did they put on your face?"
>
> He can't say, only wants her to know.
>
> "Do they say more?" He nods.
> "I belong to them."

When I work through such memories with clients, I make sure to point out that there are likely to be many alters who refused to perpetrate before the abusers could get one who would do what they required.

These perpetrators go to great lengths to make children believe that they are so evil that nobody will want them except for the abuser group. There are often alters who are given the job of reminding your client that she or he is an evil killer or rapist who will be sent to hell when they die. They reinforce the message that someone who starts to remember or disclose being abused is not a victim, but an abuser. Abusers may teach that the child (later, adult) will harm anyone they get close to. For example, see the little girl with the "black heart," above.

A central aspect of our humanity is our ability to consider ourselves free beings who have moral choices, who are able to choose good over evil and to experience empathy for others. This core belief is certainly the target of mind controlling groups, in particular those with religious beliefs at the base of their practice. The mind control takes away the victim's free will. The forced perpetration takes away the victim's ability to choose good and act on that choice, and the splitting the personality system between "good" and "evil" alters allows the eventual committing of acts of violence without the empathy which normally prevents such actions. This systematic indoctrination allows such groups continue their existence into further generations.

The survivor who chooses to recover will go through the agony of knowing and taking responsibility for what she or he has done. In this way, survivors reclaim their humanity and spiritual purity.

We shall look more at questions of good and evil, meaning, and spirituality in Chapter Nine as well as Chapter Fifteen, "The unimaginable". Different therapists take different approaches, and there, I shall share mine.

Notes

1. Note that we only know what Old Lady remembers her perpetrators telling her about their identities and loyalties. Various perpetrators identified themselves as Freemasons, Nazis, GIs, Green Berets, MI6, CIA, and Luciferians. We do not know their actual loyalties.
2. We do not know that these people were really Freemasons; we only know that is what they told the child.

CHAPTER SIX

Military, political, and commercial uses of mind control

It might be said that in some ways, all ritual abuse and mind control is perpetrated for power or commercial purposes. Some, however, arises specifically from government, military, or "shadow government" groups. Although this chapter focuses on the personal stories of two healed survivors of mind control who were used for military/political and commercial purposes, much of what they experienced applies to mind control survivors in general.

Trish Fotheringham was discarded by her abusers when she was in her teens, and never used again. This was probably because of her severe asthma and her rebellious nature. Some things that may be helpful for therapists to note in this story include:

1. The presence of one primary "handler" throughout;
2. The extremely complicated, intricate structure of her system;
3. The assignment of alter personalities to colors;
4. The simulation of the "real world" by artificial means, different for each alter;
5. The huge amount of stage magic, scenery and props involved;
6. The way in which hidden alters held emotions and other aspects of experience;
7. The deliberate creation of an "inner world;"
8. The use of age-appropriate play activities for training;
9. The sealing in of alters at ages where they could not tell reality from fantasy;
10. The internal filing system for training experiences;
11. The security system to prevent the survivor from remembering or talking;
12. The complex process of locking away the training memories and programming the child for a future of failure.
13. The deliberate creation of false memories to mask the existence of the mind control.

Mind control as I experienced it: Trish Fotheringham

I believe that I was raised as a demonstration model for mind-control techniques designed to provide the latest, most marketable form of human slavery of the time. I do not know the identity of the group who programmed me but it clearly had both a profit-making and a political agenda. From my birth in 1960, I was subjected to daily trainings and exploitations designed to create dissociated alternate personalities (alters) that could be programmed according to the needs of the buyer(s). This programming was instilled through the use of mind-control techniques, including ritual abuse-torture, that were built layer upon layer to form specific patterns of behavior within each alter. This resulted in alters that were meant to be perfectly controllable "slaves."

I was used as a child sex slave by individual pedophiles and cults, and also by pedophile rings, for orgies, rituals, child pornography and snuff films. I was used to write abusers' words, preach their agendas, recruit others, train other young children, and trigger others to action, record, and report. I was also used to steal and spy, for drug and arms trafficking, and for other common criminal activities.

As a demonstration model, I was trained to exhibit a multitude of personality profiles, any of which could be individually defined and selected for purchase and creation in others. Conflicting programs caused an increased need for adjustments and fine-tuning. Program deterioration and eventual breakdown were inevitable. When that occurred—on essentially a "built-in expiry date"—I was cast out and discarded. This conflicting training helped me to eventually break the programming bonds and bypass "failsafe" programs which are always a part of the programming package.

My mind-control programming included the use of:

- sensory/sleep/food deprivation; also sensory overload;
- confusion, fear, pain, terror, guilt, shame, humiliation and belittlement;
- theatrics, trickery, illusion, lies and coercion;
- physical, emotional, verbal, sexual and spiritual abuse;
- forced actions against self/animals/others;
- double-bind situations;
- systematic behavior modification and hypnosis techniques;
- drugs, lights, sounds, smells, special effects, film projections, hidden cameras and microphones;
- sets, props, actors, costumes and make-up;
- meticulously and elaborately designed role-play "characterizations" based on nursery rhymes, fairy tales, stories, books, movies and music;
- guns, electroshock, whips;
- shackles, chains and cages.

My handlers focused a great deal on creating dissociation. Their intentional use of traumatic situations (torture and electroshock) along with psychoactive drugs made it possible for them to selectively disconnect from my conscious mind aspects of awareness or experience; these were contained in dissociated identities, or alters, that they created. The alters would serve other purposes as well.

These abuses were carefully pre-planned. My trainers generally used only enough trauma to accomplish their goals. "Smoke and mirrors" (deception and illusions, assisted by drugs) made specific aspects of each piece of training attach to the correct alter identity in a predictable manner. For maximum effectiveness and potency, the science of child development was used to make training incidents age- and stage- appropriate. These trainings, which my alters understood as "life lessons," became progressively more frequent and more traumatic as I aged.

Although they had no real power, my alters were allowed or given just the right amount of apparent personal empowerment to fool them into never knowing they were being manipulated. Their belief that their experience was real was the key. Alters were called out into the body only for those experiences that would further their intended understanding of the world.

My primary handler, whom I called "Puffy," was present during my training throughout my life from infancy. Usually loving and friendly, stroking and kissing me, he was like my daddy, lover, sweetheart, and master all at once. He played with me and treated me like his precious little princess. He took me walking in his beautiful gardens, swishing me about, scooping me up into his arms. He danced alone with me in his bedroom to Johnny Mathis tunes, crooning the words to me as if I were his lover. I stayed the night so often at his estate home after various events that I believed I had my own bedroom, wardrobe, music box and porcelain horse collections, and that his servants were my servants. I even had "my own" horse in his stables for when the two of us went riding.

Puffy often filmed our time together. He taught me to ignore and not even see the camera, which was important in later trainings and exploitations. This created confusion initially in therapy, until I learned to "zoom out" to out-of-body alters who could give me the full details of a given scenario. Before that, I misinterpreted many memories. For example, at first I believed that a recalled series of Satanic events meant that my family were Satanists and that "I" had been married to Satan (red skin, horns, tail, and all). Later, an out-of-body alter enabled me to learn that cameras, wires, crew and staged settings had created these Satanic-themed situations as part of a series of porn and snuff films. The alters involved in the ceremonial events were never out anywhere else, so they naturally interpreted them as real life. Only this "zoomed out" perspective enabled me to recognize and distinguish the truth in all this.

During my first weeks of life, my handlers established as much controllable dissociation as possible, as soon as possible. Negative emotional states such as fear, helplessness, stifled anger, and loneliness, as well as positive ones such as pleasure, contentment and safety, were isolated into separate alters. Some of these splits initially involved trauma; all were developed by giving each alter experiences that locked them steadily deeper into their emotional state.

My deliberately created alters were all associated with particular colors, with each color representing a "path" or type of training. An alter who was being trained to follow a red path would only wear particular red clothing, be spoken to in particular ways, and have experiences in particular situations, with particular types of people. So little was left to chance that even the toys each child alter was allowed were part of the plan. This color training continued until adulthood, with additional associations added as I became older. Being dressed in particular colors helped me to know who I was at any given moment, right through to the end of therapy!

As much as possible, the color-coding was also linked to the seven primary chakra chi energy centers of eastern traditions. Their traditional meanings were given twists to make the associations fit each alter's color training. Colors were tempered by their shades—lighter shades (those with white added) tended to involve sensitive feelings, while darker shades (those with black added) tended to have only the angry, violent or power-seeking types of feelings, if they had any at all.

The first step in my color-coded training was to create the initial dissociative splits needed to form the foundation for my entire system of alters. The very first intentional splits were created through the use of trauma at the time of my birth. My birth cries were choked off by abusers shaking me violently while I heard my first words repeated loudly and angrily: "Don't cry! Stop crying! Be quiet!" This was followed immediately with very tight and brutal swathing, accompanied by the loud command, "Keep still! Don't move! Stay still!" These words had no meaning for me at that point, but thereafter they became important trigger phrases, used to develop these alters and to lock in crucial programming to obey, keep still, and keep silent.

Testing was initiated shortly after my birth to determine my natural, inborn aptitudes and interests. It continued through my infancy and toddler years. Many separate, color-based training paths were developed and "installed" over time, each built layer upon layer. Each color path was linked to a skill set, forging emotional and/or spiritual beliefs and control mechanisms or programs that created base belief systems.

Throughout my infancy and toddlerhood, trauma was used mainly to reinforce such commands as "Don't cry", "Be quiet", "Don't tell", "Don't move", "Be still", "Do as you're told", and "Obey", and to institute parameters for the alters' reality. An alter who "came out" when it wasn't his or her time, or who acted or spoke inappropriately, would be punished. Appropriate behavior was rewarded with praise and what appeared to be loving, encouraging treatment. Inappropriate behavior was met with pain and the withdrawal of love and affection. Alters who were supposed to be disconnected from people, such as the "mercenary soldiers" of the black path, had basic needs met if they behaved appropriately, and were given pain or deprivation for misbehavior.

By the time I was about six months old, splits, testing and training had already built a substructure of experiences, beliefs, attitudes, and behaviors in my earliest alters. The training then began to include more and more color links, progressively tying each color to sounds, then words, shapes, symbols, etc. These were linked to alter-specific feelings and meanings to produce specific and predictable results in alters' behaviors, responses, and actions. For example, by toddler age, when I was placed on a man's lap, my first red path (sexual) alter would do a lap dance, coyly and suggestively wiggling and giggling "just so".

From age six months to two years, my training focused on installing basic commands and triggers in the initial alters. Certain programs, such as Obey, Don't Tell, Be Loyal, or Internal Security/Alarms were created at the beginning and reinforced frequently as I grew. Later, my handlers would call forth these alters by using the trigger phrases or inducing the feeling states I had experienced the day of the initial split. Alters were each given "life experiences" to increasingly lock in their separate, distinctive understanding and experience of reality. Lights, colors, clothes and accessories, words, phrases, touch, smell, drugs, and quite specific color-coding were all used methodically. This enabled my handler and trainers to create and develop each alter's individual belief system and value structure, systematically shaping his or her conceptions and understanding of "how the world works", "the rules of life", and almost everything he or she thought, felt, said, or did.

For example, in order to familiarize red path alters with sexual treatment, feelings and behaviors, everything had a sexual aspect: the way I was (they were) touched, spoken to, held, and dressed all involved lots of stroking and sexual touching; sexy music was played in the background; and lots of light-hearted play and laughter was mixed in, so it was all just fun. When there would be pain, it was usually accompanied by soothing words, sounds and gentle touch, assuring me this was all for my own good and was preparing me for life. Hence, my young red path alters' understanding of love and relationships was woven into a complex, twisted sexuality. They learned a confused sense of play mixed with resignation, based on their understanding that some parts of life hurt and you just had to endure smilingly.

Until late in therapy, base alters took and held parts of my life. Experiences were therefore often fragmented at the time they occurred. Since only one alter could be "out" for an event, one or more of these base alters would siphon off the feelings, emotional states, and/or pain that went with whatever was experienced without truly being out in the body. Each alter's piece of the memory would have to be accessed and addressed before the whole experience could be considered reclaimed and healed. Yet, "I," the person who handled everyday life at home and in the world, was not aware that alternate identities held pieces of my life. Because it seemed natural to me for life to be broken into chunks, with missing pieces here and there, lost time went unnoticed. Since continuity was unknown, there was no sense of discontinuity. Nor was I aware that a dissociated way of life had been established and my brain's way of coping with difficulties was "wired in", to simply create another alter!

During the toddler period, training began to create in me different foundational understandings of reality, with specific color-coded patterns for the role and character development of each alter and each path. As each base alter had enough time "out" in the body, their reality steadily began to solidify. Dissociative barriers limited their awareness to only their own pieces of my overall life. Each alter had his or her own unique way of being, and, by the time I was two years old, each had a distinct identity, with basic color-coded identifications and associations. His or her feelings, thoughts, behaviors, actions and beliefs had been linked to color-specific situations, places, sounds, words, phrases, gestures, shapes, and symbols.

I was two years old when my trainers first used a special wooden chair with attached straps and helmet. It could rock, buck, rotate, and administer electric shocks. My trainers always told me it was a "magic gateway chair" that allowed me to "ride the rainbow" to faraway and strange realms. At first, the vibration and electrical stimulation of the chair, along with drugs and a fan blowing wind at me, would make me feel as if I were floating and actually moving through space. They gave the chair different purposes for different alters by naming different destinations, and then using props, sets, lighting and sounds or music to create specific moods and associations, specific foundational realities. The chair's bucking and spinning created internal tornados through little pulses and zaps. These added to the whole "wild-weather" feeling. When I "rode the rainbow" on this chair, lighting and special effects made me feel as if I were traveling. Later I was "repaired" harshly and punished by the same chair. Some of the final events which locked down my "inside people" and inner world happened in the chair.

Also at two, my handlers created a structured "internal world" to house alters when they were not actively "out" in the body. These alters always had the symbols and props required to ensure they remained programmed and controllable over the long-term. All of this was established and added to over time, using staged settings which were replicated in the inner world, to make the inner landscape, buildings, and items appear real and tangible to its inhabitants. Playful dress-up activities incorporated well-known nursery rhymes, songs, storybooks, TV, and movies. Every time I saw or heard these things in my daily life, outside of the formal training, my alters' beliefs would be subconsciously solidified.

My inner world was a luscious green magical fairy tale world, with hills, valleys, and a river. An ever-present murmur of sound was at first labeled "the whispering leaves;" later, I would refer to it as my internal soundtrack. This soundtrack consisted of words, phrases, songs, rhymes, and chants, such as "Be a good girl", "Do what you're told", and "Skip to my Lou my darling", all of which formed the instructional backdrop of my life. A core system placed in the center of the inner world served as a root or anchor, guidance system and overseer system all in one. This was a "Tree of Life", with branches for the general color-coded paths, and colored leaves for holding their specific memory and training links. Training thereafter was linked and built upon this tree.

The rest of the inner world was easily installed. Some of it was done outdoors, some in staged settings. "Weather phenomena" got into the inner world the same way everything else did, simply by my being told they were there, and being shown special effects. Like all children this age I naturally believed whatever I was told. Tornadoes, dustballs and whirlwinds were made with fans blowing wind at and around me when I was in the magic chair. At first I was taught to "control" them, then later to "be" them.

Rainbows were created in the air around and under me in the chair, apparently by means of light shining through sprays of water. I was told that the rainbows were multi-colored magic paths to other worlds. The end where the chair was located was fixed. The other end was "moveable," and so it could be "set" to the chosen destination. These other worlds were at first staged externally, then became sections of my inner world. Because the rainbows contained all colors, they could be used to call forth all the alters the colors represented simultaneously. Strobe or flashing lights were used for this later.

"Natural" phenomena and mind control images were coordinated with color coding. Green was grass, trees and whispering leaves. Blue was water, the sky, air, and wind, "the power and voice" of the whispering leaves and tornados. Yellow was the sun, a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, pixie dust, a golden cup, and a "magic golden ball" of my externalized "dangerous true power". Brown was dirt, trees, "brownies and dwarves", dust-balls and whirlwinds that whisked things away out of sight. White was fluffy pillows and clouds, angels, and "heaven", the home of the gods and goddesses (who were simulated by actors). Grey was fog, smoke, confusion and illusion. Black was being alone, dark, silent, cold, scary, dirty, tough, mean and nasty.

Colors also defined the paths that were structured along the branches of my "tree of life." I came to call the nine branches "color paths", because each had its own particular color of leaf. These nine colors—red, green, yellow, white, pink, purple, multi-colored, brown, and orange—were everywhere as I toddled about outdoors in the autumn, so leaves on branches were easy foundational reference points to plant inside my mind. Once these foundational realities were solidly established, each of the foundational alters was assigned his or her own branch and leaf to keep track of his or her specific training.

The nine branches of the tree were assigned a combination of attributes that best enhanced each color's training path. These were the "virtues," based on actual virtues, such as kindness, obedience, loyalty, honesty, strength, wisdom, purity, cleanliness, order, truth, and justice. Each, however, was given its own twisted meaning. Some, like loyalty and obedience, were trained into all paths. Nearly all alters were taught to be "good", but the meaning of that term was tailored to their training path.

The nine foundational virtues alters were assigned their own branches and given a leaf of their color to keep with them at all times. With so many color paths, branches and leaves, my training was broader, more varied—and more conflicting—than most people's would be.

The virtues were developed through fun play with props and costumes with accessories, which were later used to control all of my alters. For example, a black purse or belt ensured that aspects of security training were part of the scenario, gold jewellery meant a degree of authority for the alter wearing it, and silver items created a spiritual connection. Metals and gemstones further defined complex role parameters. Each color-coded branch of training was linked with particular items, obstacles, warnings, links and guideposts for alters, most of which were given internal representations. An eyeball in a glass ball was the famous All-Seeing Eye, always watching and recording me. Brown dustballs and whirlwinds ("magical dwarves and brownies in disguise") came to "whisk things away" when a secret appeared in danger of being exposed, while a "wise" blue tornado whirled "safe words" into my mind as distractions. A golden cup, originally held to "open a channeling state," became an alter that was an open channel. All these things were produced in the external world and reproduced in the inner world.

For my red path alters, the virtues were initially developed by me being Little Red Riding Hood. The "good little girl in red" was in danger and had to watch out for the big bad wolf. She protected herself by being clever and coy while pretending everything was fine and normal. Playtime was a fun game, naked, with my handler Puffy being all scary and mean. "I'm the big bad wolf—keep me happy or I'll eat you," he said, his words accompanied by sexualized gestures and actions. He stroked and rubbed me. There was lots of bouncing, tickling, poking, laughs, and hugs. All my alter had to do to be safe was lick, kiss, wiggle and rub in the ways that made the wolf growl or purr with pleasure. Then she knew for sure she was a good girl. She would be the winner of the game too!

The red path alters' sex-focused virtue of "good little girl" was expanded over the years to include "good little hostess" and "proper little lady", along a path leading to madam-like responsibilities. The alters' experiences were designed to establish a comfort zone pattern of sex and sexual interactions as a necessary part of life. I had clients to satisfy. The skilled use of words, phrases, actions, body language and emotional response patterns was built in so that the clients' sexual experience was encouraged and enhanced. These alters only felt power and security when playing out familiar sexual roles.

My pink path alters were princesses or fairies. They were naïve and innocent, believing they were "in charge, powerful and entitled to be treated royally", as evidenced by much bowing and apparent subservience by Puffy and his servants and my trainers (who these alters thought were "private tutors.") Pink alters held fairy tale "all is good" beliefs and knew only good, happy feelings—that is, unless they didn't get their way and had a temper tantrum, whereupon all of their privileges were removed until "they" were able to "behave like proper ladies." They went to fabulous high-class parties; they were pampered, carried, "swished and flown about"; they knew daydreaming, lightheartedness, and the magical satisfaction of their wants and desires. Similar to red path trainings, as I grew, pink alters were taught the skills required of "ladies of high-standing"—how to dress, walk, talk, organize parties, be a hostess, etc.

Conversely, my dark blue and black path alters were tough soldiers (and a mean witch). They had to be forceful, calculating, manipulative, nasty, hurtful, uncaring. They must "not let anything stop (them)". Like a vicious, cruel version of normal boyish roughhousing, play for them involved much violence: sneaking up on and scaring people, tackling, kicking, hitting, nasty words, insults and putdowns. Their experiences established, for them only, a comfort-zone pattern of following orders and "thinking on their feet", with "doing a good job", anger, aggressiveness, violence and destructiveness as the only ways to feel powerful.

The white path was my main communication and word path. These alters learned to live in an outsider, observer point of view. Interpreting words, gestures and body language, they made note of people's needs. When I was about age two, a "cloud" alter was split off to "see, feel and be inside the clouds", far away from my body and unaffected by the cares of the harsh world. Not long after, a "bird's eye view overseer" was created to watch everything from an out-of-body perspective that saw "the bigger picture." Over time, through various alters, the entire white path learned to "hear the voice of the gods", "channel", "be an open vessel", and "let the visions guide." My handlers attached tiny speakers to my ears when I was drugged and used externally created film and holographic projections until just thinking of the "voice of the gods" in my mind would produce these visions without external aids.

While all of this was being established, each alter continued to receive experiential training. When my body was two-and a-half years old, my red and pink path alters' training had me in "an elite group" with other girls and boys. We were together in a class called "manners training" at an official local government residence, where we were taught "how to behave appropriately" in high society." We learned etiquette and manners, including such "necessary skills" as how to do lap dances. I learned to ballroom dance with my face provocatively buried in my partner's crotch in a way not clearly evident to any but him. We were also taught how to French kiss. Puffy was an important part of the manners training and "reward" dinner parties, at which we children were treated as pets. Men were partnered with girls, and boys with ladies. Dressed in grown up-gowns and tuxedos, we participated in fabulous dinners followed by ballroom dancing. These events included some big fat military leaders (whom I also knew in other settings along with Puffy) as well as members of the "circle of 12+1," the group with whom Puffy performed rituals.

As part of my training, names and other words that could identify characteristics of, or otherwise implicate my trainers, handlers or clients received special treatment. To protect against disclosure, every such memory was automatically shunted away to a secret place in my mind that was only known to the trainers and handlers. Eventually, entire special "code access only" storage areas were created in my inner world. Toward that end, from initial creation, all known alters were taught to not notice or be aware of (and seemingly not remember) such details. This was easily accomplished with simple, reality-denying statements such as "Don't be silly, that's not true, no-one like that (or named that) was here. You made it all up, stop lying". This invalidated and denied the alters' truth while creating and enforcing whatever false reality was needed. When that was insufficient, a hard slap across the face or some other quick, painful or shocking action would usually ensure that "what is forgotten remains forgotten".

If the security of the programming was breached, there were internal alarms. They were linked to the foundational leaf color of orange. The alarms involved pattern and word recognition, as well as the reporting and recording of information and experiences, both internally and externally. From the earliest lessons, orange connected the controller, storyteller and reporter alters to key trigger phrases like "Get the story right", "Don't miss anything", "Note every detail", and, "They're always watching". As usual, symbolic messages applied to what I said or did. Orange programs, like the first sign of the fall season, warned "the fall is coming," which was indicated that I was "nearing a fall", should "watch my step" or "be careful". Such warnings created terror in me, inducing a state of ever-present hyper-alertness over what would happen if I made a mistake.

This requirement of accuracy and attention to detail was also part of the white "word path" training. By the time the body was five, a little "scribe" or "scholar in training" alter had learned to make point-form lists for military leaders at their planning meetings. This was done initially through pictures, and then with words. (They believed the silencing programs were infallible at this point and found me entertaining in this role.) At first, the scribe kept track of who said what and what decisions were made. This progressed to detailed note-taking, followed by speech writing. By age ten I had been programmed with alters who believed themselves to be an oracle and a preacher, who, by channeling the words of the gods, roused and rallied the crowds. The message attached in my belief system was "People will suffer in these times of great change". By that time, a huge, previously installed inner world library held "ancient books and scrolls" that were the records of all "I" had listed, noted, read and learned. To this day, I still experience a scrolling marquee across the front of my brain, with my every thought plus the words I am hearing printed out in text.

Around the body's age of six, the integrity of each (known) alter's programming was subjected to tests of skill acquisition. My red path sexual alters were left completely alone with clients from start to finish, which included taking their money. Although they believed the test to be for their sexual skills and overall value, it was really a test of my trustworthiness: Would I talk/tell secrets, or try to run or escape? My dark blue and black path "soldier" alters were tested for their ability to be cold, calculating and cruel as needed, and to follow orders no matter what. The killing and dissection of a kitten was proof of the black soldier alter being able to "stomach the job", and a test proving "family loyalty" forced the dark blue alter to choose between letting my little brother get hurt and letting our pet rabbit suffer and die. These double-bind situations left me with crippling, soul-deadening shame, guilt, powerlessness and helplessness.

After the tests had confirmed satisfactory programming integrity, the inner world was sealed, trapping the foundational virtues alters inside with their programmed realities. These sealed-in alters would stay stuck at an age and stage of development that believed in fairy tales and magic, unable to distinguish between fact and fantasy. They were also completely unable to distinguish the inner world from the outer, despite living in both worlds, due to the internal dissociative barriers that the seals created. They were left with only their personal belief systems, personality traits and skills, and the safe, acceptable memories of their portions of my life. (This remained the status quo until "I" discovered the existence of the alters and inner world at the age of thirty-one.) Re-activation coding was incorporated so that my trainers would be able to open the seal at a later time and make necessary additions and other changes to my inner world. These codes consisted of the words, symbols, and actions to which alters had been trained to respond with certain previously installed instructions. It was not enough for me to simply remember the codes; a person outside myself had to say the words, show me the symbols, and make the correct actions (after I told them what to say and do) in order for the instructions to work.

In October, 1966, just after I entered first grade, the seal was solidly in place for all alters. At that point, the main focus of my training shifted to role responsibility and the steady acquisition of knowledge and skill. My red alters began to be used in a series of pornographic and snuff films (films involving actual or staged murders) with Satanic ritual themes, created in conjunction with actual local Satanic cults and pedophile groups. These alters, like all alters used in such films, believed the experiences to be completely real. One alter was proud to be the bride of Satan. I was subjected to increasingly nasty, painful, sickening aspects of my various training paths. My alters were taught to distract themselves when it was awful or yucky by counting or chanting, repeating a word or phrase silently, squeezing something tightly, or "getting lost in the music."

Another area of training occurred between the ages of five and ten, when Puffy took me to "military" planning sessions. I call them "Out of Time Rallies" because I was told they took place "outside of time" and the only way to get to them was by way of the "magic gateway chair". This was where the white scribe alter was developed and trained, taking notes for the fat old military leaders while also serving as a sexual entertainment tool for their orgies. These military men seem to have included sex in most things they did. At these sessions, I learned details of the "great leader's plans" and the intended role for my white path of "rallying the people", which greatly added to my underlying terror.

Puffy sometimes joined these men on a huge, glamorous off-shore yacht that was used for child sex slave trafficking. Here, when I was little, pink and/or red alters were passed around for lap dances and other sexual abuses, made to dance and otherwise entertain while being treated like little princesses. Here, my young dark blue and black soldier alters were sometimes forced to "do battle" with other young "boys" in soldier training, while the men placed bets to see which of us "had what it takes to succeed." As I grew older, pink and red alters were also groomed here for high society roles such as hostess and respected lady.

At some point, it became part of one red alter's job to help break down other child victims who were my age or younger, and then train them to be sex slaves. This use of me continued until I was twelve.

Often, I was taken to the yacht by my grandfather when he delivered newly acquired trainees. These were usually missing or unregistered children of all races and ages, who had been transported from other places in North America and were being readied for shipping and sale in other countries. I remember being in the boat with these children when grandpa was handing them over, helping them climb the ladder up the side of the yacht. Sometimes I would already be on the yacht, standing beside Puffy, who was awaiting grandpa's shipment. All the men in their dark blue military uniforms with their fancy insignia were standing in two-sided formal greeting rows beside and across. Grandpa (in the same uniform) would salute as he handed over the latest shipment. The ceremony included the formal military words of report, delivery, and handing over of authority. I even saluted back. I wore a formal gown to indicate that the children were being handed over to me for training. At the time, such pomp and ceremony made me believe this was legitimate and above-board, and made the other children (who were drugged, starved, beaten, confused and terrified) believe it too. This gave me clear authority over them as they were led, dragged or pushed through to their quarters and assigned bunks.

From ages nine to twelve, I was taught to take my place on "the stage of life," which not only existed in the real world of pre-teen peer pressure and media influence, but in my inner world as well. Staged and scripted scenarios, sometimes presented on the stage of a small theater, were instantly credible and completely believable to my now numerous alters. As my interest in popular fashions, teen idols, and hit parade music naturally grew, these things became powerful tools in the shaping of my alters. Many new storage and trigger mechanisms had to be created in my inner world now: clothes, purses, high-heeled shoes, make-up, and other feminine accessories for the red and pink alters; promotion-declaring insignias and more powerful weapons (such as a rifle) for the dark blue and black alters' cache. There was also much more. For proper program cohesion and function, each alter and each path had to have their own inner world stuff.

By about age ten, file rooms housing file cabinets had been established in my inner world. The cabinets were filled with folders of training and programming experiences. A fastidious grey file-keeper alter was created to keep the existence of the entire collection hidden, and also to hide the other alters' knowledge and skills from each other. This alter was able to order and reference files but not to understand what was in them.

From the start of my training, various self-destruct, booby-trap, and time-bomb programs were implanted, which I call "fail-safes". They became more detailed, involved and tailored to me and my alters, as time went by. My instructions were to never tell, to keep silent, to whisk knowledge or memories away, to keep the pieces separate, or to go crazy. Later, I was programmed to destroy my own credibility, sabotage myself, attempt suicide, or engage in addictions in order to cope or belong. The same instructions were imparted to the internal systems that reported infractions so that punishments or repairs could be done. These were the programs that made me crash or become flooded with unbearable feelings, that locked away certain memories, or that made a memory or programmed belief impossible to escape from. Like a spider-web, they were linked, woven together to intersect, support, and back each other up. This was done by repeating such phrases as "too much trouble," over and over. The same instructions were woven into many different trainings, so that a particular trigger phrase could set a cascade of programs into effect. The effects of the programs were designed to spiral, and to operate as a paradox. Thus, for instance, affirmations that work well with the average person might actually trigger increased problems for me. It was confusing for me and those assisting in my recovery that I would be getting worse when I was using methods that should make me get better.

One significant type of fail-safe programming involved “trip wires” which could trigger actual physical responses, such as an arm jerking or pain in the chest that felt like a heart attack. These began early. They were part of two separate aspects of my training: “flying” (for fairies, witch, and genie alters—done in a harness of the sort used in circus/gymnastics training), and being a “puppet on a string” (mostly to prove I was not in control of my own body). I was encased in wires and/or string (hidden from sight so the alters didn’t know they were there) in a way that led me to believe my trainers controlled my movements from a distance through their magical powers. Over time, these wires were used to form a network of control points throughout my body, each of which had specific fail-safe body responses linked to it. Telling a secret produced the feeling of being choked. Ignoring an internal warning about a fall could make a knee buckle to make me actually fall, thereby enforcing the validity of the warning.

At small gatherings in the places I was abused in (most often on the yacht), my alters’ abilities would be demonstrated to potential buyers. I would display some of the trainings specific to what the buyers wanted. However, certain things that I did in the “real world,” such as organizing a protest march in a hospital for sick children, alerted my handler and trainers to the fact that my programming was deteriorating. This forced them to speed up plans for their last uses of me before my shutdown. They had me demonstrate my skills one final time.

I found myself in a large cage, on a stage, in a large military mess tent. Using their names and trigger phrases, Puffy called my alters out, over a loudspeaker. He would reach through the bars to give me a quick zap under my feet, or a flick of a whip or a poke with a stick—whatever helped trigger the behavior he wanted demonstrated. While I displayed various “slave trainings,” buyers—rows of seated men in dark blue military dress uniforms—were told they could order children who would be trained for their purposes, as well as those already trained. My handler “switched” me rapidly from alter to alter, accompanied by different music and lighting for different alters, all to show the various trainings--from submissive sex slave to tough soldier to haughty princess to coy, provocative little girl to dominatrix to oracle to elf chanting programming rhymes and more. The men hooted. They jeered, laughed and catcalled. This enraged my rebel and activist alters, most of whom were shocked and confused to find themselves in a cage, even more so to be triggered in such a way.

I was in pain, drugged more heavily than ever by a new combination of drugs, and unbearably confused by the rapid succession of switches to alters with conflicting trainings, beliefs and feelings. Something in my mind snapped. I started screaming and swearing at the men from inside my cage while spitting, rattling and slamming myself against the bars. I was punished for this incident with a number of new splits, including an alter that lived in a cage.

Later, when I was eleven years old, I committed more major acts of rebellion, including putting poison in the ceremonial drink at a ritual. This, along with increasingly poor test results, proved that I was irrevocably uncontrollable. “Adjustments and fine-tuning” suddenly and drastically changed. Now, my lessons—drugged, brutally painful and confusing nightmares come to life—changed to what I call “shutdown” and “discard” programming. The plan was to severely and permanently cripple or destroy my credibility, my ability to function coherently and consistently, my sanity, and, if necessary, my physical body.

White alters, who had previously been taught that they were the “voice and words of the gods” (the scholar/writer, oracle, and preacher) were now “outcast from the realm of the gods.” Tests were deliberately engineered for them to fail. These were followed by terrifying and humiliating belittlement about their inability to fulfill their responsibility to the gods and the people. They were accused of putting their loved ones and others in danger through their stupid, careless, selfish choices and actions. My perception and sensation were distorted by drugs, and I was exposed to initial shutdown scenarios through a combination of hypnosis, holographic projections, movies and scenarios acted out by actors on a stage. I saw masses of people rioting and being injured or killed because of my failures. Strapped in the now familiar magic gateway chair, my white alters "rode the rainbow" to "the realm of the gods". There, they were told by the "gods" (and shown, using holographic projections in smoke-filled air) that they were "no longer of value and had become too much trouble." They were cast out, tossed into a simulated hell and told that this was where they belonged. These experiences transferred into the inner world. One alter was left trapped in "purgatory", on the "outskirts of heaven", in smoky clouds of grey fog, hiding from the gods to avoid being sent back to hell.

My handlers used re-activation codes to open the seal. They individually called forth three of the original foundational virtues alters (red, green, and yellow). After receiving paralyzing drugs, these alters were "encased" in "webs" by my handlers, who systematically carved my whole body with fine spider-web-like lines which they painted red and/or black. When the paint dried and shriveled, the lines looked and felt like burning traps that had constricted. Then these alters were "thrown into the (inner) tunnels" (by throwing them into actual tunnels) and "left to rot". Thereafter, they were only allowed immobilizing, excruciatingly painful, restricted roles. This effectively silenced them. There were more shutdown and discard events, designed separately for the alters of each color path.

From the age of twelve on, each color path was taught that their only avenue to feeling good or powerful was to be "bad". Being stupid, scary, tough, weak, crazy, a hippie, a rebel, a partier or dropout were now good, necessary, and desirable. Alters were trained to embrace "wild times" filled with sex, drugs, alcohol, criminal activities and/or weird, flaky practices.

In order to give my personality system a new structure, a combination of four alters were to be simultaneously present in my consciousness at all times, though only one could actually be out at any given time. This would ensure two things: that I would always appear normal (not multiple) to the world, and that only the appropriate skills and knowledge base would be accessible in any given situation. A young alter called Pat memorized patterns for who should be out in each situation, and conveyed them to a Controller alter. The controller alter flipped the right combination of switches to bring the correct alters to "just below the surface" where they could then take their turns out as the situation warranted. Songs and rhymes continued in my head as instructions to the alters who were out.

At fifteen, a "stage-of-life" was created for the alters who were allowed to take part in my real life from then on, and each stage-of-life alter was individually called forth and given a false "memory shell". Thereafter, if they ever told tales, shared secrets, or otherwise broke the silence, their initial statements would be either false or fragmented and confused. This would discredit any revelations of truth that might manage to surface. These memory shells provided a common but false background of life experiences that naturally progressed to my programmed lifestyle and beliefs—those of the shutdowns, outcasts, and later, disables and lockdowns—making everything feel, and appear to have been, the product of my choice or true nature. The memory shells were created by showing each alter bits and pieces of "memory" that had been photographed, filmed, or otherwise recorded on a "brain imaging screen", spliced together with new clips of staged scenes with characters alters were told were them.

Finally, when I was eighteen, my handlers stopped layering more programs into my failed system. A "brain wipe" was done to erase everything that had been installed, and my memories were "rebuilt" over a period of nine months. These events occurred in a mental health center where I believed I was attending therapy appointments with a psychiatrist. I lay drugged on a stretcher, watching a screen which displayed photographs and films which I was told belonged to each alter. All of my experiences that were known to the mind controllers were included to the degree necessary for each alter > or group to believe it was real. All alters (even those who had previously been made to disappear) had to sign contracts agreeing to whatever they understood needed to be "locked away forever." They were all regressed to infancy, and the ones who were to live my life from that point on were "re-grown" to my current age with newly implanted false memories.

> In this regression part of programming that erased and rewrote alters' life experiences, my trainers told me about both the "false life" that was being erased and the new "real life" which was being installed, thus informing my file-keeper alter of which file to pull for whatever was to be done. In my healing, this helped distinguish what had actually happened to me from the fake life that had been created in installments over the years. Examples include "You were never or never did . . .," and "You did not receive . . . training," which really meant I was, and did, and had, and was now supposed to forget it forever.
> New alters were created to guard the hidden system, including a "rear guard" and a "captain." After sufficient time for my body to recover, the control mechanisms were drastically adjusted and the controller was given new instructions yet again. Then I was taken back to the mental health facility, where the "brain imaging screen" was used to update the "memory shells."
> After the final lock and seal was done I never encountered my programmers again, although they continued to have me watched and triggered by others when they felt it was needed. Calculated caution, along with terror of being locked up or trapped back in their control, has helped me get where I am now, integrated and able to write this paper. When watchers would visit me during the years of my recovery, I made sure to appear as dysfunctional as I had been programmed to be, and they would go away satisfied that the shutdown programming had worked.
> I believe that I am still watched and occasional attempts are made to trigger me. But I really am free to live my own life now, the life my heart and soul chose, not the one they designed for me. Patterns can crumble. I am proof.

Trish has recovered to the point of full integration of her parts, and you can read more of her remarkable story in Ritual Abuse in the 21st Century or hear it on her DVD set.

Jeannie Riseman, a social worker by profession, is a mind control survivor and a pioneer in our understanding of mind control and how it works. She is one of the founders and leaders of Survivorship, an online resource for ritual abuse and mind control survivors. The following article describes what she has discovered about how her personality system was set up by her abusers/handlers. It does not go into her personal experiences, but rather describes the structure and articulation of her system.

It may be helpful for therapists to note:

1. The geometric patterns in which the information is stored in her mind;
2. The filing of information about training memories;
3. The primary themes: death, sex, deceit, money, and cover-up (security);
4. The use of "temporary alters", personalities created by combining fragmentary parts (Trish also had this);
5. The inadequacy of our categories of dissociation to describe such a system, and the fact that one cannot ever assume that any survivor's experience of dissociation will fit into a preconceived pattern;
6. The innocuous words used for access codes;

7. The redundancy of the system, with information stored simultaneously in different fashions;
8. The presence of esoteric cult information;
9. The importance, once again, of the internal structure with regard to mind control programming.

A 1940s system of programming: Jeannie Riseman

I believe I was raised in an old-school "orthodox" Satanic family, of Scottish–English background. I was born in 1937, and thus the programming system used was developed before or during the Second World War. It is not based on multiplicity. I have never read or heard of any references to the kind of programming I have discovered inside myself. I want to document it for historical reasons, since I believe it has become pretty well obsolete.

I have five different systems of programming. Four may contain the same information, coded differently. The fifth contains historical information and the "control panel" for the other programs.

Programming for cult-controlled behavior

My four redundant programs are based on simple shapes: a sphere, a 3D star (like a starfish), a square with an X in it and a triangle on top (like a roof), and a web. The fifth program is an eye. I know most about the sphere, and will describe it in as much detail as I can.

At the center is a small sphere, with five lines leading to other small spheres, each with five lines leading to still others. This continues for many layers. Drawn in two dimensions, it looks like a string of neurons that have been chopped in half so that only one end branches. In three dimensions, the surface of the sphere looks like an orange studded with cloves.

Each of the small spheres is called a node. Each surface node can be traced back to the central sphere through the branching lines.

The first main line of branching nodes organizes information about death, the second about sexual activities, the third about deceit, the fourth about money, and the fifth about cover activities.

Thus, for example, tracing the death line: core–death–1. men; 2. women; 3. children; 4. animals; 5. plants. Starting at 4, for example: 1. dogs; 2. cats; 3. birds; 4. hoofed animals; 5. reptiles. It then branches into setting: home; ceremony; school; medical facility; other: then geographically pinpoints the area, then specifies the time frame.

In this way, any one surface node gives a set of instructions. Hypothetically, reading from the surface to the center: month/day/year/hour/location/setting/what/kill. Pulling something out of the air (I hope this is made up!): September/13/19xx/midnight/Chicago/basement/library/ceremony/goat/kill. The more layers (like an onion) between the core and the outer nodes, the more detailed information can be stored, accessed, and transmitted.

There are code words to signify that nodes are about to be accessed. Three or more nodes must be accessed at one time. Then there are code words to signify that the access is complete, seal the instructions, and order the action.

One can think of the groupings of nodes as coalitions that form temporary alters with the knowledge, skill, and will to perform a certain cult action. After the action is complete, the coalition dissolves, the nodes each disappear and five (I think) exact duplicates of the original nodes appear in their places. Looking at the outside of the sphere, there will be parts where the nodes are very dense, meaning that a certain cult-ordered action has been performed many times, and parts where the nodes are sparse, meaning that few or no cult-ordered actions of that type have been performed.

The sphere is divided into segments with lines, like longitude and latitude, with one original node to each segment. Thus each original node is uniquely identified by two numbers. These numbers are used to call forth the needed nodes (after the initial code words and before the closing code words). It would sound a little like a quarterback calling plays: "OK team? 17 46 11 69 22 99 hup hup hup!" and the players start the play.

The density of nodes also serves as a kind of cult resumé. With the proper cult code/command, the person can recite the number of nodes in each segment of the sphere, giving a totally accurate summary of cult actions performed, complete with dates and locations.

Access coding

The opening and closing code words (which I have not yet remembered) are socially acceptable, innocuous words, not unusual or bizarre enough to attract attention. Privacy is not needed to give directions. However, the opening and closing must 'fit', and there are different openings and closings for different combinations of nodes. The words must be pretty literate, they must have a certain rhythm, and the word combinations must be such that it would be highly unlikely that somebody could say them by mistake.

Often a word or concept is paired or echoed in the opening and closing phrases. Synonyms and antonyms are often used, as are puns, rhymes, or analogies, reminiscent of the sort of stuff you find in the Miller's Analogy Test or SATs.

(Relationships between ideas, puns, reversals, paradoxes, and jumping between systems of thought or ideologies are very common. Switching between math and language is common. Normally disparate things or ideas are connected in idiosyncratic ways. Up seamlessly becomes down, black becomes white, and reality is as elegantly complex as a Mobius strip. Language itself becomes a Mobius strip, floating between the Satanic and the cover world.)

The 3-D pentagram (starfish) works exactly the same way, with temporary coalitions of nodes, except that the numerical coding and the access codes are different. The starfish and sphere contain the same information, and after completion of the cult action, the nodes split on each surface. (If the sphere is accessed, the results appear on the surface of both the sphere and the star, and vice-versa.) This redundancy is built in; in case something happens to disturb one system, there is a back-up that is always kept up-to-date.

The house and web are, similarly, redundant systems. I can visualize the web in 3-D, like a crystal, with each node being a point of the crystal. I have not yet been able to see how nodes could fit into the house-like figure.

Number to letter or concept codes

Let's take a large rectangle, length and width segmented and numbered like axes on a graph, yielding a numerical grid with many cells. Then let's take the sphere, with its own numerical grid, flatten it, and make it transparent. Let's distort it, like silly putty, into a pre-determined shape, and place it over the rectangle. There are varying numbers of rectangle cells contained in the distorted sphere cells.

With sufficient distortion, up to twenty-six portions of rectangle cells can be in one distorted sphere cell. Voilà! Alphabet code. Knock out k, q, x, z and a few of the other rarer letters, and you get a simplified readable alphabet code with what looks like strange typos.

With less distortion, say only 1–9 rectangle cells to a distorted sphere cell, you could code to sequences of ideas. It would be pretty easy to identify a Bible passage this way, for example. Or identify a particular code from a master list. The intermediate step allows access to a large number of coding systems.

Back to the silly putty analogy. Just as silly putty can pick up newsprint, the distorted sphere could 'pick up' these coded instructions and 'remember' the message when returned to its undistorted state. This increases the flexibility of and usefulness of the original program.

Meta-programs

There are a number of programs which apply to all four of the behavioral programs equally.

One is based on the concept of the abacus and dictates cascading consequences for behaviors that the cult deems undesirable. There are two abaci: one for internal events, one for cult punishment or retribution.

Let's label the wires on the abacus A B C D E F and the beads on each wire 1 through 10. Wire A is the action the cult doesn't like. B is the first consequence. If bead A goes up, then Bead B-1 goes up, and A falls; i.e., the undesired action ceases. If bead A does not fall, then B-1 stays up and bead C-1 rises.

For example: A: I remember something I shouldn't: B-1: I immediately forget; C-l: I think I am crazy; and so on, all the way through F-l, which is suicide. Some of the undesired actions are: remembering, telling, cutting contact with the cult, disobeying or ignoring a cult order, acting bizarre and damaging the cover of social acceptability.

With these five contingencies and ten consequences apiece, there are fifty cells in the rectangle representing the abacus. This type of system is called grid programming. There are other meta-programs, some having to do with linguistic conventions.

The process program

The fifth program is represented by an eye. It contains theoretical information, operating instructions for the other programs, history, and theology. I suspect that not all members of the cult were taught all of this material, and that the amount taught depended on the role the person was destined for in adult life.

I have not figured out how the information is arranged, or how the mnemonic shape organized the information. These are some of the areas I know are covered:

1. Satanic liturgy, its meaning and history. Theology: 'why' the liturgy is a certain way. The purpose and uses of each ritual.
2. History and organization of the cult. What each role is, how it is filled, rules of succession. Blood lines and recruitment. How the cult changed over time. Old-world sources of traditions. Rules governing differentiation and consolidation of functions to meet changing circumstances.

3. Sociology and economics. How the cult related to other cults. Agreements to cooperate in certain areas. Information specific to certain economic considerations, including arranged marriages and economic ventures, both legal and illicit. Money management.
4. Teaching and programming. How to teach the material contained in the other four systems. Nonviolent ways of teaching. Trance induction, amnesia induction. Child development. Comparative programming (analysis of methods used by other cults.) Curriculum development.
5. Methods to change the basic programming. For example, amnesia is a benefit during a member's early years and for low-ranking members. In order to control and coordinate cult life and ordinary life, amnesia is detrimental. The top leaders need to be able to be conscious of both lives simultaneously to run the cult smoothly. When leadership is passed on, many changes of this sort are made in the basic programmed instructions.

Models of the mind

This type of programming can be conceptualized as based on multiplicity, with extreme fragmentation of the core self. One alter is built from fragments and allowed to act as the host. Other alters are short-lived and only called into being for certain cult functions. Rather than having names, they have numbers, and they lie sleeping or dormant until the fragments are assembled.

These shapes can also be thought of as mnemonic devices to organize and simplify recall of cult information. They are not very difficult to memorize, certainly no harder than the multiplication tables. (It strikes me as interesting that elementary schools usually teach a maximum of five main subjects, with a few little extras like gym and art thrown in. Developmentally, small children could simultaneously be taught five programming systems, which would get more elaborate each year to match the child's intellectual development.)

These 'systems' can also be seen as post-hypnotic suggestions, organized in such a way that they are easy to activate. The abacus model of a series of increasingly self-destructive post-hypnotic suggestions is helpful in explaining escalation of symptoms as memories surface.

Clinically speaking, people today are generally dichotomized as multiple/not-multiple, or seen along a spectrum of dissociation. Either/or, with a clear demarcation, or a lot/a little, with gradations. What seems to 'fit' for me is a model that describes information as being stored simultaneously in different fashions.

In my office, I have much of the same information stored on the computer, on back-up disks, on paper in a file cabinet, and in a jumbled pile on the floor. There is a lot of redundancy. I could add audio or video tapes if I wanted, or CDs, and increase the number of modalities of storage. I could also memorize the whole mess, or make petroglyphs. The storage systems would be different, but the information would be the same.

I can also order this information in many different ways. By name, by icon, by size, by date, by author, by title, by the Dewey Decimal system, chronologically. The information can be translated into hundreds of languages. It can be cross-referenced. Given this plethora of systems, which is the 'real' system of organization?

So, with the cult information stored in my mind, I believe that all the storage systems are equally 'real.' I can simultaneously be multiple, non-multiple, a 'sleeping multiple', a potential multiple, etc. I 'am' whatever system I am using at that particular moment.

In a more classic sense, I can simultaneously store information both consciously and unconsciously. I can store it in action and in words. My body 'knows' how to ride a bike, and does not forget when I manage to put that knowledge into words to teach another person. Yet most of the time it is not in my conscious thought as I go about my daily life. There are many things that are 'really' conscious when I think about them, and 'really' unconscious when I don't, and 'really' pre-conscious when they are floating around in the back of my mind or on the tip of my tongue. I don't have to choose: the labels can be sequentially or simultaneously accurate.

Closing thoughts

No concrete elements of this programming system rely upon concepts developed after WW II, like video games or computers. The general principles, though, are certainly very familiar to computer programmers and can be found in post-WW II mind-control programming.

I have a hunch that one reason so few middle aged or elderly people are remembering, even given the social climate these days, is that this kind of programming is simpler than post-World War II programming. It has fewer moving parts to break down, so to speak. I also believe that it is dying out as a system, or is confined only to a few groups.

A couple of years ago I shared what I had discovered about my system by e-mail with a younger MC survivor. I was told that this looked like an early version of something called "blizzard programming" which was and is still used in Europe. In blizzard programming, the alters come together like snowflakes to form a temporary alter to do the task, then melt apart. The theory is that since the alter that did the job no longer exists, it is impossible for any part of the system to remember what was done or what happened. Total safety for the programmers and handlers.

As you can see, the personality systems created by non-ritual groups (military, political, organized crime) are quite different from one another. We have to learn from our clients about what kind of system they have.

CHAPTER SEVEN

A reversed Kabbalah trainer speaks

Stella Katz

WARNING

Much of the content of this article is really gruesome, so be prepared to be traumatized. I especially do not recommend that survivors read this, as it is likely to set off all kinds of conditioned reactions. For therapists, however, it provides incomparable information.

Editor's note

Survivor Stella Katz, who endured ritual abuse in her own childhood, worked as a cult trainer of little children, but was brave enough to leave the group and undo her own programming. This remarkable article gives us information which cannot be retrieved just from survivors' memories of their own abuse, and that you will need to be able to recognize in your clients, so it is important for therapists to study it. Remember that Katz was required to do what she describes here, and misled into believing that it was not the abuse that we, and now she, understand it to be.

Below is a list of important points for therapists to note, as indicators of these experiences are commonly found among ritual abuse survivors but have not been well understood to this point.

1. The experiences of babyhood and infancy, which are often very difficult for a survivor to recall because of the way baby memories are stored in the brain;
2. The deliberate disruption of the mother–child bond to prevent attachment;
3. The early splits and the Gatekeeper alter;

4. The categories or blocks of alters and how they are developed;
5. The way the initial (baby) alters are created, and how other similar alters are deliberately split off from them;
6. The "playful" way the system structure is built;
7. Garbage kids, doubles and reactivators;
8. Touch triggers;
9. The use of spinning;
10. Deliberate preparation of the body for sexual penetration;
11. First, second and third circles for recruitment;
12. The details of each major ceremony;
13. The creation and training of demon and animal alters;
14. The use of the Kabbalah;
15. Booby traps;
16. Rewards used in training;
17. The helmet and other technology;
18. Occult belief systems;
19. The context in which ritual abusers operate, so that we can understand their beliefs and the reasons for their acts.

The Kabbalah and its inversion

I want to make it very clear that not all Kabbalists are Satanists and not all Satanists train their children using the Reversed Kabbalah.

The true ancient Kabbalah is a beautiful thing that takes a lifetime of training to integrate and apply in one's life. It is an ancient body of spiritual wisdom. The Kabbalah has always been meant to be applied as a tool to bring clarity, understanding, and freedom to lives, rather than being merely "learnt." It teaches its followers how to navigate through life without pain, suffering, and chaos.

Kabbalah is a comprehensive philosophy that cannot be explained in a few short lines. Essentially, it teaches the person to integrate the spiritual with the physical in everyday existence. In Kabbalah, the person follows certain paths, using numerical codes and meanings in the shape of the Hebrew alphabet, to decipher the secret teachings of the Torah. As it does with all belief systems that it perverts, the Satanic version—or, perhaps, as it should be described, the "Satanic inversion"—bastardizes the practice of regular Kabbalah in a variety of ways. In the Satanic Kabbalah, the codes are still used, but they are taught using torture instead of meditation, and the Torah is twisted to make God the bad guy. To train children, Satanic Kabbalah trainers, in opposition to the practices of the regular Kabbalah, work from the feet up, rather than from the head down, their Supreme Being is Lucifer, and their angels are black angels.

I am a former trainer in a Kabbalah-based Satanic cult. I worked for them from 1971 to 1991. At the time I did this, I suffered from dissociative identity disorder. All parts of me except the host believed that they were doing the right thing in abusing children in this manner. I am now integrated, and have been filled with remorse at what those parts of me did. But I am also aware that I became DID in childhood from the same things being done to me.

The philosophy of the group for whom I worked was: "God is not the only one who can give. You do not beg Lucifer, you demand. You do not grovel on your knees, you stand face to face. Power is the most important thing in the universe. Without power you are nothing. Life is for taking, not giving."

I discovered that the only thing I did was grovel—that I had no freedom at all, no matter how high in the ranks I got. Everything I did and said was what I was told to do and say. Eventually, I became sick of hiding in the shadows. I was sick of death. I was sick of watching children being tortured and told that this was love. I knew that there had to be more to life than "kill or be killed."

I am writing this because I want others to know that freedom is a wonderful thing, and it is attainable. I want to help therapists who seem to be fumbling in the dark, sometimes doing more harm than good, not because they want to, but because they do not have correct information. I want to give back some of what I've taken. And most of all, I want these groups to know that no matter how much torture they put us through, and no matter how many chains they put on our bodies, they cannot imprison our souls.

Occult belief systems

Just as there are many different Christian groups, there are a variety of different occult belief systems. Not all are the abusive or dark kind that creates mind control victims. Magik is the occult practice of using a universal force or demons to get what you want in life. Death magik and sex magik are the two most powerful kinds, because they use the life force of a human for power. The magik used by witches or druids is basically positive thinking, drawing on the force of many minds and the universal force. Satanists do the same, but in the negative, using demons for power.

In both Luciferian and Satanist belief your spirit does not belong to yourself or to God, it belongs to the devil. In strict Satanism, the entire goal is to prove that Satan is more powerful than God. Since strictly Satanic groups use a system that is based on reversal of mainline Western religions, certain Satanic rituals reverse traditional Catholic ceremonies and symbols: the cross is turned upside down; the Holy Water is actual blood; instead of marriage to God, marriage to Satan; the Black Mass in place of the regular mass. Satanic abusers often meet in churches, and try to use as many sacred objects stolen from the church as possible in their ceremonies. This is to dishonor God.

Luciferians are more gentle than strict Satanists. They represent more of a religion than a revenge. Luciferians call upon Lucifer with the same respect as conventionally religious people give God. They focus less on attempting to prove God wrong and more on honoring Lucifer, and following his ways. More of the multigenerational groups are Luciferians. Like born-again Christians, who dedicate their lives and souls to their God, Luciferians do the same, but to Lucifer.

Some groups also incorporate ancient deities into their practices. Many of the ancient Pagan religions seem to share a number of lesser gods—a pantheon, as the ancient Greeks called it. Marduk, for example, was a lesser dark god, or a keeper of the gates to the underworld. In some religions he is a dark angel. Setians follow an older belief. Set dates back to the Egyptians.

Set is the God of Darkness. The belief is that Set is just another God among many, the God of the Underworld, the God of Death, the Mightiest of all Gods. Some men in the modern military follow Setian beliefs. Black Santerians, usually Hispanic, use black magik, demon magik, or Saints of the underworld. Black Santerians, like Satanists, practice a reversal of a positive religion.

When working with survivors, it is important to realize that the religious beliefs of the cult-involved alters are real. Trying to change them is just like telling a Catholic that everything they have ever known is nonsense. The magical aspect of the religion is also a very important part of the belief system and must be dealt with. However, the spiritual or religious basis of the group is only one aspect of how the dark religions influence their participants. The other is mind control, which is based on abuse and deception.

Rationale for deliberately creating dissociative disorders in children

From what we had been able to establish through reviewing old writings, it is obvious that the splitting of children had been done for many generations in certain of these religions to release greater and lesser demons through children. In the early days, when an alter emerged, it was seen as a certain demon by its behavior, and the group would call it by that demon's name. After a while the group could use the demon's name to purposely call it forth. However, when a demon came forth without permission—as most ended up doing—the child was usually subjected to exorcism by the church. Children that could not be exorcised would be put in an insane asylum. Eventually, as the dark cults developed a greater understanding of the process and consequences of splitting children, their activities and systems they created became much more sophisticated.

We (by which I mean the training group for which I worked) purposely split children because when a child splits on its own, without any guidance, the alters that are created are unlikely to become productive members of the group, and cannot be controlled. We knew that a child who had to bear all the pain and torture to which we subjected it would die unless it had parts to absorb the trauma. It was also important that the children whom we trained have a personality acceptable to the outside world, that could go to school and play with outside children without giving up the secrets.

Hierarchy of Satanic and Luciferian groups: first, second and third circles

The First Circle of the group in which I was raised consists of group members born of the First Circle or the higher echelon of the Second Circle. They are trained from birth in the ways described in this chapter.

The Second Circle consists of people not necessarily born into the group, but brought in at a very early age, usually before one year of age. For example, a child of a Third Circle member or a child recruited by a babysitter or neighbor. They also receive this training, though it may not start quite as early.

The Third Circle consists of people who have come in as teenagers or adults. If these people have children under the age of two, or very intelligent children up to age four, the children become Second Circle; children who are older remain Third Circle. They will become full-time breeders, prostitutes, or "gofers". They are never allowed to see all the intricacies of a ritual; they are kept in the back rows. Their bodies will form the outer circle but their backs will be turned, or they will be on the outside of the building. They might be told they are important because they must signal if someone comes around.

People who come into a group as teens or adults may not have dissociative disorders: after the age of nine you cannot split a person.[1]

Reversed Kabbalah training: goals, schedule, methods, and technologies

Reversed Kabbalah training is a carefully developed process, with elaborate goals, a schedule, methods and technologies.

Props and technologies used for deception and training

A variety of props and technologies help trainers in these groups to create the illusions and affects that help them accomplish their goals. These include:

1. "Stage magic" is used to create non-human alters and simulate various false scenarios, including murders. This includes bags of blood, tape-recorded cries, costumes, stage scenery, projectors, and so forth.
2. Drugs: Different drugs are used for different purposes, such as to aid suggestibility, to restrain the child, or to whip him or her up into fury. Injections of sulfur or Naltrexone will create pain all over (a punishment program). Curare will paralyze the body.
3. Spinners: see the detailed discussion of this in the section on infancy.
4. Red light flashing machine: One way of making an alter believe illusions is through the use of a machine that flashes red light on closed eyelids. The perpetrators believe that when the eyelids are closed, light seen through them confuses the mind so that the person is unable to tell the difference between reality and fantasy. You can tell such people that what they are seeing is a spaceship and that they have been abducted by aliens. You can tell them that they have had surgery, and that a device for keeping track of them is hidden under their scalp. With the correct use of this machine, the groups believe that victims will believe everything they have been told. For example, someone on whom a small cut or scar of some kind is done at the same time will believe that the eye of Lucifer has been placed in their stomachs to keep an eye on them, and they will believe it forever.
5. Helmet: The helmet is a piece of equipment used for imaginary brain surgery. Small electrodes in the helmet send small shocks to different areas of the head. This can be used as a form of punishment or to convince people they have had brain surgery. In punishment, these individuals are given a real scenario about something they have actually done (such as talk to an outsider), or an imaginary act, like killing a loved one or pet. Each time they deny it they are shocked. The shocks get progressively more severe as they continue to deny until eventually they admit to what they have done. The trainer will get them to repeat that confession numerous times, while recording their words. They will often then be put on the light machine, and while the light flashes they hear themselves repeating whatever hideous crime they have committed in their own voices. At the end of the session they will believe they have committed the crime.

6. Sensory deprivation room: The deprivation room is a small soundproof and lightproof box. Sometimes it is lowered into a hole in the ground that is about two feet wide by three and a half feet high. The box has oxygen as well as stereo speakers. This is used for many different kinds of training, as well as for punishment. In training, the child will remain in the hole for hours at a time, with a tape repeating the same instructions over and over in a monotone. The child will then be removed, allowed to use the toilet, fed, and returned to the box.

   When the box is used for punishment, no sound at all is piped in, or there will be a high-pitched, screaming sound; the child must remain there for a day or better, never allowed to use a bathroom and given no food or water. This box is also used for tone training. Different tones will be piped in along with a specific word or instruction. This will teach the child how to read sound signals.

7. Sound machine: The sound machine is simply an audio machine, similar to the one that is used to test hearing. It is a sound-proof box with headphones that produce different sound frequencies. The child is strapped into the box, and the trainer, from a room outside the box, makes requests of the child. When the child does not comply, sounds are emitted. At first they are soft. Then they are louder and louder until the sound blows the eardrums, or almost does so. Survivors often have ear damage from this. The sound is initially used as a way to stop the "ignore reflex" in infants, at six weeks old. It continues to be used throughout the person's life as punishment for non-compliance or for talking to outsiders. All alters will be familiar with the sound used.

   The sound is often used as a booby trap, set to go off if the survivor does not comply with a return program or request. During training, the child is told she or he has so much time to comply; then a trap is created so that the child cannot comply even if she or he wants to. After a certain length of time, or after a certain date that has great significance, such as an anniversary or birthday, the trap goes off and the child is punished with the sound or a spin or an electric shock, or all of the above and more. Eventually the system learns the dates and what happens as a result of non-compliance, so the internal system automatically sets off the sound or other internal punishments.

8. Electronic board: This is a bed equipped with electrodes. It is used in teaching touch triggers. The child is hooked up to the electrodes. A small shock is administered that hurts but does not injure. It is accompanied by a repeated word or instruction. This lesson takes several months to complete. It will allow the child to be triggered by a simple touch, either given by an internal touch-trained alter or another person. Each time a person/alter touches one of these triggers with a finger in a specific manner, the child will feel the shock and will bring forward a specific lesson or specific alter who will carry out the lesson.

   The electronic board is used for many different things. Without a doubt it is the most effective kind of training. The touch must be done in a specific manner in order for the lesson to be triggered. This is so an outsider cannot set off the triggers accidentally.

9. Virtual reality glasses: These are a relatively new thing in modern day training. Since their invention, it has made illusion a great deal easier, especially for impersonation of therapists. (See Chapter Thirteen, "Boundaries and bonding: the therapeutic relationship".)

Role of the trainer

Most trainers of babies are young females, in their teens and twenties. The child has the same trainer for years—from birth to when they are "given," at age nine. During training, the baby is looked after by the trainer for two or three days at a time. The child is with the trainer for three days, home for three days, back and forth for months, until the mother is trained to maintain what the trainer started. If a trainer starts to bond with a child, she has to hand the child on to someone else. The trainer monitors the child in the home and at cult functions. The trainer is in an emotionless alter when she hurts and splits the baby, unless she is not multiple and is simply sadistic. Some trainers will smack the baby's face; some do not, because of the danger of brain damage. Some stab the baby's feet with extra sharp forks or fondue skewers. Exactly what is done when depends on the child's development.

The following describes what we did to the children we were training, and of course, what was done to me. It follows a chronological schedule.

At home during the first year of life

The child's primary guardian for the cult, who is often the mother but may be the father, another relative, or another cult person, must keep up the trainer's training at home. The trainers or programmers teach the parents what to do. The parents have to take notes, and are punished if the notes are not good enough. If the mother is too soft and cannot be trained to harm her child, the child is left to a specialized infant trainer until the age of two, then passed on to a trainer for older ages.

The following happens at home:

1. The child is neglected. The mother is not allowed to feed the baby consistently. Breastfeeding is not allowed.
2. The parent uses a home version of a spinner, like a baby weigh-scale, which spins the infant fast. It is a very smooth ride, and is not fast enough to cause shaken baby syndrome. Head and neck must be stabilized. This is used for compliance when the child will not stop crying on command, for example, or if the toddler will not stop touching something.
3. Colors made out of felt with little felt pockets are always kept in the crib. The mother has colored dolls made of hard foam (previously of cardboard) for the representations of the alters, and teaches the baby to put them in the pockets.
4. The parent shows the baby the magikal symbols in a game, and tells the baby what they are.
5. The parent uses touch triggers, especially Silence, taught with the trigger on the head and a hand over the baby's mouth.
6. The guardian calls out particular alters and speaks to them strictly in their own magikal languages. In the first few months, they are called out by using their name together with their unique touch.
7. The child is hurt without marking it. Its hand might be put over radiant heat, or it might be burned internally with a tiny probe.
8. The child is sexually abused with fingers and dildos.

If the mother cannot do these things because she has bonded with the child, the child is given to someone else, or the mother has to take it to the trainers.

Preparation for sexual abuse

Starting at about two months, fingers are inserted in the child's orifices to widen the openings. This is done very carefully, so as not to tear. Little boys' penises are stroked pleasurably until they are erect. Little girls are also stroked, with jellies used as lubricants. By eighteen months the vagina or anus should be wide enough to accommodate a full-sized penis. The trainer shows the guardian how to do this. Once the fingers are no longer large enough, a kit is used with a series of size-graded, smooth wooden phalluses. It comes in a leather binder like a musical instrument case.

The trainer is trained to think that by stretching the orifice in this way, she is protecting the child from physical harm and intense pain when the child is later raped. The trainer teaches this to the guardian. If the child comes back to the trainer bruised, the guardian is punished and chastised; the kit is taken from her and the trainer continues the job.

Bonding to group rather than family

Very little takes place in the first two weeks of life except the bonding with the parent and trainer.

The baby's bond with the mother and the trainer is established in the first two weeks. Then later the one with the mother is broken. The child is passed around among the group members, so that a bond to the group will replace the maternal bond. The child is taken out of the home, and cannot see the mother except at a distance. It is teased by being shown the mother at a distance, and told, "If she loved you, she'd be with you." The baby is made excited — "Mommy's coming!" Then Mommy comes and walks right past. The baby is kept away from the home for the length of time it takes to break the bond with mother. The child never really trusts the mother again. The trainer will always be the rescuer. A cult child rarely "makes strange" (that is, rejects strangers and clings to the mother) because it is accustomed to strangers and does not have an exclusive bond with its mother. It is passed from pillar to post. It is used to being in crowds, and will go to anybody.

Deliberate neglect

The infant up to six weeks of age is allowed to cry endlessly while its basic needs are ignored. Once the baby stops crying, its needs are attended to. During this time the child remains in the home unless it the trainer feels that the mother cannot or will not do what is needed for the child. The trainer monitors this child daily to see how it is responding. As the baby becomes accustomed to neglect, it learns to calm down in minutes instead of hours. It is monitored during this process. A child of that age can be abandoned for up to two days, depending on its size. Doctors give their opinions on what the child can tolerate without physical damage.

The not-yet-split child is spoken to in only one language, the mother tongue. The child's name is used constantly. The main teaching between six weeks and six months continues to be that its physical and emotional needs are to be ignored. The child is still severely neglected, left to cry for hours. It is not fed on any specific schedule. It may be fed twice within an hour, and then left for twelve hours with nothing to eat or drink. It is left cold and without any diaper change, and it is not held or touched at all. Its hands and feet are bound so that it cannot comfort itself by sucking a thumb. During the first six months the baby is taught to dissociate its own pains and needs.

Milk and blood

The baby is rarely breast fed, as this creates too much of a bond with the mother. However, the mother's milk is used, as babies prefer the taste and will accept it more readily. The milk is mixed with small amounts of the mother's blood so the child gets used to the tinny taste. (Contrary to popular belief, the child is not fed whole bottles of pure blood, as that would make the child ill and unwilling to accept what you are trying to feed it.)

Fear training

Loud noises are often used to frighten the child, in order to see how long it takes to settle down. Frightening sound is used from Day 1 to get the child past the ignore reflex. The trainer wants the child to be frightened. The child is forced to listen to such a sound over and over, now and at a later date, to teach it to be on guard and fearful all the time. The child is given no chance to calm down; there is no real comfort, ever.

Color training

From birth the child's crib is surrounded by color. There is a black crib sheet on the bottom, a red panel on the right, green on the left, blue at the head, yellow at the feet, and white on top. Faces in black and white as well as magikal symbols are stuck to the color sheets.

Dissociative testing and application of results

The faster the child settles when it has been frightened, the easier training will be. This also means the less the child will have to endure in the way of pain. This begins the weeding out process, through which the children are chosen to lead or to serve. Just because a child is the first born of a member of the inner circle does not automatically make it High Priest/Priestess material. If the child tends to be placid it is trained easily, but from the perspective of the trainer it would be unlikely that such a child will be trained for the highest positions. The child with the strongest will is considered to be more intelligent. It was Lucifer's strong will that won him the position of Prince of the Underworld, instead of one as God's flunky. Therefore, the strong-willed child, who is harder to train at first, will be seen as a true child of Lucifer. Lucifer does not want anyone who is willing to bow and scrape. Remember, in Satanic prayer, the petitioner demands, s/he does not beg and plead. She or he stands on her or his feet, and does not bend the knees and grovel. Therefore, it is the children that are the hardest to break that will be the rulers of the underworld, and the right hand of Satan.

The first splits

Between six weeks and six months of age, the trainer begins to deliberately split the child.

The Firstborn

The physical child that is born is the "birth child". The "Firstborn", who is the same gender as the person, is "born", or created, from the first split, and will serve as guardian or caregiver to the birth child. It will forever know what is actually going on in the person's life, while being shielded from the pain that could kill the person. All other parts come from the Firstborn.

The Gatekeeper

The next part to be split off will be raised as Gatekeeper. He or she will always be present at the birth of a new alter. He keeps the records for the developing system and the order of the splits. The Gatekeeper is never hurt after his birth. He holds everything back, and observes everything that happens. He will raise the new parts if they seem worthy or junk them if they are not. The Gatekeeper is told that he is in control of the mind and all emotions. The only alters not recorded by the Gatekeeper are accidental splits which can become "floaters" or remain stagnant.

These two first split alters are the same age as the body. They grow up with the body because they do not receive further trauma.

The thirteen blocks of alters

The group that follows will be intended to remain children or animals or demons. The trainer builds on the infant's initial dissociative training and attempts to split the child further. The foundation created by the first splitting of alters usually consists of thirteen "blocks" (alters of particular job categories who will be the sources of further alters of those categories). It might also be based on a number divisible by three. The triggers to bring the alters "out" in the body mostly correspond to the chakras, as well as to stations of the Kabbalah.

The types of alters are: spirit, language, guards, touch, magik, sacrifice, pain, sex, demons, animals, re-activators, doubles, and garbage kids. The "locations" of these alters (the blocks), and the triggers to bring these alters out in the body mostly correspond to the chakras, as well as to stations of the Kabbalah, as follows:

1. Spirit—head, third eye (middle of forehead)
2. Language—throat, thyroid chakra
3. Guards—palm of right hand

4. Touch—palm of left hand
5. Magik—heart chakra
6. Sacrifice—solar plexus chakra
7. Pain—sacral chakra
8. Sex—genitals (sex chakra)
9. Demons—right knee
10. Animals—left knee
11. Re-activators—right foot
12. Doubles—left foot
13. Garbage bin—on the behind, tailbone area

How the child is split

To create the splits, the child is bombarded by constant annoying sounds, its feet are jabbed with needles, and small electrodes are placed in every orifice. Small shocks are administered, not to burn the child, but just to make it hurt as much as possible. The trainer watches carefully. It is believed that the moment of a split occurs when the child's cry becomes a hooting sound, similar to that of an infant going through drug withdrawal. Its eyes roll back in its head, and it becomes suddenly limp and silent.

At this point the trainer has a window of fifteen seconds to one minute in which to name the new child alter, and assign it a color and a magikal symbol. The trainer wears the color with a symbol in black on the trainer's shoulder or chest. The trainer then picks up the child and wraps it in blankets of the color it will be assigned. The child receives care for approximately one hour, in a very loving way. It is fed, bathed, changed and caressed. It is continuously spoken to in its own language, which may or may not be the mother tongue, using its new given name. Then it is rocked back to sleep. Once the child is asleep, it is returned to its mother until the next time it is brought to its trainer, which usually occurs two to three days later. This whole process can take a few hours or several days, depending on the child.

The task of the first few alters is to guard the "firstborn," who will not be not used again after the foundation is built. All of the other alters are told that without that firstborn, they would die. The firstborn is considered to be the body and soul; the others are "renting space".

Record keeping

All the child's data is recorded in a small book the trainer keeps. Data will include what was done, the exact amount of time it took to make the split, and what worked best to achieve the splits. The names of the child alters are recorded, along with the order of birth, the sex of the alter, what color and symbol was assigned, and what language they speak. A record is also kept of the type of "physical body" the alters have been assigned—human, animal or demon.

The Kabbalah on the body

An internal Kabbalah is installed when alters are split off. In most cases, binding and hurting parts of the body is sufficient for this. A cardboard cutout of a body, called "Kabbalah," is held where the baby can see it. Somebody points to a spot on the cutout while the baby is probed or stabbed at that spot on its body. The cutout is marked into layers. Initially, there are just three layers—from genitals down, genitals to throat, and head. As the child gets older the body is more differentiated.

The foundation of the first year

This includes:

- Original alters (blocks) with colors, names, touch triggers to bring them out, and locations in the body and in a cube.
- Compliance training.
- Spin training.
- Silence training.
- Training not to taste.
- Basic touch triggers to bring out alters, and to enforce compliance, silence, and not tasting.
- Some other triggers, e.g., sounds and smells.

Building the system structure

By the age of six months, the child should have at minimum 18–20 alters with distinct names and colors. This number is needed so that there will be some to fall back on if some of the splits are found to be untrainable.

Now, the visual form building begins. The child (each foundational alter) is placed in a box-like playpen with cloths of certain colors on the walls. Each wall cloth contains small pockets. Small cardboard figures are used for what appears to be a game. The figures are male or female, animal or demon. Each wears the color that corresponds to the name given. The names are printed on the chest and the magikal symbol is drawn on the abdomen. As the trainer shows each figure to the baby, the figure is called by name in the language that corresponds to the name. The little figure dances happily into its slot on the wall. "This is you. Where do you live?" The trainer talks with the child about the other foundational alters and where they all live. Each foundational alter learns the location of all the other foundational alters. Later, each foundational alter will learn where all those who split off from it live.

After a few tries, the trainer gives the child the figure, and helps guide the figure into the slot. The children are very responsive to this activity. It is fun for them, because it involves little figures, bright colors and a great deal of attention from the trainer. No torture is used in this game. This also makes it less likely that the person will remember it in therapy, as therapists tend to pursue discussion of traumatic events. Also, non-traumatic events from infancy are not available to explicit memory.

It takes a couple of months to build a base. The trainer tries to have it done by the time the child is 6–10 months of age. Internal structures are fixed by the trainer and the specific group. They are purposefully designed so that the trainers can easily retrain alters over time. Some groups use structures consisting of geometric shapes; others use trees; others use the Kabbalah. Each structure has a department head and workers. Colors and symbols categorize different groups of alters. Only the department heads know what the structure is based on. This is important for therapists to understand, as it is easier to go through the system once you know the physical look of the structure or structures.

In a reactive multiple (one not deliberately trained) any internal structure that exists is created spontaneously by the person for the safety of the system. It is not based on a hierarchy for the purpose of later use and is usually not elaborate. Most common are houses or boxes that serve no purpose other than as places for alters to live while inside.

Insertion of touch triggers

Once the child has a few of these little characters placed properly every time, the trainer can begin to inset basic touch triggers. Touch triggers are very important for the control of the children. A lot are put in during the first year. To the outside world, most of the program touch triggers look like loving touches.

The child is made accustomed to specific places on the body being made to feel more meaningful, being stroked, etc. These spots, at the acupressure points, are mapped out on the body as the child starts to learn her programs. Touch triggers are often taught through a combination of games and pain. Each program has a trigger in each sensory modality. A baby really begins to find parts of its body; those parts are intentionally hurt. Triggers are repeated over and over while the child is in a semi-conscious state from drugs and punishment. The machine that flashes red light on the child's closed eyelids is used here.

Silence touch

The first touch trigger to be inset is the Silence touch. If a child has had a slip of the tongue in public, the crown trigger, found at the crown of a child's head, is touched in a loving way by the parent or guardian. The child will fall silent. To create this lesson, the trainer gets the baby babbling any way s/he can. Then the trainer touches the child's crown and says "Shh." The touch is paired with putting a plant in the baby's mouth that makes its tongue swell, or with an electric shock. If the baby cries during training, the trainer repeats the touch and sound and covering of the mouth again using a louder voice. This is repeated until the baby figures out that it must be silent. It can take days, or only two or three tries. Another silence trigger is a little rub at the dip at the base of the back of the neck. An outside person observing the parent touch the child in this loving way would never know the child is being silenced through mind control.

The use of spinning

When a person is spun, he or she becomes ill and afraid, angry and thrilled: many different physical and emotional sensations are created. Spinning simply transfers these sensations to those alters best equipped to handle them, as alters tend to specialize in particular sensations. Thereafter, every time the individual remembers anything associated with that kind of abuse, they will be brought back to that original memory and have the sensation that they are spinning.

Compliance training

Spinning is meant initially as a form of compliance training. From the very beginning, the baby is taught compliance and obedience. The baby is spun in the small cot fitted with padding that resembles a baby weigh-scale that was mentioned earlier, on a spinning chair, or attached to a device like an electric potter's wheel. The baby cannot see out. It is prodded until it cries. The crying baby is placed on its side so that it does not choke when it vomits, and secured using rolled towels or foam blocks. It is spun slowly to begin with, increasing the speed as it goes. An annoying noise is made at the same time. When the child is exhausted from crying and has been sick several times, it stops crying. At that point the spinning is stopped. This process is repeated many times, using each alter. It usually takes several weeks before each alter has had its turn. This will be done over the next two years every time the child is disobedient.

Spinning teaches these children that they have no control over their own bodies. The child's head can flop, though their wrists and ankles are tied. Spinning makes the children physically ill, sick to their stomachs, but no help is given; they are spun until the screaming stops. The technique works better when children are not fighting. Small amounts of drugs are administered to calm children who fight a lot so they give up faster.

Sometimes mistakes are made in the spin training. These children can get "shaken baby syndrome" and can be killed.

Distributing lessons

After the child reaches the age of two, commercially available spinning chairs are used. A child is spun until it vomits while particular words are repeated over and over on tape such as Die or Kill or Silence. This is done to teach the child's alters to come forward quickly to take parts of the child's pain, fear, and nausea, or different illnesses. It teaches the alters to share the lesson being taught. Some lessons, such as suicide or homicide, must be held by more than one alter in order for the target behavior to take place, so that one alter cannot kill the entire system, or one alter cannot kill another member of the group. Because of this kind of security measure, the majority of people only injure themselves rather than die in their suicide attempts.

Basic lessons for each child

1. Total compliance.
2. Loyalty to the group.
3. Silence.
4. Do your job to the best of your ability.
5. Replenish the group through breeding or recruitment.

The first three lessons are taught when the child is under two years old.

Training not to taste

At ten to twelve months there is training to shut off the ability to taste. This is done (using little sniffs of ammonia) so that the child will not be able to taste sacrifices. The trigger is a little circular counterclockwise motion with a finger on the tip of the nose.

Satanic baptism

The ritual of Satanic baptism occurs when the child is between twelve and eighteen months of age. The child is starved and isolated for two to four days (depending on the size of the child). Following this, the child is bathed and anointed with fragrant oils. During the ceremony, a man in a devil suit rapes the infant, vaginally for a girl and anally for a boy. This is considered a great honor for the child.

Because the child has not given its body freely in its sexual encounters with group members (it is taken), it is still considered a virgin. When children give their bodies "freely" at age nine, they are seen as losing their virginity. All parts of all group members (other than their host alters) truly believe that this is the right thing to do.

Before baptism the child is not involved in worship services. After baptism, it is involved in all of them. It is "free to participate" in orgies. In these situations, adult participants can do anything they want to the child, unless an older child tries to protect it by taking it as its partner for the whole night. The women lick the infant's genitals and give it their breasts to suck. Usually the child is eased down on to an erect penis, and the rapist pulls out when he feels resistance. Those who have sex with upper echelon babies are all upper echelon, and know how to do this. (In orgies, everyone has sex with only their own level.)

Preparations for future indoctrinations and trainings

At around three years of age, preparation begins for the Satanic rebirth ritual. Starting at age three, the child is taken out to cemeteries, and put inside open graves or mausoleums. Dirt is thrown at the child, and it is told that it is dead. The child is taught that it is born of Beast rather than of man, that man is nothing and that Beast is everything. The child is also taught beginning magik spells.

Building foundational blocks of alters

The trainer concentrates on building one specific block of alters at a time, filling it fully. Each original block alter is split through torture,[2] usually administered to the part of the body where this alter resides. The system is built like a giant jigsaw puzzle.

After the blocks of alters are created (see below), they are trained using a combination of torture and pleasure for ceremonial and teaching purposes. Alters from different blocks work together to make events happen. Cutting the person's arms, for instance, involves somebody from Pain, somebody from Touch, somebody from Emotion, and the Gatekeeper.

Guard block

The Guard block is usually built first, when the baby is between the ages of twelve and eighteen months. The original Guard alter is tortured by burning or electroshock to the right hand to create a group of new Guard alters, in a number that is divisible by three (usually six). The new Guard alters are placed on the right hand in the reversed Kabbalah, and their representations are placed on the walls on the right and left sides of the child's box or crib, three in each color block. Their names will all be similar. Guards, usually male, are sometimes just labeled with numbers attached to the same name ("Michael#1, Michael#2", etc., M1 and M2 for short). Even though the child is too young to understand, these alters are told they are very important because it is their job to protect the body.

When these alters are older, they are trained using strength. Physical fights and beatings are used. The alters must not stop fighting their opponent no matter how badly they are hurt. Aggression is rewarded. A show of fear is punished.

This group's psychic ability is also trained. They are trained to feel others' emotions and to psychically see at long distances. The CIA started using this tactic several decades ago, calling it "remote viewing".

Language block

The next block, the language block,[3] is made between eighteen months and three years, depending on the child's linguistic facility. The language alter is split through torture to the throat, usually using plants that cause the tongue and throat to swell. Two alters are created for each language that the child will learn. They are placed in the thyroid chakra, and in the box they are placed on the wall behind the head. The language blocks alters are always given names in their mother tongues.

The block used for language is not treated as badly as other blocks that are created in this age bracket. Language is mostly taught with age dependent rewards. Younger children (1–3) are rewarded with affection and candy, older children (5–10) are rewarded with money, and young teens are rewarded with money and sex and favors such as having more honored parts in rituals or holiday celebrations. This block is trained like anyone else learning a new language. The faster an alter picks up the language, the more he or she is rewarded. Alters who are lazy or cannot learn the language are punished or replaced with ones who can learn quickly.

Touch block

The touch block is begun at eighteen months through dislocating the fingers of the left hand or making cuts in the creases between the fingers. Usually about fifteen Touch alters are created. The head Touch alter is in charge of being aware of exactly what it takes to harm someone else with a minimum of damage, and how to do such things as putting a nail through a hand or slicing a sacrifice with great care. Below this is an alter who is in charge of cutting or any kind of mutilation of the person's own body. The alters below that are in charge of setting off the triggers for harming their own body (by thought, not by actual touch). Some of this group are in charge of setting off self-harm programs in other people through those people's triggers. Names are similar to those of guards.

Demon and animal blocks

It is important to remember that not all of what is seen or believed by members of these groups is real. For instance, you know there are alters who believe they are cats or dogs or snakes or demons, although you also know they cannot possibly be real. But to the alter they are as real as you or I. Tricks, technology, and "stage magic" are used to deceive the child. These are regarded as legitimate parts of magik.

The Demon and Animal blocks are built before the age of five years from harm to both knees. Doctors are involved as consultants. The child, drugged with hallucinogens, is in an altered state.

For demon and animal alter creation, puppets are used to simulate demons. The puppets are operated from above, and some are spiked. Some are hand puppets; others are on strings and fly in the air. They come at the child, who then gets a shock. The child is strapped down and wired. Probes are used to create pain. Some demons appear to fly right through and inside the child. This is done in an empty room with white walls on which the demon pictures can be projected. Finally, the "Granddaddy of All Demons," a man or teenage boy in a costume, rapes the child. Little girls are raped anally as well as vaginally. Little boys are raped anally while the penis is manipulated, and then they are raped orally. The rapist is using a drug that maintains his erection.

This takes place during a long session, lasting through the night. More than one perpetrator is present. One operates the puppets. The trainer does all the vocalizations—making demon sounds, and giving each demon a name and a job. As many demons and animals are made as possible, from two to twelve.

After the rape, while still heavily drugged, the child is decorated with theatrical makeup and corresponding tail and horns. When he or she "comes around", the child alter is told that it is a puppy, pussycat, or snake, or a demon, gargoyle, or devil. The alter may be a demon in the shape of an animal, or just an animal. The child is shown a small "mirror" that is painted with the image of an animal or a demon, and told this is him or her.

For example, the "cats" are kept in a dark room, until their eyes become accustomed to the darkness. Objects are coated with neon paint. The children are then told that cats can see in the dark. A black light is turned on, and the objects glow in the dark, making the children believe they can see in the dark like cats do. When the child has been shown it is a demon, an image of fire is projected on to a screen hidden behind a wall of smoke. The smoke has been created by dry black ice that has a red lamp shining on it. These children are told the fire will not burn them because they are from hell. In their drugged state, they are walked through what they perceive as fire. "Snake" children are bound with gauze and plastic wrap so they cannot move their arms or legs, then are placed on the ground and told to slither like a snake.

The purpose of the demon alters is to keep the child in line and in constant fear of being grabbed and harmed by a demon. They represent actual demons, just as idols may represent deities in the Hindu faith. A total of thirteen demons are wanted, including the original one, and six animals. The job of demons is to come up during rituals and during times of potential disloyalty. If the child is about to disclose something to an outsider, a demon will come up and scare him, so as to ensure compliance. The demons are set up in a hierarchy. They are given names of actual demons. Animal alters are used for purposes consonant with that animal's nature, such as a cat for going through the bushes at night. The large animals such as dogs are also used for sexual intercourse with real animals. The child usually gets to pick their own animal names.

None of the children who are programmed to believe they have animal or demon alters are beyond the age of five years. This appears to be the best age in which to create these kinds of illusions. The group will be very careful to maintain the age of these alters. Beyond that age they would tend to question, and the illusion would be broken. If you come across a cat or dog or snake or demon when working with a client, remember that it is not likely to be more than five years old.

Painholder block

Built through pain (cramps) in the lower abdomen, the Painholder block includes three or four alters who inflict pain on the child's own body: three to six who block pain, and a smaller group of no more than three who inflict pain on others. Only one of each type of pain holder is kept in the Painholder block; the rest are shared among other blocks. For example, some might be put in with Demons, some with Guards, some with Touch, and some with Animals.

Sex block

Sex block alters are created through sexual torture. Once the splits are made and the names and jobs are given, the pleasure can begin. The child is taught to masturbate, and the trainer, guardian, and other group members masturbate the child. The child is taken for entire weekends of nothing but sexual pleasures. While sucking breasts, it is taught to enjoy being masturbated.

The number of Sex block alters depends on what echelon the child belongs to. Higher echelons (children destined for higher roles, depending on how they tested in infancy) have fewer such alters than lower ones such as simple breeders.

Little nymphomaniacs are created for prostitution. These include masochists and necrophiliacs. Some breeders are trained to become sexualized at ovulation time. Some alters are designed specifically for sex magik. There are also sexual perpetrators, including necrophiliacs, who are usually male alters even when the body is female. The masochists are also usually male. There are male-bodied breeders, used for stud.

Masochist and perpetrator alters

The perpetrator and masochist alters are trained between five and seven years of age. First, the masochists are taught to hurt themselves. Every time they hurt themselves sexually they are rewarded with treats, candies and praise. A Pain alter is brought forth to share the outside body with the Masochist alter, so that the child is not feeling the pain s/he is inflicting on his or her own body. Each time the child escalates the level of self-harm, s/he is given a bigger reward. Once the child reaches a specific level, other children his or her age are brought in to do things to that child. The perpetrator child is rewarded for hurting the masochist child, while the masochist child is rewarded for enjoying the pain. Both children have pain-holder alters co-present with the sex alters. Those of the perpetrator child hold the empathic, vicarious pain.

At a certain level of tolerance and enjoyment, masochistic alters are brought forth to abuse themselves on the altar to show their abilities. This is done in an official ceremony. The alter is praised by the whole group. Then the Grand Master or person in charge of the service is allowed to hurt the child sexually while the child enjoys it. This is usually accomplished via the vicious anal rape and biting of the penis for a boy, anal and vaginal rape for a girl.

The child is given sexual stimulant drugs during the orgies, and the sexual perpetrator alters are deliberately brought out. They see people having intensely pleasurable sexual experiences while harming or being harmed. They are allowed to go around and feel anyone's bodily parts. Masochistic alters are also trained during orgies. They are given pain-killing drugs, almost to the point of nerve blocks, so that the masochist feels as little as is physically possible until the physical stimulation (pain) reaches a certain level of intensity. These alters learn to need pain in order to achieve release, and experience it as pleasure.

Training to kill

The big ceremony for the perpetrator alter involves killing. The sexual perpetrator alters are also the killers. When these alters are first created some of them are put in the section with the Sacrifice alters. Prior to the ceremony, the alter has been taught not only to harm a masochistic child, but also to harm small animals, usually their own pets (such as kittens). They are allowed to have a pet for about two weeks, then have to kill it. Before killing, they have to sexually mutilate it. Ultimately, they are bonded for three to six months with a "disposable" child (an unregistered birth), whom they have to sexually mutilate and then kill.

Necrophiliac alters

The necrophiliac alters are taught with cadavers. A Sacrifice alter is brought out with them. They learn to slice a certain muscle in the male cadaver's abdomen, which can then be tugged to cause an erection. Then they mount the cadaver and have intercourse. The first time, the child has been sexually stimulated almost to orgasm before being put with the body. Oil of Wintergreen has been administered to the genitals, which then feel too hot, so the cold cadaver feels soothing. At age eleven or twelve, a necrophiliac alter is thrilled by intercourse with a cadaver; it is an honor. Earlier, they do not like it much because it is cold, but the child is praised a lot for this kind of performance, and by eleven or twelve vaginal secretions take the chill off for a girl.

Sacrificial block

The Sacrificial block of alters is created between five and seven years of age using torture to the solar plexus. Alters in this group are trained to do killing, cutting, and skilled dissection.

Alters of the Sacrificial block spend most of the time being tortured. They are put in a pit, starved, beaten, and taunted with little bits of food hanging down out of reach, having only rats or putrid things thrown in for them to eat. This makes them full of rage. However, the goal is for them to be trained to feel less. Rewards are given for showing little or no emotion. The more they can endure without emotion, the more they are rewarded. These are the alters who endure the worst kinds of torture. These alters will be put in small holes with rats, or in graves. These must kill their beloved pets or siblings.[4] By the "age of giving" (nine) they will already know how to skin and dismember an animal or fetus. No weakness will be tolerated in this block of alters. Any sacrificial block alter who shows one sign of compassion will be tortured for long periods of time, or "destroyed" (taken to the point of unconsciousness or temporary death, and never revived).

Re-activators, doubles, and garbage kids

Re-activators are alters created specifically to retrain a wayward alter who has forgotten his or her training or chooses not to do it. Doubles are simply "backup" alters, to be used while the original alter is being retrained. If the alter cannot be retrained, the double will stand in its place and do its job permanently, while the original alter is discarded. (Often if an alter "changes sides" in therapy, its double will appear to do the job it used to do.)

There is a dump—a garbage bin is a place in the mind, similar to a prison—for discarded or untrainable alters, called "garbage kids." Garbage kids are alters that would not comply in training, or could not learn quickly enough. The trainer either takes them to death point (via drugs or severe electric shock) and "kills" them (stops the heart briefly), or simply never calls them out again. The rest of the system may believe these alters are dead, or at least that they are not as good as the others and not worthy to be alive. Once in the dump, they never leave.

When trying to take apart any lesson, it is important to include any garbage alters (as well as doubles) who were present, or the lesson will simply be re-activated or regenerated.

Satanic rebirth ceremony

The alter that will head the inside world is created during the rebirthing ceremony. This takes place around the time the child is six. Children are prepared for the ceremony by learning chants and prayers. They are taught to crawl through a hole that has been cut in a piece of wood and fitted with a piece of tight flexible rubber. They are not told what they will crawl through for the ceremony. It will be the decomposing carcass of a cow, large goat, or sheep. These children are taught that they cannot enter the kingdom of darkness unless they are born of blood and beast. This is similar to, but a reversal of, the Christian belief that only those born of water and the holy spirit can enter the kingdom of heaven.

The child is drugged and placed naked inside the carcass. He or she is sewn into the body. Upon awakening the child becomes terrified and thrashes around. The hand of the deliverer is inserted and the child is brought through the opening in the animal. In the meantime, the child, used to splitting when frightened, has formed a new split. This child alter will usually be given a demonic name by the deliverer, who tells the alter that she or he is in charge of all the others. This new alter will control all alters of the cult side. The others will learn to fear and obey him or her.

If an already existing alter emerges during the rebirthing, it becomes the new leader. If that alter is strong enough to take the rebirthing without leaving the body, it is strong enough to lead the entire system, so it deserves the position.

Training from ages six to eight

Suicide training

Suicide is taught after the rebirth and is attached to Loyalty programming. Once children are old enough to understand the concept of death, they are told that if they are found out by anyone outside the group, they simply must die. This is why so many survivors who have never before attempted suicide begin these attempts once they get into therapy. This is also why so many kids in foster homes attempt to kill themselves or run away. For these people, suicide is not from "low self esteem," but because they have been told that the outside world is not as perfect as they are, so they must not allow themselves to be defiled by the filth of the outsiders. This viewpoint is similar to white supremacist beliefs. It is also important to remember that several alters have to be involved via a spin before an attempt will be successful (see the section on Spinning).

The group will only allow the system to successfully suicide if an "outsider" (such as a therapist) has been allowed to come too close to the core, or to tamper with a lesson that they should not have opened. The Kabbalah-trained alter will have many of these lessons throughout each important path. The system will also be allowed to die if the person, along with an outsider, reaches the angel at the end of a path, or if they tamper with the path. This is known as a booby trap. This will be discussed in the later section on walking the Kabbalah pathways.

Sexual training

During this time the child's sexual alters continue being taught how to sexually please adults, as well as themselves. The child is greatly rewarded for this by adults and other children, with praise, treats, and sexual pleasures.

Training regarding urine

Children are trained to hold urine for long periods of time, as it has been found that a full bladder actually aids in sexual arousal. Also, blood is mixed with urine, ashes, and wine for a Black Mass. The child whose urine is used is rewarded. During orgies, often a child will be asked to urinate on someone with that fetish, as a sexual stimulant.

Preparation for marriage to Satan

At age eight, the children begin preparation for when they will be given as brides and consorts of Satan. The head alter of the inside cult world will select the alter to become the bride. This alter is taught special prayers and chants in the chosen language, as well as spells in sex magik. Those children who are still physically too small to receive a full size penis comfortably will receive more physical preparation. Most of the ones who are not large enough are members of the second or third circle, who came in at an older age.

Marriage to Satan

Children are given as brides and consorts of Satan when they are nine years old. They take vows to Satan to love and obey Him, to give themselves to him freely in body and soul. This is the first time they "officially" lose their virginity. They are prepared physically by their trainer. They are bathed in special oils. They are taught prayers and chants. They are painted head to toe with colors signifying their rank and circle. The alter that will become a priestess or breeder is called forward. She is dressed in white and drugged with pain killers and hallucinogens. She is then walked to center circle where she takes part in a Black Mass. During the offertory part of the service the children are called forward and raped either by a member of the congregation dressed in a costume of Lucifer, or by the Grand Master or High priest, who uses a phallus with sharp spikes sticking out. After the service these children will become permanent parts of the circle.

Reaching "maturity"

Between eleven and thirteen, the female child will conceive for the first time. The firstborn male child is killed in a sacrificial manner during its first weeks of life. Simply put, this is what Lucifer demands. The belief is that the energy of the child's life force is given to those who encircle it.

At thirteen the child becomes an adult, and has something similar to the Jewish rite of passage for that age, the Bar or Bat Mitzvah. The cult version is celebrated with the child's first orgy, that is, the first one in which he or she freely participates as an adult. The adult gets to choose his or her partners instead of being taken by anyone, gets the say in what is done, and is given as much pleasure, without pain, as possible.

Beginning of Kabbalah training

After the sacrament of marriage to Satan, the children begin training on the Kabbalah. The Jewish Kabbalah, or "tree of life," is a structure like a tree, with pathways representing different aspects of sacred mysticism. It also represents the shape of the human body. The occult reversed Kabbalah groups use literal pathways and harm the literal body of the child. The Kabbalah, which was initially presented to the baby on his or her own body, is now represented in the training center both in that way and by pathways along which the child must walk. Most paths contain thirteen doors. Each path has a guardian at the opening and a black angel at the end. Doors on the first path always contain the first symbols of the major triggers of obedience, such as roses, sounds, smells, words, or music. The path is set up such that one door is the trigger, one door is a punishment, and one door is a pleasure. You may get two pleasures, one pain, and three triggers, or the other way around. The Trainer sets up the path according to a set law, but to the victim it appears to be completely random.

Twisted shapes of the alphabet as well as magikal symbols are used as a code of trail markers, and to bring forth specific lessons and alters. Different places in the body contain different lessons and codes. Only the Highest Jobs (high priest or priestess) will ever reach the head of the body, or be one with Lucifer.

Kabbalah levels and lessons

In each lesson of the Kabbalah, there is magik. Each spell accompanies a very important lesson. In therapy, it is important to remember the magik and the spell-work that go along with each path. Leaving this out would be the same as removing only part of a cancerous tumor. It would eventually grow back and spread throughout the entire system.

The bottom part of the body of the Kabbalah is for the Third and lower Second Circle. The mid section is for the higher Second and lower First Circle. The upper section, excluding the head, is for the rest of the First Circle.

The head is only for those who will become High Priest and Priestess, Grand Masters, or above. These children learn different lessons. They have to endure more physical and mental hardship and perfect their knowledge of secret languages. In the upper part of the Kabbalah, the child is taught a higher form of black magik and demon spell work, with the blackest magik, including the use of the Lords of Demons, being in the head region. The lower groups see this, but they are not taught how to do it.

It is here that the child will be broken, if possible. Only the strongest survive this level, and it is they who will become the leaders. The amount of abuse they must withstand is phenomenal. These children are the physically strongest and have the best coping skills. However, attaining this level has nothing to do with whether they are any more prepared or willing to do evil than anyone else. I was chosen, but I never liked doing evil. I often said no. The fact that I would stand up to them showed my strengths but also increased my chances for death.

Those who become members of the hierarchy are rarely so damaged that they cannot function in a very successful career. It is rare that they end up in therapy, unless they do so for other reasons. They also rarely have any visible marks on their bodies, and rarely ever physically injure themselves. They are, therefore, more likely to be invisible in society.

Most people will have finished their level of the Kabbalah by the time they are sixteen years old.

The Kabbalah pathways

People being trained in the Satanic Kabbalah travel down the paths of the Kabbalah. All paths consist of thirteen doors. Each door has a symbol and a letter on it. In each room there is another symbol. The lower paths have no magik; the higher paths have more, plus sacred languages. Without exception, every door divisible by three will contain torture of some kind. The last door (13) contains an angel who is a booby trap.

Example of a path

This is an example of a mid path, moving up from knees to waist, used in training a young teenager:

Room 1: The symbol is A for Alef, or the Hebrew A, which is a symbol that means return. In the room is a single yellow rose. The word "Return" is played over and over.

Room 2: B for Bet. In the room is a man with a candle. You enter the room, and the man burns your hand with the candle while a prayer of dedication is being recited.
Room 3: G (Gimel). Two people hold you down and rape you, using excessively large phalluses. You will recite the sex magik spell.
Room 4: Delet. You see red, yellow and white roses. The word "traitor" is recited.
Room 5: Heh. In blackness, the only thing heard is a series of tones. In each tone is a subliminal command. It could mean anything from "Be there Friday night" to "Kill John Doe".
Room 6: Vav is a room of terror. It is usually pitch black, and you stand in the middle while things poke you and prod you and burn you and shock you for no apparent reason at all.
Room 7: Zayin contains an altar with a fetus on it. You have to dissect it or you will be beaten.
Room 8: Khet contains a chair. It is a place of refuge and rest.
Room 9: Tet is an electrode placed in the mouth with the word "silence" repeated.
Room 10: Yod is a demon triangle, the meeting with the demon master, and a spell.
Room 11: Kaf. Color and tone, with word "comply."
Room 12: Lamed. The person is strapped down, raped, and beaten, while the words "love and respect" are played over and over.
Room 13: Mem. A spell is cast for power, and it is the setting for the Angel of the sunset.

Angels and booby traps

Each path has set booby traps that will be set off if the person tries to break the code. Not all doors contain booby traps that are designed to kill, and neither do all pathways. Only the paths divisible by three are trapped to kill. However, other traps may cause such things as a crash in the system (which in turn will cause a total loss of memory), or fabrication of wild stories in order to make the person appear insane. One of the worst traps, beside suicide, causes the person to become completely catatonic and perhaps remain so indefinitely.

One booby trap is an overwhelming feeling of guilt and depression that causes the person to shut down emotionally or to kill him- or herself. Other booby traps cause such unbearable feelings that the person gets trapped in the emotion, or door, and cannot find their way back.

The angel[5] at the end of the path is a guard. If a survivor is trying to reverse the Kabbalah, and gets to the angel at the end of the path (in memory recovery or in therapy), it means she or he has gotten too close to the core. This will set off a trap of death by suicide or accident. The survivor who runs from the angel can avert the trap going off. However, the angel is enticing, and will call the survivor in. This angel is so compelling because s/he is so beautiful and peaceful, and s/he causes alters in the path to feel as if s/he is the only one who can take away their pain.

The memories that can cause these pain and depression booby traps are of the deepest kind. They include the death of a loved one, such as a brother, sister, or friend, or the death of a pet, especially by the person's own hand, or memories of abandonment, including being told they are unlovable, even by God. The children have been told, "No one wants you, you are worthless, no one can save you." Then the angel comes, and claims to be the only one who can stop their pain because s/he is the only one who loves them. This is so consoling that they want to go with the angel. The angel will help them stop the pain, but they must commit suicide, or die of a broken heart. This is very important. It is a double-bind, with no escape from fatal consequences. As hard as it is to resist the angel—and it is very hard—if the survivor does not, he or she will die, in one way or the other, within forty-eight hours.

Breeders, fertility training, and use of babies

Breeders are girls and women whose function in the cult is to give birth to babies for cult use. They are trained using rape and sexual torture to show sexual pleasure but feel none. A breeder who feels for the fetus she aborts is no good to the group. The fetus must have no more meaning to her than an ordinary menstrual period.

The young breeder, before she begins her period, is raped on a daily basis. If she does not show pleasure to her partner, she is beaten. She is given hormones beginning at age nine to make her periods begin early and to make her gain weight. The weight is to hide pregnancy. For the first year, her periods are monitored very carefully, so the trainer knows when ovulation takes place. Around the time of ovulation, the girl is given drugs to sexualize her. This continues for a year. After that, if the girl demonstrates she is sexualized when she ovulates, the drugs are stopped; if she does not, the drugs continue until she is sexualized at ovulation. For some, this can take as much as three years. The girl's first few abortions are done with the use of drugs, so that she does not feel the procedure. As time goes on, less and less medication is used, until she needs none at all to abort. If the pregnancy is beyond twenty weeks, the girl is given ergotamine for several days to make her abort naturally. As time goes on some of these girls can actually abort at will. It just takes visualization for a day or two to begin contractions. A natural abortion is prized more highly than one done with instruments.

A girl who is destined to be High Priestess is also trained to become sexualized at ovulation. This is to ensure that her children are fathered by a High Priest or her mate. The fetus of a High Priestess is prized more highly than any other. Impregnation during ovulation helps to time a pregnancy so that the abortion falls on a Holy day, such as Imbloc.

It is considered that sixteen to twenty-three years of age is the best time for breeding, and that the infants that result will be of better quality. These babies are rarely killed. They might either be raised by the group to be future leaders, sold for large profits to other groups, or put on the baby black market. Most often, the firstborn healthy child is adopted by a member of the group residing in a different part of the country, or another country altogether, to be used as a pawn that will help control the mother later in life.

Internal calendars and dates

Internal calendars are used for special events such as birthdays, recall dates, and other such special events.[6] These are usually learned by alters in a normal everyday way, just as you would teach any child its birthday, or what day Christmas falls on. The outside person ("host" or ANP) does not know that cult holidays are significant.

Children in Luciferian cults are taught that in the Millennium (the year 2012) Lucifer is supposed to return. The teachings that these people have received say this: We will all be called to account. Don't forget we owe our souls, so if you have been a good little Satanist, you will be rewarded; if not, you will be punished for eternity.

Satanist and Luciferian Groups celebrate both Christian and pagan holidays. Although many of these holidays correspond to the traditional pagan holidays the witches, druids, or Wiccans celebrate, you should not confuse these groups with Satanists. Traditional Pagans do not worship Satan, as they do not have such a deity in their belief systems; "Satan" is strictly a Judeo-Christian manifestation. The fact that Satanists also celebrate Christian holidays does not make Christians Satanists.

Rewards used in training

In Satanic Kabbalah, the rewards given for compliance depend on what the individual responds to. Some want money, others sex, and all want power. Those in the situation do not even consider other rewards, such as having loving relationships, since these are not possible. They know what they will be rewarded for or what they will be punished for. So much of Satanic Kabbalah has to do with "double binds"—putting people in the position of having to choose the lesser of two evils. Pain or less pain? Power is preferable because it means being hurt less often and less severely. (Of course, the alter who lives in the "real world" is unaware of all this.) The highest levels of the Kabbalah contain the most rewards, balancing out the torture.

The rewards of ordinary life can seem very mild compared to those given in the cult. But I know the value of what I now have: freedom of body and soul. I am no longer a trapped soul; that is worth it.

We shall hear from Stella at other points in the book regarding her own experiences both in childhood and in recovery. Her documentation of the training given to children from the perspective of the abuser group, in particular the training center, is very valuable for our understanding, as no one but an adult perpetrator is able to give us the information regarding what is done to infants. Many survivors' accounts, from many different locations, reflect the kind of experiences that Stella describes here, although they often do not know the purpose of those experiences. It is similar with the experiences of ritual abuse and mind control described in Chapters Five and Six. Many specific details and themes are constants, even though the survivors were abused by different and unrelated groups in different places. The selections from survivors in this book should be seen as not just the experiences of one or two, but as representative of many, voiced by these brave and articulate people.

The contents of this chapter in particular illustrate why therapists MUST be careful to do things in a particular order, rather than just responding to whatever their clients present at any given time.

Notes

1. Editor's note: Nine is a bit older than we have been taught to believe as the upper limit at which DID can be created.

2. Editor's note: The torture and training described in this section is gruesome, so reader beware.
3. Editor's note: Occult groups use various magikal languages, such as Enochian or Latin, in their rituals, and members have alters who are trained specifically to use these languages.
4. These memories, as well as those of perpetrating, often come up as soon as the client makes significant disclosures to a therapist. They are part of the "booby traps" to induce suicide attempts if security is breached.
5. Editor's note: In the angel booby traps, an alter has the job of making those who try to work through a memory feel that the angel is present in the here-and-now, and invites them to join the angel by suicide.
6. In addition to Appendix 2, a Satanic calendar authored by Stella Katz, a more detailed calendar for each year with holidays for a number of different groups can be found on the Survivorship website.

CHAPTER EIGHT

The programming: indoctrination, lies, and tricks

It is widely known that mind control is produced through a combination of hypnotic suggestion, torture, threats, and double binds. But the most important thing for you—and your client—to know is that the mind control created in children, whether by cults, military or government groups, or organized criminal groups which use children as sexual slaves, is based on carefully designed and meticulously executed deceptions.

Abusers create false beliefs by setting up certain scenarios, using trickery (stage magic and illusions), reinforced by the effects of drugs, and, when it might be helpful, torture. You will see further elaboration of this process in Chapters Nine through Fourteen; this chapter summarizes some of the most common lies told by these abusers, the purpose of each, and the methods abusers use to make children believe them.

The most crucial lies are those that create lifelong obedience and loyalty in the survivor and those that maintain the secrecy and security of the perpetrator group. Other lies are told to get alters to do their "jobs."

In my experience with these survivors, I have found that there are many lies and tricks that might be called "standard." (Some "deprogrammers", such as Steve Oglevie, say that they can recognize the abusive group by the way the personality system is structured and then know what specific deceptions are practiced by that particular group.) Spontaneous DIDs do not appear to share such commonalities.

Alters who are split off at different ages are told lies that are effective for the ages at which they were trained and stopped maturing. So, for instance, four-year-olds will be told about the "magik" powers of the perpetrators, and will see these demonstrated; eleven-year-olds may be told about the extensive power of the perpetrator group to infiltrate every organization, spy on everyone, and use sophisticated technology which has not yet been released to the general public. Both these lies serve the purpose of causing the child/survivor to believe there is no way to escape the perpetrator group. An adult survivor may have many different alters, each of whom believes the lies they were told at the ages when they were trained.

The fact that there are alters who live most of their daily lives and function socially in the outside world, alters who often do not know of the beliefs, training, or even the existence of the other alters, allows for the lies and tricks to be effective.

It is interesting to observe how many of the themes found in the primary lies told by the mind controllers are devoted to reinforcing the basics of the belief systems of dangerous cults as listed by Bonewits (see Chapter Two). These include the leaders' wisdom and knowledge, the leaders' power and control, the correctness of the belief system of the group, the need for sexual submission to whomever the group designates, the importance of censoring communications with the outside world and of isolation, the wrongness and danger of leaving the group, the rightness of violence, the dangers of the outside world, the importance of surrendering the will, and the importance of appearing "normal" and maintaining a double life.

Lies about the abusers' correctness, superiority, and wisdom

- Children are told that the way of the abuser group (worshipping Satan or Lucifer, or the Third Reich, or the white American way of life, etc.) is the only right way and its leader or deity deserves obedience and loyalty.
- Children are told that they can trust the abusers because the abusers are their "family," but they cannot trust anyone else. Only this cult defined "family" cares about the children.
- Children are told that the group performs these abuses for the child's own good (rape confers forgiveness; torture or being forced to harm or kill someone else makes a person strong).

Methods of indoctrination

How are these lies conveyed? Intense, abusive religious or military indoctrination forces mind-controlled child alters to adopt the belief system of the abusers. These beliefs are hammered into the child's mind over and over, through religious ceremonies, military drills, songs and chants and rhymes, severe punishments, and rewards for compliance or memorizing the correct beliefs. At night or during breaks from real school, cult children attend "cult school." Children are coerced into making vows of loyalty and signing official documents, sometimes in blood.

Lies to induce obedience to the abusers

- Children or alters are told they are "good" if they obey the abusers and "bad" if they disobey.
- Children are told that they have to remain loyal and obedient to the abusers, because they made vows or promises of loyalty.
- Child victims or trainees are told that they are robots, or computers, or sex machines, or killing machines, not persons. Or that they have robots inside who control their minds and bodies.

- Children are told that someone who fights back against the abusers is a traitor and should and will be punished. (Such alters become discarded "garbage kids.")
- Children are told that all "inside people" were created only to do the jobs assigned to them by their abusers, and if they do not do these jobs they will have no purpose and will no longer exist.
- Children are told that all "inside people" must stay in their "places" in the inner world or structure.
- Child victims or trainees are made to believe that they are soldiers whose duty is to obey without thinking. Thinking for oneself is viewed as wrong.

Methods of indoctrination

Children being taught that they are killing machines or sex machines or robots are put in positions where they lack control over their own bodies, which are made to perform the desired actions even against the children's will.

To make alters believe they are soldiers, abusers dress the children up in uniforms, and uniformed adults who call themselves generals or commanders or captains use their power, their size, and their loud voices to frighten the children and make them obey. The children are forced to engage in training just like adult soldiers. The "generals" make them watch movies of soldiers marching or fighting. They talk about pride in fighting for their glorious cause, and dying for it. They give fake promotions. They shout at the children and tell them to obey and not think for themselves. Children who cry, vomit, show fear or sadness, or show compassion for others who are being hurt, are punished.

Lies that create loyalty to the abusers

- Children are told that a disloyal group member is a traitor and deserves punishment by rape or torture or death.
- Children are told that the abusers can kill the child or take him/her away at any time and no outsider can stop it happening, because the group has infinite power.
- Children are told that if they disobey the group, someone they love or another vulnerable child will be punished or will die.
- The alters whom the abusers put in charge of the other parts are told that they must always make the other parts obey, and punish them if they disobey, or the abusers will find them and punish them severely.
- Children are told that if they do as they are told, they will rise to be the highest members of the coven or to be generals in the army.

Methods of indoctrination

Children being shaped to these beliefs are punished for minor infractions. They are also rewarded (by drugs, sex, or being allowed to harm someone else instead of being harmed) for compliance. They are given "promotions" in the cult or the military organization, with stripes or rings or some kind of token of the increased status.

Each child is usually put through a scenario in which he or she watches an alleged "traitor" being tortured or apparently killed, and is told this will happen to him if he is a traitor. He is given a sample of what this feels like, such as being stretched on a rack, or severely electroshocked.

Lies about the abusers' power and knowledge

Children are told that:

- The walls have ears (taught to a young child in a room with plastic "ears" glued to the walls. The abusers said the ears would always be there in any room but will not be visible.)
- The all-seeing Eye always sees you even when you cannot see it (taught with a plastic eyeball in a glass case, or even an actual eyeball from a dead creature).
- The stuffed animals (some given to the child by the perpetrators) report on the child to the perpetrators.
- The abuser group are always hiding in the shadows or in the walls (taught through an actual experience where this was the case). (You may note that not all tricks require the same level of detail, depending on their context.)
- Mothers have eyes in the back of their heads.
- The crows or the spiders or some other common creatures report to the abuser group.
- "Satan's eyes" are always watching (simulated with flashlights in the dark).
- There is a microchip implanted in the survivor's body that tells the abusers where s/he is and/or what s/he is thinking.
- There is a device implanted inside the victim's head that sees and hears everything and reports it to the abusers.
- The abusers have sophisticated state-of-the-art technology to listen to the survivor's phone conversations and read his/her emails and see where s/he is at all times.
- The abusers know things and do things by means of real magik.
- The abusers always know if someone is lying, so the child must always tell the truth to them.
- Everyone the survivor knows is linked to the abuser group and knows his or her every move, and will report back to your abusers.

Methods of indoctrination

Mind controllers want and need their victims to believe they are all-powerful, all-seeing, all-knowing, and able to appear at any moment to punish disloyalty. These lies are basic to the "access programming" we shall discuss later, as well as the "silence programming" which prevents survivors from disclosing their abuse.

The most basic lie is that the perpetrators always know where the survivor is and what he or she does, says, or thinks. To prove this, they commonly use their deity or deities, "God" or "Satan" or "Lucifer." Those of us who attended church or Sunday school will recall being taught that God is omnipotent, omniscient, and omni-present. There is nothing like an invisible, omnipotent watcher to make children behave in the desired manner when no one is really supervising them. This is especially effective if that deity has already been simulated by a costumed person who punished the child for disobedience with rape or torture.

Punishment and trickery are used to convince the child of these lies. A situation is created in which the child is likely to hide, to talk to someone about the abuse, or to disobey. A hidden microphone or a one-way mirror permits the group to see or hear what the child is doing or saying. The group punishes the child for what s/he did or said when the child thought s/he was alone or hidden. Some of the details of the tricks are in the examples given above.

Lies used to keep the survivor in contact with the abuser group

Abusers must make sure that the survivors do not begin disclosing the abuse once they grow up and leave the area. In addition, some groups want to continue to use some survivors. For instance, ritualistic cults expect the children they abuse to become adult cult members who will transmit the group's values and practices to the next generation (Stella Katz, the author of Chapter Seven, was such a member.) Military/political groups continue to use some adult survivors of their training as spies, assassins, or drug couriers. While they "close down" the programming of some survivors, as they did with Trish Fotheringham, they keep others in active use. Child prostitution and pornography groups probably allow survivors to leave when they reach adulthood, unless they are also involved in the adult versions of the same things.

There are many lies designed to keep the trainees or group members involved. "Return" programs are based on lies that invoke the necessity of returning at specified intervals or for specified events. "Come when called" programs involve the necessity of responding to call-backs by perpetrators. "Report" programs address the problem of members giving away secrets by forcing those who have done so to return to or contact the group of their own volition. Particular groups of alters are given each of these types of training. In Chapter Eleven, "'Stabilization' takes on a new meaning", we will look in more detail at how these beliefs are induced, and what to do about them.

Lies to ensure the survivor returns to the abusers (return programs)

- Children are told that if they go to the abusers when they are supposed to, they will not get punished, but will get a special treat.
- Children are told that if they do not return to the abusers on birthdays and other special dates, they will be hunted down and punished severely.
- Children are told that if they do not return to the abusers on birthdays and other special dates, the group will hurt someone else.

Methods of indoctrination

These lies about what the survivor can expect to happen throughout their lives are all established through tricks that happen in the person's childhood. In one scenario, children are unable to attend an event on time, and are then taken to the event and forced to watch someone else being punished on their behalf. In another setup, one child is told that he or she is the only person that can save another child from being hurt, but is prevented from arriving in time to do so. Other setups involve rewards for coming on time.

Lies to ensure current contact (come when called programs)

- Children are taught that they always have to answer the phone, or something bad will happen.
- They are taught that even on the phone, alters have to come out if they are asked for.
- They are taught that they always have to answer the door and open it, even if they do not want to see the person who comes to the door.

Methods of indoctrination

Children are trained to accept the false belief that they must always be available to their abusers—that is, they must respond to their abusers and come when called. These lies result in programmed, immediate responses. They are reinforced with such things as painful electric shocks until a child picks up the phone, and doors kicked down by violent abusers. Children are also deliberately given opportunities to run away, only to be caught and violently punished repeatedly while they are given the message that they cannot run. (See Chapter Eleven for details.)

Lies to ensure the survivor reports any disclosures or relocations (report programs)

Mind control survivors learn the false belief that the abusers always know where they are and what they have said and done, and will hunt them down and punish them severely for disloyalty. One or more alters are taught that they must report to the abusers any time the child disobeys or discloses secrets. These "Reporter alters" are also told to report any relocations, so that the abusers always know where they are. The paradox of this situation is that the alters who report to the abusers do so because they believe the abusers know everything and will punish them if they do not report, while the secret reporting and its consequences provide evidence to the rest of the system that the abusers know everything.

Methods of indoctrination

The alters who do this job are created when children are forced to watch other children being tortured until they disclose to the perpetrators something they have said to outsiders. Then they are put in a position to receive a milder version of the same torture, accompanied by a warning about what will happen if they do not tell the group what other alters have told outsiders.

Reporter alters are tested and trained; they have backups. It is important to the abusers that the rest of the survivor's personality system does not know about the reporters, so they will all continue to believe in the magic or technology which enables the perpetrators to know everything, so survivors can never escape or be free.

Lies about the child being evil

- The children are told that they are evil and are perpetrators rather than victims, just like the abusers.
- The children are told that God hates them and will punish them because of the evil they have done.
- The children are told that they are children of the devil and belong only to the coven and to the devil.
- The children are told that they are going to hell, and their only choice is whether they will be hurt there or will hurt others.
- The children are told they have special powers that can at any time destroy people's lives.
- The children are told that they will harm anyone who gets close to him or her.

Methods of indoctrination

Mind controlling abusers isolate survivors from the rest of humanity through forcing children (and adult survivors) to perpetrate various abuses. In ritually abusive groups, this means taking part in animal sacrifices and in real and simulated human sacrifices. Initially the child's hand, holding a knife, is forced by the hand of an adult to stab the victim. Once the child realizes he or she cannot resist, an alter is split off who will do the stabbing without being physically forced. The child is similarly assisted to participate in rapes. For a girl, this is done with objects. Military/political groups train their little assassins using standard military indoctrination and training, praising children for being skilled "soldiers." However, these children are generally tortured to produce these alters, who are then forced to commit acts of extreme cruelty. We can see this kind of training in the Ugandan "Lord's Resistance Army," known to engage in both ritual abuse and mind control, though these terms are not always used in news reports.

Persons who steadfastly refuse to perpetrate are subjected to scenarios wherein others harm someone or kill an animal, and the person is told it is their fault. A child might also be told that she or he has the capacity to kill someone psychically, followed by a simulation of this killing. This forced perpetration, real or simulated, is immediately followed by teaching about how evil the child or group member is and how no one else will ever want him or her. Sometimes the message is heightened when scenarios are enacted in which costumed actors pretend to be God or Jesus and either abuse or reject the child.

A child may also be convinced that something evil is put inside him or her. In "brain transplants," the brain of an abuser or of a despised animal, such as a rat, is supposedly put into the child. A child who is made to believe she or he has a "black heart" sees an animal heart and then feels a pain in her chest while it is supposedly inserted. Alters are told that they are demons or monsters or aliens, and other alters are created as internal copies of an abuser whose "seed" has been implanted by means of a rape.

Lies to isolate the survivor from the outside world and prevent disclosures

Like all dangerous cults, these groups teach the persons they indoctrinate that they are only safe within the confines of the group, and being involved with any people in the outside world will harm either them or those they get to know. Because the primary victims are children, these lies have enormous effects on the children's development, and lay the groundwork for dissociative disorders as well as attachment disorders. This group of lies includes both general ones about not trusting or attaching to people, and specific ones targeted at such people as therapists, police officers, and medical professionals. Children's beliefs that they are perpetrators rather than victims also adds to their isolation.

Lies that destroy children's ability to attach to other people

- Children are told that they can never trust anyone who is not part of the family or the abuser group.
- Children are told that people they know and like or love will always leave and will end up hating them.
- Children are told that anyone they tell about the abuse, as well as their families, will be hurt or killed.
- Children are told that if they get attached to people, something bad will happen to those people.

Methods of indoctrination

You will notice how the victims' altruism is used against them. As with all the mind-controlling lies, scenarios are set up to "prove" the "truth" of these statements. For instance, a young child is asked to choose between two groups of people, one group wearing hooded black robes, the other group wearing ordinary clothes. Naturally, she chooses the people in ordinary clothes, and they attack and abuse her. She is put back in the choice situation, and chooses the robed cult members; they welcome her lovingly. Now, this child alter will bring on fear inside the adult survivor if she begins to develop friendships with regular people.

A worse scenario occurs, in which a child is paired with a "disposable" child, is allowed to become her friend, and then is forced to participate in the real or simulated murder of that child. Even worse is one in which a child is forced to participate in what she believes was the killing of the only woman she trusts (or, more likely, someone impersonating that woman). The woman then rises up and sexually assaults the child, telling the little girl that she, the child, is responsible for making the woman evil, because when you die you become evil.

Though not consciously remembered, this indoctrination into an "upside down" system of reality prevents the child (and later, the adult survivor) from breaking free from the group and developing real friendships with outsiders.

Lies to prevent disclosures to professionals

- Children are told that if they show physical evidence or tell the story of their abuse to any professional, that person will not believe them and will lock them up in a mental hospital, where they will be drugged and abused.
- Children are told that any therapist they talk to will sexually abuse them.
- Children are told that if they disclose to law enforcement professionals, they will be arrested, charged with crimes such as murder and rape, and put in prison where they will be abused by guards or inmates.
- Children are told that if they tell anyone about the abuse, a bomb will go off inside their body, or an animal such as a rat or a snake will eat them up from inside.

Methods of indoctrination

These perpetrators pay special attention to disrupting their victims' potential relationships with therapists, doctors, and police officers. Members of ritually abusive cults have almost all been invited to talk about the abuse by people posing as these professionals, only to then be sexually abused by them. Stage "psychiatrists" or "psychologists" will tell children they are crazy for talking about such things, lock them up in restraints in a "mental hospital" or "loony bin," and administer strong drugs which make them feel ill and unable to think. The children may also be assaulted by the "inmates" in the loony bin or mental hospital. The "police" either beat and rape these children themselves, or put them in "prison" where inmates claiming to be killers or rapists do so.

Another technique to keep survivors from talking is the staging of simulated operations. For example, a four-year-old child is put on a stretcher or table and prepared for surgery. The child is told that the abusers are putting a bomb inside her or his stomach, and if he or she talks about what has been done, the bomb will go off. The child blacks out, comes to, and is shown the bandages and an X-Ray of the supposed bomb inside his or her belly. Later, this alter's fear will be enough to prevent the adult from speaking out even if there are recalled memories to talk about.

I have encountered this "bomb" with sufficient frequency among my clients that I have begun to joke about it with some of them. I say something like, "Oh, that old X-Ray again. It must be starting to wear out by now. I think they use it on all the kids. I wonder whose stomach it was really in the time they took the picture." The client, who has told me in hushed tones about the bomb, looks at me in amazement, but begins to feel some reassurance because she realizes that I know about this, and it is a trick. (A macabre sense of humor may be a requirement for this work. When survivor clients demonstrate this kind of humor, it indicates perspective, and I know they are really recovering.)

In other versions of this technique, military/political mind controllers claim to implant small devices that will record everything the child thinks or says and transmit it to the abusers, and/or to explode when the abusers become aware that the survivor has "talked;" ritualistic cults insert snakes or rats in a small child's vagina or anus, declaring that if he or she talks, the creature will devour him or her from inside. They then switch the child to another alter, who is told he or she has "given birth" to this creature because s/he is so evil.

Remember that the alters on whom these deceptions are perpetrated are deliberately maintained at the ages at which they believe such things and accept the "proof" of them provided by their abusers. If a survivor attempts to find out what happened to him or her, the fear coming from these young alters will flood the person, no matter what their actual age.

Lies to induce suicide

- Children are told that it is honorable to die for the cause of the abusers (common with "soldiers" or religious alters).
- Children are told that since the group knows what survivors have said and done, traitors must kill themselves quickly before the group finds them and kills them slowly and painfully. (Note the theme of double binds.)
- Children are told that their lives will always be so unbearable that it is better to die.
- Certain alters are told that if they kill the body when it is traitorous, they will be rewarded in the afterlife. (This is similar to the belief of extreme Islamic suicide bombers.)
- Demon or alien or ghost alters are told that they can kill the body without themselves dying, or that their special powers will bring them back to life.

Methods of indoctrination

One of the ways that organized abusive groups guarantee secrecy is to train alters to commit suicide if someone is no longer of use to the group and begins remembering or disclosing the abuse. Abusers use anaesthetic drugs to make the "non-human" alters responsible for suicide unable to feel anything in the body, thus convincing them they do not belong to the body. Sometimes there is a reward promised them for killing the body. Other indoctrination discussed earlier, such as watching an alleged traitor be tortured or killed slowly and painfully, convinces other alters that they would be better off dead if the person is a traitor.

Suicide and self-harm programs will be addressed further in Chapter Eleven.

Lies that cause survivors to deny or recant abuse memories and experiences

- The alters who are designated to live in the "real world," going to school or college and holding jobs while interacting with others in adulthood, are trained, usually at home by parents, to disbelieve any memories that might come up.
- Children are taught to believe that they got the idea that they were abused from something they read or saw on television or from someone else's experience or from a therapist. (This is a basic argument of those who attempt to discredit these experiences in the public eye and among professionals.)
- Children are also taught that if they experience flashbacks of awful abuses, those must be dreams or imagination or signs that they are crazy. Nothing bad really happened to them.

Methods of indoctrination

The group might "prove" the unreality of the child's memories through simulated murder events that the child attends, or in which the child is forced to participate. The next day, the child sees the murdered person alive, and if she or he asks questions is told that the awful event was a dream or a product of imagination.

Since survivors of extreme abuse often do not remember much of their past, it is very easy for people who have power in their lives, such as their parents, to convince them that nothing bad happened to them. Everyone wants to please their parents. Parents involved in the abuses of those who have a dream, a flashback, or a memory of the abuse in childhood will tell them that they got the idea from somewhere else. It is reassuring to these children to believe it was not real.

Chapter Twelve, "Maybe I made it up", addresses these issues in more depth.

Therapy to address abusers' lies

Cognitive therapy of mind control survivors is an important part of treatment for these lies and deceptions. This needs to be done both individually with particular alters, and also with the personality system as a whole. Therapists can provide an alternative explanation to that given by the abusers. For example, if an alter personality was told that he or she is not part of the body (and therefore can kill the body without the alter dying), a therapist can discuss making a mark on the hand of another alter, and then the alter who believes he or she is not part of the body can come out and see whether or not it is also on his or her hand. The alter will stare in amazement and ask how the mark got there. In a few cases there will be another alter inside who creates an illusion of an unmarked hand, and it may be necessary to ask this one to stop creating the illusion so that everyone inside can see the truth. In most (but not all) cases this will be effective. I do this in a playful way, engaging the child alters in showing their power by turning the illusion on and off again.

Unmasking the deception can be very powerful. Often this is done using the abuser's type of trick, without any abuse. For example, I induced an alter who believed he had no body to come out into the body. He was invisible to all other alters. He explained to me that he did not have a body. I asked what was in his hand. A cup, he said. I asked how he was managing to hold it. He looked in amazement at the cup, and slowly began to move the hand. He did not understand how he could be doing this. I asked what he looked like. Nothing, just blackness. How did he know this? He said that he saw himself in a mirror, and it was just black. I showed him his (that is, the person's) face in a small mirror. Then I put a piece of white paper over the mirror, and asked what he saw. Just whiteness. I assisted him to move the paper on and off the mirror, so he could see it was just covering the real image. He said that he was not white, he was black. I used the black plastic cover of my notebook to cover the mirror, and he said yes, that was it. With the help of another alter, who informed him that the abusers had put a black cloth over the mirror, the illusion was dispelled, and the alter realized how he had been tricked.

It is most effective when alters who were deceived receive information directly from alters who know the truth. Since alters whose mothers were involved in the abuse commonly believe that their mothers can use magik to always know everything, it comes as a shock and a relief when another alter reveals having had the job of tattling. So when new alters emerge, I always ask them to get information from others in the system rather than just from me. Why should they trust me? But the others can give them actual memories. I tell my clients that when all their internal parts share information with one another, they can discover the lies and tricks perpetrated on them.

Similarly, groups of alters together might be invited to view the whole memory of an event in which they were deliberately deceived. For example, you recall a recently described trick wherein a ritually abusive group inserts a rat into a girl's vagina, telling her it will eat her up from inside if she talks about the abuse. They switch the child into another alter, and then extract the rat, telling the new alter that she has given birth to a rat because she is so evil, and no one but them will ever want such an evil person. If both these alters view this event together, they will see how they have been deceived. This intervention is even more effective than one alter telling the other what they know, but it cannot be done until the personality system is ready for memory work, and prepared with a way to handle the emotions and physical pain of such horrendous memories. This information will be found in Chapter Sixteen.

Many alters can be "stuck in the past" and still think it is 1968 or 1987 or some other year when they were still physically a child and the abusers were in charge of them. The parts who were put in charge need to be fully informed about the situation, and if they realize they are no longer in danger (when this is an accurate perception, and current contact has been addressed) they can stop punishing the others and learn to work together with all parts, for safety and healing.

It will empower your clients to understand that there are lies which they do not have to believe any longer. You can tell them that when they share information and emotions between and among all their parts, they will know the truth. They now have choices that they did not have in childhood. As they question what they were told, and consult with their inside parts to discover the truth, they will regain their freedom and control of their own lives.

My car has a bumper sticker that says, "I think, therefore I'm dangerous." One of my mind-controlled clients, who was told repeatedly never to think, bought me two more of these stickers when I replaced the car. It meant a huge amount to her. And it is a delight to see her alters begin to think for themselves and recognize the truth of past and present. She has requested that I ask therapists to give their clients the following message:

> Think for yourself, now that you are an adult, and critique the information the abusers gave you to see whether or not you now think it could be true. If something is really true, it will resonate as a truth for you. You might find that when something resonates this way, you feel angry or sad, and you might want to avoid thinking about it any further. If this is the case, it will be helpful for you to follow the thread of emotions and thoughts and ask yourself why you are avoiding this. Shed light on it so that you can find the real truth, which is the only way you will be able to heal and to move forward in life. Recognize that if you were deceived, you were a child, so it is not your fault you were deceived. Be determined to get at the truth. If one thing the abusers said to you was a lie, then perhaps other things that were said to you were lies or tricks (fabricated events). You can find out, and you can regain control of your own life and be free.

CHAPTER NINE

Understanding and working with alters' jobs and hierarchies

What is usually known as a "program" is really the job that an alter, or an orchestrated series of alters, has been trained to do. The alters in systems created through mind control function within specifically designed internal structures, as we have seen. They are also arranged in an internal hierarchy, which is another of mind control systems' most distinguishing features. In this chapter we shall look at these alters, their jobs, and the way they relate to one another. We shall also address treatment issues particular to the programming and arranged roles of your client.

Basic rules and arrangements for alters

Unlike the more random arrangements found in "spontaneous" multiples, the personality systems of most cult children are structured with a strong dividing line between the left (cult) and the right (ordinary life) sides. The alters are toljd by the perpetrators that this is where they live, but this division is unlikely to represent the actual physiological differences between them, since alter personalities reside more in circuitry than in specific brain locations. The left/right division is not the only way that alters from organized abuse are separated from those from "regular" abuse in the home. Many mind-controlled systems also have internal walls and barriers to segment groups of alters. Sometimes groups from a particular kind of abuse are hidden "underground" beneath other groups. So, for example, Ku Klux Klan alters can be hidden beneath ritual abuse alters. It is easy for a therapist, even if he or she discovers ritual abuse, to completely miss the hidden mind-controlled alters from child pornography or military/political abuse.

All of this is done to ensure that mind control alters remain hidden—from everyday alters, and from the world. Memories from the alters involved in the organized abuse do sometimes "leak" into the ANP or other alters from everyday life. When they do, they cause terror, as the everyday life alters have no idea that any of these horrible things that they are "seeing" occurred. More commonly, it is emotions that will leak through to an ANP, who has no awareness of what is causing them. This can be the basis of the depression, anxiety disorders, or obsessions and compulsions that drive some survivors to therapy.

It is easy to miss the real cause of such symptoms and treat them in standard ways which will be ineffective as long as the memories and the alters involved remain dissociated. For example, one of my clients originally went to therapy for an obsessive fear that she would harm her child with a knife. It took many years before the ritual abuse at the base of this became evident, which might never have happened had I not been open to the existence of these issues and able to work with them. Her previous therapist was unfamiliar with ritual abuse, and believed that allowing "body memories" to surface without knowing the associated events would be sufficient to resolve her trauma. It was not.

There are rules that abusers require to prevent the emergence of alters and memories. These are:

1. Silence—do not disclose the abuse to outsiders.
2. Maintain a façade of normalcy, or of craziness if you have been discarded by the abusive group.
3. Obey all past and present abusers, and obey the alters in charge of the system.
4. Be loyal to past and present abusers.
5. Do not develop close relationships with outsiders ("Isolate").

Each alter personality in a mind-controlled system either takes pride in the job they have been forced to do, or is terrified of punishment if he or she fails to do it. For alters low in the hierarchy, the punishment comes from alters higher up. Alters higher up fear punishment that can come from the actual adults who abused them, who might or might not be still involved in their lives, but who they believe can find them ("hunt them down") and kill them if they disclose the abuse. Hidden parts of the personality system who believe they are demons or ghosts or aliens have the jobs of frightening and punishing higher-ups to keep them obedient. (More about these alters later in this chapter.)

In treating these survivors of extreme and organized abuse, remember that it is important to treat whichever parts are put out into the body to speak with you with respect, kindness, and gentle curiosity. In the early stages of therapy, your job is to ask who the part is, what their job is, and why they are present at that moment. Later you can ask to speak with specific alters. Do not ask leading questions.

It is often wise not to ask for the names of the alters, as abusers use names to call them out for torture or punishment. They may have no trouble giving names, but do not assume they want to. I sometimes suggest that they might like to give themselves new names, an idea that they often welcome. Thus, one client's "Satanic Legions" have become "Alicias," and another client's "Satans" have become "Simons." I remember when first working with Tony, I encountered an alter who announced he was "Almighty God." I told him I had a bit of difficulty calling him that, so was there another name he would be comfortable with. "Well, I always liked Geoffrey," he replied.

If you received standard training for treating DID, you may have learnt that you should map your clients' whole personality systems. However, horizontal identification of the parts is not your goal; vertical navigation up the hierarchy is what you need to do. With one of my first ritual abuse survivors, I spent a couple of years working my way through what I believed to be the whole system, mapping it out with her, and then discovered that this was just the first layer. Generally, the structure (if there is one) is intended to be kept secret. The main thing is to get an idea of the size of the system, the number of layers, and the number of alters. Then you work with parts who have more power and more actual content. Often, ritually abused and mind-controlled clients are described as being "polyfragmented," with hundreds of alters or more. Do not be overwhelmed by the number of parts. Many are just memory fragments.

Integration, or fusion, is not a big deal if you do not make it one. If the client chooses to integrate, it will happen naturally when they are ready. Talk about walls between "inside people" no longer being needed. Do not talk about the "people" disappearing. Alters are afraid that if this happens they will die. In my experience, as alters share experiences and memories, the walls between them dissolve, either gradually (when they are co-conscious a lot) or suddenly (during a major abreaction). Do not talk too much about integration or fusion between alters, especially at the start. Respect their choice not to fuse until—and unless—they are ready. And never, never, force an integration on a client.

Alters' jobs

Certain "jobs" are commonly assigned by mind-controlling abusers. You can also consult Stella Katz's account in Chapter Seven for the categories of job assignments created by cults, which include the following.

Internal organizers

- Keeping track of training memories; organizing these as files or tapes or videos.
- Keeping track of alters and making sure the wrong ones do not come out.
- Switch control—turning "programs" or training effects on and off by internal switches and buttons which have specific effects, like putting alters to sleep, or making them suicidal, or creating hallucinations.
- Recycling memories, keeping parts of them separate so that programs cannot be destroyed by memory reintegration.

Internal enforcers

- Making internal threats, sounding like the abusers or like demons.
- Punishing disobedience.
- Harming or killing the body.
- Putting the person to sleep, scrambling their memories, making them "crazy," upsetting other parts so they harass the therapist, distracting the therapist and setting off other behaviors which can interfere with therapy.
- Spinning internally to distribute feelings or impulses through the system.

Alters who deal with perpetrators

- Memorizing and responding to triggers from the outside world.
- Observing the person's behavior and thoughts and reporting disobedience to internal or external bosses.
- Reporting to the abusers.
- Returning to the abusers.
- Engaging in trained sexual behaviors.
- Killing, cutting, and sacrificing.
- Fighting, spying, and other military duties

Using the alters' jobs to assist in recovery

Many alters define themselves by their jobs, and do not know who they will be when those jobs are gone. This can make them resistant to therapy. They usually have special skills related to those jobs, and in some cases, the jobs can continue to be useful long into the course of therapy. As you meet various alters, it is advisable to ask them about their jobs, and show appreciation for their skills. Then, help them find other ways to use their skills in the service of making the whole personality system healthier.

For example, some of my ritually abused clients have alters who can put other alters to sleep. If we are in the middle of processing a traumatic memory, the alters involved in that memory agree to be put to sleep until the next therapy session so that the memory and its feelings will not leak out between sessions. Another client has bad flashbacks and nightmares, so I contacted the Gatekeeper, who has the job of containing the memories, and asked him to please do his job more thoroughly. A client with military training has her soldier alters involved in exercising to keep her body healthy. This was their own idea.

In many cases, the alters can change their jobs to other functions which employ the same skills in the service of their recovery. File keepers have access to the training memories and can bring them up when the system is ready to process and resolve them. Observers and recorders can watch the present life to make sure the client is safe. Spinners can spin peaceful and calm feelings when others in the system are anxious. Some alters may know how to remove pain. An alter trained to make the others forget events can make the alters who are supposed to report to the abusers forget having talked about the memories. Internal leaders assigned by the abusers can remain in leadership of the personality system, maintaining order, until that is no longer necessary. When new alters emerge who would destabilize the system, these leaders can take charge and make sure they do not do any damage.

Survivor Jen Callow's experience regarding her alters' jobs demonstrates the benefits of helping alters find new jobs:

> It was important for our parts to find a purpose beyond the one our abusers assigned to them. For many parts, running the programs and keeping constant vigilance over our system had been the only way to feel powerful and to avoid feeling physical or emotional pain. After we'd processed a memory, our therapist made sure to help each part find a new job and purpose inside, including the children, if they wanted (children need the time to grow and play, but we found that often > they liked to take on a smaller job of their choosing). For example, we had a group of inner soldier parts terrorizing our system. Our therapist talked to the soldiers through a host part and eventually determined they were scared children, wanting to feel powerful. After working with them and their memories, she talked with them about their talents and skills. Many of them had no idea what they liked or disliked, or what life was like beyond being a soldier. She encouraged them to spend time exploring our inner world, and asked for other parts to volunteer to show them around. We also needed to create a space for them to live and eventually reassigned them to jobs such as security (keeping us safe in the outer world), record keeping (tracking the memories we'd processed and filing them), and even maintaining the soccer field (one of them likes the discipline and precision this requires). Their responsibilities inside grow and change as they do, with the intent that they enjoy their work.

The enforcers: the key to unlocking the system

The persecutor/protector alters who are found within virtually every person with DDNOS or DID are the key to unlocking any personality system, particularly those of clients who have experienced mind control or ritual abuse.

In his study of the features of DID, Ross (1997) found that 84% of 236 DID patients said they had internal persecutor alters. As he describes them, "On first meeting they will be fearsome, loathsome, demon-like entities totally committed to the malicious harassment and abuse of the patient" (p. 115). These parts are aggressive exaggerations of the more common "inner critic" which almost everyone experiences. They tell the person not to talk, they threaten consequences for disobedience, they alienate friends and family, and they may harm or even attempt to kill the body.

Here is the perfect example of how the mind controllers and ritually abusing cults build programs that are destructive to the person by deliberately exploiting survival and self-care motives. As abusive or destructive as they appear, particularly in ritually abused or mind-controlled systems, it is very important to recognize that these alters are no different from all other alters, in that they doing their job of serving the survival of the person. They persecute in the service of protecting. For example, a client with a very angry, critical mother might hear her mother's voice telling her not to do something, or reprimanding her harshly if she did something her mother had not permitted her to do. By influencing her behavior, the alter protected her from very real abuse from the mother.

Goulding and Schwartz (1995) list these protective goals: looking for present dangers, using self-injury as protection (for example, to relieve pressure or nullify pain), being keepers of pain and badness, imitating the abuser or pleasing the abuser to avoid punishment, feeling tainted and damaged and only able to excel at being bad, distraction, trying to stop memories, and trying to protect other people from the survivor.

Some persecutor/protector alters actually believe themselves to be the person's real-life abusers. There may be more than one internal representation, for example, of a parent. This happens spontaneously, and its tendency to happen is exploited by mind controllers. For example, an abuser will rape a child while saying he is "putting himself inside her". The resultant alter believes itself to be the perpetrator.

Some alters have been deceived into believing they are demons, devils, Satan, or animals, such as Stella Katz described in Chapter Seven. They are very young (around age three) and imitate “demons” or animals they were shown to frighten them. Other deliberately created alters are responsible for the programs to cut the person’s arms as a punishment, to flood the system with despair, to prevent a memory from being completely processed and put together, or to stop the person from talking by making him or her mute and terrified. Particularly because of these jobs, the persecutor/protector alters are the key to unlocking a mind-controlled personality system.

Early interventions with persecutor/protector alters

Uneducated therapists often have an inability to cope with the behaviors of persecutory alters. They commonly focus on helping one side of the personality system and battling with the other side. When “Satan” or some similar part talks in a deep scary voice to you or to the client, it is easy to think this is a nasty perpetrator or a supernatural being, and to oppose it or fight with it or try to banish it. However, if you do this, you will engender the hostility of this part, who has probably been very badly hurt and told a lot of lies. You will foster internal splitting in this way, and get nowhere fast.

Once you recognize that these alters have a protective intent, you can see that working with them involves enlisting them in the service of healing, just as they were originally enlisted in the cause of safety.

You will see examples of these kinds of errors, which often result in clients leaving their therapists, in survivor LisaBri’s story:

When therapists make mistakes: LisaBri

> In the early 1990s, I was diagnosed with everything from schizophrenia to pre-menstrual syndrome. I was told to get a hobby, to not drink in the evenings, and one psychiatrist pulled a packet full of white pills from his desk drawer every time I showed any kind of emotion. Every therapist, doctor and psychiatrist I had ever seen wanted me to stuff the feelings away. But where could they go? The more I ‘stuffed,’ the worse I became, until I landed in a locked ward of a psychiatric hospital. I sobered up, threw away the drugs and alcohol and finally found a therapist to work with. I arrived battered and worse for wear, ready to do anything to curb the intense feelings I was experiencing. I was quickly diagnosed with DID, and during the next five years, hospitalized frequently.
>
> With my new therapist, I discovered that I had been ritually abused. I soon learnt to substitute the process of stuffing feelings away with stuffing away ‘bad’ inside parts. This was what my left side alters were labelled—evil. They needed to be dealt with harshly, I was told. They were ‘sabotaging’ therapy by creating chaos in the system, preventing any healing. Today, we bear the scars caused by these early misinterpreted inner parts. They were just doing the jobs assigned to them by our abusers. (At this time, no one inside understood that we were safe by then, as the core of the cult was dead.)
> In order to make our right side more strongly defended against the left side, the therapist attempted a forced integration between the host, Lisa, and the strongest defender of our system, Brian (Bri), by creating a hypnotic integration ceremony that took place in an imaginary forest.
> It appeared to work, and the therapist was ecstatic, but it was too confusing inside. I tried to talk, but I couldn’t find the proper words. Julie, a five-year-old part from abuse by my father, had appeared > just as we joined. At that moment, we were a threefold alter who had no idea on how to live in this singleton world. I tried to convey that there was a complication but the therapist didn't listen. We finally made it out to the car and stalled it all the way home as we couldn't operate the stick shift. After three days of not being able to function and carry out simple tasks such as unlocking a door or preparing a meal, we broke apart, but not before deciding never to integrate again.

> It felt as if our core strength, Bri, who had been the basis of our survival for so long, almost crumbled because of a botched attempt by an outsider to gain control of our personality system. This therapist was wrong. An outsider can't revamp a system that has been in place for forty years and make it work, no matter how logical it seems or how right the therapist believes herself to be.
> When we discovered an inside part whose main function was to hold pain arising from both from the present day and from traumatic memories, the therapist felt it only right for her to be banished and isolated from the rest of the system. Miss Pain was sent away to an internal imaginary beach, alone with all her pain. She had no one to talk to, cry with, or hold. Years after that therapy we attempted to find her, hoping to tell her the world had changed, we had changed, and we wanted her back. I am happy to say that we found her, and, to our pleasant surprise, she was in better shape than we could have hoped. She was smart. Those years at the beach were spent ridding herself of the pain that so often led to self-harm. She revealed to us that when the tide came in at her beach, she took a little piece of pain and put it in the tide. When the tide went out, the pain went with it, making her isolated life just a little more tolerable.
> The therapist eventually terminated therapy with us. Since she was unable to get rid of our left side alters she became convinced that we were evil. We were rerouted to a psychiatrist who practiced hypnosis. Due to our ability to dissociate at any given moment, we were highly susceptible to this type of therapy. Unfortunately, this doctor also set the goal of banishing the 'bad' parts. He had the strongest right side parts gather all the left side parts, many times forcibly, put them into a rocket and send them over the highest imaginary mountain into space. We did this routine with him once a week for over three years.
> After some other unhelpful therapy experiences, I found our current therapist. Our first session scared the hell out of me. She said, "I will work with your right side; however, we need to do a lot of healing with the left side parts. This is going to be my starting focus."
>
> She wanted to work with the left side, the inner cult parts. Was she crazy or what? After spending almost a decade with doctors and therapists doing all they could possibly do to get rid of those parts, this took me by complete surprise. But that's what I needed. Finally, I could heal.
>
> It is not acceptable to hide or banish inner parts for whatever reason. Labeling alters 'good' and 'bad' has to be eliminated. All parts are equal and all deserve the respect of the mental health community.
> I did not write this to bash therapists, but to help them help their clients.

LisaBri's experience reflects several mistakes that untrained therapists working with these clients often make. Avoiding treatment of certain alters may seem to be an efficient way of helping mind-controlled clients, but it is unwise, and damaging to the survivor. It takes patience to work with alters who appear to be destructive, or who are overtly hostile, but it needs to be done.

What LisaBri found most helpful, and what is the most effective approach with persecutor/protector alters, is to immediately engage these personalities in a therapeutic alliance. As with any alter, you need to be aware of their ages, and of how much they know about life in the present. Empathize with the dilemmas they have faced and mirror the importance of their protector roles. Then you can help them to protect in more effective ways for present circumstances.

Sometimes, before you talk with these protector alters, you first have to overcome the resistance of other protectors who believe these parts to be dangerous or even just "improper" in their speech. Often, the ANPs, for instance, are "meek and mild" people who do not swear or say things bluntly, and they hold back alters whose words they consider rude. The internal censoring can get in the way of the therapist knowing what is really going on. I do not know how many times I have told dissociative clients I have heard those swear words before, and I want to speak directly with the alters who are saying the bad words in their head anyway.

After you overcome the language issue, you need to talk with the alters who would keep you from the "abuser" alters, explaining (with the knowledge that the inner abusers are covertly listening) how the abusers are actually protectors and are trying to keep the person safe. You can reframe the abuser alters' actions as protective or nurturant; they are trying to contain overwhelming memories, control rage, or ameliorate the fear of abandonment. You can point out the protective intent by asking about the effect of this behavior on the person's life (Goodman & Peters, 1995).

Remember that these parts are actually lonely because they are internally isolated, and they long to be accepted into the internal and external community, so just talking to them and listening makes a great deal of difference (Blizard, 1997). When first talking to persecutor/protector alters, it is important to reinforce their strength and self-sufficiency. If you fight them or try to weaken them, they will demonstrate their strength by attacking. Do not talk about their needs for comfort or help at first. This comes later. I often find it effective to challenge them to come out, and talk "tough" with them, not in opposition but in alliance. They think other parts are wimpy, and they can often tolerate large amounts of physical pain, but not emotional pain. They see the expression of vulnerable emotions as a sign of weakness. They simply do not feel emotional pain; it is diverted to other alters—though they might feel anger.

In some personality systems, each "tough" alter has its own "inner child" to hold the vulnerable feelings. Yes, alters can themselves be multiple. And multiplicity often is experienced by more than one generation, particularly in mind abusing families. One client of mine had within her the entire personality system of her mother, complete with mother's "host" and hidden alters underneath that host. When I asked to meet her "mother" alter, she went out to the waiting room and returned to the therapy room as her mother, ready to discuss the daughter's problems.

It is important to find out why the persecutor/protector alters do and say what they do and say. If the client is ritually abused or mind-controlled, at least some of these alters will be doing jobs which they were required to do by their abusers on pain of death or serious bodily harm. They may not understand the effect of doing these jobs on the body or the rest of the personality system. Persecutor/protector parts believed the aggressors' verbally abusive statements and threats, so think they have to keep the system in line to prevent bad, or worse, things from happening. This is not always a false belief.

Finding out the content of the threats from these alters is very important, as it is for most alters. Disclosing the nature of the threat is less likely to stimulate harmful behavior than disclosing the abuse memories, and so is a basic strategy in working with all alters, and persecutor/protector alters in particular, whose actions can be unintentionally hurtful. Ask them what will happen if they do not do their jobs, or if the system disobeys the abusers. Then you can give them a reality check on whether or not those things can happen in the present. It is, of course, important to check for current contact with abusers, because in that case, certain actions are protective in a concrete and real way. In some cases, clients will have contact and not know it; in other cases, they may have had no contact, but the protective alters might believe they have.

Once you have got to know persecutors a bit, you must empathically join with their underlying emotional states. This may challenge you as a therapist, because they are likely to feel pleasure at being aggressive and powerful, but it will yield many benefits. Frankel and Ahearn's "ghetto model" of the personality system (1996) may be helpful here. They explore the similarities between the organization of eastern European ghettos during the Second World War and the personality systems of persons with DID. This analogy helps us recognize the dilemma of the internal leaders of a personality system, so we will not be so quick to judge those who are loyal to the perpetrators. These are people who were held prisoner and abused throughout their childhoods, so it is no wonder they have parts who cooperated with the "guards" to get a few privileges. Now, you can carefully express empathy for other feelings, such as pain, exhaustion from hard work, and anger at abusers and at the ANP. Underneath these emotions are love for the ANP and the hurt child alters, loneliness, and desire to be loved and to belong. Joining with the whole range of emotions helps your client develop ambivalence (which multiples are prevented from experiencing because their opposing feelings are contained in different alters) and co-consciousness of different affective states. Often, persecutors switch quickly to positive, helpful behavior. Transference is really important for these alters, who are so "identified with the aggressor". Only when these clients have an attachment to the therapist can they let go of the attachment to the abuser(s).

Once a working alliance is established, the persecutors, the ANP(s) and other alters must negotiate their differences, resolve long-standing conflicts, and overcome past hurts, both real and imagined. This is often difficult, as other alters are terrified of the persecutors and will not go near them. It takes time to change this situation. Do not take sides; your job is to facilitate a negotiation. Ask what each part needs, and help them listen to each other. In encouraging internal communication, sometimes "deals" can be made, for example, the persecutor will not create flashbacks if the little ones do not talk about their abuse. Agreements are very helpful, as is homework, but make sure you dot every "i" and cross every "t" in an agreement, as young parts can be very concrete. You can understand this in the framework of negotiations. Agreements between alters or between alters and the therapist are not the same as the contracts advocated by some therapists engaged in DID treatment. I do not make contracts with multiples, since they can rarely guarantee that the entire system will agree to something.

Later in therapy, you can help abuser/protector parts do their jobs of protection better, or change their jobs to help the person instead of the abusers, especially when the abusers gave them their jobs.

Alter hierarchies

In the hierarchies of mind-controlled clients, a new layer is usually created every year (often on the person's birthday). This means that some alters have the power, internally, and others fear and obey them. Some believe themselves to be demonic entities. Military/political mind control survivors also often have systems dominated by introjects of the abusers (e.g., doctors, priests, generals and commanders), as well as internalizations of important figures in the belief system, such as Hitler, if the person was abused by a Nazi group.

The most important alters for the therapist to communicate with in a structured system are those who keep the others in line. These are higher-ups in the hierarchy, the ones who issue threats and punishments to those who disobey or order other alters to punish those below them. These important alters are generally aware of what happens in therapy in terms of disclosures or disobedience. They are often not aware of what is going on in the person's everyday life apart from therapy: for example, that the person has not seen the abusers for twenty years, or that the abusers are dead. They have been taught in childhood to believe that the abusers always know what is going on with the person, and that if they do not punish the other parts the abusers will punish them.

Be aware, however, that these parts are keeping track of what you are doing for their own purposes, not just on behalf of the abusers. They are watching you to determine whether you are trustworthy, and whether you are strong enough to receive their disclosures. Their experience is with the abusers, who switch into other states of being, who torture and punish. For a long time they may think you are one of the abusers testing their loyalty, since this kind of trick has been done to them. In most cases, they have been conditioned against you, warned against people who try to find out the secrets and express caring or empathy for them. They will be very cautious—as they should be.

Here is how Svali, who was a programmer for a cult which she calls the Illuminati, explains hierarchies.

> The cult itself is very hierarchical, and puts this hierarchy inside the person. What better way to inspire loyalty to leadership than to put the leadership inside the person's head? . . . The survivor may be horrified to find a representative of one of their worst perpetrators inside, but this was a survival mechanism [because] people will be less likely to punish someone who mimics them but will look down upon and punish a weak crying person . . . The survivor may mimic accents, mannerisms, even claim the perpetrator's life history as their own . . . The ultimate form of internalization comes with internalizing hierarchical councils . . . [which] will correlate roughly to the outside group . . . The[y] will be seen as holding power of life or death, and the child or youth will do anything to gain their favor. The trainer will help with the internalization, using photographs or holographic images of the people to "burn them in". [Svali, 2000]

Svali also writes about the hierarchies created by military programming:

> Military alters inside are extremely hierarchical. They will often be ranked inside, with lower "foot soldiers" accountable to inside alters with increasing rank. . . . A soldier with no rank may not have much knowledge about, or pull, inside the system. Its only job is to blindly obey others, after years of conditioning to do this. Ranking officers inside will often be modeled after outside perpetrators, officers, or trainers. An internal General will often have much more knowledge than lower ranks, and should be befriended, as they can help with therapy.

She points out that these internal officers have strong loyalty programming, including training to die an honorable death rather than betray the group. It is very important to be aware of this programming. Reason with the higher ranked members, respecting the loyalty, bravery, and sense of honor involved in their misguided allegiance to a perpetrator group which deceived them about its purposes. If they change their allegiance, they can be excellent protectors in the present from outside perpetrators.

The higher-ups

The higher-ups who are in charge of the internal hierarchies enforce the loyalty programming, which the rest of the alters obey. They are also the ones whom most of the rest of the system will still obey if they decide to work for healing.

The higher-ups' loyalty training

Higher-up parts have received some of the most horrendous spiritual abuse, in that they have been forced to perpetrate. Here are some examples of loyalty and obedience training that clients have shared with me (once again, a warning about disturbing material).

- A child has to watch another child stretched on a rack until he is pulled apart and dies. She is told to drink his blood, and when she balks she is put on the rack until she agrees to do it. The lesson is, "Never say no."
- A child (on her birthday) has to harm another child to prove she is worthy to receive a demon. She is given a hallucinogenic drug, and as it takes effect, demons are supposedly collected through a spell. She is hit on the head with a hot poker until she invites a specific demon to enter her. With the aid of the drugs, she feels "possessed" by the new demon alter. The demon alter has to say vows of loyalty to Satan.
- A child observes a woman refuse to keep her promise, made before she had children, to kill her own child. Because the woman does not keep her promise, the woman's child has to (apparently) kill her, while the children witnessing the event are instructed to keep their promises.

When a survivor is re-contacted by the abuser group, there are reminders of these trainings. Often the higher-ups are forced to perpetrate on another person, and then told they will always be part of the evil group. They have to repeat their loyalty vows, or sign them in blood. For example, the survivor is kidnapped, and raped and tortured with electroshock until alters agree to listen and repeat their vows of obedience. She is made to hurt another victim to prove her obedience. The cult threatens to kill someone she loves, and/or her therapist, if she disobeys.

When a person has parts who have been through experiences as heinous as these, they also carry considerable shame. When you think of the shame carried by a child for being sexually abused, you can only begin to understand how much shame a person carries if she or he has been forced to participate in the sexual abuse of others, or in what she believes are murders.

Your client will be afraid to disclose these experiences, and very afraid of the perpetrator group that does them. Alters who have been through these things are afraid of their own memories, and afraid you will reject them if you know what they have done. You need to be ready to accept them, no matter what they have been forced to do. You will need to explain to them, in ways they can hear, the coercion which was involved in their past behavior. You must be patient. Your own need to have the client free herself of undeserved self-hatred cannot replace her own process. And you must understand that her guilt is what distinguishes her from people who really are evil. I often say to such clients, "If you were truly evil, you would not be feeling this way. Evil people do not feel guilt for what they do."

Rewards given to the higher-ups

The parts in charge of the personality system, who hold the power over the others, have also been given rewards. Rewards include pleasurable sex, pleasurable drugs, and getting to do the hurting instead of being hurt. If they are supposedly demonic, they may have been taken to a simulated hell, and given the choice of being tortured there or being charge of the torture of other children. Since they believe they are going to hell for eternity anyway as a result of the crimes they have committed, they might naturally choose to be the ones doing the hurting rather than the ones receiving it. Note that these parts have been split off from other discarded parts (garbage kids) who refused to cooperate with the abusers. When the higher-ups confess their guilt to me, I ask how many different alters refused to do the heinous act before they finally agreed to do it. I point out that the perpetrators would not actually kill the child even if s/he chose to be killed rather than do what was required. It takes time to convince them about how they were coerced and tricked. Stockholm Syndrome is a reality, and organized child abusers deliberately exploit it.

Sometimes when these parts watch what you are doing, they can surprise you. For example, one long-term ritually abused client of mine recently discovered she had a hierarchy on the right side (home alters) as well as the left side (cult alters). But it had given us no trouble, because the alter in charge of it, called Mother, had earlier decided to become disloyal and renamed herself Mother-F—-er!

Working your way up hierarchies

Svali has this advice on how to deal with internal leadership councils, the alters at the top of hierarchies:

> Internal leadership councils will often be some of the most resistant to, and hostile towards therapy, especially in the early stages. They will verbally banter with, or refuse to speak to, the therapist, as being "beneath their notice." They are mimicking the haughty, hierarchical attitudes they have been exposed to all their lives.
>
> They also have the most to lose, if the survivor leaves the cult, and may fight this decision tooth and nail. They will often be the alters with an "attitude."
> Both the survivor and therapist need to recognize that these parts had powerful needs that were met in the cult setting. To ignore this and argue with them will only entrench their belief that therapists are stupid and unknowing people. Acknowledge their internal role while gently pointing > out reality. Try to enlist their aid in helping the survivor strengthen. Discuss honestly the pros and cons of leaving the cult. These are highly intellectual alters, and they need to express their concerns and doubts. Setting good boundaries and not allowing verbal abuse of the therapist is important. These alters are used to "pushing people around" verbally, and have been rewarded for it prior to therapy. Now, they need to learn new coping skills and behaviors, and the process may take time. Allow them to vent their anger, displeasure, and fears about the decision to leave the cult. Offer them new jobs inside the person of leadership over safety committees, or even decision making committees.

> Sometimes, a system that has broken free from the cult, and has no external hierarchy that they are accountable to[,] will go through a short period of chaos as word gets out: we're free, and don't have to do what the cult tells us to do any more! Hundreds of internal arguments may break out as to: what do we do for a living? Where do we live? What do we eat? What hobbies will we have? Everybody wants to come out, see the daytime, and live this new, free life. But the freedom may cause imbalance with all of the switching going on inside. Enlisting the aid of the internal hierarchy, and creating a limited democracy, with ground rules, may help during this time. Don't dismantle the internal hierarchy overnight, or the systems will be rudderless. Enlist their aid in helping direct which direction the survivor goes. Things will settle down after a period, as the systems learn to listen to each other, vote on ideas, and begin going together in the same direction. [Svali, 2000]

Be aware that as you establish rapport with the "lower-down" parts, the higher-ups will make their presence known, either by coming out and objecting to what you are saying or by creating symptoms or by voices in the person's head. If your client appears to be hearing something scary, you may ask what she is hearing, and then ask who is saying it, and then ask whether you can speak with them. If the client goes through a flashback or body pain, you can ask to speak with whoever is causing it. I have one client whose right hand I take when establishing rapport; after a few seconds her left hand moves forward to remove my hand, and I take a gentle hold of the left hand too, letting those "left side" parts know that they too are welcome to be with me. Even though they usually pull away (and I let them go) the message has been given.

With my most recent mind control client, I began working my way up the hierarchy immediately. Each week I meet a new part whose job is to sabotage any healing by the other parts. I emphasize that they can all now be brothers and sisters, equal partners in healing. I meet "Hitler" or "God" or "Beelzebub," greet them in a friendly manner, and invite them to work with the others towards healing the whole person from the abuse and eventually helping other hurt children. Several of them have decided to change their names. They are enthusiastic about having a purpose other than the one they were given. They are delighted to discover that they were not "created" by the abusers, but were simply split apart from the other parts by the pain the abusers had given. The ones with important jobs have learnt to respect the "blue pile," the bruised and beaten parts who resisted doing the jobs and were discarded by the abusers. Later, when we work through memories, we will involve the blue pile too, so that they will heal from their pain.

In getting to know such a system, I frequently ask each alter if someone else is threatening them or giving them orders, and then ask to talk to their boss. This expedites the process of working my way up, and if they decide to change sides it makes the work much easier.

Survivor Jen Callow (See Chapter Seventeen) describes the new job description adopted by her Council, once they were enlisted in the service of healing:

> The Council was often able to suggest which programs were safe to work on and where inner booby traps and the like were a concern. Rather than stay a dictatorship, which would have been detrimental to our healing work, our Council chose to become an active part of our system. They disbanded several years ago, as they weren't needed in that role anymore. Many of them now assist our system in other ways and participate to varying degrees in our outer life. Some have integrated over the years. In the end, the parts designed to be the most loyal to our programming turned out to be some of our greatest allies in healing.

Backups

If you manage to gain the cooperation of the higher-ups, and therefore of the primary personality system, you can expect some trouble for a little while. All alters with jobs, including those in charge of the system, have "backups," alters who have received the same training and are supposed to take over the roles of any alter who becomes disloyal. Do not be discouraged. This will be manageable. Backups are pretty easy to convince to change sides, if the primary higher-ups have already decided to work for healing. Backups do not have much real life experience and are hollow compared to the alters they are backing up.

Work your way up the hierarchy, getting to know resistant alters, until you have at least some trust from those in charge of the system, who have until now been identified with the perpetrating group. If disclosures are made prematurely, you can expect that the client will have flashbacks and engage in self-harm and suicide attempts, plus there is the risk that alters will report to the abusers that s/he is disclosing, and they will make moves to stop her. This may take several years, or only a short time, depending upon the individual client. In the meantime, you can explore in the inner world, and intervene to make it more pleasant for the parts, and you can work on helping the client achieve safety and stabilization, all of which will be discussed in the next few chapters. Only after you have good cooperation from the personality system can you begin your work with traumatic memories.

Outliers

Outliers, as I call them, are outside the main personality system. Their job is to keep those in the main personality system in line. Outliers may be located in a structure separate from the main structure. For example, two of my clients programmed in Ontario both had their main alters in an inverted pyramid, and their outliers in rings around the outside of the pyramid. As you have seen, survivors of ritual abuse often hear voices, alters who are often viewed by themselves and other parts of the system as demonic beings, ghosts, or other evil and generally non-human entities. (They may also purport to be other people, living or dead, or God or Jesus.) This identity gives them more power over the alters who are supposed to run the system. However, they are just alters like everyone else, with a job to do; their job is to keep those in the main personality system in line. One such group that I encountered led to a delightful resolution, as described below.

The Woo-Woo Kids

The client left me a message: "I went to bed really early and woke up at 12:45 a.m. and can't get out of my head. I keep replaying everyone I know who is dead and they are taunting me, telling me that I'm making it all up and they are watching me and know that I'm a liar." She managed to calm herself with medication until our next appointment.

I know this client pretty well, and we have worked through much of her training and abuse memories. So I did as I usually do with her. I requested she ask the part named High Priestess 9, who was the main alter in charge of the system, whether she knew who inside was making my client hear these voices. I was assuming that the voices were neither real dead people nor memory fragments, but something some alter personality had been trained to do.

The reply was that High Priestess 9 was also affected by hearing the voices of the dead, as was Satan 9. I knew these two well. It had taken me about a year to work my way up to High Priestess 9 and convince her that I wanted to work with her, rather than against her. The left side of this client's system had nine layers, and each one had a high priestess, a Satan, and a complement of deliberately created alter personalities.

I remembered a group of three alters I had worked with about a year ago, the Big High Satan and two others called the Entities. This little group functioned to keep the alters in charge of the system in check by frightening them, Big High Satan frightening the rulers on Level 9, and the Entities in turn frightening him. It had taken some convincing for this client's system to let me actually meet the "Big High Satan." Did I not know he was the real Satan, implanted in her at a ritual? The alters knew by now that all the other Satans from ages three to twelve were just alter personalities. But this one was the real thing. That was in line with what many survivors and therapists believe, that somehow real demonic entities are attached to the personalities within a ritual abuse survivor.

I reminded her that little Satan 1 had thought Satan 2 was the real Satan, and Satan 8 had thought Satan 9 was the real Satan, and so on. Why should this new situation be any different? And, sure enough, it was not. The Big High Satan, who was all of eleven years old, boasted about how he was the one really in charge. We worked through some of his memories, and he became, for the most part, a cooperative part of the system.

This new problem sounded to me as if it might originate with our young Big High Satan. I asked to speak to him. He came out. "I'm the only one who can make those voices," he bragged. I asked why he was doing it. Because Stan was telling him to.

The problem with this was that Stan was not an alter. He was an actual high priest and the uncle who had abused my client. And he had died of cancer several years ago.

I asked the Big High Satan whether he thought anyone inside could be impersonating Stan, since he himself was impersonating several different dead people. He was indignant. No, he was the one really in charge, and he was the only one who could do the voices realistically. I reminded him that the Entities had been split off from him in order to control him, just as he was supposed to control the rest of the system. Oh, yeah: then, he guessed, it could be them. I asked him to check it out. He reported that he heard laughter. They were laughing about how they had fooled him.

We all laughed together about how the Big High Satan went "Woo-woo" and scared the rest of the system, and how the Entities had done the same thing to him. We decided to call them "the Woo-Woo Kids" from then on.

Conflicts in the field regarding "outliers": demons, ghosts, and "attachments"

There is disagreement in the field about how literally to view alters who see themselves as demons. Should they be seen as "attachments" or intrusions from a spiritual power?

I believe that this issue affects the proper psychotherapeutic treatment of our clients. To address it, I must challenge certain Christian perspectives. I want to point out here that my criticism is of the way in which these beliefs are applied to our understanding of the internal structures of survivors and what is required for their recovery, rather than of the beliefs, per se. I certainly do not have the right to criticize anyone's religious beliefs. In fact, I would like to point out that I am not even criticizing what might be seen as the extreme beliefs that are the subjects of this book, but the practices that hurt children and others. However, certain beliefs lead inevitably to cruel or unethical practices, and I believe it is important to challenge those beliefs. For example, Nazism is inextricably involved with the idea of the superiority of the Aryan race, and therefore the right of Aryans to exterminate those of other races.

Many survivors who experience "demons" seek a spiritual remedy for their experience, and a way to battle them, in evangelical Christian churches. In some such churches they do find helpers willing to work with them from a specifically Christian standpoint.

Among those professionals who have written about these issues from the conservative Christian perspective are the late Pastor Tom Hawkins of Restoration in Christ Ministries (2010), and Reverend Tom Ball (2008). Both of these men have extensive knowledge of, and experience with, dissociative disorders, in particular those which result from ritual abuse and mind control.

As you have seen, survivors of ritual abuse hear voices purporting to be demons or other evil entities (and might also hear voices purporting to be God or Jesus). Like other evangelical Christians who work with ritual abuse, Tom Ball makes the assumption that some of these demons are real entities which have been "attached" to the alter personalities through curses, etc. He recommends treatment in which the demon is told it has no right to be in the person and is commanded to "go directly to the throne of Jesus for Him to do with you as he will" (p. 441). Ball states that for him the best proof that real demons have been expelled is demonstrated "when the demons are prayed against authoritatively and commanded to stop bothering the person and leave [and, as a result] the upsetting feelings, ideation and symptoms do in fact stop quickly" (p. 435). He notes that other Christians working in the field "assert the best method [by which] to be sure a demon is present is to exercise the gift of discernment of spirits" (p. 435).

Hawkins went further. He saw ritual abuse not merely as a treatment issue, but also as a religious war. From his perspective,

> Most [ritual abuse survivors] were forced to engage in rituals that included vows, oaths, sacrifices, or covenants made with the evil spiritual realm. These 'legal transactions' gave evil spirits, or demons, the right to 'attach' to the specific alters involved and to exert varying degrees of influence and control over them. They may play a role, for instance, in enforcing programming; blocking memories; and re-traumatizing any alter who fails to fulfill cult purposes, tells secrets, or seeks outside help. These demonized alters have essentially been brought under bondage to Satan and his agenda. . . . Connections can also be made to evil entities of a higher echelon than demons . . . Many of the more sophisticated cult perpetrators also claim that dissociated identities can be taught, or coerced under conditions of severe duress, to enter states of transcendent consciousness that connect them with what we have come to call the 'second heaven,' referring to the 'kingdom of the air' over which Satan is the reigning 'prince' (Eph. 2:2). Here they can seemingly be held 'captive' by evil cosmic beings and covertly used in Satan's worldwide agenda that is being directed from the spiritual realm. Within the person's system, these alters generally maintain a seemingly out-of-body perception and may be considered absent or even 'dead' by the other identities. [2010, p. 62]

This belief system has been influential over many Christians and even secular therapists working with ritual abuse survivors. While Hawkins said that "A therapist must always respect the worldview of the client" (p. 63), he also stated that > Successful resolution of the major spiritual bondages occurring in RA survivors requires . . . an understanding of the spiritual principles relating to the cosmic struggle between the forces of God and the forces of Satan as found in the Bible. While the secular community is well-equipped to deal with many of the psychological issues involved in DID-RA, releasing the person from bondage to the spiritual realm can only occur through the power of God. Therefore, this part of the process needs to be facilitated by a pastor, Christian counselor, or prayer minister who has thorough training in working with the dissociative disorders. [ibid.]

How did Hawkins reconcile his respect for the client's world view with his own view that these spiritual bondages require spiritual interventions? In an email to the Ritual Abuse and Mind Control Special Interest Group of the ISSTD (used by permission), he made it clear:

> Since I am coming from a Christian perspective I make my own perspective clear (usually that is why they seek me out) but at the same time I work hard to not impose my views on the clients. A major component is encouraging them come to a place of safety to express their anger and disappointment, including "anger with G-d".[1] Nearly all of them have parts with conflicting perspectives and respecting their internal diversity allows for them to solve these conflicts and come to their own conclusions with a cohesive internal view they can own. If spiritual issues are not dealt with in a balanced manner it actually fosters more dissociation, in my perspective. [personal communication]

I see several problems with Hawkins' position. His analysis and recovery plan might be all very well for those therapists with the "correct" religious beliefs, especially if they only see clients who specifically seek them out for that reason, but it leaves the rest of us out in the cold. How can we help ritual abuse survivors effectively if we do not subscribe to these beliefs, or if our clients do not? And how can we intervene in a religious way if doing so violates our professional codes of ethics?

Hawkins was aware of this problem, and stated in a footnote,

> Dealing with spiritual issues of any kind can sometimes put a licensed therapist into a difficult situation. I encourage those with licensure to seek good counsel and get a clear understanding of their legal responsibilities under such licensure." He then suggests that we therapists work together on a team with what he calls "spiritual leaders.

This is, presumably, to get around the fact that the ethics of professional licensing bodies (who disapprove of imposing beliefs on clients) differ from those of religious organizations.

He introduced another complication: "Disconnecting RA survivors from the spiritual entities holding them in bondage is not a simple process. The specific legal rights claimed by the demons and/or evil cosmic beings must be ascertained and renounced by the identities involved" (2010, p. 63). (At the end of Volume 1 of his book, Hawkins has a table containing "Renunciations and Affirmations" designed to deal with this. He intended Volume 2 to go further into the spiritual dynamics.)

In my opinion, this collusion with the alleged validity of such agreements is unwise and therapeutically inappropriate. The notion of "legal" agreements and rights is used a great deal by mind controllers of all kinds. Children are often made to sign such agreements in blood and are told they are "married" or are bound for ever. Rather than simply accepting that these are genuine legal agreements made in some heavenly or hellish court, therapists should explain that such agreements, especially when made by under-age children under coercion, are not legal or binding in any way. Once the victim lets go of his or her belief in them, they are meaningless. Hawkins stated that "The specific legal rights claimed by the demons and/or evil cosmic beings must be ascertained and renounced by the identities involved" (ibid.). In light of what we know about how they were actually created and the alters who maintain them, it could indeed be helpful to take time to renounce agreements which were made, but simply as a statement of the survivor's free choice, not because they are actually legal agreements. One client of mine "divorced" Satan, but even this creative act might ascribe too much credibility to such agreements, the acceptance of whose legitimacy and power I believe to be detrimental to recovery.

Steve Oglevie is a well-known and self-described "deprogrammer" and expert in different mind control systems who gives workshops on the different kinds of mind control programming. Many therapists have attended these trainings. Here is how one day-long event is described:

> Recognizing Spiritual Evil, Recognizing Dissociated and Disembodied Foreign Human Spirits and 'Installed' Personalities. Understanding of Spiritual Evil and how it Interferes in the Therapy Process. The therapist will be introduced to the very complex field of dissociated and disembodied foreign human spirits including their level of attachment to the client and ways in which they can be successfully disentangled from the true humanity and sent away. Therapists will be introduced to understanding installed personalities and how to differentiate between installed and genuine personalities.

Such trainings have a strong effect on how the therapists view the problems they are dealing with, and I consider their being labeled as "psychotherapeutic" training to be unwise. If a person working with a mind-controlled client subscribes to such a definite belief system, one which influences what they believe about what is wrong with the client and how it has to be fixed, there is not much room for the client to determine his or her own world view. This is of great concern. Such strongly held beliefs—developed to the point of being "absolute truths"—have an even greater potential to influence our clients even when they are not made explicit.

Prayer, beliefs, and treatment

In his chapter in Ritual Abuse in the 21st Century, Ball (2008) reviews several different Christian methods of "inner healing." His favored approach is Theophostic Prayer, which involves asking Jesus to take the client to the origin and source of a troubling emotion, then having the client look around and describe the memory all the way to the end, find the lie embedded in the memory, and ask Jesus to bring His truth to that lie. In Ball's experience, this brings rapid release and freedom to survivors.

If you break it down, in many ways this part of his approach is not different from the memory work I recommend, which many therapists have found effective: having the survivor watch a traumatic memory from start to finish, and see the lies and tricks embedded in it. It can be done therapeutically, without the explicit presence of Jesus, which certainly makes it easier for survivors who are not Christian or those whose ideas about Jesus have been severely distorted by their programming. For survivors with a strong ANP who is explicitly Christian, the addition of the prayer and the visualization of Jesus probably creates an easier and more comforting way to view the traumatic memories.

In a 2010 post to a ritual abuse and mind control discussion list (used by permission), Ball offers this useful caution to those wanting to make specifically Christian, or spiritual, interventions with this population:

> I have recently learned how absolutely important it is to take my cues from the survivor about using language when referring to anything spiritual. Terms I take for granted, I now understand, may actually cause internal pain to some parts of the personality stuck in programs related to certain abuse episodes . . . because those terms may have been used as part of the abuse/programming. But, by asking the survivor to pay attention inside, and then testing out a spiritual term that feels intellectually honest to the survivor and really does reflect the intent of the survivor, I find we can easily come up with a word for G-d that does not upset any parts inside, but that allows the survivor and me to draw/call on that spiritual resource during sessions.

Old Lady's ritual abuse experiences, described in Chapter Five, illustrate both a Satanist or Luciferian world view and a fundamentalist Christian world view, believing in specific controlling deities and other entities who interfere in human life and expect loyalty and obedience. The primary difference between these "mirror image" world views seems to concern who will win the battle and control the universe—God or the other side—and who is right and therefore deserves people's loyalty.

But what about those who do not have this particular religious perspective, or who do not have religious beliefs at all? For them, the insistence on having Jesus involved might easily feel alien, or even alienating. It can also feel like yet another violation of their autonomy. A point stated earlier should be highlighted here. Even if their personal position is not explicitly expressed, therapists need to be careful to avoid influencing their clients' development of their new world view—or even appearing to want to. This is particularly relevant for mind control survivors, who often assume that the therapist is their new "handler." My clients often wait for me to tell them what to believe and what to do. I tell them that I do not want them to obey me or believe what I say; I want to help them regain the freedom to choose their beliefs and their behavior. When I explain that I do not intend to try to control them in that way (or in any way), they look at me in shock and say something like, "That's not possible." But of course it is: that is what recovery is all about!

Let us look at how, by examining one particular consequence of the fact that survivors of these abuses all have dissociative disorders. My client, Tony, had an ANP who was a very strong Christian; his alters called him "religious Tony." Tony was a religious Christian, but among the alters who controlled his personality system were Satanists, who believed as they had been taught, and others who disbelieved everything. If I were to work with Tony from an explicitly Christian world view, I would be supporting the ANP but possibly violating the rights of, and the potential for any empathic bond with, the other alters. I would also be reinforcing the view that Tony's abusers imprinted in him: that life is all about the battle between God and external demonic forces. Tony was also filled with religious delusions, including having an alter named "Almighty God." How could a person like this come to develop a unified world view, and make meaning out of his horrendous history? Surely it would begin with internal communication and beginning to think for himself. The beliefs of the conflicting "selves" he carried were something only he could resolve, a challenge that required absolute impartiality on the part of his therapist. Even if a "Christian" client, such as Tony, deliberately comes to a religious organization for help, and receives this team service, what would the team do—and what should they do—about the fact that different parts of Tony have different beliefs?

Not all therapists who use the methods taught by Oglevie and other deprogrammers do so from a personal belief system. While not taking a personal position of endorsing these recommendations, some therapists maintain a perspective of "objectivity." They suggest that one should not take a stand either for or against such belief systems, but should support a client's belief where it exists. In my view, however, even this ostensibly "non-judgmental" position also has serious drawbacks.

Psychologist Ellen Lacter (2011), whose ritual abuse and mind control web page was mentioned earlier in Chapter Two, offers a perspective that might be seen as typical of this school of thought. She describes what she sees as the benefits of working within the client's own cultural world view without taking a position about the "reality" of any such belief system:

> When clients perceive the presence of spiritual evil, internally or externally, I usually work with that perception, rather than initiating dialogue about whether the perceived evil is real or not. If I were to try to convince a ritually abused client that human spirits or entities are not real, to try to reduce their fear, etc., I might stand a chance with some hosts, but no chance with self-states raised in Satanism or abusive witchcraft. Those self-states were raised in cultures rooted in theologies that [assert] such entities are more powerful and enduring than human life. And these self-states are barely orientated to the outside world. Programming is most deeply resolved when it > succeeds in changing the reality of programmed alters in the inner world. Whether such 'evil' is spiritually real or not, it is psychologically real to these self-states, and I believe it can only be dealt with as such. [pp. 128–129]

Reading this, one issue that immediately surfaces for me is the character of the belief system we are talking about here. Is it wise to "work within" the cultural world view of someone raised as a Satanist or a Luciferian, or a Nazi? Once we acknowledge that, we need to address how the belief system was installed—with abuse, tricks, and lies to our clients. In my view, we need to weaken the entire belief system so that the client can recognize they were told many lies. I told my Nazi-raised client about Barack Obama being the US president. I told the internal "programmer" of a client raised by Satanists that "Satan" (that is, the man who dressed up as him in the rituals) was dead. He was shocked, as he had been told that Satan never dies. Yes, and that he would never die if he killed his own body. This was a good opportunity for him to discover that the abusers lied.

When Lacter describes her treatment protocol for "demonic" alters, she is on the same ground, albeit with different language, as Tom Ball and myself, but these similarities occur in spite of, rather than because of, her theoretical base. It is at the conclusion of her statement that she acknowledges what I see as the real mechanism for recovery:

> I have found that to achieve 'separation' of perceived attachments, whether this mechanism is partly spiritual or only psychological, survivors must recall the rituals in which 'transfers' and 'captures' were perceived to be accomplished, and then assert their will to reject each act. I tell survivors that I believe that any act intended to spiritually control children, who are not aware that they had any choice to the contrary, can now be opposed and 'separated' spiritually and psychologically by a simple act of one's will, that we each have control of our spiritual self. I believe that an overwhelmed, frightened, and abused psyche is what permitted the perceived 'admission' of these entities and introjects. Making the trauma conscious and the exercise of free will is what allows for their rejection and separation. [ibid., my italics]

In my view, it is making the trauma conscious that creates the healing, along with the exercise of the client's free will. True, free will can be exercised in rejecting and separating perceived attachments, but it can be exercised just as well by the whole person asserting that she or he will no longer be part of any religion or belief system which does evil, without all the complications I have described.

Furthermore, the theoretical base of Lacter's discussion, which defines some alters as "attachments", builds in a real treatment limitation, which can best be understood through the review of how "demon parts" are created. The therapeutic review of these traumatic memories needs to include the parts played by all of the alters who were involved. This includes the "garbage kids", who were discarded because they refused to perform the desired evil behavior, as well as those parts who came forward to assume the responsibility of doing the lesser of such evils as, "You kill this rabbit or we will kill your baby brother," or, "You stick this cross into this person or we will do it to them and to you." The child is told that these alters, who split off to do this evil act, are not part of the child, but are "demons" or some other kind of attachment. And one can easily see how these tormented and victimized helpers could well be the alters that Lacter describes in her discussion of how the parts seen as demonic attachments can be identified:

> Many survivors easily differentiate self-states from perceived introjects or entities. For others, the therapist can help the survivor differentiate these through dialogue. Self-states, even those with a hostile veneer, usually desire some human connection with the therapist, are motivated to feel 'better', and their hostility has a quality of underlying fear and pain. Perceived introjects and entities generally do not establish a 'felt' human connection with the therapist. Instead, they demonstrate scorn for the survivor and intense hatred for the therapist. [ibid.]

Similarly, some of the sources Ball cites suggest that you can tell a demonic spirit if it slithers like a snake or has rolling eyes or looks hateful. Ball, however, is wise enough to recognize that a hostile presentation does not necessarily mean a real demonic entity. After all, any alter that has been told that it will be destroyed is going to be hostile.

I have one client in whom it took years of therapy before the cult alters could accept that I was not just another abuser testing their loyalty. (Such tests are common in the training of cult alters.) An alter in another client, whom I met very recently, was very hostile, and very much acted the role of a "spiritual attachment." It demonstrated the "scorn for the survivor and intense hatred for the therapist" that, according to Lacter, define demonic entities. I wondered why. I asked the alter whether it thought I was a member of the cult and was testing it to see whether it remained loyal. Yes, of course. This alter simultaneously believed that I was an outsider who would destroy it, and that I was a cult member who would punish it if it showed any signs of disloyalty. What a set of feelings to juggle. I got the system leader to explain to it why she had become a "traitor," and that she had known me for several years and they really were safe. Then it relaxed.

These parts may be the ultimate challenge to the therapist's understanding of dissociative self states but, in the end, they are no different from any other part. You cannot judge that some part is external to the personality system just because of its behavior, no matter how "evil" that behavior, or its attitudes or self-identity.

In my view, the way to interpret what Lacter describes is to see those parts with an extra dose of compassion, not a willingness to collude with the client's view that they are evil. It is not hard to see that such reactions are normal for an alter who has been told (1) that it is not part of the body and should kill that useless and traitorous body, and (2) that it is an evil spiritual being and if it talks to a therapist it will be destroyed. It takes patience, persistence, and kindness to break through their defenses and help them know they are now safe and do not need to continue to do their jobs.

Restoring the human dignity of alters who have been forced to perpetrate is one of the most important and difficult parts of therapy with ritual abuse and mind control survivors. For this to happen, the alters who performed the evil acts need to see how they came into being and the double binds involved. But if these alters are rejected and ousted as demons or "attachments," they lose this chance for recovery. Certainly it is possible that in some cases, with wise Christian therapy, they can come to believe that they are simply alters to whom a demon was attached, and they can get rid of it. But if the abusers told them that they were that demon, and they, along with the rest of the system, believe it, recovery will not take place.

Lacter does not see this conflict. She says that this approach yields successful outcomes, and says that she has "consistently observed that when affected self-states perceive spirits and entities to be gone, the survivor experiences tremendous relief." In fact, she says, "To date, no survivor I have worked with ever felt that they had separated a part of the self in the process" (ibid.).

Perhaps this has not happened to her. But it has to me. At my client Teresa's request, I experimented a few times with removing such parts from her, following a protocol such as that of Hawkins. She also had exorcisms in churches. The alters always came back. In LisaBri's story you saw the chaos in her system caused by her cult-aligned alters (including several "Satans"). After these parts were banished, they became even more destructive and dangerous, continuing to do their jobs but now in hiding. Suicide attempts, self-harm, and flashbacks continued, but the ANP was not aware of the causes. Those who approach such alters as demonic may be similarly unaware of the negative consequences of their recommended interventions.

What if you are a therapist who happens to be a Christian, reading this? Must you accept the approach recommended by the most vocal Christians working in this field? I do not believe so. Many Christians do not believe in "possession" as a literal fact, or in "legal agreements" between coerced children and external spiritual entities. Even among those that do, you will find Christian therapists who, like any others, can learn to detect "sheep in wolves' clothing," child alters who have been told they are evil spiritual beings, and have been forced to perpetrate through being placed in double binds. Jesus' teaching is that "by their fruits you shall know them"—in other words, an evil or a good being is distinguished not by its appearance or its supposed loyalty, but by its actions when it has an actual choice.

In twenty years of working with ritual abuse survivors, I have seen several integrate fully, and several others achieve healthy co-consciousness. I have never met a single real demon or attachment. It is true, as both Tom Ball and Ellen Lacter also point out, that putting together the memory of the events that created the belief in possession is crucial. But I disagree with the assertion that we need to believe that the possession itself is real, or to go along with the client's belief in the interest of cultural appropriateness.

As we work with abuse that is so clearly evil, it might be difficult for some to accept the fact that we will never all be able to share a position about whether evil spiritual beings exist. But what we can all agree about is that evil is about what we do, and its essence is doing harm to other people and living things. Raping little children and teaching them to kill is evil. It only muddies the waters to add notions of external forces to the treatment conversation. Evil done in the name of Jesus, or Mohammed, or Buddha, or Hitler, or Stalin, or Satan, or the "free world," or democracy, is still evil.

When we apply our theories to the question of evil, we should remain mindful of Occam's Razor, a well-known scientific concept: "One should not increase, beyond what is necessary, the number of entities required to explain anything." Dissociation offers a powerful explanation for the existence of relatively autonomous and destructive entities within someone's mind. An alter, a part of a person, separated from that person's capacity for empathy, is more able to do evil than an integrated human being.

Even the ritual abusers, who might for centuries have believed they were attaching real demons to children, now recognize they are creating dissociative disorders, as Katz states in Chapter Seven. They still tell the children they are attaching demonic spirits, or their own spirits, or the spirits of dead relatives, but they now know they are actually splitting children and naming and training the alters. Should we continue to subscribe to the belief system the abusers have implanted, even when they themselves know that it is dissociation that gives them power over their victims? Our responsibility is to help those desiring to recover from such evil to be able to do so. The answer lies in psychotherapy techniques and practices that are appropriate for mind-controlled persons with dissociative disorders. It is our job to assist our clients in moving toward a state of wholeness, whether or not it comes in the form of literal "integration." In my view, to approach evil as a set of disembodied evil entities that are attached to our clients interferes with our ability to achieve that goal.

> The belief in a supernatural source of evil is not necessary: men alone are quite capable of every wickedness (Joseph Conrad).

> Ethics . . . are nothing but reverence for life. This is what gives me the fundamental principle of morality, namely, that good consists in maintaining, promoting, and enhancing life, and that destroying, injuring, and limiting life are evil (Albert Schweitzer).

Note

1. Note the use of "G-d", which is commonly used in online survivor discussions because the word "God" is frequently triggering to survivors.

CHAPTER TEN

Dealing with programming: alternative strategies

Some programs are triggered deliberately; some, accidentally. Some programs reveal themselves early, as they are part of the abusers' plan to sabotage therapy. This can alert you to the fact that your client has mind control. Once that fact has been established, the therapist knows s/he must consider that a particular issue may be due to the activity of trained alter personalities. Instead of wasting time suggesting that the client take soothing baths to promote sleep, you can search for the alters who are responsible for the insomnia. If the client were cutting her arms, you can find the alters involved, ask how they were trained to cut and why they do it, and eventually work through these training memories. You can use whatever has been triggered to search for the trainings involved. Then, you can take care of them in some way, and eliminate or arrest the problem behavior.

Learning from what is triggered

A client of mine was triggered by an incident in which her cat caught a fly, which made a loud buzzing sound. All her alters went deep inside and hid for a week, until I saw her. Two different things were going on. In one, child parts who had been put in a pit with rotting meat and dead things and flies now began to think they were back in the pit. I had to give them a little biology lecture about flies, and make sure they knew they were safe in my client's apartment. The buzzing of the fly also brought out an alter who had been trained with electroshock administered (with a buzzing sound) by a helmet. The alter made a buzzing sound himself, which frightened all the other alters who had worn the helmet. I had to bring him out and show him that there was no helmet on his head, and he was in a safe place; he could let the others know that. I then had the alter in charge of the memory storage put the memories of the pit and of the helmet safely away, so those affected would no longer have flashbacks.

You will make your decision as to how to address a triggered program based on your treatment agenda. In treating mind control, it is wise to be systematic in your approach to therapy. Generally speaking, memory work comes only after a good deal of groundwork has been laid. (This will be discussed further in Chapter Sixteen, "Working with the traumatic memories".) In this example, it was not time to do memory work. Since we did not need to work through all the memories of the "pit" or the helmet when we found what was triggered by the fly's buzzing, we just had to put them away. Sometimes it is preferable to just turn off and put away what is triggered, and continue to work with whatever you have made your priority. However, when the triggering has produced a dangerous behavior, such as severe self-harm, it is smart to make it a priority to work through the memories of the original training, once the client is ready for memory work.

It is possible for a therapist or client to use perpetrator-group-created programs for helpful purposes. For example, an alter trained not to feel pain can reduce the pain resulting from a re-abusive group contact. An alter trained to put other alters to sleep can put to sleep alters who are programmed to go to group meetings or to harm the body. An alter trained to make the others forget events can make the alters who are supposed to report to the group what they have disclosed forget having talked about the memories.

Asking, negotiating, and commanding

Many interventions that are not useful or even wise in therapy with non-mind-controlled clients are helpful and even necessary with survivors of mind control.

Therapists may affect programs through asking, negotiating, or commanding. Naturally, I prefer to ask or negotiate before attempting to command.

But with some personality systems, asking and negotiating does not work, and verbal commands are necessary. This is because you are speaking with very young alters who are trained to respond only to commands, often phrased in a particular way. They are concrete and literalistic. They are not offended by commands.

The three little words, "Turn it off," can have profound effects. One client would leave me telephone messages, and when I replied would not pick up the phone. However, I would leave a message giving the order "Turn it off," and without the client understanding why, the problem would be alleviated.

With another client, I had to add "in the name of Satan" in order to get the young alters to comply. Since I had difficulty with that phrasing, I added "whom I don't believe in," which apparently did not give them any difficulty. So I would say "Turn off the Pain, in the name of Satan, whom I don't believe in." You can say firmly "I command you in the name of Satan, whom I don't believe in, to stop, turn off, and put away the Suicide Program" (for example). If you and/or the client are Christians, you may add "And I ask you in the name of Jesus, whom I do believe in, to stop, turn off, and put away the program."

With some clients, a general command will work, as internal programmer alters (that is, those that are trained to activate the memories which will produce symptoms) are always listening. With other clients, it will only work if you know the cult-assigned name of the internal programmer alters, and command them by name. (They do not have to be cooperating with you, and do not have to be "out" in the body, for this to work.) Internal programmers are controlled by strong obedience programs; that is why they often do not want their names known, because they do not want to be commanded by name.

One danger in doing this is that some insider alters will believe you are a member of the perpetrator group. So, if you use commands, be sure to explain to the whole system that you have learnt this from other therapists, and that you are not one of the abusers. This applies even more strongly to the use of triggers deliberately installed by the perpetrator group.

When you search for alters who are creating these problems, keep in mind that their training probably included threats of punishment to them if they did not comply with the abusers' instructions. Usually there are other alters who are supposed to punish them if they do not comply, and backups who will do their jobs if they become disloyal. You can search for the punishers and the backups and dialogue with them until they agree to turn it off. You will need to update any alters you speak with, explaining how the perpetrators can no longer hurt them (because of time and/or distance), or if the group is local and still harassing the person, the group can only hurt them if it gains access to the body.

Generally, however, as long as the trained behavior has been performed, it may be all right to turn it off, though it may be turned on again in response to a cue or to other alters' disobedience to their instructions.

With programs such as flooding of emotions, the alters involved might not feel safe in turning the program off. But you might be able to negotiate that they turn it down so that it is barely noticeable. Or you could ask the spinner alters to spin in the opposite direction, so that they spin the effects back into the original alter rather than out to the rest of the system. Or you could find a way for them to implement the program without doing harm. One client of mine used to come into therapy sessions with instructions to harm me. She would take a thumbtack from my notice board and prick me lightly with it once. Then she would say "Okay, I've done my job," and we would have no further problems. Similarly, you can have the child alters draw on their arm in red ink rather than cutting it to draw blood.

Use of perpetrator-created triggers

Most programs, if they have "on" triggers (cues which trigger trained alters to do their jobs), also have "off" triggers. Sometimes you can convince alters to show you the "off" triggers and, with their permission, can use them. Note that you do not have to know alters' names for touch triggers to be effective.

Psychologist and ritual abuse expert Randy Noblitt uses such triggers, with the client's permission, to assess whether or not they have been subjected to ritual abuse or mind control, and also to help insure the safety of survivors. He has written a monograph on those triggers which he believes will access alter personalities safely. He obtains a general informed consent where he asks the client's permission to "explore his/her mind" (Noblitt, 1998). He makes a video recording of the session that becomes the property of the client so that the individual knows what has transpired and can be assured that no further victimization has occurred. He uses benign triggers for this purpose, ones that will elicit child alters or protective, knowledgeable alters. After what he calls "dissociation of identity" occurs (and it always does to some extent) Dr Noblitt explains what occurred in terms of the individual's response to triggers. The individual has the video to study, to see how he/she was triggered and develop self-defensive responses to triggers. Dr Noblitt is always happy to explain how he obtained his knowledge. He is the first to admit that his information is not all-inclusive. The reader might have concerns about his use of this technique, but Dr Noblitt's willingness to learn, courage to employ it for the individual's benefit, and encouragement for the individual to become empowered and self-advocate make it clear that he is not a "bad guy." He has never had any response other than relief that someone has been able to unlock the door and let the secrets emerge.

I do not want to list all the triggers that I know in this book, because they could be misused. However, I can mention three that might be useful.

1. Grasping your client's arms firmly and briefly halfway between the shoulders and the elbows will turn off a spinning program temporarily.
2. Holding your hands out in front of you, palms upward, then drawing them quickly towards your chest and closing them will temporarily turn off all programs.
3. Running the fingers of your left hand down the left side of the face from the cheekbone will cause the person to forget whatever memories or flashbacks s/he has just experienced. I noticed two different clients doing this to themselves spontaneously at the end of sessions where we had dealt with traumatic memories. This enabled them to go out into the world after these sessions without being still in a state of shock from the traumatic memory.

I do not know how widespread these particular triggers are, but I have found them effective with many clients.

If you use triggers (e.g., special touches or hand signals), make sure that your client has confirmed what effect they will have on him or her and agreed to allow you to use them. Also, explain how you learned these triggers. Otherwise your client may believe that you must be one of the perpetrator group to know such things. One client finds it effective when I do these triggers on my own body. Without having to touch her, I am able to use some of them when I believe they will keep her safer. For example, I used a signal (tracing a line down the forehead) to keep her "left side" (cult-abused) alters separate from her "right side" (everyday life) alters, when the left side alters were increasing the suicidality of the right side alters.

Some triggers are common to many survivors, but some are unique. One thing that all touch triggers have in common, according to Stella Katz, is that they are installed at acupressure points. (For this reason, acupressure techniques can cause unexpected effects in this population.) The same trigger may activate or turn off different behaviors in different survivors, so be careful in using triggers. Turning off a behavior through a trigger does not mean it will not recur. Permanently deactivating the training can only be done by working through the training memory with all involved alters.

It must be remembered, however, that use of perpetrator-installed triggers by the therapist, or the use of force by certain alters of the client on other alters will be experienced by the client as coercive if the alters being triggered do not consent. Cooperation is always to be preferred to coercion, and can often be achieved. For example, an alter who is trained to harm or kill the body may agree to be put to sleep or internally isolated until the next therapy session, when the self-harm program might be undone. It is preferable to convince the internal alters to do these things rather than having the therapist do it via triggers. If and when it is necessary for the therapist to use touch triggers to turn off dangerous behaviors, an alter should first be out who does not mind being touched, and who understands that the therapist is not a group member just because s/he knows about triggers.

Program codes

Another way that alters can be helped to change their jobs is through their program codes, which are the sequences of letters and numbers which, when spoken by the correct person or in the correct manner, will turn programs on or off, or even destroy them. These are spoken signals which are taught to alters, and which alters are expected to obey. They might best be understood as similar to the touch triggers discussed in Katz's chapter. The concept is simple, but the sequence can be quite complex.

For instance, one of my mind-controlled clients had assassin programming, the codes for which were songs on a particular record album. Each song brought out a particular alter, in sequence, the second last being the assassin, and the last being one who was supposed to stand around to await getting caught, appearing crazy. The "off" code for the program was all the lengths of the songs on the album. The "off" code for a program to make him smoke was the chemical formula for nicotine.

Knowing codes and saying the "off" codes can help in undoing programming. Since it did not remove the trauma that had created the programs in the first place, it simply meant that the alters involved no longer had to do their jobs. Neutralizing the programs can be helpful, as they will then not get in the way of the therapy. The time period during which a program is turned off can allow the survivor to work through the memories of the abuses that these programs represent. Be aware that programs which have been turned off through codes sometimes get turned on again, perhaps after a time lapse or because an internal programmer alter has discovered they are turned off and turns them on again.

I do not know whether some program codes are universal, or at least universal for survivors of the same organized perpetrator group.

I do believe that it is wisest to obtain such codes, if you use them, from your client rather than from elsewhere. One client wrote down the codes for a particular set of programs, and I spoke them to her. If you use codes which the client has not given you, they might have unexpected effects, and they might alienate alters in charge of the personality system. If you have worked with your client for a long time, you might inquire whether there are any codes that could hasten the therapy process. But the psychotherapy remains to be done, even if codes have been used.

Using program codes to disarm programs can be a useful shortcut, but it does not resolve the trauma, which still must be worked through for complete recovery to occur. However, survivors of ritual abuse and mind control have suffered such extensive and traumatic abuse over such a long period of time that therapy can go on for their entire lives. Anything that can make such persons functional in a shorter period of time can be very helpful. It is up to the survivor to decide whether or not s/he wants to work through all the traumatic memories in order to have full healing, or whether s/he prefers to become relatively functional (if that is possible) without doing all this work.

Use of internal programmers for program charts

You might have heard of survivors having "internal programmer" alters. Do not be intimidated. These are alters who have been trained to turn programs on and off, in response to environmental cues. When someone speaks a program code or does a touch or sight trigger, it alerts an internal programmer to turn a program on or off, usually through flipping a switch. The programmers usually do not know what effect their switches have, but are heavily trained in obedience and in memorizing signals. In most such systems, the switches are located on control boards, such as would be found in an electrical circuit-breaker box. Every switch is labeled, usually with some kind of shorthand representing what the training was, when and where it was done, and how many times it was repeated at what ages. The labeling is similar to Jeannie Riseman's description of her inner structures in Chapter Six.

Most deliberately structured personality systems have some kind of control system for the programs. When a client has reached the point where his or her personality system is working together effectively, the therapist may ask the internal programmers to put together a chart of all the programs existing within that system, based on the labels on the switches. Once that is done, it is possible to work through the programming memories systematically to permanently disable the programs and rescue the alters from their traumas.

As an example, here is how one client's internal programmer described his instructions:

1. To turn on a program, hit the black button, speak the program, and then press in the two-numbered code.
2. To close the program, hit the red button, speak the program, then press in the reversed two-numbered code.
3. The first number or numbers followed by a comma is the Programmer level that can activate that code. (There was a programmer alter on every level of the system: levels 1 to 9 reflected ages five to thirteen, and level 0 meant every level.)
4. The numbers after the comma are the numbers in the alphabet of the first letter of words except the last, and the last letter of the last word of the program title.

So, for example, the code for the program "Watching You" was 0 – 23 – 21. The number "0" meant that programmers at all levels held this program. The numbers 23 and 21 after that were for the W in Watching and the U in You. I would not have to speak the level numbers, but if I were going to dismantle the program by going through the memories with the client, I would have to make sure to deal with all nine instances in which the training was given.

Each program also had a spoken code, which would turn the program on or off if spoken. For example, one program to make the client go home was triggered by the words "butter tarts," which were innocuously inserted into a letter from the client's aunt. To turn this program off I would have to say "Butter tarts 19 – 2." The program to make the client go with someone was triggered by the word "cigarette."

There were around 200 programs listed. Their content was similar to what we discussed in Chapter Eight. Some interesting titles were “therapist no clothes”, “drive fast,” “act insane,” “show mother’s face,” “jam thoughts,” “miss family,” “shoot outsider,” and “little ones explore sex.”

With a list and chart like the one this programmer gave me, it is possible both to turn off programs that have been triggered, and to identify the programs for working through the memories. It should be noted that another inside alter (hidden as a sub-alter of an alter with a different job) controlled a different set of programs.

Creating program “wiring diagrams”

The abusers of my first four survivors, who were involved with the same Satanic coven, began to instruct their alters about what to do if I attempted to work through programming memories in order to destroy the programs. Each program that I attempted to undo (through working through the memory) was attached to another program, which was turned on as soon as I interfered with the first program. Some personality systems have this connection between programs built in. For example, if we attempted to undo a suicide program, it might trigger a program to harm the therapist, and if we attempted to undo the program to harm the therapist, it might trigger a program to not understand English, and if we attempted to undo that program, it might trigger a program to fall asleep in the session. Sometimes the wiring was circular: for example, in the above scenario, working through the “Sleep” program might trigger a suicide program.

To battle this, Jennifer learned to bring “wiring diagrams” to sessions, describing what program would be set off if we interfered a particular program. Jennifer and I would examine the wiring diagram together and select the weakest link; this would usually be a program we had already worked through, or one that was minimally harmful. We would start there, and work our way through the sequence backwards.

The key to dismantling or neutralizing programming is in the work with the personality system. We will look at this in the next chapter. In the following sections, we will address the first step of the process: unlocking your client’s mind-controlled system.

Is “deprogramming” effective?

The term “deprogramming” is used in various ways. “Deprogrammers” such as Steve Oglevie who work specifically with ritual abused or mind control survivors appear to know a great deal about the specific illusions implanted in the minds of survivors programmed by different groups, and the program codes which have been implanted by these groups. Deprogrammers such as Oglevie attempt to discover the type of structured personality system, speak the codes, and rescue the alters from the perceived abuses or internal situations in which they are trapped. (Oglevie, for one, also believes in removing spiritual “attachments” from such survivors. This will be addressed at the end of this chapter.) The deprogramming is conducted over a period of several days.

Therapists who have taken their clients to such deprogrammers report mixed results. It appears that the client's stage of recovery, along with his or her trust in her therapist, has an effect on whether or not such deprogramming is effective. Randy Noblitt has done some of this work, and he sees this strategy as the equivalent of using temporary shutdown codes. He posted his concern to the Ritual Abuse and Mind Control Discussion List (reprinted by permission). He does not "deprogram", he says, because ". . . people are not computers even though they may be abused and under traumatic circumstances they may come to believe that they have computers installed inside them. . . . I do not believe any of us can 'deprogram'—the brain is not a programmable/nonprogrammable computer."

Noblitt is also critical of the process because in his experience it leads to complications: ". . . it only [gives] a temporary but false sense of recovery to clients (comparable to premature integration)." After applying a method he had learnt to "deprogram" robot alters, he found that

> . . . the method worked but it kept me and the client in an interminable loop of deprogramming rather than attending to the necessary therapy. For example . . . It took about 20 minutes for each robot and I could "remove" the robot alters one at a time. However, my client had 1,000 robot alters. Had we continued with that goal in mind we would have been sidetracked and missed the important therapy that she needed.

In fact, Noblitt found that for his client, deprogramming was not even a shortcut. He developed a way to integrate these "robots" in "less than 15 minutes", without codes or passwords. In the end, he cautions, "Many of the tunnels, mazes, computers, files, etc. [found in these clients] can keep a therapist and client distracted from the work of therapy for a long time."

Effective shortcuts

As Randy Noblitt reminds us in his previously cited post, "In order to become psychologically healthy[,] the survivor needs to access the parts, hear their stories, integrate affect, memory, sensation, behavior, etc."

So, are any shortcuts really effective? Some are. One of my mind control survivor clients developed his own shortcut. It was "Whatever they told you to do, do the opposite." He spent several years actively psychotic while many bizarre programs were set off. Once he got his inner kids to "do the opposite," his system settled down, he began to access the significant abuse memories, and he is now much more functional.

The key to either using a pre-existing shortcut (e.g., finding out program codes) or developing a new shortcut, like this man did, is for the whole personality system to work together in the service of healing. The alters in charge need to decide to do this. If they do, many things are possible. This survivor is not fully healed, but he has become functional, which is a huge step forward for him.

This may well be the key to all effective shortcuts. As therapist Arauna Morgan wrote to the Ritual Abuse and Mind Control Discussion List (reprinted by permission),

> Of the survivors I know, one common thread seems to be that they finally decided that they have had enough. Some of the most impressive deprogramming I have seen was various ways of stating just that, "I have had enough and I no longer accept . . . (fill in the blank)."

Survivors' self-help strategies and other wisdom

Jeannie Riseman, MSW, has been a leading light in the ritual abuse and mind control survivor community for many years. We saw her perspective on mind control in Chapter Two, and a description of her own programming in Chapter Six. In the following contribution she offers her own expertise, as well as that of another survivor, C. "Cheryl" A. Beck, supported by the power of their creativity, experience, and humor, about how to deal with programming. Your mind-controlled clients are not passive patients who merely receive treatment. They can be, and are, quite active participants in identifying and changing their own programming. You will see examples of this throughout this book, and especially here. Not only does Riseman personalize this issue, but, in my view, the strategies and understanding of her selves that she developed can provide invaluable information and ideas, as well as reassurance, for therapists.

Programming. taking the wind out of its sails:[1] Jeannie Riseman

Finding out about the programming

In a group I attended years ago, we were asked to pretend that we had been molested and write about the experience in detail. Some amazing things came out, because the "it's just pretend" framework helped to bypass the inner censor. I remembered doing this, and said to myself, "I'm going to pretend I'm multiple and draw my system." Simple technique, but the system was so complex it took three months to get all the information.

Dealing with programmed thoughts and urges

Here's a very simple technique that I often use when I do not have the faintest idea what is going on. It is the same method I used for dealing with my ordinary internal prejudice, a technique anyone can use for dealing with conditioned thoughts and responses.

When I have a thought or urge that seems cult-related

1. I name and label it as soon as I become aware of it.
2. I refuse to act on it.
3. I let the issue go—I do not brood on it.

To name a thing is to take away some of its power. A name is like an anchor in my mind. Labeling a thought "programming" clearly brackets the thought that I find undesirable and separates it from the "me" that I value. It is now something that was taught me without my permission, not my own thinking.

Steps two (not acting on it) and three (letting it go) are weakening the programming by not reinforcing it. Refusing to act on it—refusing to cut, for example—is avoiding reinforcement and avoiding buying into the perps' value system. And refusing to brood on it, to beat myself up over it, is equally an avoidance of reinforcement. If I spend three days agonizing over having had a suicidal thought, that is three days of driving that thought deeper into the grooves of my mind.

Note that this is not the same as denial. I am not shoving anything under the rug. I acknowledge it, deal with it, and move on. If I slip, I make amends to myself and move on. But I do not solidify the programming by thinking about it all day and all night.

Here is how I used the technique to deal with a cult-implanted "don't talk" program.

At one point I told my therapist something I was never supposed to remember, let alone talk about. The internal backlash was something fierce. I was haunted by strong urges to suicide, mostly in particularly revolting ways. So I tried thinking "programming" every time I spotted a self-destructive thought.

What happened? For starters, it seemed like every third word I thought was the word "programming." I had no idea that the "kill yourself if you tell" program was that compelling. "Wow! They really did a number on me, didn't they? I wonder how they did it?" My mental attitude changed from fighting suicidal impulses, trying not to think those thoughts, to curiosity about the past. Which was great, because trying not to think something is a losing battle, and consumes a vast amount of energy, besides.

Step two. I gave my kitchen knives to my best friend to hold and re-committed myself to not acting on suicidal urges. Just let them be. If I act on them, I will never get a chance to understand where they came from and what they mean. I am sure I would have experienced some relief if I had cut, but I chose to stay with the thoughts and feelings and see what happened.

Step three. After I labeled the suicidal thought as programming, I turned my attention back to everyday activities. No point in hanging on to it, for surely it was going to come back by itself. Meanwhile, might as well get something accomplished.

I walked around my home describing all the things that were mine. "This is my refrigerator, and I can buy and eat anything I want now. I don't have to eat what I am told to, like in the old days. I can eat spaghetti or ice cream for three days straight if I feel like it, or I can stir-fry spinach with olive oil and a whole head of garlic. I can do whatever I damn well please. Isn't that great?"

And so I "out-Zenned" the program, rather than fighting it, and it ran its course and faded. I emerged from the situation feeling more empowered. There was more of "me" and less of the programming. The next time a suicidal program kicked in, it was less intense and lasted a shorter time.

I then proceeded to fine-tune this simple technique. I tried talking to the program as if it were an alter. I praised its strength, intelligence, and sophistication. I could almost feel the programming smile. (Of course, I was not really talking to the program, I was talking to the alter or to that part of my mind that had learned the program.)

I also spent some time telling that part that nothing bad would happen if we broke the rules now. I explained that there was nobody around to enforce the old rules, and so they did not really apply any more. They had stopped being rules. We were free!

Educate. Accept. Do not arm-wrestle with programming. Work with, rather than against, my parts and my programming. Cool.

Dealing with the programmed parts rather than the programs

I would like to share this contribution from one of my heroines, C. "Cheryl" A. Beck. She wrote about dissolving a complex mirrors/everything backwards/matrix program by talking past it to the underlying parts that had been programmed. I am paraphrasing from her e-mails with her permission.

> I had a diamond matrix. The front side opened like butterfly wings. This was the open access side, which I could enter easily. It was composed of RA stuff like complicated belief systems such as the Kabbalah. I could've spent a lifetime confused and lost trying to figure it all out.
> The ever-present threat looming in the background was Draco the Dragon that patrolled the "Dark Side of the Moon." This was the backside of the diamond where the real MC programming was stored. The rest was just a cover. This part of the matrix fell under "Draconian Law"—death to me and my family if Draco reported disobedience by me to my MC handler. Draco was the ultimate internal perp. There were also others like the Iceman, who froze me if I got too close to an MC memory.
> The facets of the diamond were mirrors which multiplied one image and made them into dozens. This was all meant to confuse and overwhelm. In fact the mirrors were alter fragments doing a job to keep me safe, to keep me away from the MC memories. What worked for me was simply to congratulate them on a job well done and to find something else for them to do. My fragments usually just threw away their jobs and blended with a protector alter.
> The need for backwards communication and pairing of opposites was also a way to keep me safe by confusing me and leading me away from the MC memories so I didn't have to be accessed and re-trained by torture. I communicated internally that I was a competent adult free from the cult/MC world now, and I had no need for that type of "safe communication" anymore. I promoted those fragments from that type of confusing communication to straightforward reconnaissance. Whatever the fragments understand and desire to become works.
> After a while I "got it," from head knowledge into my very "knower." It was my mind that created all this. They didn't insert a matrix into my brain. All material constructs and figures and images were actually little kids—alters or alter fragments imitating perps, dragons, colors—all in the interest of keeping us safe from further harm or torture. When I got it on a gut level, the construct came to an end quickly. It literally blew up and freed all the alters, instead of killing them in the explosion, which was the lie they had believed.
> Lying fuckwads.

It was very reassuring to learn that the same technique worked for Cheryl and for me. Maybe my instincts were right after all! I just knew in my bones that it was not necessary to get all fancy and complicated to deal with programming, no matter how complex it might be. It just felt right to use simple, proven, everyday, common sense techniques. It also felt instinctively right to use love and respect and friendship to counter the mind-fucking that had been done to me.

Look at it this way: I spent many long years of hard work learning Latin, which is a highly complex language. I learnt it very well, too. Got straight As. But I do not have to think or speak Latin today. Just because I learnt it does not mean I have to use it. I prefer to speak English. Of course, the difference is that no part of me ever believed I had to use Latin for the rest of my life, while many parts of me believed that I could never escape the cult system and way of thinking and behaving.

My complex programming initially frightened me. I thought it was so exotic, so otherworldly, that I did not have a fighting chance against it. It did not help that the system contained no recognizable alters. Everything was geometric patterns and mathematical codes, and I had no idea how to talk to non-Euclidean geometric figures. What could I say? “Nice figure! You are really flexible!” I was totally snowed. How could I unravel it if I did not have the codes? The codes would let me remember, but I had to remember to get the codes. Impasse.

I soon realized that I was thinking using the premises of the programming. It had been designed to block me, and as long as I thought in its terms, I was, indeed, blocked. I had to think outside the box.

I have come to believe that it does not work well to use the perpetrators’ framework. By doing so, you are buying into their belief system and reinforcing it. Just like I cannot see how to teach children not to hit by hitting them. Or teaching people not to kill by killing them. All it teaches is that the strong get to do what they want to the weak. Besides, if I use the perp’s weapons, I feel like a perp myself. I do not like it. I usually feel miserable enough as it is without purposefully adding to those bad feelings.

It dawned on me that a sentient part of me must have been present when my mind learnt all that mysterious math junk. I decided to work with the part or parts of myself that had learnt all this stuff. Back then, I had been an everyday child, with likes, dislikes, fears, dreams, head colds, and much-hated brown socks. I might not have the vaguest idea what to say to the programming, but I sure as hell know how to talk to an eight-year-old.

I started to talk past the system to the child I had been, and still am in some frozen part of my mind. “There’s nobody around who will hurt you. They hurt you back then, but now is real different. They aren’t here anymore.” And for the very little parts, “Bad guys all gone bye-bye!”

With my biological children, especially when they were young, I would over-simplify whatever I was talking about. As they caught on, I made things more complex, matching my explanation to their developmental stage. I figured that it was worth a try working with myself and assumed that there were parts of my mind that were still operating on a child-like level. Even if it did not work, I was convinced that the very fact that I was using commonsense things that any teacher or mother knows instinctively would help me cut the mind-control programming down to size in my own mind. I was no longer paralyzed when thinking about it. I had a plan and some hope.

Looking back, I see that instinctively I did three simple but effective things.

1. I set the stage for respectful internal communication.
2. I educated myself internally about the present and about the past and its effects.
3. I offered opportunities, but did not try and change anything internally

Step One: Setting the stage

I start by giving permission to my parts to learn, without being coercive. “Anybody who wants to listen can. Nobody has to. Anybody who isn’t listening can ask others inside about what I said. And I will explain again, too, in case you want to listen later on.” I’ve snuck in the idea of freedom of choice.

“Anybody who objects to or doesn’t like what I am saying can let me know if they want to. Anybody who wants to give me information may, as long as it’s okay inside.”

I try to keep it casual. I do not want to sound frantic and scare my parts or make them feel as if I have a heavy agenda.

(As an aside, I had a friend who spoke to his alters like this, "Listen up, ass-holes!" He did not get a lot of internal cooperation by being rude. Exorcism does not encourage internal cooperation, either, in my opinion. It just scares alters and sends them into hiding.) [Author's note: This parenthetical observation mirrors the conversation in Chapter Nine, on attachments.]

Step Two: Then I educate and explain in simple language

I explain that we were raised by people who liked kids to obey and liked to hurt kids. But those people are not around any more. We do not have to follow their rules. We do not have to agree with them any more. We can make up our own rules. We can change our rules any time we want.

I steer away from words that have a weird connotation to me. "Safe" for example, means to many of my parts that I am locked up, and that therefore I cannot hurt anybody or anything. I am "safe" because I am imprisoned. This is not a message that I am trying to convey inside, so I avoid the word and find words that were not used back then. "Okay" is a fine substitute, as my perps were too proper and snotty to use that word. If I find that I am getting anxious or panicky, I take a look at the words I have just used and apologize inside and ask if I need to add to my list of double-meaning words.

I describe my present life. "This is my bed. These are my sheets and pillowcases. I bought them myself because they are pretty. I sleep alone in my bed. Nobody comes to my bed to bother me. Never! Those days are all in the past. I can sleep with stuffed animals if I want. This is my purple frog. I can go to sleep whenever I want and I can sleep as long as I want. I can get up in the middle of the night to pee if I want. I don't have to ask anybody's permission."

I explain all the psychological things I have learned about PTSD and dissociation. I explain amnesia, alters, and flashbacks. Again, I keep it simple. The young parts can understand.

"This is a flashback. It feels yucky. It's something we are remembering. Once long ago we forgot it, and now we are remembering. It isn't happening now. It just feels like it is because the memory is so strong. But that's okay. It's like the mind is burping up a memory. Burp! Feels better after you burp."

I do this at random times during the day when I am relatively calm, as well as in an emergency. Years ago, when all this was new to me and I was flooded, I held a stuffed rabbit and patted it, saying, "Of course you're afraid. You'd have to have rocks in your head not to be afraid. It's okay to be afraid now." Day after day I repeated the same message. In time, with repetition, it got through. My feelings had been normal, there was nothing wrong with me, and I was in a different situation now, one where I could feel my feelings.

Step Three. Without trying to change anything inside, I offer opportunities

"Would anybody like to learn how to make an omelet? There is a pretty nifty omelet maker around here, and maybe that omelet maker would enjoy teaching you all. Nobody has to learn, but you are welcome to watch and learn if you want." "Anybody there who never got to choose what kind of ice cream to eat? Yeah? How would you like to choose what kind we're going to buy today?" I think what I am doing is expanding the number of jobs and skills each fragment has, without challenging their fundamental sense of self.

I also explain things to my drivers. "We'd like to drive carefully and calmly. We will watch all the traffic signs, the cars, the bicycles, the pedestrians. Under these conditions, anybody can drive who wants to." (I do not use negatives, like "we won't hit anybody," because the unconscious tends to ignore the negative and hear "hit a pedestrian.") And I thank them afterwards and say it was a great job.

This worked with my biological children, by the way. If they knew how they were expected to behave, they did, as long as there were not any disconcerting surprises. It was usually ignorance and confusion that made them behave inappropriately.

I have been talking about building relationships inside. The same principles, however, apply to interactions between alters and a therapist, partner, or friend. Giving information about the present is very useful, as long as it is offered gently. It is never a good idea to be pushy. The idea is to avoid arguments, to offer information in a non-threatening manner, and to convey an attitude of respect and interest.

Frightening alters are usually acting that way in order to save the system as a whole from real or perceived harm. It's not personal! Compliments often help make a connection. "Gee! You are really fierce! I bet you would be wonderful at protecting others from harm. Has anybody ever told you that? One of your friends, maybe?" Aggressive alters are generally feared inside, and this may be the first time somebody has had a calm conversation with them. They might tell you sadly that they have no friends.

Information can be tailored to match the alter's age, previous experience, and interests. Simple things, like offering choices in the present (chocolate or vanilla ice cream?) can introduce new and earth-shattering concepts, like freedom of choice, learning new things instead of being frozen in one rigid mold, and respect and reciprocity.

It is not always easy going, of course. When things get rocky, alters appreciate an honest apology and an admission that they have not been understood. There will be many misunderstandings, but as long as they are treated with and respect and caring, relationships can be created.

To summarize how I work with my parts: I talk to myself, respectfully, reassuringly. I educate. I open doors to new experiences and viewpoints. And I try never, ever, to be coercive, or know-it-all, or bossy. I want to be as different as possible from my perps. I try to accept and work with, rather than against, my parts and my programming. I do this even though I do not have conventional people-like alters inside. It does not seem to have done any harm, at least so far.

Within this simple framework you can add almost anything you can imagine. Some people make an internal "healing pool" for newly awakened alters to wash away the hurt and pain. Some make a special place where there are kind and competent alters to take care of the wounded ones. Some find relief in making small internal changes, like laying an hourglass on its side or giving a frightening fire-breathing dragon the job of lighting a fire for coffee every morning. The number of ways you can adjust things to suit your system is limited only by your—and your therapist's and friends'—imagination.

Start simple, see what works and what does not, and then tweak my technique. Accept. Educate. Work with, rather than against, my parts and my programming.

Working with the inner world

People's inner worlds are not all the same. Some, like that which Trish Fotheringham described, have magic castles and woodlands; others have prisons and fortresses and control rooms and various military installations. Some have places they describe as different worlds and other planets. People with spontaneous, self-created DID often have internal "houses" in which alters live, often copies of the houses they lived in when the abuse occurred. Or they may simply have no inner world, and the alters disappear into blackness when they go inside. In ritual abuse and mind control survivors, however, the alters are arranged in a hierarchy, and often reflect whether their abuser group is military, Satanic, Kabbalah, etc. It may be possible to identify the type of abuser group by the type of inner world they create.

Here is one survivor's highly detailed description of an inner world which is very different from those we have looked at so far, how she worked with it, and how she managed to dismantle it.

Dismantling my inner structures: Robin Morgan

> The purpose of my programming was to create alters who were trapped or imprisoned in an internal structure that could be seen by the system internally, if they knew where to look. Alters were only released long enough to perform a prearranged function, then they returned to the structure. In my inner world, every part of the structure, even the booby traps, was an alter, programmed to be something else.
>
> Deep inside, there were walls containing the only alters that had not been programmed. If I talked to them, the wall would dampen not only what they said, but also the emotions they projected. I learnt to thin the wall in order to communicate with them. The cult had discovered these alters, sometimes years after their programming was done, and just neutralized them by enclosing them in walls. There was gold in those walls! Those were the alters that would later help rescue programmed alters and dismantle the program structures.
> In my system there were entities that would attack if not appeased in a prescribed way. After all of the entities were pleased and calm, no traps would be tripped. At one time, I thought the entities were not part of my system, so I tried to send them away. I found that they kept coming back; they no longer attacked, but were still there. I learnt that when something does not go away, there is an alter in it somewhere. There were often shells that contain alters. The shell could look or act like anything that can be imagined, even a real alter, but they were not themselves alters. There were layers of shells.
> I noticed that all shells would start to lose definition and turn into blobs when separated from their original placement by the programmer. I had an internal safe place where I put all rescued alters. There was one alter that I pulled out of a cement floor. The alter looked like a fetus. It did not move, > but I knew it was alive. I could not help that alter right away, so I left it in the safe place, while I tried to figure out what to do. A week later it had degraded into a blob. I thought it did not belong and tried to send it away, but it would not leave. I finally opened it, as one would unwrap a present, and there was an alter inside.

> My programming would be "unlocked" by a programmer to improve upon the training of an obedient alter, then would be "locked" by the programmer to trap alters within the structure if they were no longer useful to the cult. Alters who were designed as mythical creatures were created at the top and bottom of the Tree of Life. Then an alter was created with the sole purpose of antagonizing the two creatures and turning them against each other. In my system there were several such scenarios where I had to convince the alters that the true enemy was outside and we needed to cooperate to be able to better our lives.
> I took apart one structure by myself, using my primary alters as caregivers for the rescued alters. Then I was ready to take a break before diving into the next structure, but my primary alters did not wait; that night and every night thereafter, they worked at dismantling structures and rescuing the alters that were trapped inside. Daytime was reserved for me to remember exactly what the programmer said for the part of the structure that we worked on, to be able to finish dissolving the structure and freeing the alters inside.
> My primary alters are very helpful and often work on problems on their own. Most of the time I am aware of what they are working on, because I have asked them for help and I feel slightly dissociated while they work. They dismantle the programming structures at night, so I do not get a very good night of sleep when this occurs.
> The last and very necessary step of dismantling the structure, for me, was to remember exactly what the programmer told me and the imagery that I created from this; once I realized that the structure was that way because of what someone told me, I was able to dissolve it permanently. Strangely, just knowing that the programmer told me to make it that way did not work; I had to remember exactly what he said, and what I did in response. What I did in response to what they said was just as important as what they said for me to get rid of the structure.

As you see in this example, much can be discovered about the nature of the personality system and about the abuse by exploring the inner world. And much healing can occur by the client's making deliberate changes in that world.

Exploring the inner world, detecting the ways in which alters are trapped there, and then improving the conditions for the resident alters—who, after all, are just dissociated parts of the survivor—can go a long way to assist your client in healing. The preceding articles may be shared with survivors, who often seek, and share, recovery tips and stories with other survivors. As a therapist, you can gently facilitate the process. You can inquire—perhaps more through "wondering aloud" than directly asking—about where the alters are housed in the inner world. Often there are alters in dungeons, cages, and other unpleasant places where their real body was placed during the abuse. When those alters are discovered, you can work with the personality system to help bring them up to date, and internally provide anything they might need. Often alters represent unmet needs of the person from childhood; some of these needs can be met by internal caregivers; friends can also provide caring, acceptance, and play. We all need play. In her inner world, for instance, one of my clients has little ones bouncing around in “space suits” that prevent emotions and body pain from leaking from one alter into another. The wonderful thing about an inner world is that it can be redesigned to give all insiders whatever they need.

Many survivors, especially of ritual abuse, have programming for internal world disasters. An inner world earthquake is created by shaking up both the model of the world and the child. A tidal wave is created by flooding the world model and simultaneously almost drowning the child. Tornadoes are created with a leaf blower or wind tunnel, and you can imagine how inner world fires are made. An alter is instructed to set off these programs in response to certain triggers, and the rest of the system then experiences the destruction of the inner world by whatever means was used in the program. Often alters are believed to have been “killed” internally, presumably suffering whatever the child suffered during the original programming. It is important to be aware of these programs and to anticipate them by speaking with the alters in charge of them. In my experience, their use is reserved for cases of serious disloyalty. If alters have been “killed” internally, there is nothing to stop the system from creating a magical river in which they can be placed to revive them.

As alters in the inner world leave their original places and begin to interact with others, there may need to be some rules, like no abusing other alters. Those who have always been in charge may need to learn new internal parenting methods, as often they can be authoritarian and critical or even abusive, copying what they saw in the outside world. They can learn, or they can be relieved of their duties and do something else that they like, while other alters can take over the parenting or management of the inside world. With your help, you client can create a functional inner family to replace the one that the abusers made in their own dysfunctional image. You will learn more about this in Chapter Seventeen, “Successful resolution: co-consciousness or integration”.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

"Stabilization" takes on a new meaning

Destabilization is characterized by traumatic intrusions such as flashbacks, nightmares, body memories, emotional states of sadness, anxiety, and despair, and, sometimes, PTSD-related symptomatology suggesting bipolar disorder or psychosis, all of which are severely disruptive and painful. Self-harm and suicide attempts are often methods survivors use to try to reduce these unbearable intrusions. Dissociative disorders are a defense against trauma-related overwhelm, and therapists walk a fine line, trying to balance between the denial and numbing which impedes recovery and the horror of post-trauma flashbacks. The commonly recommended approach for treating people with dissociative disorders is that the therapist should achieve stabilization, and then begin working with the traumatic memories.

Survivors of ritual abuse and mind control experience these symptoms, but not for the same reasons as other survivors and often in the extreme.

Ritual abuse and mind control survivors often continue to be at risk for dangers in later life, such as harassment of survivors, family members, and pets via physical and sexual abuse, poisonings, and break-ins. Therapists are also sometimes affected. Worse, like destabilization symptoms, those threats seem to accelerate when survivors are in treatment. Historically, these dangers have been seen as originating from all-powerful, omnipresent (yet often unidentifiable), relentless and unstoppable perpetrators. This view of abusers, along with the view that ritual abuse and mind control puts survivors so at risk when they pursue recovery, has made survivors afraid to go to therapy, and therapists afraid to treat them. But here is something we did not know in the beginning, and many who work with these survivors still do not understand: these two phenomena are connected, and their etiology is not what you might think.

Perpetrators realize that they will not have the time or resources to keep track of children they have abused when they reach adulthood. The group regards the child as their property. Because of that, they get the grown children to do this for them. Most survivors have ongoing contact with their abuser groups in one way or another. This occurs whether they are in therapy or not, and results in ongoing access and survivors' involvement in continuing activities throughout their lives, especially if they are living in the same vicinity. Most important with regard to the issue of recovery is the fact that it is these clients' own alters who are contacting cult members and that they report not only any physical relocation, but also whether survivors are in treatment, with whom, and what they are disclosing there. This allows the group to take actions which trigger alters to behave in ways that sabotage their recovery.

Mind controllers have researched ordinary post-trauma intrusions, and have co-opted them for the purposes of controlling their victims. Mind control survivors are particularly likely to produce these symptoms when they remember or disclose their abuse or otherwise disobey the rules. In the early stages of a survivor's disobedient pursuit of mind control recovery, alters not only release partial flashbacks or body memories, disrupt therapy with frequent crises and/or quit it, but also may harm the body, and make suicide attempts. The abusers have also trained the alters to manifest symptoms of virtually any mental illness. These important additional considerations, both internal and external, make stabilization much more difficult to achieve than with other dissociative clients, and much more important for safety in a concrete way.

Because of this, disclosures about the organized abuse early in therapy are particularly dangerous to the client, and sometimes to the therapist. Before treatment can proceed, these are things you must understand and address. I cannot overestimate how important it is for therapists working with these survivors to recognize the degree of risk involved here. But the good news is that we now know that the risk—and the power to protect from the risk—begins with the client.

Current contact with perpetrator groups

In the past, signs of current perpetrator involvement in mind-controlled survivors were seen as unstable client behavior not unlike that of an abused woman who cannot stay away from her partner. However, when therapists attempted to address them in the same way as with all other clients, by working on mindfulness or grounding techniques, assertiveness, boundaries, and self esteem, the problems continued, and increased. Relatedly, the reassurance that many therapists are used to giving their incest survivor clients, "that was then and this is now," not only proved useless, but dangerous, to such survivors. It also rang false to their dissociative inner systems. Our knowledge of "current contact" activities with abusers has allowed us to deal with this issue. The key here is that this term "current contact" describes not only the activities that continue to victimize these people, but also the method through which abuser groups ensure the ongoing contact that allows them access. One way the latter is accomplished is through "access programming," through which perpetrators find out if any secret information is disclosed to outsiders, including therapists. It is extremely important for the therapist and client to understand precisely how this works.

Even when there is not current involvement, usually there is one (or more than one) alter who is trained to report to the group. The contact will generally be hidden from view and from consciousness. These alters believe that the perpetrators already know what the person has done and said, and even what he or she thinks, as we saw in Chapter Eight. These alters believe that if they do not report this to the group, the abusers will punish them severely or punish someone else (inside or outside) because of them. Once the perpetrators have this information, they become active in attempting to shut down these disclosures.

As soon as you even suspect that your client is a survivor or ritual abuse or mind control, you should (1) assess whether or not s/he is currently involved with the perpetrating group, and (2) find a way to prevent alters from reporting to the perpetrators.

Not only will that protect your clients' therapy, it will also be the first step in helping them to be free from all other future forms of current contact-related abuse. Your clients' alters have no idea that they have choices, and how much power they really hold.

How to identify whether your client has current involvement

In the early 1990s, some of the literature on ritual abuse stated that virtually all clients continue to have current involvement in "the cult." The current view held by many trauma therapists is that the opposite is true—that the abuse which began in childhood is now over and the client can recover in safety, the only danger being from his or her own self-harm. The truth appears to be somewhere in between.

Many clients in the early stages of realizing that they have experienced ritual abuse and/or mind control believe it was in the past. However, this is because their involvement is hidden via alter personalities. As a therapist, it may be some months or even years before you know whether your client has any ongoing contact with dangerous people. In the worst-case scenario, you will find your client is fully involved in a perpetrator group, attending rituals, participating in the training of other members, and carrying out other crimes. I remember my shock when my client, Tony, told me he had found himself waiting at midnight at the corner gas station to be picked up by the cult van for a ceremony.

It is also true that there are also many clients who have not had contact with their perpetrator groups for many years and appear to have been completely dropped by them. You have seen this in Trish Fotheringham's story. Errors in programming, a rebellious nature, or a difficulty keeping information nicely segregated in hidden pockets of memory or alter personalities have rendered many survivors useless to their programmers; after measures have been taken to "cap" their memories, they are turned loose to fend for themselves. Other survivors move far away from their abusers to a location where the perpetrator group does not function. Sometimes the group itself has disbanded, or its original purpose (such as the Cold War, for some military/political groups) no longer exists (though the actions often continue, with different excuses).

However, the client does not need to be in constant contact with the group in order for contact to be established under certain circumstances. In Chapter Eight, you saw that many of the lies that these groups teach their victims are aimed at preventing the person's total separation from the group. Even when these survivors begin to remember their abuse and seek out therapy, the rule of secrecy still prevails. Even a client who has not had any contact with their perpetrator group for many years might end up reporting to the perpetrator group and reactivating harassment by them.

Even if there is minimal group contact, it is common that clients maintain contact with their families of origin. In most cases, a family member or the person's whole family was involved with the perpetrator group when the client was a child. Even if there is minimal group contact, it is common that clients maintain contact with their families of origin. It is difficult to tell whether they are reporting to family members about their therapy because they could be reporting in a dissociated identity state and have no memory of doing so. At the same time, therapists need to understand that failure to maintain contact with the family could arouse suspicion, and aside from the fact that the client might genuinely care about his or her family members, it is probably best that the client not deviate from their usual contact patterns, unless they have some other urgent reason, such as preventing abuse of their own children.

In the past, I have heard some therapists say they will only work with ritual abuse survivors if there is no current contact. It is not really practical to insist on such a guideline. It might not be discovered for quite a while that a client who sincerely believed he or she had no current contact has unknowingly been fully involved in group activities. It is also possible that a client who realized that he or she was currently involved would lie about it in order to stay in therapy.

My advice, therefore, is to proceed on the assumption that your ritual abuse or mind control client may have current involvement. If you are not prepared to deal with that, it would be best to refer your client to another therapist as soon as possible. Once you get into the middle of undoing all the programming, it will be difficult and complicated for the client and the new therapist to make the change. My other advice is to delay soliciting disclosures about the abuse until you have worked sufficiently with the personality system so that the client will not report to the perpetrators about what goes on in therapy. Simply stated, you do need to assume that a part of them is trained to report.

Indicators of recent and/or ongoing perpetrator contact, harassment, triggering, and/or abuse

In the early 1990s, Pamela Reagor, in a handout distributed at a workshop, listed the following indicators that recent or current contact is occurring:

a. Sudden onset of disruption in therapy structure, e.g., missed appointments, disappearance for days, inability to find the therapy office.
b. Sudden onset of disruption in therapeutic relationship, e.g., severe mistrust (not attributable to natural process of new alters beginning to participate in therapy more overtly), fearful inability to talk or to respond to innocuous questions, obvious withholding of information.
c. Sudden onset or persistent recurrence of claims of inability to believe that the ritual abuse history is true, inability to understand “this multiple business” or “this programming stuff,” sometimes with repeated requests for repeated explanations.
d. Persistent failure for the MPD system to agree to and follow through with special precautions for personal safety (e.g., “be with someone tonight,” “don’t answer the telephone yourself,” etc.)
e. Evidence (conservatively gathered) that other MPD survivors feel afraid of the person, and may have had their therapy disrupted after contact with the person.

f. Reports (often only in response to therapist inquiry) of numerous hang-up calls, repeated wrong numbers, strange sounds or messages on telephone answering machines.
g. Problematic response to therapeutic inquiry regarding security leaks in MPD/DDNOS system—e.g., "Is there anyone in there who tells cult people what we talk about in therapy sessions?"
h. Evidence of recent reprogramming:
    (i) Bruises, pin pricks, blisters, other pains or marks, especially after lost time and with no plausible other explanation.
    (ii) New personalities, who may or may not know the therapist, but have confused histories or no significant childhood or adolescent history.
    (iii) Plausible reports of sudden inability to access other personalities, loss of co-consciousness: e.g., "everybody's gone," "there are no other personalities," "everything, everybody is scrambled," "nobody is where they are supposed to be inside."
    (iv) Suspicious disappearances or lost time, especially during "peak" holiday or programming periods or birthdays. (See Appendix 2 for dates.)
    (v) Known personalities now split into two or more parts, with different knowledge, abilities, etc., and probable fear of going back together.
    (vi) Along with two or more of above indicators (i–v), sudden onset of intense and uncontrollable body sensations and behaviors (e.g., drugged appearance, electroshock spasms, stereotyped gestures with hands, feet, etc.) in flashbacks or memory work.
    (vii) Along with two or more of indicators (i–v), sudden onset of intense urges to engage in some complex, usually dangerous behavior (e.g., suicide in a specified motel, go to a specific town, self-mutilate in a specific manner, etc.), without insight or appropriate affect.

I believe this is an accurate list of indicators, with some exceptions. Point (c), the client's inability to believe in his/her own memories or multiplicity, may occur without current contact if training of alters to disbelieve is operating. Even "reactive dissociatives," those who have not experienced mind control, tend to disbelieve both their diagnosis and what they are remembering. Point (d), failure to follow through with safety precautions, can result from learnt helplessness in both programmed and reactive dissociatives. For example, I have one client whose brothers and father broke down her door if she locked it, and punished her severely for trying to keep them out. In adult life, she believes she has to open her door to anyone who knocks, including a former employer who abused her.

Some of the indicators in point (h) might also occur when certain programming or training is in operation, without there necessarily being current abuse or involvement with a perpetrator group. Another possibility is contact that is minimal. A telephone call with a cult member (usually a family member), or a birthday card with a certain type of picture on it (e.g., a rose) can be enough to set off many of these symptoms. A client I have been seeing for many years just told me that this is a "recall year for her," in which the alters in charge of her system are supposed to organize the system to return to her place of origin, where they will report to her programmer (who by now is either dead or very old) about any alters who have broken the silence. These alters will then be "sacrificed." Her last recall year was sixteen years ago.

The following sections detail some of the danger signs to look for in ascertaining whether there is current contact.

Current contact alerts

- Significant periods of amnesia (especially around cult holidays), including client reports of evidence that he or she has gone out at night but has no memory of it.
- Reports of being approached by people in the street who are saying peculiar accusatory things, often with Satanic themes.
- Reports of receiving peculiar phone calls, particularly where the same thing is said over and over at each call.
- Receiving calls that consistently hang up after three rings.
- Finding one's car or home broken into and minor vandalism conducted.
- Other forms of harassment and apparently indirect communication.
- Sudden fear of the therapist or of the therapist's office.

While many of these forms of contact appeared to be nonsensical, to certain identity states they have a very clear meaning. If your client has met some of these criteria described above, your index of suspicion should be raised regarding whether they are being contacted and are going out at night to participate in the activities of their perpetrator group, without their conscious awareness.

Not all current contact is a simple matter of access by the original perpetrator group. We must also be aware of the dangerous tentacles of the worldwide web for these survivors. I had a client who told me that a man with whom she was in contact on an internet discussion list was trying to figure out her personality system; the system subsequently turned upside down, alters I had never met took control, and she left therapy with me. I do not believe that this client had current perpetrator contact prior to this; the man was actively trolling survivor discussion forums for those whose personality systems he could disrupt. He told her he was going to come to our city in search of her, and it is likely that he did so.

Other dangers are seen in the recovery community. A client of mine who had not been in contact with her perpetrator group (in another city) for almost forty years met a fellow ritual abuse survivor in a sexual abuse survivors' group who took her out to what turned out to be a cult meeting and reprogramming session. After that event, my client received regular telephone calls from local perpetrator group members, attempting to call out alters and get them to attend meetings.

I had one meeting through a church minister with a woman who had supposedly healed from ritual abuse and was now said to be healing survivors. She attended a number of churches in town. I recognized what she told me about her programming and healing as pure hogwash, and my client Lorraine recognized her and told me that she was a cult high priestess and was going from church to church seeking out survivors and giving signals to trigger them to return, report, and punish disloyalty internally. (I have no way of corroborating this information.)

Several other clients of whose safety I am fully assured have been constantly terrified that they were being followed and spied upon. Survivors who relocate and separate from these perpetrator groups have alters who have been taught that they can never get away and that the offenders know everything. As their therapist, you therefore cannot rely upon what they tell you; you need to look for indicators such as those listed above. You and your client need to understand that a strong impulse to call a relative or to return home can be a tip-off that the client's reporting has been triggered.

Current contact is a serious business, whether it is present at the start of therapy, initiated by the client's reporting to the perpetrators about therapy, or accomplished by the client's contact with other survivors who are looking for disobedient survivors to trigger or recall. All of my "first four" clients were involved in current contact, but none had conscious knowledge of their involvement at the start of therapy. I can think of several other clients in the same situation, and I lost some of them because of it.

What happens in current contact?

When in therapy where their history is being addressed, survivors generally will contact the group and report what is happening to a designated contact person, who will call out a reporting alter to give a recitation of all the client's behaviors. It is extremely important for the therapist and client to understand how the group is able to find out. In particular, watch for reports of strange phone calls, missing time, and odd behaviors, as well as a compulsion to make contact with family (if family were involved in the abuse) or other perpetrators. Look at cards and gifts from family members and ask whether they have any special meaning.

Once a group discovers that one of their current or previously abused persons is telling secrets to outsiders, various unpleasant things happen. If the survivor who is disobeying the rules and has become a security risk is far away from the perpetrating group, the group will make certain attempts to trigger alters into doing the job of shutting down the leak. This will result in some of the symptoms listed earlier, which disrupt therapy but also have the benefit of giving away what is happening if the therapist is educated about these signs. In some cases, the person will return home for further retraining. If the survivor is of particular importance to the perpetrating group, either because s/he was high up in the group's hierarchy or because s/he has knowledge of some important crimes, the group may contact a different group in the survivor's locality and ask or pay them to harass the survivor.

Now the group can pursue its goal of interfering with or destroying therapy, by extreme tactics if necessary. When the group contacts the survivor, they will trigger alters into returning to them and into obeying their rules of silence and loyalty. When the client returns to the perpetrators, the training experiences of her childhood will be repeated. She will again be tortured and forced to perpetrate against others. The therapist might be impersonated, and this person will abuse the client, and the client may be forced to abuse the supposed therapist. (See Chapter Thirteen for more details on this.)

If the client does not return to them, cult or group members will hang around the localities where she spends her time and give signals to get her to come to them, so that they can take her for retraining. If she ignores the signals, they will lie in wait for her and abduct her. If she finds ways to prevent this, they will resort to more extreme measures, such as breaking into her home.

Just as there is an escalation of these tactics, there is a gradual escalation of punishments for survivors who disobey, and in particular if they spill secrets to outsiders. I have had three clients for whom the original perpetrators traveled all the way across the continent to try to do the reprogramming. If the client has become unmanageable and core secrets have been breached, true suicide training (as opposed to attempts designed to land the survivor in hospital) might be triggered. If this fails, the group might engage in murder attempts disguised as suicide or accidents. They broke into my client Jennifer's apartment, found all the pills she had on hand, and stuffed them down her throat. Fortunately, she did not have a great deal of medication and she did not die. But, as you saw, Lorraine did die, perhaps by forced suicide to protect her loved ones or perhaps at the hands of the perpetrator group. Organized criminal groups protect their secrets at all costs.

Common access programs

Access programming is what gives the perpetrators access to your client for ongoing involvement, punishment, and retraining. The traumatic memories of these trainings are among those that create the most danger for the client, so should be processed as soon as the client is ready to work with such memories. Some of the specific mind-controlled beliefs involved in these programs were described in Chapter Eight.

Reporting

The survivor usually reports to the perpetrators through a phone call to a relative, during which the person being reported to may trigger other alters to do their jobs. Generally, the reporting parts of the survivor believe that the group always knows where they are and what they are saying anyway. They have experienced the fact that usually, when the organized group is actively abusing a child, they really do know where the child is and what the child is saying at all times. Since a family member of the child is most commonly involved, when the child tries to run away or to hide, the group can find the child easily. Group members will tell these children that they found them by "magic" or "the eye of Satan", etc. (See Chapter Eight for more examples.) Young children believe this explanation, and since they remain child alters, they continue to believe it when the survivor is an adult.

Whether or not there has been deliberate mind control, child alters in an adult trauma survivor might not understand time or place, and might believe they are still in the places where the group had access to them in childhood. Here is how one client described it in a letter to me:

> Most of the ones inside do not feel time the way you do. When you say it has been a long time or many, many years, it does not make the same kind of sense to the little ones as it does to you or to the older ones. Those little ones only know about time when they are out. So for them it isn't as long as you think it is since they were in that place. The older ones know better about time and how it works. The little ones kind of know about today, tomorrow and yesterday. They sort of > only know where they are when they are out. They know the neighbor lady's house [where some abuse happened]. Some know the house with that mother and father and a few know the house we lived in later. Some of those same ones know different rooms where bad things happened like with the doctor and that other man. They only know all of those different moments. There is kind of nothing in between. A few of them have been lost in the town after your meeting. They just know they are lost. But they are not looking around and thinking this is a different place.

Because young child alters have so little understanding of the time that has gone by, or the distance they have traveled from the place where the abuse occurred, they believe the perpetrators are still around even when they are not.

Here is an example of how one child was trained to telephone her mother. At age eleven she was heavily sedated so she believed she was asleep. Then, she was painfully abused by people in costumes, so that she thought she was having a nightmare. Her mother came in and soothed her, and told her that if she had nightmares she should call her. This event was repeated several times, and in different places, and in the later instances her mother was not present but there was a telephone on which she could call her, and her mother responded by coming and soothing her. In later life when this training was triggered, the adult had nightmares and the trained child alter phoned her mother.

Perpetrators use one child (usually a sibling) to report on another in a family, and reporting alters start doing it early in childhood. That is when the child is most likely to accept the group's "magik". Groups commonly train young children to believe that they know everything by the use of hidden microphones combined with props. One client had certain alters who constantly saw an "all-seeing eye"—a prop which was used in their training. Another saw ears on the walls, a result of the room with the microphone (and one-way mirror) having plastic ears actually glued to the walls. Usually, one alter sees the (now imaginary) prop, while another has the job of making them see it through replaying the picture from the memory. Other groups tell children that small creatures (crows, spiders, squirrels) tell the perpetrators about them, or that the Mother lurks in every shadow.

Usually, this training includes a horrendous experience designed to make the child terrified of the consequences of not telling the perpetrators what she has disclosed. For example, the child is told that an older child has talked about the cult to an outsider. She watches this child being tortured until he or she discloses to the cult what has been told; then the punishment stops. The newly trained child is put in a position to receive the same kind of torture (e.g., put on the cross or rack, or touched with the hot poker), and believes what she is told, You must always tell us if you have talked.

How therapists should deal with reporting alters

If your client acknowledges the presence of reporting alters, my advice is to reason with those alters, or, if they are too young to understand, with the older parts of the client who may be in charge of them. Ask them why the abusers would need alters to report to them where the person is, if they already know. Point out to them that that the abusers knew that when the body became an adult, they would not be able to keep track of the person all the time as they could when s/he was a child. Explain that this is why they trained alters to keep track of those things for them, and if the reporters do not report, or do not tell the truth when they report, the perpetrators will not know that any disclosures have been made.

If the reporters (or those in charge of them) decide not to report, you have the safety to proceed with therapy. Reporter alters have generally been trained to always tell the truth. Be sure to look for "backups," however—alters who are supposed to take over the job of any alter who stops doing his/her job. They will also need to be convinced.

Reporters are also observers

Reporter alters are trained to watch and listen carefully to everything the person does in the real world. Therefore, they observe therapy sessions. If the reporters are unwilling to stop doing their jobs, other parts of the client's personality system can be recruited to help. Here is one way that you can deal with this problem: There are usually some alters who have the job of putting other alters to sleep (the initial training is done with sleep-inducing drugs); they can put the reporters to sleep during most of the therapy session. You can arrange this with those in charge of the "sleep program," then have those in charge of the "forgetting program" make the reporters forget that you have made this arrangement. From then on, in therapy sessions, you talk about inconsequential topics for the first five or ten minutes for the benefit of the reporters, then, when the reporters have gone to sleep, do your real work. They can be woken up for the closing minutes of the session. All they will have to report is what happened in those first and last few minutes.

Another way of dealing with it is to satisfy the reporters' need to do their jobs by having them report internally to internal copies of the abusers (there usually are some). How do you find out if there are? You just ask.

If you do not have sufficient rapport with the personality system to do these things, you need to proceed very slowly so as to not accidentally trigger any reporting which will get the perpetrator group reinvolved with the client.

What about relocation?

In the beginning of our work with survivors of these abuses, therapists learned quickly that their clients continued to be in danger, and continued to be abused. As described earlier, our initial perspective on the safety of survivors viewed it as simply a matter of physical location. For some, however, this view continued: As late as 1998, in her book, The Ultimate Challenge: A Revolutionary, Sane and Sensible Response to Ritualistic and Cult-Related Abuse, sexual abuse victim advocate Gayle Woodsun recommended relocation for survivors, but without acknowledging the fact that they would inevitably report their new location to the abusers. She did acknowledge the reality of mind-control programming; however, her recommendation was to treat all the child parts of the person as if they were programming to be resisted rather than child parts to be nurtured and reasoned with. In my opinion, her approach was already dated when it was written. It was also neither revolutionary nor well-informed, but it does acknowledge the reality of current contact, something many therapists do not want to face and are very skeptical about.

It is true that Woodsun's suggestion of relocation (to a place at a great distance from the original abuse) is sometimes necessary, but it is only useful when the person is no longer reporting to the abusers, and provided a competent therapist is available in the new location. Until then, relocation is of little use and, in fact, might serve the perpetrators' goals of sabotaging recovery. I once began to treat a woman sent to me by a therapist in a city some distance away; the survivor was high up in a very vicious cult and the memories she began to work on were horrendous. However, about a week after she arrived, she disclosed to me with embarrassment that she had telephoned the perpetrator group and given them her location. I had to smuggle her out of town (while her apartment was being watched) and send her on to another location previously unknown to her. It is likely that the therapist she was sent to would have the same experience after another week, unless he were able to deal with her reporting training.

Call backs: training to return to the perpetrators

Most survivors of organized abuse have parts trained to return to their abusers, either at specific times or dates (e.g., for family birthdays or important rituals) or when they are called back. Young adults are usually allowed to go out and create an identity in the world, then called back for use at a specific age or year. Subsequent to their early years of ongoing programming, those people whose initial abuse was with an occult religious group will continue to participate in the rituals and orgies which happen on the dates listed in the group's calendar. They will not incur any punishment for disloyalty—unless they begin disclosing secrets to outsiders. If they are parents, they will very probably be taking their children to the group's events, and their children are being abused on an ongoing basis within the group and possibly by some of their alters at home. Those who have been trained by a military/political group might go on assignments for the group. A child, teenager, or young adult from either setting may continue to be involved in pornographic filming or prostitution. All of this happens in a life separate from the one they present to the world.

The following sections detail some specific types of training which survivors have disclosed to me.

"Return to save someone"

This call back is used frequently with disloyal survivors. The person believes that s/he has to return to save a younger sibling or friend from being killed. The alters who have this training will feel a desperate need to return to the group, feeling that something awful will happen to someone if they do not.

"Return to avoid punishment"

This has several variations. For example, a cult child misses a ritual (usually for the full moon) and is punished with electroshock the next day. Or she is made to kill what she believes is a baby and is told that if she does not keep returning the police will be notified and she will be jailed. Alters who have this training are afraid not to return.

"Return for rewards"

This is part of the training of alters who have to take leadership in rituals. These alters experience none of the abuse, and are rewarded with massage, drugs, pleasurable sex, and power (e.g., the right to decide who gets hurt). The call to return for the survivor's personal birthday is of this type. The alters who have this training really want to go back to the group, and can only be stopped by other alters sharing with them the pain of what has happened to the body at cult events.

"Return at a specific date"

I am currently dealing with a client who had come a long way in therapy, and then encountered callback programming for Easter 2010. Just before Easter, certain alters I had not known about "woke up." They were heavily drugged child alters, who had been told that the world would end at Easter of 2010, and they must return home by that time. (Other alters who woke up at the same time had the job of punishing the rest of the system if they did not return to the cult group.) Over the next couple of months (since Easter 2010), I spent considerable time showing them current magazines and books with dates on them. Obviously, in this case, the callback was unsuccessful, because the client had made so much progress in therapy. Her system was able to detect the new alters and (with my help) update them on the changes in her life and her current safety. But if this were a client who had not received therapy, or whose system were not largely co-conscious and cooperative, she would probably just have booked a flight home and returned to whichever perpetrators were still around to reset her programming.

You can dialogue with the parts who believe they have to return for any or all of these reasons. They need to understand that contact with the group puts them in a weaker position and will lead to pain, while disconnection will protect them. For example, if a person returns to save someone else, they are often used to harm the person they were supposed to save. Then they are told that they are just as bad a perpetrator as those who made them do it, and that they will be jailed if they disclose what happened. This needs to be exposed as a lie. The truth is that the group is less likely to harm someone your client loves if they are not present. Sometimes, guilty alters think they should return to be punished for their crimes; I tell them that if they return they will be forced to commit more such crimes. Those who return to avoid punishment need to learn a simple truth: the abusers can only hurt them if they have access to their body. If they are not there, they cannot be hurt. Those who return for rewards are most difficult to deal with. Until the memories have been shared with them, other alters with internal authority can keep them under control by making them forget the date they are to return or getting them to go to sleep at that time.

External helpers, such as a friend or spouse, can also help. For example, someone safe can hide their shoes or block the driveway so they cannot drive to a group event.

Training to make the survivor accessible to abduction

When a survivor in therapy is no longer returning to the group or reporting to them, s/he may still be accessible to the perpetrators for some time because of alters trained to respond to cues from the perpetrators. Some of these trainings get the survivor out into the open where group members can get at them. Often there are specific auditory triggers, such as a certain number of rings on the phone, the honk of a car horn, or a beeping sound. Visual hand signals can also call a person to come to a group member with or without direct and personal contact with the person making the sign. Some triggers can make the survivor unable to move or speak, so that they will cooperate with an abduction. Triggers can now be sent by email. A client of mine recently received an innocuous-appearing email from a private detective representing her younger brother (whom she had not seen since her escape twenty years ago), saying he would love his sister to meet his wife and children. She went into a complete panic, believing the perpetrators were about to appear at any moment and re-abuse her. She spent two weeks in terror with her blinds closed.

Below are examples of some trainings I have discovered in clients.

Training to answer the phone and open the door

A child was drugged to lethargy and seated alone by a phone, with electrodes all over her body. When the phone rang, she was given painful shocks until she answered it. Then "Satan" spoke on the phone and told her, "Always answer when Satan calls." She had met this "Satan" before at cult rituals, where he hurt her. Her mother called through the door that she would take her home if she (the child) opened the door, so the girl managed to get to the door and open it, fighting the effects of the drug and the shocks. In later life, the survivor always had to answer the phone and/or open the door in response to specific sound triggers. She had no conscious memory of the reason for this compulsion, until we uncovered the memory in therapy.

Another client, who frequently denies the ritual abuse history that brought her to therapy, is trying to reduce her contact with her family. She tells me that she just cannot help answering the phone or returning phone calls when messages are left. Turning off the ringer does not work because she sees the flashing light which indicates that there is a message. She has no knowledge of this specific programming, but clearly something is forcing her to respond to phone calls, whether or not she wants to.

Training to go outside

At about age nine or ten, a child was deliberately made addicted to narcotic drugs, and was conditioned to go outside at the sound of a car horn (or dog whistle, etc.) to get the drugs she needed. Later, feeling drug withdrawal symptoms and knowing she must go outside to get rid of those symptoms, this alter responded to the sound cue.

Training to come to the handler

A young child was put in a backyard swimming pool, and called by a perpetrator, on the other side of the pool, to swim to him. A lid was put over the pool so that the only place she could get any air was by him. She swam across to him underwater in order not to drown. Later, the survivor felt the sensation of drowning until she went to the cult person who had called her.

Training to keep still and silent

A child was put in an enclosed space with some type of supposedly poisonous creature (bees if allergic, snakes, spiders). He was told not to speak or move or the creatures would bite or sting him to death. I have seen this training in several different survivors. In one case the insects (bees) stung her and, because she was allergic to bees, she became unconscious. Then she was resuscitated. In later life, if a perpetrator group member approaches this person on the street and gives the signal for this program, the survivor will be unable to run away. (This kind of training is also one reason that survivors so often have strong reactions to insects.)

Training not to run away

A young child is encouraged to run away from the perpetrators, then punished by harm to her knees or feet when she is caught. An alter is to give her this pain if she considers running away from the group.

Training not to leave town

A child or teenager is drugged and put through simulated car accidents, plane crashes, and other events designed to make her believe that these things will inevitably happen to her if she attempts to leave the town where the perpetrator group operates. I had to work through all these memories so that Teresa could leave town to a place where she would be safe, even after her access programming had been removed.

Dealing with access training

Most mind control survivors I have encountered, especially of cult abuse, have all of these kinds of trainings. You see how complicated they are for the client to deal with, and to unravel in therapy.

In the short term, if your client is being watched and/or harassed by perpetrators, it helps if she lives with a safe spouse or roommate who can be informed of the situation and stay with her whenever she is out of the house. Survivors who live alone are “sitting ducks” for perpetrators. I do not recommend ritual abuse or mind control survivors living with one another; rather than keeping one another safe they will expose one another to risk. But many do, without conscious awareness of what has driven them to this connection or what the implications are.

When Stella Katz was being harassed by the cult that she had broken away from, the cult’s van kept circling her neighborhood, waiting for her to leave the house. So she telephoned the police and said “I keep seeing a van around here, and I think it may have something to do with those break-ins that keep happening in this area.” The police checked it out and called her back. “It’s funny,” they said, “There weren’t any burglary tools, but that van was full of illegal drugs and weapons and handcuffs.”

If the perpetrator group is not local, your client will only have to deal with telephone calls and letters or emails. If they harass her (trying to trigger various trained behaviors) she can turn off the ringer on the phone (and place it where it is not visible), change her email address to something they do not know, and bring any letters or parcels in to your office. There, you can see them and she can look at them in your presence. You can discuss their meaning with her and make sure that she will not act on any messages they carry.

In the end, however, the only solution is to work through the memories of the trainings, so that the person is no longer bound by the compulsion which various child alters have to act on because of their training. Programming such as this operates like post-hypnotic suggestion; it feels compulsory when the person is in its grip, even when the conscious adult does not understand it. Once the method of its creation becomes conscious, it loses that grip and the person becomes free. Before you can work through your client's memories, the important thing is to make sure that reporting does not occur so that the person does not have to deal with perpetrators in her adult life.

With some current-contacting clients, I have had marathon sessions of a weekend at a time (all day long), just going through the memories to remove the effects of all the access training. I also had a policy of working through all current abuse memories immediately after they occurred, along with the memories of whatever programming was being retaught in the current contact. This is what enabled my clients to escape their group and become free.

Ongoing perpetrator contact is one of the most difficult issues for therapists of survivors of ritual abuse and mind control. It is my belief that most retractors of memories disclosed in therapy were victims of ongoing abuse (and rewards) by perpetrator groups. We do not want to know this is happening, but if it is, it is. Being aware of it and dealing with it directly with the client can save you from being caught off-guard by a retractor client blaming you for her "false memories."

Stabilization: special issues with ritual abuse and mind control survivors

There is a good deal written about stabilization of abuse survivors, whether dissociative or not. You can find some books that teach these methods in the annotated bibliography (Appendix 1). Please make sure you are familiar with this material. All those techniques have their place when working with mind-controlled clients. I am not going to repeat any of that information here. Instead, I will focus on what is unique about mind control and ritual abuse survivors in terms of the reasons for these destabilizing behaviors and symptoms. The special considerations discussed in this chapter will make your work with survivors of organized abuse involving mind control much more effective.

Self-harm training

Self-harm, or self-injury, is not the same as a suicide attempt. The training is specific; for example, cutting or burning. Besides alters being trained to do this when the person is disloyal or discloses secrets, perpetrators can also give words or signals to trigger this behavior. Sometimes, the pattern of cuts is a visible sign that the person has been abused by a cult group: this may make other cult members (e.g., in a psychiatric hospital) aware of the survivor so that they can approach her to bring her into the local group. In a typical training, a child is branded with the mark of a pentagram with a hot branding iron, and is told she is being marked because she is a servant of Satan. If she is disloyal, she has to make this mark on her body to prove her loyalty. She believes that the perpetrators know she has been disloyal and will punish her unless she does this to herself.

The alters who inflict the pain are generally not the ones who feel it. When asked, the person will also report feeling no pain. Some alters have been trained to experience sexual pleasure when the body is cut; for them, cutting in this way could become a sexual addiction.

Alters who are “introjects” of the perpetrators are told they actually are the persons who “created” them, and they must harm the body in the exact same ways as those persons do if any of the parts become disloyal.

Therapists should make a careful search for trained alters before assuming that self-harm is just an attempt by the adult to avoid other kinds of pain, such as depression, physical pain, or unpleasant emotions. You can see how differently motivated these self-harm and suicide attempts are. This is not to say that mind control survivors do not self-harm for the same reasons as other trauma survivors; just that there is an additional level of complexity.

Therapists generally put a lot of effort into training clients to live in the present and avoid self-destructive behaviors. But this is largely wasted when the child alters doing the cutting or taking the overdoses are doing their “jobs,” in fear of death or torture to themselves or others if they disobey. Medication can help somewhat, but the problem behaviors will persist and the underlying struggle will continue for the alter. The behaviors must not only be treated for their emotional and cognitive aspects, but as programming.

Suicide attempt training

Although ritual abuse and mind control survivors attempt suicide more frequently than other extreme abuse survivors, their rate of successful suicide is no different, according to the Extreme Abuse Survey (Rutz, Becker, Overkamp, & Karriker, 2008). Organized criminal groups expend large amounts of resources on training children, and in many cases they expect to be able to use them for life. Also, successful suicides could prompt investigations, and these groups do not want to draw attention to their existence, whereas a suicide attempt might get a client hospitalized, and cults and other criminal groups monitor many psychiatric facilities to find and retrain survivors while they are there.

In the early stages, the group will make sure that these attempts are unsuccessful. This is because children are actually taught to stop short of actually killing the body, for example by taking just a few less pills than a lethal amount.

The training not to die is often accomplished this way: the child is drugged and assaulted by costumed “demons” in a simulated hell; the alter is told that if the body dies this is what will happen to her because she is evil and deserves to go to hell. This alter will work hard to make sure she does not die if other parts attempt suicide.

Actual suicide training

This is not to say that no one is trained for successful suicide. They are.

Training for successful suicides usually involves a group or sequence of alters (see Stella Katz's information regarding this in Chapter Seven), but it is not activated until either the perpetrators instruct the survivor to do it, or the security of the most important secrets is prematurely breached. Children and adults are generally taught several specific ways of harming and killing themselves, down to the details of how many of each kind of pill to take.

Children raised in Satanic or Luciferian cults often have an experience similar to the following: A child who is supposedly a "traitor" is killed slowly and painfully, and those children who watch are told that if they ever become traitors, they must kill themselves in some less painful way before the cult finds them, or they will be killed just like this traitor was. Training in how to accomplish this is then given.

Internal homicide training

Suicide trainings are often trainings for internal homicide—that is, one alter killing the body to kill the other alters. The alters who do this are usually trained to believe they do not belong to the body and will not die. For example, an alter who believes he or she is a demon is taken to "hell" where other alters in the body are tortured, and this alter gets to torture other (outside) people. He is told he will not die if the body dies, and will have a higher place in hell if he kills the body on command. Such alters might be given injections which make them unable to feel anything, and invited to watch something being done to the body in which they reside without feeling anything. They might be trained with rewards, such as pleasurable drugs, then told that if they kill the body they can return to the perpetrators for more rewards. They might also believe they are demons, ghosts, aliens, or demigods.

Other alters trained to kill the body are trained to believe they reside somewhere other than inside the body in which the host and other alters live. Since they are all given different "bodies" in the internal world, and they are not supposed to come out into the external world except at the signal of their handlers, they have no way of disproving this, just like the alters who believe they are spiritual beings without bodies. I have repeatedly watched as these alters come out into the world and stare in amazement at their hands, flexing their fingers where the "claws" are supposed to be, and looking at their clothing. Sometimes they say things like, "What am I doing in this body?", and I ask what kind of body they thought they had. If none, I invite them to touch the body and see whether it can feel the touch. If they feel a furry body, I ask whether they have seen Halloween costumes.

Interventions to prove to such alters that they belong to the body, such as those described at the end of Chapter Eight ("The programming: indoctrination, lies, and tricks"), are very important, and are not difficult. When these alters come out, they often appear to be in a drugged state. Hypnotic interventions to remove the drugs will enable them to see and think more clearly, before giving them the proof that the abusers lied to them.

Psychiatric symptom training

In addition to self-harming, suicide ideation and attempts, your client may suffer from various psychiatric symptoms which you might try without success to relieve, including extreme depression, anxiety, seeming mood swings, mood disorders, and psychosis. You need to be aware of the possibility that they might result from internal punishments by alters who are trained to administer them. This is an important way in which mind-controlled clients differ from others who have not undergone systematic mind control. These symptoms serve a variety of purposes. In addition to disrupting or confusing the therapy, they also might make the survivor so dysfunctional that s/he will return to the perpetrators to have things put right. Failing that, they might result in hospitalization. But that leads to its own complications, as you will see.

Treatment of destabilizing symptoms: concerns and cautions

In response to many of the seemingly out of control, self-destructive behaviors that these clients manifest in early recovery (which is essentially before their current contact programming has been identified and disabled), or to psychiatric symptoms that erupt at any time during treatment, a therapist might reasonably believe the clients require more care than they can provide. The therapist might even panic or feel overwhelmed. At that point, it would seem advisable, even necessary, to at least refer them for psychiatric evaluation and possible medication; failing that, inpatient treatment in a psychiatric facility might be pursued. But all of that yields complications.

Psychiatric medications

Psychotropic medications do not address the special needs of this patient group. Not only are they frequently ineffective, many of the training experiences that your clients have been subjected to have included such medications as part of mind control. The helplessness, confusion, and triggering effect of these meds make them damaging to survivors.

Antipsychotics can reduce the ANP's ability to communicate with the rest of the personality system, thus suppressing the client's ability to do the necessary therapeutic work. Jennifer was hospitalized when we unearthed a memory of a "bug" being placed in her ear to tell the abusers what she disclosed. She became paranoid. We scheduled the memory work to deal with this issue, but before we could do so, the hospital psychiatrist discovered she was paranoid and put her on antipsychotic medication. As a result, we were no longer able to contact the alters involved in the memory and we could not do the work. My attempt to explain to the psychiatrist failed. In his view, she was paranoid, this was psychotic, and so she needed the medication. Jennifer had to pretend she was fine for two weeks, so that she could get discharged and stop the medication. The memory work was successful once the medication was out of her system.

Group treatment settings

I am very hesitant about group settings and group interventions for survivors of organized criminal abuse, whether on an outpatient, self-help, or residential basis. This is primarily because survivors who are currently involved with perpetrator groups are often trained to seek out other survivors to get them reinvolved. A client of mine who had been abused by a group two thousand miles away was taken back to a local group by a survivor she met in a group therapy setting. Even those survivors who do not reinvolve others often have alters trained to give signals that will cause deterioration in other survivors' functioning. Neil Brick, who organizes survivor conferences and is an activist devoted to combating ritual abuse and mind control, writes in his blog that he used to unintentionally give trained hand signals while giving speeches.

I had a friend who conducted a group for clients with dissociative disorders in the Mental Health Center where we both worked, and I was told later by one of my clients who participated that the cult conducted a similar group with a different purpose in the basement of the mental hospital. Imagine the confusion of those who attended both groups.

In hospital, there is a risk of programs being triggered by other patients. One ritual abuse survivor client was hospitalized years ago, before I saw her. For a long time she would not tell me what happened, but made me promise not to hospitalize her. Eventually, I discovered that another woman in the hospital had handed her a note which said "I'm sorry I have to kill you." She told me that although most of the staff had no idea about dissociation, some of the patients "looked inside" and could detect the presence of alters.

Two years ago, I was just beginning to treat a woman with a trauma history who seemed to be dissociative. She had disclosed to me one memory that appeared to be a possible indicator of ritual abuse. She developed some paranoid ideas with which she went to the police, who had her hospitalized. She called me from the hospital to tell me she had finally obtained funding to see me and was looking forward to it. She committed suicide immediately upon discharge from the hospital. There had been no indications of suicidality. I do not know, and will not know, whether she was given a very discouraging diagnosis by the hospital psychiatrist, or whether something happened at the hospital that triggered programming.

Residential and inpatient settings

In some communities, perpetrator groups actually want their survivors put into psychiatric day programs, or hospitalized.

There are several reasons for this. The most obvious one is that staffs of mental hospitals tend to be uninformed about organized abuse (not to mention even basic treatment for dissociative disorders); they will simply diagnose such patients with mental illnesses and medicate them or put them in group programs within the unit, where, as you have seen, other patients might trigger them to re-engage them with the groups from which they are trying to escape. And there is another, more insidious reason: many mental hospitals have members of the perpetrator groups on staff who are trained to recognize mind control or ritual abuse survivors.

When I was dealing with my first four ritual abuse survivors, all members of a local cult, Teresa had a close relative who was a ward clerk and gave staff false information about her condition. The cult had a regular pick-up system for survivors at the dinner hour. The survivors would go out to the front door for a smoke, and the cult van would appear, pick them up, take them to be tortured and for their training to be reinforced, then drop them off at the time they were supposed to be back indoors. Although the hospital did keep patients from committing suicide during their stay, it did not keep them safe, because it facilitated the group's access to them. Lorraine's "suicide" occurred immediately upon discharge from that hospital. On one occasion late in her therapy, Jennifer came to her appointment with her arms badly cut; she told me that she had not done it but the high priest had, in the hope of getting me to hospitalize her so they could access her.

I learned to avoid the psychiatric hospital for my clients who experienced current contact, especially after what happened with Lorraine. Even a safe psychiatric hospital, unless it specializes in treating dissociative disorders, is little more than a holding tank to prevent patients from committing suicide. In the days when our local hospital would permit outpatient therapists to meet with their clients in the hospital, I found it useful to see clients in the hospital to work through the programs that were creating the instability. Now, the hospital will not allow outpatient therapists to do therapy on their premises (because of their insurance). Such a hospitalization just delays effective treatment.

Most of the people who run mental hospitals are sincere professionals who really want to help people whom they believe suffer from a "mental illness". Ritual abuse-created dissociative disorders, being mental injury rather than mental illness, require different treatment on several levels: first, trauma recovery; second, dissociation; and third, mind control. Hospitals specializing in dissociative disorders, when not infiltrated by members of organized perpetrator groups, can be quite helpful to survivors of organized abuse. (The challenge for the clinician is determining which ones are safe.) However, the bulk of the work needs to be conducted by an outpatient therapist who understands the nature of the abuse.

Many survivors, when hospitalized, almost immediately switch into an alter who appears normal. Hospital staff, not understanding the nature of what they are witnessing, say that the medication they have administered is working, so the person can be released.

It is my fondest wish and hope that one day, the information contained in these pages will not only empower interested clinicians to better help their mind-controlled clients, but also that it will filter through the mental health care system so that when we need outside assistance for our clients, we will know it is available, knowledgeable, and safe.

CHAPTER TWELVE

"Maybe I made it up"

You may have had some difficulty accepting or emotionally integrating some of the stories and examples you have read in this book so far. This is something survivors who are disclosing memories of ritual abuse or mind control often struggle with as well. The old question of "Could this really have happened?" comes up all the time with these clients. Sometimes they ask plaintively whether or not we believe them. At other times they insist that none of it is true, they made it all up, they got it from television shows or the Internet, or they have a vivid imagination.

Some of the clients I have seen who allege ritual abuse and/or mind control do have vivid imaginations; some of them do not. Some of them like to read and research, others do not. Still others deliberately do not read or watch anything related to what they are remembering so that they do not contaminate their memories. In my preface to this book, I recommended that survivors not read it, because memories that come spontaneously from within them are more trustworthy than those that come prompted by hearing what someone else has experienced. Or at least the client will find them more trustworthy. One of my clients had flashbacks of ritual abuse, and her mother informed her that certain neighbors who used to look after her were the perpetrators. The client now doubts both whether she was ritually abused, and whether those were the real perpetrators, just because it was her mother who told her this. Outside influences can be very confusing for these clients.

Denial is commonly found among persons with dissociative disorders. My favorite quotation from such a client is, "We are not multiple, we made it all up." I have heard this from several different clients. When I hear it, I politely inquire, "And who is we?" The client looks confused—or we both begin to laugh. When a person has a dissociative disorder, many things that happened to them feel as if they happened to someone else. In addition, events that are remembered at one time might not be remembered at other times, which leads to even more confusion. Such people have been described as having "multiple reality disorder." Denial is common in the population of those with major dissociative disorders, whether or not they have experienced ritual abuse or mind control.

There are many reasons that a client might insist that what they are remembering cannot be real. One obvious reason is the bizarre and horrific nature of the memories they disclose. If I were seeing such things in my head, and did not know what I know now, certainly I would want to believe they were not real.

One of my clients has a group of little child parts inside who have horrible memories of abuse outside the family that began early in her life (via a babysitter). At the same time, another group of parts, who are adults and teenagers, have no conscious memories of this abuse. They tell me that they have been having awful nightmares of things that cannot be real. Some of their "nightmares", they say, are during the day.

The little ones told me about the "line" down the middle to separate those who lived inside the home from the ones who remember the early abuse outside the home. So, the older alters are unaware of the little ones and what happened to them. However, pictures and emotions leak through this dividing line and are interpreted by the older parts as signs that they must be either crazy or evil to invent such horrible things. By now, the reader has probably realized that the dividing line was deliberately placed there by the perpetrators.

Let us look more closely at how mind-controlled children are trained in denial and disbelief of their own memories and their own internal multiplicity by mind controlling abusers, who have studied the processes of remembering and forgetting, and how dissociation works.

Denial training

Training that makes survivors unaware of their dissociative conditions

In a memory that one client worked through, she was given a heavy dose of antipsychotic medication, which made communication within her personality system very difficult. The abusers then asked her whether she heard any voices, and gave her electroshock to the head every time she said yes. This was part of training to make her appear non-dissociative. When a psychiatrist put her on antipsychotic medication in adulthood, this memory came up, as it brought up the alters who remembered this training. Fortunately, she was in therapy that recognized her abuse history and could properly address it. You can imagine what would have happened if she were not.

The same client told me of a training to create walls between the alters. As an infant, she was put in a closed box, periodically taken out and abused or smothered, then "rescued" by being put back in the box with safety and a bottle of milk. An alter was told that if disclosures were ever being made, she was to bring up this training in order to isolate alters from one another in "boxes" in the inner world, so that the alter who was out in the body would be unable to communicate with the rest. The presenting part would be unaware of the existence of the others.

The last time one of my clients made statements that reflected denial, she sounded as if she were reciting. So I asked her whether anyone said this to her. "Yes, my mother." Her mother, who, according to the memories she allegedly "made up," was the primary perpetrator in her abuse.

Training which makes survivors disbelieve their own memories (and makes investigators disbelieve them)

Simulated murders

Organized abuser groups make particular efforts to have both their victims and those to whom they disclose dismiss what is said as having been made up. One of my first clients who disclosed ritual abuse went through a memory of being around five years old when the cult group made her stab, and supposedly kill, a baby, whom they said was her younger brother. The next day she found her baby brother alive, and when she expressed her confusion to her mother, she was told she made the whole thing up. Alters had been given the job of making her believe this message. This appears to be common for such abusers. I have heard about this same kind of experience from other clients and from other therapists.

In Chapter Eight, "The programming: indoctrination, lies, and tricks", you saw that trickery is a major modus operandi of these groups. One client of mine remembered a grade school classmate being killed in a ritual, while the teacher told the class that the girl had moved to the US to live with her father. In adulthood, the woman made a police report, and the police searched for the girl. They found her alive, having moved to the US to live with her father. One of my more recent clients believed she should not make friends because a friend from school had been killed in a ritual. As soon as she told me this, another alter who was listening told me that the girl had come to visit her old home in early adulthood and had looked her up. Yet another client told the police the name of a little girl she remembered killing in a sacrificial ritual. They looked the girl up and sure enough, she was still alive. As a consequence, they now disbelieved all the client's disclosures. The client said that she knew it was "Stephanie" that they killed because "They told [her]." She now believes she was forced to kill a little girl, but it probably was not Stephanie.

Victims are left in a deep state of confusion about what they had thought they had experienced. Remember that drugs are used during many of these traumatic trainings, and electroshock given at the conclusion to further dissociate the memories of what happened. It is no wonder it is very difficult for survivors of organized groups to be clear about, or tell anyone, what they remember.

These tricks serve another important purpose: insurance. They discredit the rest of survivors' disclosures. Sally McCollum (a licensed and highly experienced psychologist in private practice in the Sun Valley area of central Idaho), related this story in an email to a discussion list (reprinted by permission):

> One of my clients had a memory of assisting in the abduction of a young woman who she believed was murdered in a ritual and she wanted to give her evidence to the local FBI. Unfortunately, she discovered at the same time the FBI did (through a simple search) that the woman was alive in another part of the U.S. It damaged her credibility severely and was extremely frustrating for her..

I have heard similar stories from other therapists.

Murders of named persons appear to be simulated for the perpetrators' mind control purposes, to prevent these survivors making friends with "outsiders," to make them doubt their own memories, and to make investigators disbelieve their disclosures. When survivors begin to remember things that happened, programming often kicks in to make them remember these apparent murders of persons who were not actually killed. No wonder police investigators have doubts about the reality of ritual abuse.

Murders that are real

Some of what these children believe to be murders are real; some are not. "Murders" which are designed to discredit the survivors are simulated. But it is my observation that murders in which "traitors" are killed are most likely to be real, since they usually involve gruesome torture that is difficult to simulate. Usually, these occur at large events in which a whole generation of cult children are trained not to be traitors. Presumably, because it is risky for a group to engage in an actual murder, the abusers want to make the most use of such an act when it is done.

Besides the religious importance of ritual sacrifices in the cults, "snuff pornography" brings in big money. Victims of actual murders used to be abducted children, before law enforcement and the media became very concerned about them. Children used to have to abduct children, playing with them in the street or the park and luring them to the perpetrators' vehicle. Several clients have told me of doing this. Now the victims are more likely to be street people or hitchhikers far from home. One of my early survivor clients told me how the young adult cult members used to cruise along the highway picking up hitchhikers, talking with them in a friendly manner in order to pick out the ones who were far from home and could be used as sacrifices without local law enforcement finding out. Society's image of the abductor of women or children, based on what is portrayed in the media, is a lone man, but cult groups also abduct victims.

As described in Stella Katz's account, cult women and teenage girls are made pregnant and aborted as soon as the fetus is viable, so that it can be sacrificed. There is also considerable killing of children who have been bred for the sole purpose of being torture and, eventually, murder victims. These children's births were never registered, and they have been raised in secrecy.

It is not only the dispensable children of unimportant women who are killed. Licensed clinical social worker Wendy Hoffman, who worked extensively with ritual abuse survivors in the late 1980s and early 1990s, wrote an unpublished book, "Ascent from evil: Toward healing the wounds of Satanic cult abuse" (1993), and identifies herself as a survivor. According to Hoffman, the children of each woman who was selected to be her cult's newest "Queen" were killed immediately after birth when they did not respond well enough to tests regarding their ability to be programmed. Hoffman states that, in her experience, many people were killed, and the group just came up with other reasons for the deaths such as illness or suicide. And indeed, it is logical that if the murder of someone who moves from the area can be simulated, an actual murder can be disguised as a natural death or a suicide. That is what may have happened in Lorraine's case. If it was not a murder, it was certainly a forced suicide.

Hoffman also states that in her extensively networked group, leaders had to be killed ritually. While I have no way of corroborating this information, I did have one client who spent her childhood years from age three to twelve as the house slave of a cult leader; she was taken into foster care when he had himself killed in a ritual.

Cover memories

Organized perpetrator groups also deliberately create screen or "cover" memories of impossible or highly improbably events such as alien abductions. (Alien abductions are often cited by those who wish to discredit the reality of ritual abuse and mind control.) I remember when Jennifer confessed, halfway through her therapy, that for a long time she had had a memory of an alien abduction, the kind where the aliens poked and prodded at her body in the spaceship. She had been afraid to disclose it to me because she was afraid I would not believe her about the cult events if she did. When we worked through the memory from start to finish, with all the alters involved, we discovered that the alleged "spaceship" was parked in the cult training center. Certain alters had been taught that they must release this memory to consciousness if she began to remember other things.

False information

There are also more mundane, but equally effective, things done to confuse children in this way. When we worked through Jennifer's first ritual abuse memory, a gang rape, I asked her whether or not she knew the names of her abusers. Yes, she did: Mickey Mouse and Donald Duck. Imagine the outcome for a victimized child who reports such things in a police interview!

Training which discourages telling the truth

Another reason it is difficult for these survivors to disclose what has happened is the training they receive to believe that the group knows everything they disclose, and sometimes even everything they think. One common experience is that a young child undergoes a fake "operation" in which a "doctor" puts a "microphone" in her tooth and convinces her of these things, telling her that through this microphone the group will know when she has told about the abuse, and will find and punish her. "Bombs" are implanted in the child's stomach, and verified, with "X-Rays"; the victim is told that if she talks about the memories, the bomb will explode. A carnivorous animal or insect is supposedly put into the child's vagina or anus, after which s/he is told that remembering or talking will cause the animal to eat her up from the inside. These "operations" are done when the child is still young enough to believe that thoughts or words can trigger a result like this. Alters are taught to remind children about these experiences through bringing back the pain of the "surgery" or the animal's insertion.

Organized perpetrator groups also discourage disclosures by training alters to make survivors remember all the events—especially crimes—in which the child has been made to take part, such as the real or simulated murders and rapes that ritually abusive groups commonly perpetrate. Such flooding will overload the survivor with horror and guilt.

The groups will also stage events in which the child is punished for honest disclosures to people she does not realize are group members. For example, one five-year-old child was encouraged to make a disclosure to someone she believed was a uniformed police officer, who then took her to a "jail" where other perpetrators, adult men, were incarcerated with her. They blamed her, beat her, and sexually assaulted her for telling on them. When another child was triggered to tell some supposed police officers what happened, they responded that she was lying, and then tortured her to get the "truth" out of her. They were not satisfied until she really lied. She was also punished at home for telling the truth.

Incentives are also offered to survivors who recant. Lorraine found an article on her bed in the psychiatric hospital about a client who won huge amounts of money from suing her therapist. Another survivor received a letter offering a warm welcome back into her family as well as the rewards ensuing from such a lawsuit. A promise of warm acceptance and welcome into the family can be very enticing for the parts of the client who always wanted to be loved. Consider the implications of this when you hear of therapists being sued for their alleged misdeeds with such survivors.

Here is what survivor LisaBri says (adapted from an article on her website) about her experiences with "denial" which she describes as being a "two-faced animal":

Honesty and denial: LisaBri

> As I put together my life history, my research has led me through almost forgotten sets of old journals. I have come across entries that scream "Honesty!" How could anyone possibly make up the secrets hidden in those diaries, or, more importantly, why would I want to? Yet the next line always begins with, "I'm making it all up because . . ."
>
> In my childhood, honesty was always laced with threats. I grew up being told I was a liar with an overactive imagination. I had to lie all the time, not only about the sexual abuse in my home but through keeping silent about the horrendous events that happened in the cult rituals. Programmed with the "No-talk" rule, alter was played against alter, and the words of the training were constantly spun: "You're crazy. Only crazy people make up stories like this; they should be in a psychiatric ward. Don't talk or you'll be locked up."
> To this day I remember seeing a dog lying dead in the garage of the second house we lived in. It was my Aunt and Uncle's dog, a small white poodle. I ran to tell my mother that the dog was dead in the garage. My mother calmly said it wasn't. Her words left me scared and confused. I could see the dog, and it was dead. The piece of information I did not have was from another alter, an eleven-year-old who had participated in a ritual the night before. As they killed the dog, all the members of the circle chanted, "This is not real. This is all in your imagination. This is not real. This is all in your imagination . . ." When the eleven-year-old [alter] insisted that it was real, they beat her into submission and drugged her. The message: 'It is unsafe to see things through your own eyes because you are crazy. Listen to your mother.' So we denied our reality and lived knowing the dog was dead but believing it was not.
> It is not sensationalism; it is a reality. If I even think about the enormity and reality of the truth, the rapes, the pit, the rituals, then a denial program runs: "This didn't happen to you. You are making it all up. No one will believe you." It leaves me terrified and confused as I lock horns with it at every memory level, at every alter level, and at every step forward.
> Fifteen years ago, as an adult survivor, I carried the lies in my scattered dissociative brain. I was always vigilant, for I did not want to break into what I labeled "little Lisa pieces," which would > inevitably be followed by being locked up in a psychiatric ward. However, the fight to continue became too much, and I lost the will to live. I was locked up in the hospital. But not only did I survive, but I found it was the one place where I could be completely honest about my past. I could say anything because I knew my time was coming to an end. All my business and what little personal affairs I had had been put in order. I was ready to be a psychiatric hospital "lifer" and eventually to die in that place. The doctors and nurses would not question another shuffling, mumbling person talking about things too heinous to be believed. I was just another statistic.

> Lying in bed in hospital one night, I thought I was dying. With no energy left to fight, I gave in to the voices for the first time. I discovered that they were not psychotic voices, but voices of alter personalities. My strongest alter, Brian (Bri) came to me that night and in six words changed my life. "It's going to be all right," he said. And I had to believe him. And it was. I discovered that the "little Lisa pieces" were alters fighting to be heard and recognized—not a sign of mental illness or incapacity, as I had always been led to believe, but a sign of strength, courage, and health.
> On one level, denial is as devastating and crippling as lying. Did my father, for instance, really believe he loved me in the only way he knew? Or had he, like me, been trained in denial? Did his denial lead him to think sexually assaulting his daughter really was "no big deal"? Did he even remember his further abuses of me?
> Denial is a two-faced animal. On one level denial keeps me safe. While the denial program is running, 90% of the time I do not believe there is a cult group in which I had to be an active participant, and which I would be exposing by remembering. The memories, trainings, and rituals do not exist, in denial. My system shuts down. There are no crippling sexual assaults. The need to harm myself, attempt suicide, drink, or use drugs to deal with the associated feelings stays on the periphery of my mind.
> The constant back and forth movement between truth and denial wreaks havoc on my mind, leading to anxiety and panic attacks. But if I can ride out the storm, I can recognize that I survived. My therapist constantly tells me, "Keep the denial for when you are not in therapy. When you enter this room, the alters make you deny your reality need to turn it off so we can get to the issues." This has allowed me to grow, and to be open and honest, in a small office for an hour and a half each week.
> The truth really does set you free. And denial is there for when you need a break.

Notice that LisaBri finds her denial helpful outside of therapy sessions. We therapists need to recognize that denial and dissociation can sometimes be helpful with these clients, as long as it is dropped during the therapy itself. It can prevent flooding and allow them to live a relatively normal life.

Trainings to make disclosing survivors appear psychotic

Another way that these abuser groups discredit the disclosures of survivors and make them deny their own reality is programming to make survivors appear psychotic. When a person appears psychotic, it can result in them being hospitalized, which can lead to a lot of other serious problems for this population. In Chapter Eleven, "'Stabilization' takes on a new meaning", I discussed the way in which these groups cause flashback hallucinations, flooding of emotions, rapid switching, scrambling of sensory information, and self-harm and suicide attempts. Following are some other memories that survivors have disclosed to me, which made the person appear psychotic. These trainings are difficult to recognize as internal punishments.

Insomnia

A child is stuck in a cage or tied to a stake for days, and if she falls asleep she is painfully prodded awake with a stick. Another alter is trained to reactivate this memory, and the triggered adult is totally unable to sleep.

Psychosomatic pain

An injection is given that makes the child hurt all over, and, while she is in this condition, she is raped with a hot object. A different alter is trained to administer the pain from this memory to the presenting person at the correct cue.

Emotional flooding

A child is put through a series of experiences (mostly very unpleasant) that produce a lot of strong emotions. Several different emotions can be used to produce "crazy" emotional lability, or one particular emotion, such as sadness or anger, might be the focus. Cues are given to alters to release these emotions and have the spinner alters spin them out to the rest of the personality system. This kind of training is involved in the "booby traps" of intense sadness and suicidality that the survivor encounters when she is getting close to protected memories of core training. A lesser version of this might come up as soon as the client makes disclosures about the abuse.

Flashbacks and hallucinations

During a horrifying abuse session, the child is told that if she talks she will see or hear or experience this painful event all over again as if it were currently happening. Separate triggers are taught for visual or auditory hallucinations. So the survivor could hear the voices of the abusers, or the sound of the electroshock machine. S/he might see a perpetrator in the therapy office, in a very frightening and "real" way, and be very confused about why you, the therapist, do not see him. ("He's right over there!")

There are less shocking versions of this, with different purposes. In the early stages of therapy with one ritually abused client, she kept staring at my hands. I asked what she saw on them. Lines. (There were no lines.) I asked whether someone inside was making the lines appear. Yes, a little boy. I asked whether he knew how to turn the lines off? Yes. He demonstrated turning the lines on and off, at my request, while some of the other alters watched. He was just doing his job to make the rest of the personality system believe I was one of the perpetrator group. He was proud of his ability.

Internal world disasters

Most mind-controlled children have an inner world and/or structure or structures created by building models with Lego or some such toy (see Chapter Six, "Markers of mind control and ritual abuse", and also Stella Katz's account in Chapter Seven). The alters "live" in that world, and there is training for the destruction and damage of the inner world. An earthquake is simulated by shaking up the model world so it breaks apart while the child is simultaneously being shaken. A tidal wave is simulated by flooding the model world while almost drowning the child. Similar simulations are done for fires and tornadoes. When certain triggers are given, the internal world is destroyed and alters are "killed" internally. (You can revive "dead" alters through such things as an imaginary healing stream. Remember, alters do not really die.)

Rapid switching and scrambling

For rapid switching programs, the child is spun around, and alters are called out by a special shoulder touch (along with their names being spoken) so fast that they go in as soon as they are out. The effect is inability to complete a thought or sentence, which looks like the schizophrenic "word salad". A variation is "Fast switch child alters", which allows only very young alters to come out but not stay out long. You can imagine the diagnosis and the treatment that would result if this were triggered in adulthood. For scrambling, the child is put through a very confusing treatment, such as this: People walk fast in all directions, pushing the child, talking very fast, and stepping on her. She is given a drug that loosens her tongue, and has to say everything that comes into her head, while people continue to talk too fast to be understood, push and throw her around, and poke her. While still talking, they put insects and spikes in and out of her ears so that she only hears part of what is said. At the same time, touch sensations are also scrambled by doing opposite touches, such as tickling and hitting. Triggering of the feelings from this memory results in the person talking continuously in a "stream of consciousness" style, and not understanding what is said to her. As with the rapid switching, this makes the person appear psychotic—and likely to be hospitalized.

Delusions

Dissociative disorders, even those created by mind controllers, are not psychosis, but this program will create the most common symptom used to diagnose schizophrenia. The child is hurt while on a turntable, with people and television sets and cartoons and photographs all around the turntable. New alters created by the torture are instructed that they must obey their instructions and become the people around them, people on television, or other alters when they are told to. When this program is triggered, the survivor will hear "voices" of the people whom the "copy alters" are imitating, or will have many confused alters popping out who think they are actually other people or movie stars. The identities of the copy alters change when the survivor's surrounding change.

Training to behave like an animal

Brain operations are simulated to apparently insert the brain of an actual animal (e.g., wolf for ferocity, dog for obedience, small rodent for stupidity or biting), and the child is trained by behavioral methods to behave as this animal does. As you have seen, it is common for survivors to have alters who believe themselves to be animals. When this behavior appears in an adult, however, she will seem genuinely crazy. Stella Katz described other methods of creating animal alters in Chapter Seven.

Remember that making a survivor appear psychotic not only discredits any disclosures she makes, it is also likely to get her into the psychiatric hospital, where there are often patients or staff members who are trained to find organized abuse survivors and get them back into control of the perpetrator groups.

Validation

Many survivors feel they would believe their own memories if they only had some external validation. Most of the time this is hard to come by. Sometimes, as with the first four of my ritually abused clients, there is cross-corroboration by other survivors or family members who were actually present during the abuse. The similarity of survivors' experiences in different locations is well documented. The Extreme Abuse Survey asked questions about quite a number of different experiences, and found large percentages of those reporting extreme abuse had similar experiences.

Some of the survivors who have the worst time being believed are those whose experiences involved government-generated technologies. Here are some examples of the validation that mind-control survivor Carol Rutz, whom you met in Chapter Two, obtained through her Freedom of Information Act submission in the United States. (Rutz is an author of the Extreme Abuse Survey as well as of a book on her experiences.) The material in this article, which she wrote for this book, is expanded in a speech she gave at the SMART conference in 2001.

Validating my mind control memories: Carol Rutz

> Many of the cult ceremonies took place at our local zoo. When I began to draw and talk about them, my doctor turned ashen. It was one of three times in eleven years that he said, "I've heard that before from someone else about that place." Wow! Talk about validation. When I went to the archives of the public library to find material on the zoo for two particular years, it was missing. Everything was there but the information for those two years. I was disappointed but not surprised. In April of 1993, after two years of retrieving SRA memories, I was able to go back to the zoo accompanied by my husband and walk through the places where these rituals had occurred. When I left, it was a victory.

different parts of my personality, separate and apart from the me that they would eventually reawaken. Years later, I was able to find a photo of the PET machine that was the actual technology used (Figure 2).

During the 1980s, a remote viewing project called Stargate was done at Fort Meade. It used binaural beat tones, transmitted through earphones, that altered brain waves. A hemi-sync device that played two different frequencies into each ear was found to produce altered states of consciousness. Perhaps this technology was derived from these experiments done in the 1960s on MKULTRA subjects.

During my recovery process, I also did a drawing of a procedure that was performed on me, I believe, by a doctor in Montreal, Canada. He inserted electrodes into sleeve guides and probed my brain, while someone in the room recorded what was being said. He said my brain was like a tape recorder and he just needed to take me back in time. He did this by touching different spots in my brain. The men kept recording the memories induced from images in my past. Later, a man from the CIA would use them for programming sessions. Figure 3 is the picture I drew of this procedure.

I did not know that this was a known procedure, and what it was called, until I came upon a diagram of it in a book (Scheflin & Opton, 1978, p. 268). It is called stereotaxic surgery. In it, an instrument is attached to the head, skin and muscle retracted, and a "bone button" removed to permit the insertion of an electrode into the depths of the brain.

We know now that during the 1960s and 1970s, the Soviets found that by passing a low voltage current from the front of the brain to the back, they could drop their remote viewers into the Delta

> State. Using this artificial means, they found Delta waves to be the brain's doorway to telepathic influencing, telekinesis, and remote killing.

> That might account for the remark I recall the doctor making, "Given enough time and enough bodies, I can find the doorway to the soul."

> Validation is what we all search for, isn't it—how can I know this is real? How can I prove this really happened? My alters found that painting and drawing were perfect expressions for getting scenes recorded—people's faces, places, buildings, ceremonies. I never knew what was going to be painted or drawn; I just gave my alters free rein. Years later I was able to match real people and places with my artwork. The validation was overwhelmingly powerful and helped me to understand what truly happened to me.

Of course, we do not know that the stereotaxic instrument really did what Rutz's captors told her it did. What they said might have been a deception. We do, however, know that she found validation of the experience her alters remembered.

Technological monitoring

You will notice the amount of technology used in Rutz's mind control training. The military and political groups who do this continue to become more and more sophisticated in their use of technology. Some survivors have found small metallic "implants" in their teeth or ears, and believe these were designed to monitor their location or to broadcast their words or thoughts to the abusers. Such technology has been developed recently for keeping track of animals or persons with dementia. But to what extent it was used years ago by mind controllers is unknown at this point. At least some of it may be similar to the "bombs" in the stomach, a trick to convince survivors that their abusers monitor them continuously. The presence of an object does not mean it is capable of collecting complex information and sending it back to abusers, or even sending them signals, for twenty or more years, as some survivors believe. As with other apparently bizarre beliefs of our survivor clients, we must acknowledge that something happened, and remain open both to the possibility that there was such technology and the possibility that it is yet another deception to convince survivors they cannot escape the grip of their abusers.

One of the most frightening aspects of this alleged technology is the possibility of mind control by "remote control," that is, through such technology as microwaves and radio waves. There are many stories about this, coming primarily from survivors, although we do know from a variety of reliable websites and mainstream news that such technology is being developed, or at least that the technological groundwork has been laid. Once again, however, we do not know whether this was in place when today's survivors were programmed. It is difficult at this point to determine how much of this is genuine, and how much comes from false beliefs deliberately induced to make survivors feel powerless, much like the "one huge and invincible cult" of whose existence survivors convinced therapists twenty years ago. I know that one of my mind control survivor clients was convinced of technological monitoring during a psychotic period several years ago, but as he healed he discarded such beliefs, along with many other bizarre ones in favor of recognizing that he had been abused by real human beings whose identity he knew.

If some of this remote control it is genuine, we may need to develop technological means to combat it.

However, we should not be intimidated. Even if "voices" are induced in the head by remote control rather than through alters doing jobs, survivors can learn to disobey such voices just as they do those of alters. Competent and compassionate therapy for the dissociation can help survivors to heal. Meanwhile, there are numerous survivors whose mind control is of the kind that can be treated through psychotherapy.

Neutrality vs. reflective belief

When a client who reports ritual abuse or mind control asks, "Do you believe me?", therapists often feel caught between two unacceptable options. We have been advised by many professionals to take an attitude of strict neutrality regarding the veracity of clients' allegations and supposed memories. Some claim it is unethical to do otherwise. Yet we know from our clinical experience that neutrality can be interpreted by a client as disbelief and can harm the therapeutic relationship. These clients already have considerable difficulty trusting a therapist, and because they have undergone many of the experiences described above they struggle with what they need to tell us. It feels as if we're "damned if we do say we believe" (encouraging the client in inventing things, inviting a lawsuit), and "damned if we say we don't believe" (invalidating the client).

So, in the early stages of therapy with such clients, here is what I suggest therapists say: "I'm a psychologist (you can say counsellor, social worker, doctor), and it's my job to deal with whatever's in your head. It's your job to figure out what's real, what's unreal, and what may be a result of abusers' tricks. You can only figure that out successfully when you've found out everything that's in your head." Reassure your clients that they can talk about whatever they need to talk about, regardless of whether or not at this moment they believe their memories or the images in their head to represent real experiences. That gets them "off the hook" of having to tell "the truth" which their abusers wanted them to tell.

Here is how Carrie Swart, of Intensive Trauma Therapy, Inc., addresses this issue (from an email posted to an online forum called the Dissociative Disorders Discussion List, reprinted with the author's permission): First, she says, it is "[t]he narrative truth that each individual brings to the table at a given time, [that] is of the utmost importance." The literal facts are not the issue, but the person's perception, experience and response:

> So many traumatized and abused individuals, both RA/MC and not, go through life not being heard and not being believed. I have seen many clients who, especially as children, have tried to tell someone about their abuse but were told 'That couldn't have happened' or 'Uncle Henry would never do that to you,' etc. . . . in some cases, not being believed by the adult 'caregivers' in one's life can end up being just as, if not more, traumatizing than the abuse itself.

When clients question the validity of their memories, she says, she informs them she cannot > answer that question for them . . . regardless of whether or not something occurred in reality, or is simply a product of one's brain, it is still disturbing to the individual. If their perception of an event, image, memory, dream, whatever, is disturbing to them in the here and now and causing symptoms of trauma/dissociation, then it needs to be processed. Our clients need to be heard and validated. We need to work with the information provided by a client, rather than focusing on whether or not we believe what he or she is telling us. The important thing for us as clinicians, is to believe that feelings are always valid and that each and every client we see deserves to live free of symptoms and free of pain.

I would add that the historical truth is often embedded within the narrative truth, and can be discovered by the client once the narrative truth has been faced in all the aspects available to all the dissociated parts of the client. When my client believed she had killed a living baby, an "observer" alter told her that the baby was already dead and its cries were made by a tape recorder hidden under the table. When the client who had undergone the "alien abduction" saw that the spaceship was within the cult training center, it cast doubt on the perpetrators being aliens. Tricks and lies can be unmasked, but only through the client looking, together with a supportive witness, at what she remembers, and then drawing her own conclusions when she has all the available evidence.

Van der Hart and Nijenhuis (1999) wrote a wonderful article on this topic. Here is their abstract:

> Clinicians should not reflexively accept or reject as fact a client's report of uncorroborated abuse. However, by maintaining a neutral stance, clinicians may fall short of therapeutic honesty and transparency, may fail to promote reality testing, and may not perform the necessary step of bearing witness to the client's victimization. Using a case of dissociative identity disorder, this article proposes the careful development and sharing of the clinician's reflective belief in the (in)validity of reported trauma. This process may assist clients in (a) reclaiming a sense of integrated personal narrative memory and identity, (b) correcting cognitive distortions, or (c) both. [p. 37]

There could come a time when we might come to reflective, rather than reflexive, belief. When everything seems to fit together—the client's symptoms, their stories of what happened, their body sensations and emotions, and any external corroboration—over time we can come to reflective belief that some of these experiences happened, although in many cases the experiences were not what the child believed they were. But there is a difference between believing that bad experiences happened, and believing what the child was led to believe. For example, a woman recently disclosed to me a memory in which a group of her male alters were anally raped by a group of priests, who told them that this was a special honor and a spiritual experience which was only given to boys. It is not necessary to believe that they were boys or that it was a spiritual honor in order to think that the client's memory could be valid. Similarly, when I meet an alter personality who informs me that he or she is not part of the body and would not die if they killed the body, I acknowledge that they had some experience which led them to believe that, but I do not accept their belief at face value; I search for what was done to make them come to this conclusion, and I attempt to unmask the trick.

Some professionals take the position that the truth or untruth of a memory does not matter. They suggest that therapists need not pursue an exploration of what really happened in trauma survivors' lives. I do not endorse this position. In practical terms, for this population, it would allow programming to endure, uncorrected. Psychologist Ellen Lacter, in an email to the online Dissociative Disorders Discussion Forum (reprinted by permission), speaks about the internal conflicts survivors go through in sharing their experiences, the most human response a therapist can give, and why it is damaging to merely take a neutral position.

> Most survivors are their own greatest critics when it comes to doubting their memories. They have been programmed to distrust them. They hate and fear them and want them to be untrue. They have been invalidated by others their whole lives. To be healing, we must be deeply honest. If an account seems contrived, fear-driven, impossible, etc., we can say "It does not ring true to me." And when reality is very unclear, we may say "Let's see what happens as this unfolds." But when clients overcome tremendous trepidation, and finally share an account of unspeakable horrors, with vivid multisensory details, and matching somatic flashbacks, and matching affect of fear, disgust, rage, and grief, pieces of other memories match, and they both wish it was not true, and long to be believed, and they say "Could this be real?", or "Do you think I am making this up?" we must speak the truth from our heart, and say "It all seems to fit," or "It rings true to me." To say "What matters is what is your truth" is a lie. It is nonempathic. It is dissociogenic. And it leaves them alone in the ritual or laboratory.

When I read accounts of clients with allegedly factitious DID, many of those accounts remind me of Teresa, one of my first four. I know that I went through a process of increasing disbelief with her, as the abuse she disclosed broadened from verbally abusive alcoholic parents, to sexual abuse by father, to sexual abuse by relatives, to the "boogie man" who came in through the window at night (probably someone who paid her parents for this privilege), to sexual assaults by strangers (who turned out not to be strangers to some of her alters). Couple that with the overwhelming positive transference which caused her to almost stalk me, as well as her tendency to confabulate when she did not remember what happened, and it was very tempting to dismiss her allegations as unfounded. I am grateful that I did not. Until I listened to her and to the others who were being abused by the same perpetrators, Teresa was alone in the psychiatric system, wearing a pejorative label ("Borderline Personality Disorder"), without help.

We need to be careful about labeling clients' disclosures factitious, no matter how far-fetched they appear to be. Some of the things these perpetrator groups do are indeed far-fetched, but they are real, even if they include simulations of impossible events. More important than telling the client we believe everything s/he tells us is letting him or her know we are open to his or her sharing whatever experiences s/he needs to share. Our clients need to know we are open to hearing about multiple perpetrators, deliberate creation of alters, torture of infants and children, years of deliberate planned abuse, sexual perversions, murders, cannibalism, and children forced to perpetrate. They watch us carefully to learn whether or not we can handle it, and whether or not they can trust us with that information. Let us not fail them.

In the following chapter, we will further examine the relationship between therapists and the clients who come to them to heal the unimaginable.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

Boundaries and bonds: the therapeutic relationship

The research evidence has not changed in the past fifty years: the factor that matters most in successful psychotherapy is the bond between the client and the therapist. Patterson (2000) states that

> Considering the obstacles to research on the relationship between therapist variables and therapy outcomes, the magnitude of the evidence is nothing short of amazing. There are few things in the field of psychology for which the evidence is so strong. The evidence for the necessity, if not the sufficiency, of the therapist conditions of accurate empathy, respect, or warmth, and therapeutic genuineness is incontrovertible . . . The effectiveness of all methods of counseling or psychotherapy may be due to the presence of a therapeutic relationship. [p. 441]

And that is one reason the mind controllers work so hard to destroy it.

How mind controllers prevent the therapeutic bond

Mind controllers know the importance of the relationship with the therapist. They know that the most likely time a survivor will disclose the secrets of their abuse is within a secure bond with a therapist or a loved one. So they go to extra trouble to make sure that such a bond never happens in the first place, or, if it does happen, that it will be disrupted and broken.

Deliberate neglect and breaking of infant bonds

Licensed Clinical Social Worker and survivor Wendy Hoffman, in her unpublished manuscript (1993), states:

> The cult knew about attachment disorder before it became a diagnosis. Their goal is to separate the fetus from the pregnant mother emotionally. They give the mother electric shocks in various parts of her body and she has to leave the fetus emotionally. If she does during these frequent torture sessions, the fetus is then born programmable because it will have attachment issues. The reason they test the fetus when born is to see if the mother separated from the fetus. The mother knows if she doesn't, the fetus will be killed. They test by giving the fetus pain and observing whether the fetus will accept comfort. If it will, then the fetus is not programmable, and may be killed.

Take a look at what Stella Katz wrote in Chapter Seven about the initial experiences of ritually abused infants. They are deliberately neglected and abandoned, and the bond with the mother is deliberately broken. One ritually abused client of mine had an alter who believed himself to be a rock. This resulted from being left alone all night out in the forest at the age of two, in the Canadian cold season.

Couple with this severe neglect and bond breaking the fact that, in most cases, the parents are actively involved in the abuse, and you have a recipe for severe distrust of anyone who appears to care. One client of mine was violently sexually abused by family members while they called out alters' names and said, "This is how we show you that we love you. This is what love means." Some of my ritually abused or mind-controlled clients have had parents with dissociative disorders. One part of the parent cared about the child and was even overprotective, while another part was involved in severe abuse. As one of my clients cried out recently while processing a memory of torture, "That's my dad but it isn't my dad, somebody else is inside him." In other cases, the parents have been consistently frightening and punitive as well as neglectful.

This kind of upbringing teaches a child that she cannot trust people to comfort her or to pay attention to her needs. It produces a disorganized attachment, even without all the pain and torture that these groups administer to children.

Training not to form bonds or trust anyone

Among their abuses designed to contaminate bonding, ritual abuse and mind control survivors have endured deliberate training experiences in which they have been taught not to trust anyone. For example, after a girl had told her teacher that her daddy hit her, her teacher and school counselor were impersonated by cult members, who abused her, and she was told that you cannot trust anyone you tell because they will turn out to be perpetrators and will abuse you.

Children in ritualistic cults are given animals to pet and love, and then the animals are killed, often with the child either being blamed or being forced to hold the weapon which kills it. Trish Fotheringham (Chapter Six) tells of having to choose between killing her pet rabbit or having the abusers kill her baby brother.

Perhaps the worst experience is when a child is forced to stab and believe she has killed a person she has been allowed to get close to. Children in Satanic or Luciferian cults are often paired with a "disposable" (unregistered or kidnapped) child, given a chance to make friends with that child, and then are forced to participate in that child's murder.

Stella Katz has shared this story, as an acknowledgment of what she was forced to do as a young girl, and a tribute to the (other) victim. She states that Miranda was a disposable child bred within her group, and was used to train Stella in the "art" of sacrifice, by being the sacrifice.

For Miranda: Stella Katz

This is for you Miranda, and for all the other Mirandas who came before you and who have come after you. May your souls be forever at peace.

Miranda was four years old when she died on an altar of Satan, at the hand of her five-year-old friend.

The only difference between Miranda and the other little girl was the family to which she was born. The five-year-old was fortunate, or not so fortunate, depending on the way you look at it, to be born to a family of the inner circle. She was destined to be great and was groomed to be so, and Miranda's death was part of this hideous grooming. Miranda was born to the lower circle. From the moment of her conception she was fated to die. She was probably conceived during an orgy, paternity unknown. Her birth would have been at home, or in the home of another coven member. She would never have seen a doctor unless he was of the coven, or anyone for that matter outside the group. She never went to nursery school, or the zoo, or any public place. No outside human being would have known of her existence.

From the moment of her birth she was neglected and abused, physically, emotionally, sexually, and spiritually. She was given only the bare necessities of survival. She was never allowed to associate with other little children or have any kind of friends. About six months before her death, she was, for the first time, allowed to have a little friend. The bond created between these children was unbreakable.

For those six months the friendship was encouraged in every way, and it flourished, neither child knowing what was to come. When someone is starving to death, and food is offered, they don't often stop to ask the cost. When children are deprived of love, any affection is welcomed. When that child suddenly has someone, the bond that is created is an everlasting thing.

For Miranda and her little friend, the bond that was created was nothing more than a deliberate cruel joke. The children were told that something special is coming, and that they are to be a part of it. They got excited as children do; talking and whispering and giggling about what it might be. As the day approached, they were primed and pumped and hyped up, just like children anticipating a special gift from Santa.

On that special day, they were bathed in sweet smelling soaps, and covered in sacred oils. Their hair was neatly curled and groomed and their bodies were painted with sacred symbols.

For those six months, they had been inseparable. And now they were to join in a big celebration at which they would be the honored guests. They were dressed in ceremonial garb. The little friend in white satin, and Miranda in a beautiful red chiffon dress, all soft and flowing. She looked like a princess and felt, for the first time in her little life, like someone special. Her blonde hair fell in ringlets flowing gently over her shoulders and down her back. Hand in hand, Miranda and her friend were led into the center circle by the High Priestess. The bell rang nine times, and chanting began. The High Priest began the offerings, and then after what seemed like forever, he picked up Miranda and carefully placed her on the altar. Her hands and feet were bound, and as the fear welled up inside her, > she began to cry. The priest then picked up her little friend and held her as she knelt beside Miranda. When Miranda saw her friend she immediately quieted and smiled. The priest picked up the sacred athame and placed it into the hand of the little friend.

> Holding her hand in his, he raised her hand, and with one swift thrust, pierced Miranda's heart. Miranda looked up at her little friend and smiled through her pain and tears, and said "You was my friend" and died.
>
> The little friend was left kneeling on the altar at Miranda's side holding the knife with the blood of her friend dripping off the end of it. Knowing that she had just killed her best friend. The High Priest picked her up again, and raised her to the crowd, and said, "You are forever ours." They cheered. She was passed around the circle and praised. The shock of what had happened was so great she couldn't even cry.
> Well, Miranda, thirty odd years later, your friend is finally crying and can't seem to stop. There are too many Mirandas. There are TOO many children that society doesn't know about, or care to know about. They turn their heads away and pretend that this stuff just doesn't happen. And worst of all, some are claiming that our memories of Miranda and kids like her are false.
>
> Well, Miranda, I know that you existed. I know that my memories are very real and so were you. I promise to you here and now that as long as I am alive, the world will know that you and others like you are not figments of our overactive imaginations. And Miranda, I swear to you that the voice I silenced so long ago, your voice, my friend, will scream through mine, until somebody finally hears, and puts an end to the slaughter of all the little Mirandas.
> No one on this earth will ever tell me that you never existed. Be at peace, my little friend.

Stella's tale of her little friend not only shows the horror of forced perpetration, but exposes the horror of the brief lives of unregistered children, born into cults and kept for a few years solely for the purpose of sacrifice.

My most personally traumatic experience in all the years of working with ritual abuse survivors happened when I discovered that one of my clients had an unregistered child. The client's reporter alter told the group that I had found out, and she was forced to kill the child before anyone could locate it. I had to work through this very recent memory with her.

What does it do to a child to have such experiences? Love is connected with death, and with the child experiencing herself as a murderer. How can such a person develop an attachment bond?

Most of the memories that can cause the overwhelming kind of guilt and depression used in the mind controllers' "booby traps" (to create suicide attempts) are the death of a loved one such as a brother, sister or friend, or the death of a pet, especially by their own hand. Other causes are memories of abandonment, being told they are unlovable, even by God—"no one wants you, you are worthless, no one can save you". The rescuing angel at the end of the Kabbalah pathways is the angel of death, who promises to stop this pain through being the only one who loves the child.

In Chapter Eight, I mentioned the experience of an adult client who, as a little girl, came to trust a friendly caring neighbor; the neighbor woman was impersonated and the child, drugged, forced to stab and "kill" her. Then the "dead" person violently abused the child, and the cult leaders told her that if she got close to anyone she would be forced to kill them and then they would become evil like this woman did. This client had an alter whose job was specifically to "unplug" her from any relationships in which she might get to trust someone. It took her several years before the young alters could begin to trust me.

Training not to trust therapists

There is also specific training of child alters to distrust therapists. One scenario I have encountered several times has the child lying on the couch of a cult-involved therapist, who says she must look at him. When she does, he is wearing a devil mask and horns, and he rapes her, telling her that all therapists are servants of Satan. Child alters are taught not to look at "therapists" until they are told to. Experiences such as this one reinforce this training. It sets the scene for actual therapists to be impersonated later in the person's life.

Often, child alters are trained to listen for certain words in what people say, and if they hear these words they know that the person is dangerous and not to be trusted. With one of my survivor clients I have to try not to use the words feel, touch, or think, among others. All those words were used in combination with torture. When the client with the reaction to those words recently attended an adjudication regarding Criminal Injuries compensation, the adjudicator asked her several times, "How do you feel?", the exact words which were said by her abusers after administering pain. Needless to say, she was upset, and an alter blurted out "Don't use the F word!" I had to explain what she meant to the shocked adjudicator, who stated that she would never use the F word. Another client cannot hear the word "safe," as to her this means the reverse. Several times I have heard a client say "They told me about people like you, they told me you would say that."

Mind controllers also train child alters to seduce therapists. A client of mine disclosed a memory in which she cried in the office of someone she was told was a therapist, and then in comforting her he sexually abused her in such a way that her body responded. Afterwards, he accused her of tricking him into it. When she got home, her mother said she did well, and taught her how to do it better. I found it quite sad when this client posed provocatively, trying to seduce me, saying in a childlike voice that it was "the best offer I'd ever get."

It is hard to build a relationship with someone who has parts who believe either that you will sexually abuse them or that they will harm you or be forced to kill you. Parts who are trained to kill in cults are generally told that they are evil and that their dark energy will harm anyone they get close to—or that the cult members will come and kill those people.

Impersonation of therapists

The training not to look at therapists sets the stage for members of the perpetrating group (sometimes called "cult clones") to impersonate the survivor's actual therapists when she seeks treatment and begins to disclose the abuse. Members of the abusive group study the therapist by attending his or her lectures, becoming clients briefly, or sending a client in with a device to tape the sessions. They find a way to get into the therapist's office, or use another space that is similar to the office. Then they call the client to meet them, or abduct her, and they use an individual who has some physical resemblance to the therapist to impersonate him or her, wearing similar clothing and scented products and imitating the therapist's speech patterns while the client is drugged and unable to see clearly.

Katz, discussing the impersonation of therapists as part of current contact, writes,

> When a client is disclosing secrets to a therapist, and the group finds out about it, the therapist is impersonated to make the client distrust them. In the old days, therapists would be impersonated by actors, in a setting that closely resembled the therapist's office. The actor would be dressed in similar clothing and would impersonate the voice of the therapist as much as possible. The person would be picked up and drugged and brought to the so-called office. A therapy session would begin as it usually did, then the therapist would begin to doubt what the person was saying. They would then tell them that they were lying and that what they were saying was just figments of their imagination. If the person protested, they would strap them to the chair or couch, and physically abuse them, or rape them using electric probes that burned or shocked. This would break any trust the client had with the therapist. At the end of the session the person may be told it was just a dream. However when the person tries to go to the therapist's office, they find it impossible to trust, or spend the session testing the therapist. This is done over and over again, until the person stops going altogether.
> Today it is done using virtual reality glasses, which is more efficient. With the use of computers and virtual reality glasses, as well as good old drugs, it has made it very easy for the groups to reproduce a therapist that the person trusts, and make them into a therapist that hurts. At one time they needed "look alike" actors, and a good construction crew, and money. Now they simply need to videotape the therapist's office through a window, as well as the therapist, and they can reproduce them any time they need to, with very little expense. A simple recording of the therapist's voice, usually taken from answering machine messages, with the help of a computer, can reproduce every little intonation the therapist may have in his or her voice. If anything specific is needed, a client is planted for a few sessions with a hidden tape recorder, and the group has everything they need to make the therapist appear to be the real person.

This impersonation of therapists sounds preposterous, and I did not believe it until it happened to me with the first four. Tony began to refuse to enter my office, and I had to meet him in the coffee shop across the street. The other clients became afraid of me. Eventually I discovered that cult members had somehow got into my office,[1] and in there someone impersonating me had brutally sexually abused them while telling them she loved them. She had also forced them to abuse one another.

I asked them to bring in a support person to our sessions while we worked through this memory. I eventually held a meeting with Teresa and Jennifer in which they apologized to one another and to me for participating in this (not that they had any choice). These clients all became aware of my being impersonated, and learnt to tell the difference between me and the "clone." I had a crooked finger at the time, and while not looking at the person's face they could see her hands and see whether or not it was me. During this period I had my first session with a teenager who claimed to be ritually abused, just after I had surgery on this finger, and she kept staring at my bandaged hand. When I asked her why, she stated that it had not been like that the last time she saw me. I had never seen her before! My "clone" had beaten me to the punch.

This impersonation only worked for a short period with these clients, because the "clone" abused them brutally, and did not do a very good job of impersonating me. However, a couple of years later, an artist client claiming a ritual abuse history told me she kept drawing my office. She was knowledgeable about these matters, and wondered whether perhaps my office was to be simulated. Then she had a dream in which people took her to an office which was a few blocks from mine, similarly located on the second floor of a commercial building, in which she had some kind of therapy session. A little while later, she came to a session with a support person and accused me of being angry and critical of her in our sessions, stating that she could no longer trust me. Apparently the impersonator that was used this time (this client was from a different perpetrator group than my first four) did a very good job by just engaging in bad therapy rather than sexually abusing the client, so it was harder for her to recognize that she was reacting to an impersonation than to me. I lost this client after over a year of therapy.

If you suspect that you are being impersonated to your clients, select something unique about your hands or some other part of your body, which the impersonator will have difficulty simulating, and suggest to your clients that they look at it if they are not sure whether the person is you. You may wonder how a client can believe that it is you when the person is engaging in behavior that is completely opposed to your nature and your usual way of being. Remember that these clients are used to being around people who have extreme changes in their behavior. Many of the perpetrators have dissociative disorders themselves, and switch to abusive personalities from ones who are quite socially acceptable. Others are just good actors.

It is very important that you find out whether this is going on and, if so, find a way to work through these current memories as soon as possible. Otherwise you may either lose your client or find yourself the target of a lawsuit or complaint to your licensing board.

Abuser groups also use voice impersonation over the telephone. Teresa, who lived in an apartment, had an impersonator imitate my voice over the intercom and invite her to go out for coffee. Another client, who had a safe husband and older children, kept getting phone calls from "me" cancelling our appointments. We agreed that if I called her, I would always use the name of a floater alter the group did not know about, so that she would know it was really me. Similarly, psychologist Eroca Shaler arranged to always talk about the weather with one client who was receiving such calls. If the weather was not mentioned, the client would know it was not really Eroca.

Creating a therapeutic bond with mind-controlled clients

It is easy to be impatient to get through therapy quickly, especially if funding is time-limited. However, the only thing that works with people who have been so frequently betrayed, trained to expect betrayal, and trained to believe harm will come to anyone they love, is to be consistent, week after week, year after year. We need to be consistent in our caring, caring for all parts of the person equally rather than rejecting some parts. We also need to be consistent in the boundaries we set, so that the client knows what to expect from us. Let us return to LisaBri's story.

A survivor in therapy: LisaBri

In childhood, severely abused emotionally, physically and sexually, I refused to die. My perpetrators, including my own mother and father, did not mildly abuse; they subjected me to the horrors of Incest and Satanic ritual abuse on a continual basis.

I was fearful of the slightest noise at night—beds creaking, house settling, pipes banging, or a door opening left me cowering in the corner of my bedroom. I knew they would be back to twist and warp my mind for their sadistic purposes. They always knew where to draw the thin line between death and sanity. I always waited in fear, with my heart pounding through my chest and cold, sweaty and clammy hands.

At the age of twenty-five I ran. In running, I found therapy. Three thousand miles away, in hiding, I approached my first therapy appointment. I was about to break one of the cardinal rules of the cult—you do not disclose to outsiders.

Body shaking, icy, freezing hands and feet, knees feeling like they would buckle with every step, I reached "Linda's" home office—scared but alive. She would guide me through the next five years. I left my car on the road, and thought of a hundred reasons why I should not continue and each was just as feeble as the last. During that two-minute walk, I convinced myself I had not escaped, and behind that door lay my abusers ready to punish me for my indiscretion. As I stood at the door, ringing the bell, hearing the sudden bark of dogs, and what sounded like a thousand troops pounding down the stairs ready for battle, it took all my inner reserves not to take flight as the internal pull to run or stay clashed in my brain.

Those first few years with Linda were turbulent with many valleys and hills. I would reach the crest of one only to fall down the other side. Linda did more than guide me; she broke her own ethical rule of conduct by laying no boundaries. She spent one on one time with me in her home. I would have dinner with her family. She spent her time off frequently having coffee at my house. I could call her twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, and she bought me presents.

Within four years, I had moved from the city to the small town that she resided in. I became part of Linda's other life away from therapy. Playing to my constant insecurities, Linda consistently told me, "I will never hurt or leave you," and I believed her.

Looking back upon it now, telling me this was as cruel as it was kind. With no set therapeutic boundaries I had no sense of myself. I was living Linda's life and I was bound for hurt or betrayal. Instead of helping me find independence and growth, I grew increasingly dependent on her and when the blow came, it hit the core of my being.

The message I received on my answering machine in the midst of intensive memory work told me she had renewed her faith in God and overnight believed only God could save me. Linda would no longer work with non-Christians. Scared, hurt, disbelieving, and having been so dependent on her, I could not comprehend life without her. Desperately not wanting to lose Linda, I ignored my own instincts and the daily growing knot of uncertainty in my stomach. I went to Christian counseling and to her church for a year, until the fear completely overwhelmed me.

I recognized that coming from such a horrendous background had left me spiritually raped and unable to cope with any religious denomination. I finally had to accept that I had lost Linda in more than a therapeutic way.

After shopping around for almost a year, I found "Christyne", but with a different resolve. I chose her, not from an overwhelming sense of urgency and neediness, but from an educated place of having > learned a harsh lesson. I talked to Christyne on the phone prior to making an appointment and she said, "I can guide you, I can help you find yourself and what that means, but first we have to set boundaries." I made an appointment.

> I must have reached for the phone twenty times from that day to the date of my appointment to cancel. I didn't. I arrived at my appointment with Christyne, weak-kneed with a parched mouth and throat, and feeling like I could not string two words together. I wondered how I would find the strength to master the walk up to her office; it looked like there were thirty steps, straight up with the last stair not in sight. As I stood on the ground floor, looking up to the top of that mountain of stairs—I knew I would climb it—more than once in my lifetime. All I had to do was take one step at a time. I would falter and take a step back, but in strength and support, I would regain my holding and advance to yet another step.
> Today, the mountaintop seems closer and with boundaries set out with Christyne I am learning independence and with it a sense of pride. I don't know where Christyne lives, nor do I have her home phone number. With proper guidance, I am in charge of my healing, and I am doing it. Having a consistent structure has been a major growth experience for me.
> I still have days when I want to cry and rage, "I don't want to do this anymore!" yet I find the strength and with Christyne's support, I advance to the next level of healing.

Therapeutic boundaries

LisaBri's story illustrates the extreme vulnerability of dissociative clients, the dangers of therapist–client enmeshment, and the importance of clear boundaries with survivor clients. Her early experiences happened during the period in the 1980s and 1990s when therapists were first discovering dissociative disorders.

Like many other therapists working in the 1990s, I had rather loose boundaries with the first few dissociative clients I worked with. Some of that was a result of having worked as part of a multi-disciplinary Child & Youth team with members such as child care workers and social workers, who would go out for coffee etc., with their clients. Seeing them outside the office did not work with my ritually abused clients, and gave an opportunity for the local cult to impersonate me in settings outside the office.

I now believe that every therapist must work out a set of explicit boundaries and stick to them. Issues of trust will arise no matter where the boundaries are placed, although they will be much worse without them.

Survivors of child abuse and neglect tend to replicate the enmeshment and violation of their early experiences. The neglect leads them to want nurturing like little babies without "object constancy." The abuse makes them insensitive to their own and the other's boundaries. At the same time, their evident hurt, and our natural empathic response, as well as their child-like nature when in young, traumatized ego states, lead us to violate our own boundaries in our attempts to help them. I agree with Kluft (1993) that > to break the ground rules of therapy is to recapitulate the boundary violations of the patient's childhood and to demonstrate that the therapist is corruptible rather than reliable, as MPD is a condition that was created by broken boundaries. [p. 27]

Guidelines about specific boundaries: therapist availability

The primary area where I find clients try to violate the boundaries concerns my availability to them. These clients are desperate for connection, and once we get past the initial fear, if I let them, they would move in with me. Some of them have no awareness of time. Tony used to phone me in the middle of the night, since he had no sense of the difference between day and night, and after waking me and taking up my attention for a long time, he would switch to a sexualized alter and accuse me of talking to him when I was in bed. When I told him I would turn off the ringer at 10 p.m., he thanked me. Now I do not give out my home phone number at all to these people. I also do not promise to call back at the end of the day, because I am often too tired, too late, or too busy. I have slightly different rules for each client, depending on the extent to which they violate boundaries. As James Chu (1998) says, constant availability ignores the real human limitations of the therapist, and also leads to increasing dependence on the therapist. And, I might add, it also fails to prepare clients for real life.

Length and frequency of sessions

This is another area where some clients push the boundaries, in particular going into abreactions or pseudo-seizures, or raising important and sensitive topics, when there are five minutes left in the session. If a client needs a longer session because she is processing a particularly difficult memory, that is one thing. If she delays bringing up the awkward topic until the end of the session, that is another. I do find that most dissociative clients work better with a session an hour and a half long rather than the standard fifty-minute hour.

Do these clients need more therapy sessions than others? Twice per week (presumably, one-hour sessions) is generally recommended for clients with dissociative disorders. I find it works well enough with just one weekly ninety-minute session, recognizing that most of my ritually abused or mind-controlled clients cannot afford even this. The longer session gives dissociative clients more time for different alters to speak either to me or to one another, and also allows time to work through traumatic memories.

The only occasions where I have given extra time were when I was trying to remove all the access programs from my clients who were currently being harassed by the local cult. A weekend intensive therapy program of two days, all day, enabled us to get rid of some of those dangerous programs and make the clients safer. For suicidal crises, I allow the client to use the other resources, such as crisis lines, set up for such situations. I am usually able to avert such crises by careful attention at the end of a session to whether or not such a program is triggered, and speaking with the alters responsible.

Phone calls and emails

I used to say that I would only return calls if the person was in crisis. I found that this led to a manufacturing of crises. So now I just say (for those who are prone to frequent boundary invasions) that I do not return calls unless the purpose is to reschedule appointments. I limit one particular client to leaving me one message per week. I do allow clients to call and listen to my message and hang up. Some of them have brought little tape recorders for a special message each week that they can listen to. I give my email address out only to selected clients when they have proven that they can respect boundaries, and I allow them to email me rather than telephone if they are having difficulty. That way I can decide whether and when to respond.

Office rules

Mind-controlled clients in particular appreciate rules being given. They also understand rules, as they have lived with them since infancy.

My own office rules are: (1) don't hurt people; (2) don't break things; (3) don't take clothes off except coats. I state these rules to dissociative clients, especially to child alters. I emphasize that the rules apply to me as well as to them. I see their eyes widen when I mention the "Don't take clothes off" rule. I believe this rule is particularly important because of the likely history of sexual abuse by persons pretending to be therapists. When I state the rule I am telling them not only that I will not abuse them this way, but also that I am aware that this sometimes happens.

Touching

Touch is a complicated issue in the field of psychotherapy, and especially so with these clients. Stephen Ray, one of my early teachers about ritual abuse, said that he thought it was abusive not to touch clients who have been so massively neglected and abused. I do hug, touch, and occasionally hold clients, depending on the person. I often hold the hands of one of my ritually abused clients while I speak with her alters. Apparently several of the "evil" alters were told that they would poison anyone who touched them, so it is important to show them that this curse was based on a lie. My touch creates anxiety in the short run, but will create safety in the long run.

I always ask permission of the particular alter. If any alter seems to have a sexual response I discuss it openly, giving an explicit statement that I will not be sexual with them. One male client had a very young alter he called "the horny goat" for obvious reasons; after careful consideration, he decided that this child part needed a hug too, despite his embarrassment. However, there are days when he makes it clear that he is not to be hugged. The experience of setting his own physical boundaries is probably very reassuring to him.

I do believe it is wise to be careful whom you touch or hug. Many years ago I hugged a distressed woman who had been sexually abused by her mother; needless to say, this was the wrong thing to do.

Commitment and money

If I take on a client with a dissociative disorder, especially if they have experienced mind control of any type, I know I am making a long-term commitment—that is, of several years' duration. So I do not take them on unless I know I want to and am able to follow through. This pertains especially to the financial burden of therapy. I do not start with anyone who cannot pay, unless there are very special circumstances. If a funding source runs out, it is not ethical to just terminate the client. I do not allow dissociative clients to owe me money. Payment for therapy must be negotiated clearly at the start, and in some cases periodically renegotiated. I currently have several pro bono clients, and they are all survivors of organized abuse whose funding ran out some time ago. I need to make sure I have sufficient income from other sources so that I can continue to see these clients.

Dealing with boundary violations

Boundary violations are essentially unavoidable with these clients, because any ritually abused and mind-controlled people have alters who are trained to violate therapists' boundaries. But it makes a difference how we handle them. When I speak to such a client about boundaries, I always begin with saying, "You are not in trouble." In trouble is the term that many of these survivors use when they are expecting the severe beating or rape that happened when they disobeyed their abusers.

It is to be expected that clients who have been persistently violated in childhood will have difficulty recognizing and respecting boundaries. When it happens, it is important that we mention it to the client, acknowledging any fault of our own if necessary. Confrontation is difficult when we are angry and hurt. I find it helps to write out my own feelings about boundary violations first, and then write out what I am going to say to the client, so that I will not explode, blame, or fail to state my concerns assertively. And it is important to confront sooner rather than later, so I do not have a lot of stored-up anger and hurt.

Just over a year ago, I took on a client who had been fired by an experienced trauma therapist for persistent boundary violations. I took her on probation. Since she had disclosed a history of ritual abuse and mind control, I informed her that I was aware that she probably had alters who were trained to disrupt therapy, and that if this happened with me, that would be the end of our work together. I made my boundaries very clear. About a month into therapy, she flooded me with emails. I gave her a single warning, and told her parts to turn off whatever programming was making them do this. They acknowledged that it was indeed them doing their "jobs," and stopped.

I had this client for a year before she crossed my boundaries again. It happened in response to a crisis in a friendship with another survivor who was also a client of mine. (She met her through a website rather than through me.) There were fifty-seven emails within a few days. I immediately told her not to send me any emails at all. She came to our next meeting expecting to be fired. She had cut her arms and abused alcohol.

I told her that I had been observing her reaction, and we now had an opportunity to find out what caused this reaction, which had given her trouble in many relationships with professionals. I inquired not about the problem to which she was reacting, but the mechanism within her which was creating the reaction. We located "It" and "Beasty," the "non-human" rejected alters who were creating the problem, and worked through the memory of their creation. Her last email to me on the subject said simply "Thank you for giving It and Beasty human dignity and awareness of peace."

This story illustrates how boundary violations have complex and programmed causes in mind control survivors, so we need to be firm but also compassionate, and seek out the root causes of boundary violations if and when they occur.

Transference and countertransference

In an excellent little article called "What is dissociated?" Susan Sands (1994) states that the attachment disorder that is universal among dissociative clients leads to the client's trying to get childhood relational needs met without trusting the therapist to meet them. The child's healthy relational needs for empathy, affect attunement, mirroring, calming and soothing, admiration, security, recognition, sense of alikeness with another, and loving confrontation are dissociated in childhood. These hidden needs and longings are inevitably remobilized within the therapy relationship. The relational needs are experienced by the survivor as longings, affects which signal that certain environmental responses which are necessary for self-development were missing. These longings were dissociated and seen as bad by the child, because the mobilization of these longings led to danger from a sadistic caregiver, and also because of the role reversal in the parental relationship. They come up in therapy in very crude ways, and it is easy for us to agree with the client that they are bad (regressive, inappropriately sexual, overwhelming to us, etc.)

There are "painful, compulsive re-enactments." The relational longings are experienced, then violently resisted. The client fantasizes us as the idealized omnipotent savior. What we saw in early MPD treatment was that, in response, a lot of reparenting occurred—usually associated with severe boundary violations.

Attachment-related transference

Most persons with dissociative disorders (not just mind control survivors) have difficulties with attachment. Sands and other writers, such as Goulding and Schwartz, have described the following client behaviors related to attachment:

- alters competing for therapy time, trying to get reparenting from the therapist;
- manipulating the therapist, for example, a client cutting her own arm to get an extra session;
- seeking constant reassurance and expressions of affection and caring;
- smothering neediness, attempting to blend or fuse with the therapist;
- expecting the therapist to be an almighty rescuer;
- wanting too much time, energy and commitment;
- perceiving rejection or abandonment where it isn't and reacting with self-mutilation, suicide attempts, fugues, and missed sessions;
- overreacting to the therapist's illness or tiredness;
- overreacting to the therapist's vacations and business trips, thinking everything will change during this time;
- being "a bottomless pit of parts, pain, and crises".

Teresa, the client I almost did not believe, "stalked" me, engaging in many of these behaviors. She would hang around outside my office in the Mental Health Center, hoping to get a glimpse of me if I left the office to go to the bathroom or to lunch. She saw herself as very special to me, and frequently gave me handmade gifts from the child alters, telling me that her parents always rejected such gifts. She would gladly have moved in with me if given such an opportunity. She created an alter named after me. I found it very difficult to deal with her constant needy presence, and at times I would express anger at her, something that appeared not to bother her at all. I was aware that she had never been cared for, but I did not want to become her mother, and I had to deal with my personal reaction to her clinging presence. As we persisted in therapy, she did improve, and eventually was able to leave town to get away from her abusers to establish residence in another city, where she developed new relationships.

Sands writes that "The patient not only fears that the therapist will become the perpetrator; the patient will inevitably evoke controlling or sadistic responses . . . from the therapist." Teresa certainly did with me. I remember my anger and my guilt as I tried to push her away from engulfing me with her neediness. Although Teresa was a ritual abuse survivor, much of the transference she made to me, and the countertransference she evoked in me, were responses to the neglect and emotional abandonment by her parents; she played them out with me because I was the first of the professionals in her life who had sought to understand her rather than dismissing her as an untreatable case of "borderline personality disorder."

Looking back, I am not clear how many of Teresa's needy and engulfing behaviors were programmed. All the behaviors described above can occur with "regular" DIDs or trauma survivors who were not subjected to ritual abuse or mind control. But with the mind-controlled population we need to bear in mind that, in addition to living with sadistic and inconsistently available caregivers, they have experienced specific interventions by the abusers to make sure they do not form a bond with a therapist. Teresa had particular difficulty with my vacations, being afraid that something terrible would happen to me while I was away. I later found out that the cult group simulated my murder on several occasions when I was on vacation, in addition to using the time to hold fake and abusive "therapy" sessions. Mind-controlling abusers capitalize on the client's natural fear that the therapist will become a perpetrator by setting up staged scenarios in which the therapist is indeed abusive, and in which the client has to abuse the therapist.

In any personality system, those alters in charge of safety are always observing what goes on in therapy, and trying to assess how trustworthy we are. Even though many parts do their "jobs" of sabotaging the bond, most parts are very hungry for connection with a trustworthy person, something they have never experienced, which is a basic, healthy human need. We must recognize the importance of this need. It is unlikely that mind control survivors have experienced such a connection, unless their abuse happened in a setting unconnected to the home. This connection is probably the most important element in any therapy, and particularly so with those who have never experienced it.

As we provide recognition and respect, soothing, mirroring, and gentle confrontation in therapy sessions, we can then encourage it to be gradually internalized. Alters who have experienced this can share it with newly emerging alters. I used to read a story to the "kids" of one ritual abuse survivor at the end of each therapy session, and newly emerging child parts would begin their current awareness by listening to the story from "inside." We can empathize with the client's desire to have us twenty-four hours a day, explaining that that is what a baby needs, while not giving in to it. We can ask them to provide in the inner world the nurturing that we cannot provide on the outside. We can respond gently to sexually aggressive alters, explaining that we do not need them to have sex with us like their abusers did, but we care about them without this.

Trauma-related transference

Judith Herman (1992) points out that because disempowerment is a huge effect of trauma, clients often attempt to regain their power via the therapeutic relationship—when, because of their needs to be taken care of, they have given us too much power. At the moment of trauma, the victim is utterly helpless and feels totally abandoned. "It's frightening to need someone so much and not be able to control them," Herman states (p. 137). The patient feels that her life depends on her rescuer, so she cannot afford to be tolerant of human error in the therapist. Herman gives an example of a Vietnam veteran who wanted revenge on the medic who treated him, rather than on the enemy. "In fantasies they wish to reduce the disappointing, envied therapist to the same unbearable condition of terror, helplessness, and shame that they themselves have suffered" (p. 138). I believe that if the therapist is truly empathic, this is reduced. It is worse if the therapist distances him or herself from the client and the material. It is important for the therapist to understand the power dynamics so as not to take the challenges personally.

Trauma-related transference might lead to attempts to regain power in the disempowering therapeutic relationship through such behaviors as:

- accusing the therapist of incompetence;
- pumping up the therapist's vanity then pricking it with a pin, challenging his or her professional expertise, and catching every error he or she makes;
- blaming the therapist for compounding their suffering;
- inviting the therapist into power struggles and trying to provoke him or her to be hurtful and abusive, and to re-enact the trauma in therapy;
- sharing graphic details of abusive incidents which traumatize the therapist.

Mind controllers are aware of this dynamic, and they use it. One common technique of mind-controlling abusers is to infuriate the victim through making them powerless, for example, to save another child whose cries they can hear. Then, when the anger is sufficient to split off an alter who only knows the emotion of anger, the abusers provide a victim upon whom that alter can take out its rage. When the survivor later encounters frustration or powerlessness, these rage-holder alters can be activated. Sometimes they are specifically trained to attack or kill therapists. It is uncommon that a client's system will allow any real harm to occur, but therapists working with survivors should be aware that this training might be present.

Time and trust

There is no substitute for time in building trust. Almost all of my ritually abused clients have had histories of failed therapy with other therapists. Some had their boundaries violated, some were allowed to cross over the therapists' boundaries and were then blamed for it, and some were treated by methods that are just inappropriate for this population. Your clients will watch your every move and every word to see whether or not you are trustworthy, believing that it is most likely that you are not, but hoping desperately that you will prove to be a person they can trust. It might take you many years to prove this, but it is possible. Once this happens, you will be able to get to the other work of therapy, developing relationships with all parts of the personality system, working through the traumatic memories, and resolving the issues caused by the extreme abuse. Take your time. And be patient with yourself, too.

The important thing to remember at this point is that you need to treat all parts with consistency and fairness, with "unconditional positive regard." It is only when you provide consistency over time that a survivor of this kind of horrendous abuse can come to trust you.

Remember also that many parts have no sense of time, so when they come out into the body after years of therapy, they may have no awareness of all the person's history with you. It will help if other parts can take the time to fill them in so that they can build trust with you more quickly. A month ago, I met a "new" alter in a client I have been treating for many, many years. This part did not know who I was and was suspicious of me, especially when I asked him questions. I recognized by his behavior that he had probably been interrogated by abusers, as he interpreted even my statements as questions that he did not want to answer. The host is by now pretty sophisticated regarding dealing with alters, and he instructed me to leave this new part alone to just observe his present life until he is ready to talk. Good advice. It turned out that this part is very helpful in calming him down, now that he has been orientated to the safe present.

Note

1. I later discovered that the woman who took another client of mine to a cult meeting was a member of a sexual abuse survivors' group that met in my office building, so she could have remained after a meeting and unlocked the building for the perpetrators.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

Treating programmed pedophilia

Survivors of all forms of childhood sexual trauma frequently have serious sexual problems. As E. Sue Blume says in her 1990 book, Secret Survivors, which lays out many of the sexual sequelae of incest, "The context in which the child victim is first introduced to sex is responsible for numerous distortions in later life. Sex is not sex for the incest survivor" (p. 207). In particular, survivors of incest feel shame over the fact that they were sexually aroused during the abuse. The body is wired to respond to being sexually stimulated, and this is something a child cannot handle emotionally. Sexual aversion is frequently seen, as is sexual addictions, as well as other forms of sexual compulsivity.

Since most survivors of organized abuse—ritual abuse, mind control, child prostitution, and child pornography—have also experienced incest (which Blume defines as abuse by a person of greater power who is involved in an ongoing relationship with the victim), it is helpful to know about these things. However, the sexual abuses of these survivors go far beyond those of most sexual abuse survivors. Survivors of these abuses do not reactively develop problems such as sexual disturbances, including addictions and paraphilias, they are programmed to do so.

There is also programming that creates alters with ego dystonic gender identities and sexual orientations for both male and female, gay and straight survivors, which the survivor will need to resolve over the course of treatment. Your client might be too embarrassed and ashamed to tell you about even these comparatively innocent issues. Two male survivors I treated had extremely embarrassing personal solo sexual habits, which brought them great shame. One had "girl" alters who believed their anus to be a vagina, and inserted objects into it for sexual stimulation, not even realizing they had a penis. I helped him resolve it through recurring "sex education" lectures to his child alters, explaining that they were a man now who used to be a boy, not a girl, what kind of body parts they had, and how they could get the good feeling (orgasm) without engaging in the behaviors which they believed were the source of the feeling. The other man discovered that his child alters had been "located" in his anus.

So you can imagine what it is like for them to discuss the rest of it. In Chapter Seven, Stella Katz describes cult sexual training. You can imagine the results of such things as dressing alters up in costumes (e.g., strap-on penises for girls) to make them believe they are of the opposite sex, deliberate pairing of pain and pleasure, bestiality, necrophilia, and training to participate in sexual abuse and/or torture of other children while being sexually stimulated and experiencing sexual pleasure. It is no surprise that paraphilias and bizarre sexual addictions are common in this population. Groups who make the worst kinds of pornography, including child pornography, sado-masochistic pornography, and necrophilic and "snuff" (killing) pornography, create their own markets by training children and adolescents to respond sexually to other children, animals, violence, dead bodies, and death.

The conventional approach to treating sexual addictions and other extreme sexual behaviors (terms that in today's society are seen as extremely relative) is through the affected adult. With support from a therapist and/or a group, the client attempts to recognize and resist his or her troublesome urges on an ongoing basis. Sometimes, this works. Often, it does not. If we understand these problems as possibly resulting from dissociated childhood experiences, however, at least in some cases, then it may be possible to fully resolve these problems through treatment of the underlying dissociative disorder and resolution of the traumatic memories, often with great success. In any case, most of these issues are a matter of quality of life, and so it is the choice of the survivor whether or not to address them and how much effort to put into recovery. Likewise, most of the paraphilias, which are expressed "between consenting adults."

But there is one result of ritual abuse and programming that we do not have the choice to ignore, legally, morally, or psychologically: pedophilia. This is a behavior that, in the view of many professionals, can never be cured. But, fortunately, in this population, it often can be.

I share with you now the story of my client Jennifer, whose therapy included treatment for pedophilia. One of my first four ritual abuse survivor clients, Jennifer came to me in 1992 at the age of seventeen through my position at Child & Youth Mental Health Services. She requested treatment for newly remembered memories that she had sexually abused her younger brother. She worked hard, despite constant harassment by the local cult group, and reached full integration in just four years. Jennifer taught me a great deal of what I know about how to work with DID and with ritual abuse, and this book would not exist if it were not for her intelligence and bravery. I made many mistakes during the course of her treatment, but it was nevertheless successful. The following story demonstrates not only the extraordinarily layered programming that can be involved in this training, but the fact that even with those circumstances, the urges and behaviors of pedophilia can be successfully resolved.

Jennifer's story

The beginning of treatment

Jennifer was a 12th grade student in an elite boarding school. Her two years in that school were her first experience of living in relative safety. Just before graduation, when she would have returned to her family, Jennifer had a "breakdown", supposedly induced by thyroid problems. During this breakdown, she became aware that she had sexually abused her younger brother when she was between the ages of nine and fifteen. She also became aware that she had a lot of internal parts. She mapped out her internal parts in her journal, and they began writing and communicating with her there. She disclosed the existence of these parts to school personnel and to her physician. She also told these people about abusing her younger brother. She was hospitalized, referred for outpatient therapy, and placed in a foster home after the school year ended.

In the psychiatric hospital, as often occurs, despite the fact that she had produced a chart of her alter personalities, Jennifer was diagnosed as "borderline". I was the outpatient therapist assigned to her. In our first session, Jennifer asked whether I believed in what was then known to most people as Multiple Personality Disorder. When I said I did, and that I had worked with this disorder, she breathed a sigh of relief, produced her alter chart, and described what she then knew of her system. It became clear that I was talking to an organizing alter personality who frequently masqueraded as the ANP. Jennifer described her ANP as "a thin shell without much actual content," just a conduit through whose voice the other alters appeared.

Jennifer was disclosing her offenses at this time, she told me, because she preferred to be charged as a juvenile rather than as an adult. Besides the abuse of her brother, who was six years younger, she disclosed offending against some young boys she had babysat when she was about thirteen. Both sets of abuses were investigated and found to have occurred, and she was charged.

The personality system

I began by getting to know some of Jennifer's existing alters. The thirty-three that she had mapped out before starting therapy were the "real world" alters, mostly teenagers with different skills and interests. The map of her system was divided into Good, Mediator, and Evil sections. One part of Evil contained alters representing negative emotions with names such as Lust, Malice, Pain, Fear, Anger, Hate, Sadness, Ambiguity, Denial, and Grief. I later found out that these alters had regular names like Mike, Nicole, and John. The other part of Evil contained alters representing negative actions: physical harm to the self, manipulation, lust, and incest. The alter she called "Incest" was a teenage girl alter named Kristine. According to what she wrote about the alters, Kristine was boastful and proud about what she had done to her brother. Her other alters were horrified.

This was just the first layer of Jennifer's highly organized personality system. Most of the alters in this layer had been created spontaneously by Jennifer in reaction to her abuse. The next layer consisted of what she called Hurt Children, whom she had named. I did not find out until much later that they were named after children she had seen sacrificed. Below were several other layers, and other sections of alters deliberately created by Jennifer's abusers. But I did not find this out until much later. The system initially believed the incest offender alter, Kristine, to be the only offender alter. However, there were two alters in the second layer: another Kristine, and a male alter who influenced Kristine to offend. A third Kristine, who said she was a priestess, controlled both of these alters. In addition, other offender alters, with other memories of sexual offenses, were hidden in various layers of the personality system.

Memory work

At the start of therapy, Jennifer experienced repeated flashbacks of a gang rape at about age four that took place in a housing complex where she lived. Three of the abusers appeared to be teenage boys; the fourth, a man named Jason, would figure in many of her later memories. She had alters representing the rapists as well as herself as the victim. Some of these alters had imagined themselves to be perpetrators in order to avoid experiencing the pain of the rape. Within two months of beginning therapy we successfully processed this memory, making sure that the rapist alters took part so that they could no longer deny the pain of sexual abuse. When we processed a few other related memories with them, the rapist alters automatically integrated. Both Jennifer and I initially assumed that these memories were the cause of her problems.

Jennifer and I discussed potential memory processing methods and together developed one that worked for her. It was evident that Jennifer put herself into a trance during her memory processing without formal induction. I was amazed at the amount of detail she provided. The "backwards" method of memory processing we developed—choosing memories based on the behavior or feelings they motivated, rather than from the trauma material that was erupting at any one time—would later become my protocol for working with survivors. It was routine for pairs or groups of alters to integrate at the end of memory processing. As we worked with each layer of alters to deal with the memories causing their splits, they integrated and new layers came up.

Issues of safety and stabilization

Two months after we began therapy, Jennifer went to court for the sexual abuse of her younger brother. This precipitated arm-slashing by "Josh," one of the known male alters. Josh felt panic and terror at the sight of Jennifer's mother in court, but he had no idea why. When we explored this, Jennifer discovered a memory of sexual abuse by her mother, followed by punishment for being "seductive." This let me and the foster mother know that contact with Jennifer's mother was unsafe for her. Jennifer reported the abuse by her mother, and her younger brother was briefly apprehended and questioned. He did not disclose any other abuse beyond that done to him by Jennifer herself, so he was returned to the family. His mother began home schooling him.

When I went on vacation four months into therapy, Jennifer engaged in some sexual promiscuity. We found this to be very complicated behavior involving several alters. "Jessie" would seduce the men and carry out the actual intercourse. Two other alters liked the attention and cuddling. "Kristine," the alter who had abused Jennifer's little brother, handled the oral sex. Some alters wanted a child. Another was a homosexual male. We dealt with the promiscuity by planning that the traumatized child alters would share with the sexually active ones how they felt when sex happened.

The sexual behavior allowed me to talk with Kristine. She said that she had a sexual bond with her "whole fucking family," including her mother. Kristine did not particularly enjoy sex, but it was a "family thing." She did not really want the sex with her younger brother, and suspected that another alter might have made her do it. She felt obligated to engage in sex with one man so that he would like her. Her "whole fucking family" became our private joke.

Shortly after this conversation, I discovered that Jennifer had alters representing all her family members, and that these "copies" were themselves multiple, having sub-alters named from her family members' alter personalities. It appeared that all her family members also suffered from Dissociative Identity Disorder. Jennifer's personality system, being familiar with the names of her family members' alters, had "copied" these within own system. On one occasion I was speaking with an alter of Jennifer's who believed herself to be Jennifer's mother, and I asked to speak to the alter who represented her brother. Jennifer's "mother" said solemnly, "I'll go and get him," went out to the waiting room, and returned as her "brother."

Although Jennifer was no longer sexually abusing children because she had no access to them, she was extremely dysfunctional during our first two years of therapy. She had some promiscuous alters who initiated sexual contact with unsafe men. She was in and out of the mental hospital for cutting her arms and for suicide attempts. She would leave the foster home and come back traumatized, with no memories of what had happened. It became apparent that she was still in contact with her family and other abusers. She would remember seeing her mother at a bus stop, then that memory would abruptly terminate and she would "lose time." Although Jennifer was able to tell her foster mother when to hide her shoes so she could not go out at night, and when to put her in hospital, these requests were not enough to ensure her safety, since she went out during the day.

Because of the extent of current abuse, we decided together to work with the memories very early in therapy. We just did not have the luxury of very slowly getting to know the personality system and very slowly beginning to build trust. It soon became clear to me, and to the foster mother, that Jennifer's disclosure of her sexual offenses against her younger brother had been an attempt to find a way to safety from her family and the criminal group with whom they were involved.

Within a few months, Jennifer and I were working on a weekly basis with both old memories and memories of current abuse which endangered her. Jennifer's presence in the foster home helped tremendously, as the foster mother provided her with both nurturing and protection.

A week before Jennifer had to move out of the foster home, her foster mother notified me that a fourteen-year-old alter had come out and told her that we had only been dealing with the top one of six layers of the personality system. I had thought we had worked our way through thirteen layers. It appeared that these were thirteen compartments of alters on the first layer. Most of these alters were spontaneously created rather than deliberately placed there by the abusers.

When Jennifer became a legal adult at age nineteen, she was required to find her own residence. She got an apartment, and it was not long before her older brother began meeting her there to have sex with her alters, assisted by pleasure-enhancing drugs which he provided. The alters in charge of the system took action to stop their dangerous behavior by traumatizing the sexually acting out alters with memories of painful sexual abuse by that brother. This put an end to her spontaneous contact with him, but other alters continued to make contact with family and cult when they required her presence, and to report to them regularly about her progress in therapy.

Current safety concerns, as well as the gradual unfolding of Jennifer's personality system, dictated the order in which we worked with the memories. Events that Jennifer remembered as influencing her to become a sexual offender included being trained to offend both informally by her brother and formally by organized criminal groups. The primary organizer of all Jennifer's abusive experiences appeared to be the man named Jason; his relation to her family was unclear.

Memories relevant to sexual offending

Jennifer's abuse, as it was revealed through the memories, included sexual and physical abuse at home at the hands of all family members, systematic ritualistic abuse, and pornographic film-making at a sophisticated studio. (I have, since that time, had three other clients with memories of that studio, one as a perpetrator.) There was a good deal of deliberate training for pedophilia and for sexual sadism and masochism. This demonstrates to me that groups who make child pornography create their own market in adult survivors.

Abuse by family and friends

Five months after we began therapy, Jennifer processed a series of memories of sexual abuse at home by her older brother, from when she was four until her teens. During the later events, he would threaten to disclose Jennifer's abuse of her younger brother. Then she disclosed memories of having been taught to sexually abuse a little boy while being filmed.

Three months later, a male alter became suicidal after having recalled memories of abusing her younger brother. It was he who had made Kristine perform the abuse. Once "Sean" had been in the "real world" long enough, and had processed enough victim memories to realize how harmful his behavior had been, he felt he did not deserve to live. We processed the memories of the abuse of her younger brother, which was apparently mutually pleasurable. This is not surprising, since it is likely that Jennifer's younger brother had been sexually trained the same way she was from an early age.

Two weeks after that, Jennifer came up with memories of her older brother teaching her to abuse her younger brother when she was about nine. She had caught her older brother abusing her younger brother. He invited her in, sexually aroused her, then replaced himself with her little brother. At this point I thought that this experience, along with being sexually abused, was the primary source for Jennifer's offending behavior.

But there was more to come. We went through a series of memories of sexual abuse by her older brother and her mother. Jennifer's father had left the family when she was four, and there were some memories of abuse by him alone and together with her mother.

Then came a series of memories of a friend's father teaching her and her friend to sexually abuse younger children, especially a little boy she used to babysit. This man had previously been charged for sexually abusing Jennifer's younger brother. Jennifer had previously remembered abusing these children but had not recalled being taught to do so.

Jennifer and I thought we had now dealt with the sources of her offending.

Risk of perpetration while in treatment

In the spring of 1994, twenty months into therapy, Jennifer stayed in a transition house to get away from severe harassment from her family and other cult members. When she stopped going to meet her abusers, they began abducting her from the street and abusing her violently. Jennifer called me from the shelter with concerns that some alters were having sexual feelings about a little boy staying in the house, and she did not know how much power she had to control it. She had always been very honest with me. I made a short-term contract, much like a suicide contract, for her not to offend while in the home. It was risky leaving her in the shelter, but I trusted her system to keep the promise despite my later reluctance to use contracts with such clients. By this time, the ANP was a more solid integration of all the surface alters, and could not easily lose time. I asked Jennifer to search for any other memories which might be causing these desires, as well as for the alters involved; her system had become very good at finding relevant memories and alters. I saw this as an emergency.

I cancelled my other commitments, and we did intense work for three days to deal with the remaining sources of Jennifer's pedophilic urges.

We had already processed the memories of Jennifer's abuse of her younger brother. Now we went through those of her abuse of the little boys she had babysat. Then there were more memories of abuse by her older brother, some quite pleasurable and some causing pleasure to some alters but pain to others. There were also memories of her older brother selling her for sexual purposes to his friends when she was about ten.

After we processed these memories, some offender alters still existed. Jennifer's system was able to identify them. The pedophilic desires belonged to alters whose only pleasurable life experience was that of sexually abusing younger children. They saw the little boy in the shelter as vulnerable and neglected, and they felt they cared for him. They thought sexual abuse of him was a caring act, something he would find pleasant compared to what Jennifer had been through.

I explained that I could lose my license if I left her in the shelter when there was a risk of her offending against a child there. But she was in physical danger if she lived on her own at this point. I suggested that the system put all the potential offending alters in an internal prison. Jennifer said that would take too long. An alter popped out and said, "Just a minute," and then, after a brief silence, announced that they had "killed" all the offender alters; they were lying in the inside world dead, covered in blood! I was not very happy with such drastic measures, but accepted it for the interim, knowing I could rely on Jennifer to tell me if the risk recurred. I made a list of the "dead" alters.

The next morning Jennifer called; she had dreamed about sexually abusing a child. I asked her to look for more related memories before we met in the evening. She had to "reincarnate" all the dead alters to find the memories. (We already had a method for doing this, as some alters had previously experienced internal "death" in "disasters" in the inner world; when they were made new internal bodies, they became alive again.)

Related training for masochism, sadism and pedophilia

The final set of memories we had to deal with to resolve Jennifer's pedophilic urges were those of the deliberate training in sexual masochism, sadism, and pedophilia. As a child, Jennifer remembered being forced to experience both sexual pleasure and extreme pain by being sexually stimulated while her body was being hurt. These forced contradictory responses required the co-presence of some alters who experienced sexual pleasure and others who experienced pain.

Masochism training

From infancy on, a couple who were friends of Jennifer's mother would sexually stimulate Jennifer while raping her painfully, sometimes with objects. One alter would experience the sexual pleasure and another the pain. This caused the separation of two kinds of alters, the kind who experienced pain, and the kind who enjoyed sex without knowing the body was also being hurt. This was what had created the alters who thought sexual abuse of a young child would be pleasurable to the child. The final set of memories were even earlier ones involving painful sexual abuse combined with pleasurable sexual arousal. As we processed these memories, Jennifer went through wave after wave of intense sexual arousal, fear, and pain. She was unable to speak.

When we discussed this later, it appeared that Jennifer's organized abuser group had begun this deliberately when she was just an infant, perhaps administering hormones to aid the process. The alters involved were primitive infantile fragments, who gave their feelings to the pedophilic alters.

Later in therapy, Jennifer had memories of sexual stimulation combined with anal rape with objects, again reinforcing the split between the "pain alters" and the "sex alters", who came "out" simultaneously but had completely different experiences of the same events. I asked one male alter what he responded with, and he answered ,"My pseudo-penis."

Sadism training

Several months later, Jennifer came up with some memories of sexual training with a little boy within a preschool, when she was four and a half. She and the boy would be taken out of the class, and pleasurably sexually stimulated while watching movies of people getting hurt, often small children. Then she and the boy were told to stimulate one another while watching movies in which people were violently sexually violated. Jennifer told me that there were "lots and lots and lots of movies." Finally, these two were taught to do this while watching actual sexual violence perpetrated in their presence.

This was clearly a method of deliberately training her to be a sadistic abuser. It reinforced both the association and the split between the alters who experienced pain and those who experienced sexual pleasure. This time the training was directed specifically towards preventing those alters who experienced sexual pleasure from giving empathic attention to others' pain, by pairing that pain with their own pleasure, producing incompatible responses.

Around this time, Jennifer also worked through memories of violent, painful sexual abuse by her older brother; it appears he probably had similar training.

Understanding and treating pedophilia in survivors

After we worked through the final memories of the deliberate training, Jennifer told me, "It's definitely fixed (the pedophilia). I'll never like sex again!" No alters remained who were sexually attracted to young children, and since that time Jennifer has never had a desire to sexually abuse a child. I believe her pedophilia was resolved. After all the pornography memories were completed, she was even able to enjoy sexual feelings.

After the memories were processed, Jennifer and I discussed the implications of our discoveries, which Jennifer allowed me to share with you now to help you understand more about how this training works, and to demonstrate that there is a way to be freed of its consequences.

We speculated together that perhaps some pedophilia is caused by the split, as well as the association between alters who enjoy sexual feelings and those who feel pain caused by painful sexual abuse involving the child's sexual arousal. Being forced to go through simultaneous, incompatible experiences of intense pain and intense sexual pleasure leads to the separation of sexual alters who are unable to feel pain, but need the pain (experienced by other alters) in order to feel the sexual arousal. In mind-controlling and ritually abusing groups, girls as well as boys are trained with the use of sexual arousal and pleasure. You may note that in Chapter Seven, Stella Katz speaks of this type of training. I did not have this information when I worked with Jennifer, but her experience corroborates Stella's account.

I do want to note that in writing about this, I am not judging adults who engage in sadomasochistic practices in a consensual setting. Most persons in the BDSM community would say that they will only engage in consensual activities to heighten their sexual pleasure, and that they absolutely would never choose to cause pain to someone else by violating their body. They also would not be interested in having sex with children.

In mind control settings, children are forced to engage in mixed pain and pleasure and extreme perpetration with one another and with adults. If a child's developing sexual urges are channeled in this way by an abuser or an abusing group, any later sexual feelings could move the person in the direction of perpetration. Jennifer's experience also shows how experiencing intense sexual pleasure at the same time as observing or being forced to perpetrate violence on others can lead to the creation of alters who are incapable of empathy, and associate sexual pleasure with violence to other people. These child alters still exist within adults who have had this training, and if they come out in settings other than the structured ones of the mind control or cult group where pedophilia and other sexual abuse are the norm, they can act out on partners or on children. These fragmentary alters can be very dangerous, as their life experience is very limited and they do not mature. Remember that the alters who wanted to have sex with the little boy in the shelter actually believed he would enjoy it. Many pedophiles have this illusion. Although Jennifer's pedophilia appeared to have been deliberately created by an organized group of abusers, a similar process could happen with less organized abuse, as long as sexual arousal is paired with pain to the child and/or to someone else.

Much of Jennifer's offending was done by one alter who was conscious of the behavior but not in control of it. Other alters influenced or forced the offending alter to do what she did. Offenders with covert dissociation might have similar experiences—their "urges" actually come from alters. This leads me to strongly recommend that pedophilic and violent sexual offenders be routinely assessed for dissociative disorders. In some cases, uncontrollable urges might arise from other alters or ego states who are not under the control over the part of the person having conscious awareness.

Much offender treatment focuses on teaching the (presumably unitary) person to resist urges. It is assumed that the urges themselves cannot be removed. Jennifer's treatment was successful in removing her urges to abuse young boys, because the parts who experienced sexual pleasure were no longer dissociated from the parts who experienced the pain of being abused or from those who experienced empathy for others who were abused. The dissociation was healed by processing the original memories which created the splits between these alters.

How did it all turn out?

Towards the end of therapy, about four years into our therapeutic work, we discovered a new section of alters who kept a secret: the identity of Jason. We had by this time worked through dozens of memories of abuse orchestrated by Jason. The secret: Jason was Jennifer's father! Although he had left the family, he remained in leadership in the perpetrating group. But very few of her alters knew that Jason and Jennifer's father were the same person.

Jennifer's therapy took five years to complete. Her complex personality system completely joined into a single personality. She moved to another country, far from her family and the others who abused her. There was an incident a few years ago when a previously unknown alter emerged because of sexual activity with a man she loved, something she had never experienced during all those years of sexual training. She was able to integrate the alter on her own, with the help of her partner. She continues in that stable loving relationship. She now has three children (all girls), and is an excellent parent (though she learnt it from books). There are no signs that her children have suffered from her abusive background. She is now a post-graduate student at a university, and is doing very well. Her life for many years now has not been about her abuse, but about being a whole person and finding a life path that suits her own abilities and interests.

Dealing with sexuality in survivors

Curing those issues that are the product of programming does not resolve all of the sexual dysfunction of survivors of ritual abuse and mind control. Much may remain. In Secret Survivors, Blume points out that "dealing with sexuality comes later than facing other issues. . . . The survivor should not attempt to fix sex before breaking the secret [of childhood sexual trauma that has been dissociated], facing the shame, repairing her self esteem, and learning healthy friendship" (p. 227).

"Healthy sexuality," she says, "involves . . . sophisticated interpersonal tasks . . .". Ultimately, Blume suggests, this may well require a protracted period of celibacy while survivors reclaim the right to say "no" (p. 230). In the case of these survivors, however, "reclaiming" is not the correct term. Personal empowerment is something that mind control survivors have never known in any regard. However, Blume does make a statement that many will see as describing their experiences: "For many . . . survivors, the old script of incest and its inherent distortions regarding sexuality cannot be edited; it must be erased" (p. 230).

In Chapter Seventeen, Jen Callow shares how she added loving sexual partners for those parts who needed this inside. That is one way a survivor who is single can deal with the issue of sex, trying to reconnect sexual expression with love and caring. Jennifer told me that when she first became sexually involved after her therapy, she had to keep her eyes open at all times and remind herself that she was with someone she loved. Much has been written for incest survivors that also applies to the population we are dealing with. They are not fully healed if their sexuality remains something they regard with disgust, or if they are still experiencing urges involving extreme violence or pedophilia. And they can be healed.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

The unimaginable

If you ask the average mind control or ritual abuse survivor what the worst part of their abuse—or their recovery—was, it will not be the complex and booby-trapped inner hierarchies and programming, or the hard and seemingly endless work of therapy. No. The worst part, they will tell you, is the pain. The physical, but, more, emotional and spiritual, anguish. One of my ritual abuse survivor clients suffers from intractable nerve pain. But, she says, the "pain in her mind" is the worst.

Throughout their childhoods, and for some throughout their lives, these people have experienced an extraordinary amount of abuse, exploitation, and betrayal. They have seen the worst horrors known to humanity, perpetrated by human beings they knew and often lived with as children. One survivor, Annie Earle, wanted to write a book about ritual abuse, entitled "The Hidden Holocaust." What ritual abuse and mind control survivors have endured is indeed a holocaust.

Childhood trauma survivors develop dissociative disorders to defend themselves against being overwhelmed. But, in order to heal, what they have always protected themselves from must be addressed. So, an important part of therapy for such childhood traumas as sexual, emotional, and physical abuse is treating its emotional devastation.

But this is not ordinary trauma. It is mind control torture.

In the technical sense, what is required from you is empathy. But because you are treating survivors of the unimaginable, you will be dealing not only with your clients' extraordinary level of emotional darkness, but one you might experience as well, when you both face what they have endured.

This work is not easy. Therapists can easily become overwhelmed with the multi-layered complexity of the personality systems and the mind control programming, and the ongoing sense of danger in the present. I have tried to make all this manageable by, in particular, making the clients' experiences and personality systems understandable. I have provided you with the information you need about how ritual abuse and mind control work, including various keys to unlocking personality systems and training memories; no matter how complex the inner system and its functioning, or how overpowering and omnipresent the threats might appear, it helps to remember that programming boils down to human beings using time-honored torture and deception and indoctrination techniques on children, with dissociation as its linchpin.

What you and your clients are left with is the sheer horror of it. The horror that makes the therapy take so long, and go so slowly, and require so much of the therapist. No matter how expert you become in understanding this abuse, there are no shortcuts to recovery. Nothing I have taught you can take that away.

When you take these survivors on, you are in for many years of hard work, and a long-term emotional bond with someone who has been severely damaged by what they have gone through. You are also taking on vicarious exposure to the atrocities they have experienced. It takes dedication, patience, and endurance on the part of both the client and the therapist. Even the most high-functioning survivors have a great deal to face, most of which was initially hidden from them. This awareness will rock their view of the world, and of humanity, and even of themselves, as it will yours.

Trauma aftereffects

When I began this work, the issue of trauma in general was not well understood. There were only a handful of books about incest, and, as I have related, even fewer that even acknowledged ritual abuse. In Chapter Fourteen, I mentioned that E. Sue Blume's Secret Survivors addressed the sexual consequences of abuse. It also provides a comprehensive review of the cognitive, physical, emotional, and relational consequences of incest trauma, discussing the guilt, shame, and self-hatred, overwhelming fear and anger, even terror, self destructive behaviors, and, above all, grief and loss that incest survivors experience in later life. (Blume's discussion also includes many dissociative symptoms and "MPD", although she acknowledges in personal correspondence that when she wrote her book her understanding of these issues was insufficient.) To understand those issues is basic to this discussion, and I refer the reader to that book for the underpinnings of the material that you will read here concerning the consequences of mind control abuses.

For example, Blume discusses body-related attitudes and dysfunctions resulting from incest. Many ritual abuse and mind control survivors suffer from eating disorders, and from physical ill health. With regard to the latter, osteoarthritis is common as a result of physical abuse and torture. Autoimmune diseases are also common, as well as other serious illnesses related to childhood trauma. Many of these survivors have brain damage from head injuries. Most have some degree of hair-trigger emotional reactivity, even when programs related to this have been addressed, due to an overactive amygdala, the "alarm bell" of the brain. There is evidence that some physiological sequelae are the direct product of certain kinds of tortures, but these aftereffects often reflect the body's "dis-ease" with how the body has been treated.

So, to begin with, ritual abuse and mind control survivors struggle with what every survivor of childhood trauma struggles with. And then they must contend with the rest of it.

Loss, grief, and crying

Survivors have a great deal to grieve about. They grieve not only for what they have lost, but for what they never had. Innocence. A happy, normal childhood. Friendships. Loving parents. Pets who survived and whom they were permitted to love. Pets that did not, whom they were forced to hurt or witness being tortured. Children whom they bonded with, and were forced to rape or kill. Fathers and mothers who did not sexually abuse them. Emotional security and bonding. The ability to trust. Unmet needs throughout childhood. The gradual, healthy development of healthy sexuality in the context of loving relationships. A brain that could develop in a healthy way, with sufficient sleep for rejuvenation when needed. The opportunity for the cortisol released by trauma to relax into a normal level and not constantly be in overdrive. In many cases, an education which would develop their true abilities and fit their true interests. Potential achievements which an overwhelmed child or teenager, struggling with ongoing abuse, could not manage. Physical safety. Physical health and functioning. A sense of being a unified person with an ability to know and meet their own needs and develop their own purpose. And independent thought. If they come to these, it is generally at least twenty years later than other people.

The more time I spend thinking about it, the longer the list grows.

Survivors whose families were involved in their abuse have permanently lost family. In fact, they have been cheated of the opportunity to even understand the concept, just as they have been tricked about the meaning of love, and safe, and trust. They have no parents who can safely mentor them through their own children's births and childhoods. They cannot trust siblings, aunts and uncles, grandparents. They have to attempt to create artificial families from unrelated friends. They are often excessively dependent on therapists because of the lack of supportive family or healthy childhood dependency. Some have supportive spouses or life companions, but many more have remained single or have unsupportive partners who cannot face or cope with the degree of damage that survivors undergo. Some choose partners who re-enact an aspect of their abuse. And when is it safe to confide the truth to friends? So there's also social isolation, and broken relationships.

Much is now known about the stages of grief. They often occur simultaneously rather than in sequence. One stage is denial. As long as a survivor pretends his or her abuse did not happen, s/he is unable to grieve any of this. Yet, if all the abuse, and all of the losses become available to consciousness at once, they will be overwhelming. So a survivor will have to reduce his or her dissociation very gradually, confronting one loss at a time.

Anger is another important part of grieving. As with other emotions, mind control survivors' relationship with anger has been distorted and manipulated by their abusers. Their anger and rage has been deliberately buried in alters who are brought out for violent rituals or killing, the rage being channeled to a helpless victim rather than to the abusers who set up the whole situation. The anger and rage need healthy expression, through art, through screaming with the therapist, through writing, whatever means gives voice to these justified emotional responses to the horror of what happened.

Sadness is the core of grieving, and its natural expression is crying. But one of the very first programs to be installed is "Don't cry," usually done by the caregiver suffocating the baby whenever it cries. What does it do to an infant to be unable to cry, which means unable to ask for help, unable to express grief and loss and distress? A normal child hurts himself in play, runs to find his mother or father, and then cries out his sadness and pain; this release heals him emotionally. What does it do to a person to be unable to cry for his or her whole life? Mind-controlled and ritually abused children are taught that sadness is weak, and that they should not feel sorry for themselves. They are shamed for experiencing "weak" emotions.

I have found that recovering the ability to cry is one of the most difficult achievements for my ritually abused or mind-controlled clients, but also one of the most significant. Crying, especially in the presence of someone who cares, is enormously healing.

In her book, Safe Passage to Healing (1994, p. xxiv), survivor Chrystine Oksana writes this of expressing her anger and sadness:

> My recovery has been a quest to reclaim all parts of myself and then connect that whole self with the good things of this world. My journey is ongoing. Today, most of my illnesses are gone. Now I know that they were symptoms of my repressed feelings—mostly rage and grief. My emotional pain is leaving more slowly, but it is leaving.
> Today I am able to cry freely. And in addition to deep grief, I also feel gratitude. It is my tears, not my smiles, that are healing me. Today, my tears speak my truth and reveal their secrets. It's through my tears that I am breaking free.

The much mocked therapy paradigm is that you must feel worse to feel better. It is a paradox that re-experiencing the traumatic memories, including the emotions, in the presence of a safe person in the present actually brings relief. Not immediately, but eventually, and sometimes sooner rather than later. One of my ritually abused clients goes through a gruelling piece of severely traumatic memory each week, leaving dazed and exhausted. She later emails me each week to tell me how much better she is feeling all the time, how she has been able to do things like play basketball, which she was never able to do, and how well her recovery is going. It is the memory work, the experience of having a witness to her trauma, and the emotional release, which enable her recovery to move forward in this way.

Despair and dissociation

Despair is the penultimate expression of sadness and hopelessness. When a survivor client feels extreme despair, it might be a part of their normal grief. But it might also be the feelings of an inside, mind-controlled child-part leaking through into the adult. The "booby traps" which abusers design to lead to suicide use the despair of an insider to flood the personality system. These insiders with extreme emotions are often deliberately isolated from the rest of the personality system, their emotions being used for the booby traps. They "live" inside in cages or torture situations or "hell", or a place where "God" is rejecting them, and that is all they know of life.

Many such alters live in literal darkness and are unaware of daylight, especially those trained at night in secret programming sessions. When I met one recently, he asked me "What's that bright?", pointing to a tree outside the window. I did not understand what he meant, until the ANP told me it was the sunlight on the leaves of the tree.

He had never seen sunlight.

Let us look at what despair means to a mind-controlled structured system. On not just a physical level, but an emotional and spiritual level, many of the alters have never experienced anything positive. They believe the entire world to be similar to the situations they experienced once, in which they have continued to be trapped, frozen in time.

When a client states that s/he does not want to live in this world, because the world is so dark and evil, the emotions and belief could well be coming from such alters. Although the person needs to grieve what happened to these severely traumatized alters, this needs to be balanced with positive experiences in the present and from the past, shared by other alters. The rest of the system can share positive experiences so these alters can see that their experience is only a very small part of all that is. And they can gradually be given positive experiences of safety and nurturing in the present. Pleasure comes from the simplest experiences. For instance, Jennifer first discovered this when she found an alter who had never seen or felt snow. She had her spinners send the experience of playing in the snow through the system, making all the kids happy.

The therapist's reaction to grieving and despair

Dismissal and minimizing

As survivors of all childhood abuses know, people's reactions often complicate the grieving process. One common reaction is "It's in the past; get over it, put on a happy face." Even therapists do this, believing that reason should conquer emotion. Some schools of therapy are predicated on these approaches to life. But healing just does not work like this. Emotion is primary (see Greenberg, 2002). While rational thinking can help with many aspects of recovery, emotion needs to be expressed in relation to what caused it for complete healing.

Dismissal of either the trauma or the emotional reactions is what most survivors have heard all their lives. For these clients, these responses serve to mirror the lessons that mind controlling abusers taught. "You're just doing this for attention." "There's nothing wrong with you, pull up your socks and get down to work." "You need to think differently." While there is a place for changing thinking habits, especially with regard to the lies indoctrinated into the child by the abusers, emotional reactions should never be dismissed.

Another phenomenon which I have observed among abuse survivors (particularly those who are dissociated) and their therapists is a kind of warm fuzzy thinking and communication, focusing on such things as stuffed animals (which, by the way, are used by perpetrator groups to carry messages), crystals and bubble baths to make the survivor feel better. This often goes with reassurance that the survivor is a "good person" or "did the best she could." In my view, all this is a form of denial of the extent and horror of the trauma. It is also infantilizing, and strips survivors of the recovery task of the system as a whole taking on the responsibility of living as an adult. Yes, it is helpful for child alters to have positive experiences in the present, including comfort objects and opportunities for play, but all this gooey positivity is often masking denial, and avoiding what needs to be dealt with.

Emotional contagion

Other friends or therapists of survivors have the opposite reaction—they become overwhelmed with the survivor's depressed feelings or trauma. The survivor can sense that they cannot take it. One teenage girl came to me shortly after her mother left the family, referred by a therapist who told me that she was unable to stand the intensity of the girl's depression. I sat with the girl for many weeks, while she just felt her depression, though she was unable to speak. It was not until her sister came to me and disclosed a ritual abuse history that I realized why the first girl's emotions were so intense.

If the therapist is overwhelmed with contagion of feelings from the client, the client will be unable to move through those feelings to recovery. Survivors need a caring witness, who can bear the enormity of their emotions and experiences without losing her or his own ground. When I am with my survivor clients, I need to be firmly grounded in my conviction that there is good in the universe, and that recovery is possible, while at the same time having compassion for what they are going through.

One thing that is easily conveyed from client to therapist is paranoia, fear of repercussions from abusers and the feeling that "the cult" is everywhere, the client himself or herself will harm the therapist, or the therapist is doomed to failure. Just because your client—or your colleagues—exaggerate these risks does not mean you have to. Our clients desperately need us to be calm when they are afraid. They need us to be grounded in logic and a realistic, accurate view of their abusers, sans the illusions of omnipotence.

It is important to be consciously aware of your client's emotions; allow them to come into you but be aware that they are the client's, not yours. This is the definition of empathy, and it is a delicate process. It is a central part of therapy. Your mirror neurons will register what is going on in the client. The sensation is slightly different from what you would feel if it were going on in you. But it is easy to become confused about which feelings are yours and which belong to the other person. I had difficulty making this distinction when I was a beginning therapist. I have become more skilled at it over the years as I have paid it conscious attention.

This skill is not only useful for the therapist, it is useful for the client—a kind of "internal empathy". The ANP can learn to distinguish between emotions which arise from her own reaction to a present situation and those which arise from an alter being triggered into an old emotion which belongs to a past trauma. If she is unable to recognize this distinction, she can be easily overwhelmed, whereas if she can recognize an alter's feelings, she can mobilize her resources to comfort that alter without herself being contaminated with its feelings. This is particularly important for DDNOS rather than DID clients.

Most dissociative clients have a highly attuned sensitivity to others' emotions, developed over their childhood years when they had to learn to expect what was coming from other people. If we try to deceive them about what we are feeling, it does not work. If we feel one thing and say another, they will notice it, and this will damage their trust in us. At the same time, they can easily misunderstand our nonverbal signals: for example, interpreting us as tired of them when we are just plain tired. So, we need to be transparent with our emotions, and at the same time ready to explain what is going on inside us and why, if it appears to be necessary. And this means we have to be highly congruent. To do this work, we do need both to feel for our clients and to have considerable inner strength, so that we are not overwhelmed by what they are going through. We need to keep ourselves sufficiently separate from them that we are not immersed in their despair, and sufficiently attuned to them that we develop a strong emotional bond.

Isolation from peers

One major concern for therapists providing outpatient treatment for survivors is the lack of understanding of either ritual abuse/mind control or dissociative disorders by their peers in the psychiatric system. Many of our colleagues do not even consider the dissociative disorder diagnosis to be valid, use medication as the primary treatment modality, and, as discussed in Chapter Twelve, "Maybe I made it up," even some who consider themselves "trauma specialists" might assume we are creating false memories when we recognize ritual abuse and mind control. I have no easy answers for this situation. I recommend that whenever possible nonmedical therapists should find a sympathetic psychiatrist who has knowledge of dissociative disorders, can prescribe medication when it is needed for such symptoms as depression, and can handle the client if she or he has to be hospitalized. Unfortunately, such persons are hard to come by. I would settle for one who, like the one I knew, is at least open to your expertise and the existence of the phenomena we are treating.

But if you seek supervision, it really needs to be with someone who has the necessary knowledge. Training in treatment of dissociative disorders is not yet mandatory in any mental health profession. Your supervisor, if s/he is an experienced therapist, can always learn along with you. I remember one psychiatrist who was very vocal about his opposition to the notion of dissociative disorders. Then he acquired a patient who visibly switched into a child state in front of him. You should have heard him babbling about it in staff meetings, all excited that it was real. Many therapists find dissociative disorders fascinating in our initial experiences, but we all have to get beyond that stage in order to be effective with our clients.

This is the real world of our peers. In this world, we can feel peer pressure, and we can be intimidated when those with more impressive credentials than our own make definite statements about the nonexistence of dissociative disorders or of ritual abuse and mind control. It takes time for society's mindset to change. I came to realize when dealing with our psychiatric establishment that it is very difficult for someone who has practiced for twenty or thirty years within a certain model to change his or her way of thinking about the most challenging of patients. I understood this, because it was even difficult for me. Once I began to understand dissociative disorders, I looked back at my past clients, and immediately recognized three whose dissociative disorders I had missed, two of whom (both diagnosed bipolar) were probably ritually abused. One of these women had even told me that she remembered a church service in which everything was said backwards (presumably, a Black Mass) and that her little daughter was seeing demonic faces in a picture on her wall. I told the woman to get back on her medication. I worked with this client for many years, believing I was helping her. I sincerely regret my lack of understanding. And I wish someone had given me the information I needed earlier.

Compassionate witnessing

One thing we therapists need to remember is the enormous power of compassion. We do not need to have knowledge of all the details of ritual abuse and mind control, though knowledge helps. What we need, most of all, is compassion, the ability to be with our clients through all the ups and downs of their recovery process. This enables them to complete their grieving and to know that the world holds goodness and love, as they experience it through our presence with them.

It is not easy.

In Kathy Steele's "Sitting with the shattered soul" (1989), she writes,

> All the therapists I know who do this work have been blindsided at least once by the horror of it. Their own vulnerability, their helplessness in the face of such abuse is staggering. So is the evil. I don't know another word for it. Science has failed us here, so I draw upon a spiritual vocabulary . . .
> So how do you sit with a shattered soul? Gently, with gracious and deep respect. Patiently, for time stands still for the shattered, and the momentum of healing will be slow at first. With the tender strength that comes from an openness to your own deepest wounding, and to your own deepest healing. Firmly, never wavering in the utmost conviction that evil is powerful, but there is a good that is more powerful still. Stay connected to that Goodness with all your being, however it manifests itself to you. Acquaint yourself with the shadows that lie deep within you. And then, open yourself, all that is you, to the Light. Give freely. Take in abundantly. Find your safety, your refuge, and go there as you need. Hear what you can, and be honest about the rest: Be honest at all costs. Words won't always come; sometimes there are no words in the face of such tragic evil. But in your willingness to be with them, they will hear you: from soul to soul they will hear that for which there are no words.
> When you can, in your own time, turn and face that deep chasm within. Let go. Grieve, rage, shed tears, share tears. Find those you trust and let them be with you. Know laughter, the healing power of humor. Trust yourself. Trust the process. Embrace your world, this world that holds you safely now. Grasp the small tender mercies of the moment. Let you be loved. Let you love. The shattered soul will heal.

Guilt, shame, and forgiveness for perpetration

Childhood sex abuse survivors must deal with guilt and shame from being sexually victimized, and from their bodies' natural responses. Ritual abuse and mind control survivors must deal with sexual abuse that far exceeds the scope of "garden variety" incest, and physical responses that are not merely organic but programmed and distorted. But that is almost inconsequential compared with the massive guilt and shame they must face for having participated in rapes, murders, and cannibalism, which to them are very real whether or not there was trickery involved. For this, they often feel they are too evil to be forgiven, even by a "higher power."

This is not something that the average therapist can relate to, and it requires a massive effort to come close to true empathy. Who of us can even imagine what we would feel if we had hurt another in such a way?

This struggle is compounded by the shame heaped upon them by the perpetrators, particularly after participating in an act of evil. "You are one of us." "Nobody else will ever want you because you are evil." "You will harm anyone you get close to." "God hates you."

It helps them to see the entire picture of the traumatic events, including their attempts to refuse to do the evil that was demanded of them. In most cases, for every alter who stuck a sharp stick inside a vagina, plunged a knife into a living body, or took "communion" with the heart of the sacrificial victim, there were several who refused, and were severely punished, in series, until a new one was created who would commit the required act.

It also helps these survivors who are immersed in shame to have a real relationship with a person—their therapist (and/or their partner and/or their friend)—who accepts them even knowing that they have done these things.

Their sense of unworthiness is also exacerbated by the fact that if they prayed as children, there was still no apparent divine intervention; the abuse continued.

Certainly, if our clients choose to have a spiritual faith, it can help them to know that the Creator of the universe accepts and forgives them. But even in this seemingly innocuous goal, we must be very careful, because there are traps built in to words like this. The very concept of forgiveness might be contaminated by these devious abusers, as we saw in Old Lady's being "forgiven" by the priest through sexual acts (in Chapter Five). Their alters might remember rejection and abuse by "Jesus" and "God." Old Lady's experiences show us how many Christian beliefs (like God forgiving) and words (like "Suffer the little children to come unto me") have been so perverted for survivors that they cannot be used with them. If someone is using such concepts with your client, you could gently question him or her about what such things mean, to make sure that, for example, "forgive" does not mean "rape."

Remember to reinforce that guilt and shame are not good or bad but normal and human. We feel guilty when we commit evil acts, acts that harm others. We feel shame about who we are when we have violated our own deepest sense of morality. Stella Katz writes about the guilt experienced during the recovery process, and relates it to a human "core" who always knows what is right. She demonstrates how perspectives, and understanding, change in the different stages of life:

> The one thing I'd like to get through strong and clear, is that there is always one person. The core[1] whom the alters think they are protecting (and the operative word here is THINK) actually always knows what is going on, at every stage of the game. The alters do most of the shit, and very rarely understand that they do nothing without the permission of the core. Without the core's seeing and knowing what is happening then integration as an adult would not be possible. The core always grows, and always knows. The difference is that as a child the core feels it more as bad dreams. By the time you are a mid teen, you have full knowledge that it's not a dream, but you are protected from the pain, which makes it easier for you to do harm to others because it's more like you are acting this all out in a video game, as if the real people are Avatars, but you still know. And in my case my own sense of right and wrong allowed the full brunt of the guilt to flow through, and that is why I would sabotage training sessions, so that these people would have a hope of undoing this all easier than if the training was complete.

Stella knows, by experience on both sides of ritual abuse (as victim and as adult perpetrator), that there are no "attachments", no way of dismissing her actions as not belonging to her. It is all her. The guilt is real, and has to be experienced for full healing, which includes taking responsibility and self-forgiveness. Even if he or she is forced to do it, a child whose body is involved in an evil act, for example holding a knife that hurts or kills, is violating her own core spirituality, her human ability to have empathy for other living creatures. S/he might well create a non-empathic alter in the process, but when that alter joins with those who feel empathy and compassion, guilt will result. This guilt needs to be accepted and confessed.

What that means is that often the therapist has to act as a confessor, the person to whom the client reveals the enormity of the things she or he did. And we need to be quiet witnesses who take it seriously while still accepting the person, neither recoiling nor arguing that it was not the client's fault. Whether or not s/he intended it or wanted it, the ritually abused or mind-controlled client has done evil, and needs to confess it. For her healing. For her humanity.

This does not require specific religious beliefs on the part of either the client or the therapist; it only requires recognition of innate morality and how it has been violated. The issue of "forgiveness" is often introduced in conversations about recovery from sexual trauma; one aspect of such forgiveness is "forgiveness of the self." Nowhere is this more relevant than in the arena of ritual abuse and mind control. Having faced the darkest corner of her life, the survivor needs to be helped to forgive herself, and, if she is so inclined, to understand that a forgiving God, who forgives others, would forgive her as well.

Near-death spiritual experiences

Spiritual experiences do happen to ritually abused children, even though no deity intervenes to stop the abuse. Ritual abusers frequently bring children to or near the point of death, and they have no control over what happens in the person's experience at that point. They can restart a stopped heart, but they cannot prevent the near-death experiences. Over the years, with the clients who were brave enough to work through the most horrific of their memories, I have encountered amazing near-death experiences (NDEs) that address the truth of what the client has experienced on the deepest level.

One six-year-old girl experienced the usual components of the NDE, including the presence of a being of light, and a life review in which she recognized she was not responsible for the perpetration that was forced upon her, only for the events in which she made an active choice to harm someone. Another child of five, while beaten almost to death by her mother, had an alter who remained in a place with an angel. When a new alter was brought to life by the cult doctor, she said something about wanting to stay with the angel, and he told her mother, "Don't mention it, she'll get over it." Once she had accessed this memory, the client has been able to go to this happy place to be with her angel when she needs it. Another client, too, found some of her most damaged alters had angels accompanying them.

Now, I do not know what an angel is, and explaining this phenomenon is beyond my scope as a psychologist, but I do know that experiences of angels have happened to a number of my ritually abused clients, none of whom have a specific religious faith. (I am not talking about the angels who are simulated as part of ritual abuse training; for example, to invite a survivor to suicide. Perhaps these groups simulate angels because they have more experience than I of survivors who talk about them.)

Another client's Satan alter personality was enduring some training in a simulated hell, when the drugs were too strong, and the child almost died. "Satan" split off another alter, "Satan's ghost," who found himself in a beautiful place with a being of light. He encountered a dog and a baby whom he was to be forced to kill, and both told him that they forgave him. When he returned to fake hell, he knew it was not really the afterlife. And another client remembered a near-death experience in which a little boy she knew, whom she had been forced to kill in a ritual, was waiting for her at the other end of the tunnel, and told her he would remain with her as her helper.

These accounts give me hope. It is an amazing thing to be working through a memory of severe torture with a client and unexpectedly coming upon a wonderfully positive near-death experience.

Coming to terms with spiritual abuse

The concepts of meaning and spirituality as they relate to ritual abuse and mind control are very challenging, for both survivors and their therapists. Ritual abuse directs specific abuses at the victim's spiritual belief system involving simulation of religious figures, both good and evil, in perverted ways and forced indoctrination into occult beliefs. Forced perpetration, especially of real or simulated sacrifice of animals, babies, and/or adults, is followed by teaching the child that s/he is evil, and alters are told they are demonic evil beings. Children experience sexual assaults by "God" and marriages to "Satan." They watch as "Jesus" turns his back on them. The abuses are so horrendous, and divine or human help for victimized children so vividly absent, that we question any faith we might have had in humanity or a benevolent deity. When we listen to stories of little children being violated, tortured, and made to abuse others we recognize that we are encountering evil, no matter what our world view. But what does that mean, and how do we address it clinically?

In response, many survivors adopt conservative Christian belief systems, in the hope of finding an answer to the noise in their heads about Satan and demons and God, or of finding something good which is stronger than the evil to which they have been exposed. Others adopt new-age approaches, which include beliefs about angels, and sometimes include a notion of past lives and karma that defines the trauma they have experienced in this life as something they earned in previous lives. Others maintain belief systems that reassure them that "everything happens for a reason", and "God never gives us more than we can handle", although "God's ways are not to be known by mortals." These beliefs provide some survivors with the perspective of a just, or at least a protected, universe. Many survivors, however, fall into despair, believing either that they are truly evil or that there is no good in this world. If there is a God, and even He does not care, how can they find the strength to fight for themselves?

The therapists working with this population come from many different philosophical and religious viewpoints. A substantial number of therapists who are devoted to this issue come from a conservative or evangelical Christian viewpoint. Others who might be privately critical of fundamentalist beliefs are much less likely to feel alienated by such beliefs when held by RA/MC clients, about whom the therapists' perspective is, "Whatever works." What we encounter with these clients challenges all our world views. We all struggle with the same questions, and we all resolve them differently.

Our mind-controlled clients have been robbed of their freedom to be self-determining. Whatever our personal belief system, we can surely agree on the goal of restoring these clients' autonomy. This includes their ability to choose their own beliefs.

In Reaching for the Light, ritual abuse survivor Emilie Rose has a wonderful chapter about spiritual abuse. She believes that spiritual abuse is perhaps the greatest wound of a ritual abuse survivor. An important part of Rose's spiritual healing was rejecting the false notions of the divine which she had been taught, not only by the abusers, but by the conventional religion which she had at the start of her journey (1996, pp. 102–103):

> I don't believe it is possible to be a survivor of ritual abuse without undergoing a deep, spiritual crisis . . . My realization that I was a ritual survivor profoundly affected me. In some ways it totally shattered my old ideas about God. Who was this loving God I had heard about all my life? How could God be loving if God would not save those children I saw sacrificed? How could God be all-powerful, all-protecting, omnipotent? Obviously God could be none of these and also be good. Good Gods didn't watch the massacre of innocents when they had it within their power to act. Good Gods did something. How could I place the heinous reality of ritual abuse into a spiritual framework while still embracing the God I know? The answer was that I could not. Instead, I railed at this God. I hated this God—"the bastard God," as my friend said. Finally, in the midst of the deepest spiritual crisis of my life, I renounced this God. . . . I had to create a completely different vision of God. Today I think of God/Good as a light energy, an energy of creation that flows within and without so that it is a part of me, as I am a part of it.

These questions, she says, > come from a part of us that knows that nothing like ritual abuse should ever happen to anyone. They come from the part of us that knows that what happened to us is contrary to the way the world was intended to be. That part of us is outraged and sickened and horrified. Our questions come from the place within us that cries out against such evil, that life-clinging part of us that helped to keep us alive. That tiny spark of justice within us could not be put out even in the most horrible, degrading experiences a human being can go through.

But she sees hope:

> Every ritual abuse survivor has an inner part that somehow stayed connected to life even in the midst of torture and death . . . It may have many names: the strong one, the keeper of the spirit, the healer, the mystic, the grandparent, the wise one. Whatever we call the part, we can assist in its healing by seeking that part of us, inviting it out, befriending it, nurturing it, and assisting it to develop further in our life . . . This strong one within has a natural longing for life and healing. It is wise beyond years. It knows about pain and healing and spirit. It may be the place where our connection with a higher power resides. It guides us in the healing journey if we give it room to do so."

She talks about survivors, including herself, having transcendent experiences of joy and love, even during the years of the abuse. This, to her, is God (ibid., p. 165):

> There are many things like that in my life, that I can point to or experience, and say, "This is real. This is good. This you did not destroy, and will not, ever, no matter how hard you try. This is > God, the transcendent, the holy. This is what matters, and it is with this that I will cast my lot, not evil." I know evil, intimately, and I reject it with everything in me. This does not mean that I reject those parts of me that were made to do bad things. I accept them, condemn the ways they were violated, and am thankful for the ways they helped me survive. And so, I see my life, as a kind of ongoing prayer. It goes on all the time, because in every moment, every thought, every action, I feel confronted with that choice between good and evil. It is not merely a theoretical choice. I know I really could go either way. And I continually constitute myself by consciously choosing the good.

My experience as a therapist for survivors of ritual abuse and mind control has been similar to that of Rose, the survivor. I can no longer easily embrace the idea of a God who is both all-loving and all-powerful, and who intervenes in people's lives to prevent disasters. I am aware of too many horrors. I know also that "but for the grace of God", I too could have been a ritual abuse survivor, and yes, a perpetrator, given different circumstances in my childhood. So I was not, but countless other people—people with no less value than I—were. What that demonstrates to me is that God does not micromanage.

As a therapist, my belief system does not matter to anyone but me. The best thing I can do for my clients is to bear witness to their experiences, both of pain and of overcoming, and to allow them to find their own meaning by thinking for themselves, rather than imposing any meaning of my own upon them. I tell my mind-controlled clients early in therapy, and repeat often, that my purpose is to help them take their own lives back, to be genuinely free. That includes the freedom to make their own meaning of their lives, develop their own beliefs, and choose their own life paths. And that is the opposite of mind control.

For therapists: coping with the stress of this work

Pearlman and Saakvitne (1995) have written extensively about the "vicarious traumatization" which therapists experience when working with trauma survivors. They state that

> All therapists working with trauma survivors will experience lasting alterations in their cognitive schemas, having a significant impact on the therapist's feelings, relationships, and life. Whether these changes are ultimately destructive to the helper and to the therapeutic process depends . . . on the extent to which the therapist is able to engage in a parallel process to that of the victim client, the process of integrating and transforming these experiences of horror or violation.

Your client deserves to heal, and you have committed yourself to facilitating that process. Here are some guidelines that may help support you as you face the challenge of working with the massively traumatized clients who have experienced ritual abuse and mind control.

Develop awareness about yourself

It is important to be introspective when working with survivors of extreme trauma. Know yourself and know when you are in over your head. This does not necessarily mean withdrawing from those clients you have taken on, but it does mean accessing other resources to help you feel more effective in your work. Allow yourself all your emotional reactions, and allow time for them when you are alone or with friends. Watch yourself for withdrawal from survivors' pain, and disconnection from your own. Your obligation is to work on yourself to the point where your own reactions do not interfere with the therapy you are conducting. Much has been written about both countertransference and vicarious traumatization, so I will not repeat it here, but I do encourage you to make use of it.

With ritual abuse and mind control, one major temptation for the therapist is to disbelieve the client when the allegations become bizarre and extreme. I have discussed this further in the chapter about clients disbelieving their own experiences. It is important not to dismiss a client as making things up when they make such allegations, and to continue to treat them with kindness and consistency. But it is important to acknowledge when you are wondering about the client's truthfulness, and to seek support from others who understand the issue, whether in person, on line, or in books.

Be honest with your client

As you ride the roller coaster of transference and countertransference, I believe it is important to reveal information about your own reactions to the client, to communicate that he or she has an impact on you and that you are human too. You will probably need to educate the client about your time and energy needs. It is important to be honest and acknowledge your mistakes to the client, while keeping clear professional boundaries.

Look after yourself

Have realistic expectations of yourself as a therapist. When other therapists discover you work with clients who report experiences of ritual abuse or mind control, they will either criticize you and want to discredit you, or want to send more such clients to you. (Either way will provide an extra challenge requiring you to take care of yourself.) Go slowly at first, recognizing that this is all new learning and that you can become overloaded with trauma if you have very many severely abused clients, especially if they are ritual abuse survivors with current contact with their abusers. If you are able, balance your caseload by limiting the numbers of dissociative clients and ritual abuse or mind control survivors in your practice. And balance your clinical caseload with other professional involvements, such as research or teaching or writing. And balance your life. I know you have heard this before, but it is important to stay involved in joyful extracurricular activities and to take care of your physical health. These clients require a long-term commitment, so we need not to burn out either physically or emotionally.

Finally, there is the very real issue of safety. If you are dealing with current-contacting ritual abuse or mind control survivors, you may need to pay special attention to your physical safety through such means as alarm systems, self-defense training, and having others in your office space. It is unwise to work from your home with this clientele, unless you have known them for years and know they are completely out of contact with their abusers. Put backup safety procedures in place, such as keeping the names that your clients name in a locked box not on your premises, or sending copies of evidence of perpetrators' criminal acts by registered mail to a lawyer or other safe person. Make sure your client knows you have done this (the appropriate alter will hear you tell the client).

Have a strong support system

Unfortunately, you cannot tell your non-therapist family members and your friends about your clients' disclosures. If you do so you will be violating confidentiality and probably traumatizing them. You can, however, use these relationships to bring positivity into your life and balance out the effect of the exposure to extreme trauma, to find unconditional acceptance in what might be a critical world, and to be reminded that love—pure, unselfish, uncontaminated, non-abuse, non-demanding love—exists. If you do not have a supportive partner, consider a pet. Animals can love.

The most helpful professional support is from other therapists who deal with trauma and dissociation. Discuss cases (with client consent), and your feelings about them. It is important to balance your need to verbalize the traumatic imagery you are trying to work through with the need to protect your colleagues from the stress of assimilating new traumatic material. "No one can face trauma alone." Internet discussion groups can be helpful, as can professional supervision from someone experienced in this area. But professional supervision or consultation from someone who does not understand this client population can be destructive to you—and to your client.

Sometimes, engaging in social activism regarding these problems can help you feel you are changing things on a larger level. But it can add to your trauma, as you are exposed to the issues even when not seeing clients, and the organized backlash against recognizing the existence of these abuses can be upsetting. If you are the kind of person who feels empowered by action, do what feels right to do. Because it needs to be done. And because action can be an amazing remedy for feeling powerless.

Develop awareness about your client's condition and history

I have seen many therapists who carry just one dissociative or mind-controlled client, and because it is only one client of many, do not take the time to learn what they need to serve that client effectively. But I recommend studying whatever resources you can find on all topics related to this field. The more you learn, the more effective you can be with your present clients and others who may come to you in the future. We desperately need more therapists who are skilled and experienced in working with mind control survivors.

No matter what you have already learnt, an attitude of being open to learn and to make sense of what you hear from your clients will enable you to advance your own understanding and ultimately that of other therapists. Remember, the state of our knowledge regarding this field is still in its infancy. And remember that your clients will be your best teachers. Although I have learnt a great deal about dissociation and the dissociative disorders and about transference and therapy in general from the writings of others, most of what I know about mind control survivors has been learnt from the people who lived it.

Recognize the benefits of this work

This work can be enriching—it can reward us with the ability to appreciate life more fully, to take it more seriously, and to have a greater scope of understanding of others and ourselves. It can inspire us to form deeper, more honest and sensitive relationships. My clients consistently inspire me, and working with them—with all its challenges—makes me know I am doing something worthwhile. For me, this work allows me to have a sense of a higher purpose in life and the camaraderie of others who are involved with this purpose.

Therapy with these most abused survivors requires a great deal of integrity, which Judith Herman (1992, p. 154) defines as > the capacity to affirm the value of life in the face of death, to be reconciled with the finite limits of one's own life and the tragic limitations of the human condition, and to accept these realities without despair. Integrity is the foundation upon which trust in relationships is originally formed, and upon which shattered trust may be restored.

Note

1. By "the core" I believe she means the essential parts of the person, the infant from whom all the other alters were split, and the two grown alters who are the first splits (the Firstborn and the Gatekeeper), as she defines them in Chapter Seven.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Working with the traumatic memories

The DID and DDNOS created by ritual abuse and mind control cannot be resolved without putting together the traumatic experiences which initially created the dissociation. The focus of dissociation treatment is not to make recovery a fact-finding mission. As Richard Kluft (1997), a leader in the field of dissociative disorder treatment, states in "On the treatment of traumatic memories of DID patients: Always? Never? Sometimes? Now? Later?" (what a wonderful title!), "The integration of the DID patient's identity appears to require the working through his or her traumatic memories, however flawed with regard to historical accuracy and however unsettling work with such memories may be" (p. 80).

Just as dissociation itself is both a psychological and a physiological process, so, too, is its resolution. "Memory work" is the common term for the therapeutic process through which all of these physical and psychological pieces are re-associated. In biological terms, memory fragments belonging to the different senses (sight, hearing, smell, taste, touch and other body sensations), along with the various emotions, are fed through the hippocampus to the brain's cerebral cortex, where they become integrated. In this way they move from the unconscious to the conscious mind, from separated (dissociated) to connected (associated). What was formerly a dissociated, "forgotten" memory is now consciously remembered. It no longer erupts in disturbing ways or creates flashbacks. It also loses much of its emotional "punch." And it becomes part of the person's life, which is less fragmented.

In order to help a client with DID or DDNOS work through trauma memories, the therapist helps the survivor to relive them in a safe place with a safe person. While being helped to know s/he is in the present, the client can put all the parts of the memory together in the conscious mind, making the dissociative barriers unnecessary.

It is particularly important to do this work with clients who have experienced deliberate mind control as children, because their alters believe that their lives or the lives of others are dependent on them doing the jobs that they were programmed to do. The dissociated memories of the abuse events during which they were given those jobs, pieces of which are held by different alters (and kept separate from others), need to be put together so that these clients' parts will be able to see the tricks and lies that their abusers employed. This is what will free them from their overwhelming compulsion.

When is a client ready to process memories?

One does not rush into memory work such as this. There are many therapeutic tasks that precede it, even for spontaneously developed multiples. Interventions required to prepare mind control survivors have been described in previous chapters of this book. In general, a client is not ready for memory work until the personality system is cooperative, and the alters in charge permit all the alters involved in a particular memory to take part in its processing. In my experience, a memory is not completely processed (and the resulting programming dissolved) until every part of the person involved has put their part of the memory into the complete picture.

If all the parts of mind control survivors are not aligned with the process, protector parts may also punish those parts who disclose forbidden material prematurely. Delay is important when the personality system is not ready. But the process cannot be delayed forever.

Dealing with flashbacks

Memories usually first surface through flashbacks. Flashbacks are the eruption into consciousness of dissociated trauma material, in an unproductive way. Psychologist Judith Peterson, in a workshop I attended in 1991, elegantly defined a flashback as a "closed physiological loop of re-abuse." A flashback is a memory fragment. It may be visual (hallucinating what happened), auditory (hearing a voice or a scream), emotional (e.g., a panic attack deriving from a partial memory of a frightening situation), or physiological (a "body memory" such as a pain in a part of the body that was injured during the event). Until the trauma is resolved, these flashbacks will recur, often in unacceptable times and places.

I remember how helpless I felt when my first DID client, Teresa, repeatedly re-experienced the same trauma flashback in sessions, over and over without resolution. I realized that I had to learn how to help her resolve the traumatic memories more effectively. What I did not understand, at least in the beginning, was the role mind control could play.

I have worked with other clients whose previous therapists spent untold hours assisting them in re-experiencing bodily sensations of abuse with no goal or direction, or who have devoted themselves to endlessly speculating on what could have caused such symptoms. "Abreaction," traditionally recommended by the dissociative disorders field and defined by Wikipedia as "a psychological term for reliving an experience in order to purge it of its emotional excesses," can become a goal in itself. However, although the emotions are parts of the memory that need to be included in its reconstitution, going through the emotions is not sufficient for resolution.

At the other extreme, many therapists who recognize that flashbacks generally do not resolve trauma have taken the stance that "stabilization" involves preventing flashbacks from occurring, and that memory reconstitution is unnecessary. But clients who are merely "stabilized" continue to be at risk of destabilization if present events trigger aspects of their trauma. Working through the memories thoroughly creates long-term stability.

Having established that memories need to be worked through, I must now caution you that not all flashbacks experienced by ritually abused and mind-controlled clients are necessarily important enough to be dealt with. In fact, under certain circumstances, such as with regard to memories that come up spontaneously, rather than the ones you deliberately target, the opposite is true. As you might recall, the flashbacks experienced by these clients are frequently internal "punishments" for disclosures of secrets. If your client is having a lot of flashbacks, you will need to discover whether this is the case. If so, you will need to slow down the disclosures and get to know the hierarchy of parts who are doing their jobs by giving or ordering those flashbacks.

If a client is in the middle of a flashback, it is imperative to stop the symptoms. You will need to ground the client for this purpose. There are various ways to do this. It is generally necessary to tell clients to open their eyes, which often spontaneously close during flashbacks. It is also grounding for clients to listen to your voice and the sounds around them (e.g., birds, city noises, traffic), or to name things in the room, including what he or she is touching (couch, pillow, etc.). I like to ask the client to touch his or her clothing, and name each item, as these survivors are frequently naked during the flashbacks.

You can also use a signal to bring the client back to the present. With some clients I place my right hand firmly on their right shoulder,[1] and say "Stop!" firmly and quite loudly. If we have pre-arranged this signal, it usually works. But it is important to make sure that any physical touch you use is not one which carries a meaning assigned to it by the perpetrators. For example, the husband of a ritually abused client discovered that she calmed down if he ruffled the hair on the top of her head. Unfortunately, this touch meant to her very young parts, "Be quiet or else!" This particular "touch trigger" is often used by ritually abusing parents. It looks innocuous when a mother tousles her little girl's hair, but, for these families, it is not. Inside, the alters were in turmoil, while outwardly the survivor appeared calm. (This duality is common among mind-controlled persons.)

Now, be aware: although these techniques can be successful in the control of random and unwelcome flashbacks, grounding, like other forms of containment, just prevents a flashback from occurring at any particular moment; it is still likely to erupt when the client is alone, or as a nightmare. The flashback will not be resolved until the memory is properly processed. However, learning to close down a flashback in your office is actually important preparation for actual memory work. It is also important to teach the client how to do grounding techniques on his or her own, since flashbacks occur outside of the therapy office.

Internal negotiation is an important skill for the client in dealing with flashbacks. You have seen some examples of how your clients might work with their own inner worlds and parts. Here's another: a client was having horrible bodily symptoms of choking. He found the part responsible, and struck a deal with her: she would remove his symptoms if in our next therapy session she would be allowed to tell me about the abuse that caused the symptoms. This allowed him to feel better until the therapy session, when he kept his part of the bargain.

When you negotiate with the alters regarding the flashbacks, it is important to talk with the alters causing the flashback rather than the ones experiencing it; they are usually not the same. The ones causing it are the ones doing their jobs.

If the client is ritually abused, there is often a “Gatekeeper” part who is in charge of keeping memories and feelings put away (or letting them out on command). With such a client you might be able to close down a flashback by asking the Gatekeeper to put away the memory until it is time to work on it.

After a flashback has been closed down, the client should be asked to look after the parts who were having the flashback. They can be put in separate rooms in the inner world, be put to sleep, or be given caretakers.

Memory work

Now we come to actually processing the memories. I do not claim that the method I am about to describe to you is the only technique, or the best technique, you can use; I can only claim that it is very effective for me, and that it has been carefully honed for a number of years, during which this time I have worked the “bugs” out of it, correcting the most common errors which I used to make. In my experience, a few key principles can make memory work with dissociative clients efficient, minimally traumatizing, and permanently healing. This method of memory processing works with most of my dissociative clients, and has been most effective for those with histories of organized abuse by cults or other groups who engage in deliberate mind control of children.

It takes advantage of the way the organized abusers have stored the memories and the personality parts inside their victims.

With those clients who are experienced in memory processing, I am now able to process at least one, and sometimes, up to three, traumatic memories within a two-hour therapy session. On those occasions that a memory takes two or more sessions, we put it into secure storage, which is generally already provided in a mind-controlled personality system. That way, feelings will not “leak” (in the form of “body memories” or flashbacks) between sessions.

Finding and selecting memories

Using recorder alters

Many ritually abusing and mind control groups deliberately create recorder alter personalities who know everything about the system and the history, and observe it with apparent disinterest, wanting things to be better but never intervening. These recorders, by the way, could well be the traditional “inner self helpers” (ISHes) described in the early literature. They might have other labels, such as “internal programmers” or “file managers.”

When I want to process a particular memory or program, I ask the recorders to find both the contents of the event and all the parts of the person who are holding any part of that memory. Recorders are not usually allowed to deliberately intervene on their own initiative to help the person, but they are glad to assist when asked.

Thanks to the recorders, it is actually easier to access and reconstitute memories held within ritually abused or mind-controlled clients than those within other kinds of trauma survivors. You do not need to chase flashbacks. You do not need to wait for the client to spend weeks retrieving the content of the memory. Focus on the function. You simply ask for "the suicide program", "the memory that gives you the stomach ache", "the program that makes you bulimic", "the memory that you see part of in the nightmare", "the memory that gives you that awful feeling of sadness", or "the memory that makes you get up and go outside at night". The recorders know how to find the right one, even if several different memories are causing a particular symptom and need to be processed in chronological order.

It can also be helpful, especially in the later stages of therapy, to have the internal programmers create charts of the programs, and then work through them systematically (see more on this in Chapter Ten).

Before processing a memory, all you need to know is that it is the one causing the symptoms that need to be removed, and that you will have enough time in the session to get through it from start to finish (or can contain it well if it is unfinished). I prefer not to be told ahead of time what the content of the memory is. In these days, when therapists are being accused of creating "false memories" in their clients, I want to avoid all possibility of suspicion. Also, speculation by the ANP and other alters about what a memory might contain can contaminate the process and make it more difficult to get at the actual memory.

Spontaneous dissociatives usually do not have a recorder. The key to finding their memories lies in winning the trust and cooperation of the personality system. This is also applicable to some extent to the memories of mind control survivors that result from trauma which was not deliberate mind control. (Some such survivors have recorders for this kind of trauma; some do not.) In this case, what you want is for the alters holding parts of various memories to come forward willingly to process them. Often, the ones who have only the awareness of what occurred do not want to experience the pain, or the ones who just have the feelings do not want to know what happened to them; in that case, you have to talk with them about the advantages of memory processing.

With the parts who do not want the pain, emphasize that everyone inside shares the same body, and while they might feel fine, someone else inside is in pain. The ones who do not want the knowledge need to know that the abuse is now over, if and when it is, and it is safer to know than not to know. Needless to say, do not say this to a ritually abused or mind-controlled client unless you are absolutely sure that there is no current contact with the perpetrators. If there is current contact, emphasize that it is important to process the memories to destroy the programs, so that the perpetrator group will lose its ability to access the client and re-traumatize them.

Choosing the memories to be put together

Here is one place where you need to proceed differently with mind control and ritual abuse survivors than you would with survivors of other traumas, such as incest. With survivors of "regular" traumas, you wait for memories to emerge, and work with those that are emerging. With mind control, you choose the memories strategically in order to dismantle the programming. It is possible to do so because of the storage systems for memories deliberately installed by the mind controllers.

The only essential memories to process are the ones that make the person unsafe (e.g., programs), or the ones that create symptoms which interfere with everyday life. This is the same with spontaneous DID, except that safety issues are largely internal and are often more effectively removed by communicating with alters rather than by memory work. Some people might legitimately choose not to know what happened to them, if it is not interfering with their current lives.

Start with relatively easy memories, relatively minor traumas that do not have too much shock or horror or physical pain, so that the client can learn the process. With one client, for instance, I began with memories of her mother washing her hair and pulling it while combing it. Another client chose to work on the memories of being teased at school, which caused the splits between her school-going parts. In this example, there was no physical pain, and the emotional pain was not overwhelming. Other alters could observe this work and see how it resolved the trauma. I ask the parts who have more difficult memories to observe what happens when I process the easy ones, so that they can see how to put memories together, and what happens as a result.

After the system knows how it is done, we select the memories we will work through on a logical basis. With programmed clients, the goal is safety. I pay no attention to what is flashing back, but instead go for the most dangerous trainings of the alter personalities. Whether or not the person has current contact with the perpetrators, suicide and self-harm training are of utmost importance. If there is current contact, then any training that makes the client obey the perpetrators is addressed. Access training, training which makes the client report what has been disclosed in therapy, and that which causes them to fear therapists, are all very important in the beginning.

It is a very useful technique to put together a number of similar memories into one abreaction. If a client was sexually abused by her father, for example, there may have been hundreds or thousands of incidents. All the oral rapes in the bedroom, or all the touching in the television room, can be grouped together and processed as if they are one. I do not know how the client does this, but I know that they can, and do. This is fortunate, because if it were not the case, trauma recovery would take forever.

Preparation for memory work

You do not just dive into a traumatic memory and hope it comes out all right. All of the following steps ensure that the memory work will be effective.

Gathering the alters

As much as I can, I make sure that all the alters who contain parts of the memory participate. This means speaking with them ahead of time (or having other parts speak with them) and getting their agreement. I do not have to know their names, as long as I know I have all those involved in the memory. I have learned by experience that if even one alter who holds a portion of the memory stays out of the memory processing, or withholds part of what s/he knows, that alter will experience ongoing flashbacks of the traumatic event that might affect the whole system. (In fact, many flashbacks appear to be caused by some alters pushing their piece of a memory up to consciousness while others are resisting the knowledge.)

Sometimes. it is impossible to gather all the alters involved in a memory because you do not know enough of the personality system. With ritually abused clients, this is often the case during the first couple of years of therapy. To address this, either the client or I will keep an indexed summary of the memories we have worked through, and, if they are training memories, their purpose. If, later in therapy, a part or group of parts emerges who belong to a memory we have already done, it will be easy to reprocess the memory. Sometimes, a program or training we have destroyed suddenly starts working again, and the client engages in behaviors we thought s/he was cured of. It is important then to identify which program has re-emerged, and reprocess it more completely, putting in the missing pieces.

It is sometimes helpful to invite parts to be present who were not there for the original event—for example, a caretaker for little children. Other parts might also want to watch from a distance, to acquire knowledge of how to process memories or of what happened to the body. Over time with my clients I am able to find one or two parts who will specialize in helping the others with memory processing. Often the most effective ones at this are severely traumatized, empathic child parts.

It is not necessary to have the ANP present during memory work unless that personality was involved in the original experience. I have found that memories that have been completely processed often gradually "leak" through to the main adult personality in the days following the memory work. But if they do not, I do not require the ANP to know their content.

Including parts of memories held by internal recyclers

Some alters, usually known as recyclers or reactivators, are trained to deliberately withhold and hide a small part of each training memory, so that the effect of the training cannot be destroyed. The hidden bit may be some words that were spoken, an emotion, or some physical pain. If this piece is not included in the memory, the perpetrator group will be able to re-create the program from the missing piece. (I am not sure how this works in the brain.) Look for recycler alters in mind-controlled personality systems, and convince them to include their part in the memory. I remember my shock right after my client Lorraine's death when all the programs I had worked through with another of the first four, Jennifer, suddenly began to activate once more. Her recycling program, which I had not known about, was operating. This is one reason to keep specific records of memory processing. We had to work from our records, inserting the piece that the recycler held for each memory. It was quite a challenge to keep her safe during this process, as many programs were set off at once.

To find the recycler alters, I just ask in a casual way whether there are any alters trained to keep pieces of the memories separate. The client might appear surprised, but will generally answer truthfully, and then permit me to dialogue with the recyclers or those in charge of them. Memory work is much more efficient, and the client is much safer, if each memory only has to be processed once.

Dissociating the feelings

Most experts in the field emphasize how important it is not to re-abuse the client by allowing him or her to become flooded with painful memories. The goal is reassociation of memories, but not reliving them all at once in all their painful detail. The client's ability to dissociate emotions and bodily sensations while processing memories will give him or her a sense of control over the process, and make the memory processing much less painful than if s/he has to undergo all the painful feelings for the entire time that the memory is being put together.

One pioneer DID researcher, Bennett Braun (1988), described dissociation as containing elements with the acronym BASK—behavior, affect, sensation, and knowledge. I prefer to go through the senses one by one, thinking of the emotions as also being a group of senses. I think of the senses as organized into three groups:

1. The distance senses—sight and hearing.
2. Body sensations—smell and taste, pain, heat and cold, sexual feelings, drugged feelings, etc.
3. Emotions—fear, terror, anxiety, anger, frustration, sadness, etc.

The first time I go through a memory with a client, I allow only the first group (sight and hearing) to be present. Since sight and sound do not hurt (unless there is an unbearably loud noise), these senses can be tolerated for a fairly long time without too much discomfort. They are also essential for obtaining information about what happened, and, in the case of ritual abuse or mind control clients, what false beliefs, instructions, and programs were implanted.

Bodily pain, on the other hand, is very difficult to bear. It should be dissociated while the content of the memory is obtained. Beyond that, you will need to use your client's feedback and your own professional judgment to determine what to do with feelings and physical sensations.

Smell and taste and touch can be unpleasant, but not completely unbearable. Sometimes it is all right for the client to leave them in the "movie" of their memory when they go through the memory the first time, and sometimes it is preferable for the client to leave in just a little bit of these feelings. For example, in a memory in which the client was injected with a numbing drug and unable to move, a small part of these sensations was necessary to make her aware of what was happening to her.

Like the bodily sensations, the emotions in a traumatic situation are very strong, and can make it very difficult for the client to proceed with abreacting the memory. So they need to be temporarily dissociated. Sexual feelings can distract some alters, causing them to dwell in the memory rather than getting on with it. Or these feelings can be so embarrassing that the client will refuse to experience them. Feelings created by drugs can confuse, so generally it is wisest to omit the drug sensations during the first run through the story of the memory.

Skilful use of dissociation will allow the client to preserve his or her dissociative capacity while it is still needed; during therapy, dissociation can be used to store unfinished memories, pace therapy, and enable real life functioning, such as school attendance or work. By definition, anyone who has a major dissociative disorder is already a skilled dissociator. In order to help my clients process their memories in the least traumatic way possible, I teach them to dissociate in a special way. I put the emotions and the bodily sensations away in imaginary containers.

Before we process any memories, we work on the client's ability to dissociate feelings effectively. I have the client construct in his or her inner world a place where unprocessed memories and feelings are to be kept in containers, and some containers in which to put them, such as a cave containing barrels, a bank with a vault with storage lockers, a well with buckets, or a storage room with jars on shelves. Both the containers and the place in which they will be kept should be able to be locked, but there should be a way to put things in the containers after they are locked. A spout or straw might work (if the memories and feelings are thought of as liquid), or a "doggie-door" which snaps shut could be created. As with all such creative solutions, it does not matter what the image is, as long as it works for the client, and the therapist takes note of it and remembers what it is. (It helps if the client draws a picture of the storage place and containers.) Now the client can learn to put the emotions and bodily sensations from some easy memories, and eventually entire memories, into the container. The emotions from an argument she had yesterday with her husband can be put safely away, or the taste of the milk that went bad—and then, the flashback of the hands of someone who abused her. I gradually work with clients until they can dissociate difficult components of memories by putting them into containers. I might count backwards from five, if that is not triggering (clients abused by some groups have conditioned reactions to counting or to numbers). For instance:

"5, put in all the pain, all the 'owies' and hurts (Remember, we are dealing with child alters. I use childish words as well as adult synonyms for pain and emotions, to make sure that young parts understand me.),
4, put in all the fear, all the scared feelings, all the terror, all the worry and anxiety,
3, put in all the angry and mad feelings, and all the sad and hopeless feelings,
2, put in any drugs and any sex feelings,
1, now put in anything else, anything you felt in any part of your body, and anything you felt in any part of your feelings.
0, close the box (or bucket) and lock it up tightly. Keep the doggy door (or spout, or straw) ready in case any more feelings come up when you watch the movie."

When the client can do this, s/he is ready for memory work.

Remember to tailor any suggestion you read here, and any treatment in general, to the specific needs and preferences of your client as much as is reasonable, therapeutically. Some clients do not like counting, and prefer to just name what theyare putting in. Others just want me to be quiet while they do it, and let me know when they have finished. I emphasize that anything they keep out (e.g., pleasant feelings) will make the rest of the memory's feelings come back.

Putting together the memories

Watching the "video" of the memory

When I work through a traumatic memory with a survivor client, we always begin the story in "normal life" (e.g., getting into the car) and follow it through until the person is in "normal life" again, with the traumatic event having happened in-between. The alters at the beginning and end of a memory are usually different from the ones in the middle, but selecting a complete memory, normal-to-normal, in this way, helps the client understand how the traumatic events fitted in with their everyday life. This also reveals the situation if one traumatic event led to another traumatic event.

I have clients process each memory at least twice. The first time it is done as if watching a video, with sight and sound but no emotions or bodily sensations. The alters can watch it on an internal screen in a viewing room. All the feelings have been put away into a container. Because the client is not feeling the pain or the fear, s/he is able to describe what is happening clearly, and I am able to take coherent, even verbatim, notes. I can ask the client to slow down or to repeat something without worrying about traumatizing him or her. The client holds the remote control, and can make the picture bigger or smaller, speed up or slow down, rewind, fast forward, or stop. The client can pause the video to take a bathroom break, or to talk about something that was on it.

When the client is watching this "video", I encourage him or her to be simultaneously in the inner world that includes the memory, and in the outer world in which I am really there with them in a safe place. I find that in most cases it is quite possible for people to be consciously aware and with me while processing a memory, especially when just watching the video. I encourage the client to stay as conscious as possible, closely enough connected to me and the real world that s/he can describe the memory while going through it, rather than doing it silently. This does two things. It helps the client stay grounded in the present, so that the memory processing does not turn into a flashback, and it helps me to know two important things: whether all parts of the memory are being included, and what parts were trained to do.

I constantly remind my clients to tell what they heard (words as well as sounds) as well as what they saw. With ritually abused and mind-controlled clients, the words usually contain the programming or training, so the alters who know what was said will sometimes omit the soundtrack, and it has to be specifically requested. They might have been ordered never to reveal what was said to them. Stay alert to whether an alter tries to skip a part of the memory, and ask them to put that part in.

I constantly interact with the client as s/he goes through the memory, asking questions (for clarification only), giving reassurances that the event is not really happening, and correcting cognitive distortions as they happen. If a false idea was implanted by the abusers during the memory (e.g., that the abuse was the client's fault), I can challenge it right there. It is extremely effective to challenge the lies and tricks right at the point where the client is remembering them clearly for the first time.

If different alters hold different aspects of the experience, the chronological order of the parts of the memory can become confused. To prevent this, I ask for someone inside who knows the content to line the alters up in the order in which their parts come.

If the client gets stuck, I take a break to talk with the parts and find out why. Sometimes an alter just does not want to go through with it. Sometimes there is a part of the memory held by an unknown alter, whom they have to find. Then we need to negotiate with that alter, and decide whether or not to go ahead with the memory.

One client would present me with written summaries of memories that we could then work through more fully. When something like this happens, you should not assume that the client's written narrative is all that is contained in the traumatic event. Often, there is something which is omitted, either because the part collecting the content did not look everywhere, or because some part held back out of embarrassment or fear. I still think it is wise to go through the memory twice in my office, once as narrative and once with feelings, even if the client has prepared beforehand. (And I prefer that they do not prepare in this manner. It is too easy for them to get into speculation about what happened, rather than allowing the story to emerge.)

Often there has been "incidental training," accidental events incorporated into a training memory. For instance, in the middle of a training session or other traumatic event, someone might have turned on a radio, or a car horn might have honked outside. Incidental training is often not even in the room with a person. It is the white noise in the background that most people do not even notice, because they are too busy concentrating on what is happening in the room with them, but it will end up integrated into the traumatic memory. However, it is often forgotten or left out while trying to break down a program, leaving the therapist unable figure out why things just are not working. It must be included in the memory processing.

During the process I am careful to monitor my client's affect and status. If I notice the client's feelings becoming overwhelming, I remind the client to dissociate them into their container. Sometimes there are feelings I forgot to include in the first countdown, so I have to help the client put them away again. If this does not work, I stop the memory temporarily and diagnose the problem (e.g., an alter refusing to dissociate pleasant sexual or drug feelings can keep other feelings active as well).

Sometimes a very young part will want to do the story-telling part of a memory in the play therapy room, with dolls, sand tray, or other toys. This can be useful, especially as in some cases it bypasses the "don't talk" programming, as the story is not told by talking. And if the client is still a child, this is highly appropriate.

I keep a verbatim narrative of what the client says and does during the "video" part of the memory abreaction. This narrative is probably the best record the client will ever have of what happened to him or her, as the memory will fade once it is consciously known. The memory that returns during the first putting together of a dissociated trauma is far more detailed and feels much more "alive" than any other besides the contents of a flashback. I think it is helpful for me, too; I dissociate my own emotions about the trauma to the handwritten page which my right hand is producing, and I do not reintegrate them until I type out my notes at a later time.

Processing infant memories

It is important that the memories of these original splits be processed if the person wants to proceed to integration, since with organized abuse, most alters are deliberately split off in infancy. When my client Jennifer, who chose to fully integrate, had worked through all the memories of the alters on the layers in her internal structure (a tetrahedron or inverted pyramid) as well as the memories of home abuse, she was left with "the point"—the portion of the structure at the very base. It contained the infant memories, which were a conglomeration of bodily sensations and emotions. She did process these in therapy, even though there was not a great deal of understanding of what it was all about. After all, how much did she understand when she was an infant?

Memories of events that occurred very early in life might involve the entire personality system. All of the alters involved have to regress to the age at which the trauma happened while they process the memory. What this means is that they could be quite young. With these memories, sometimes I have to use word and touch signals because the client is unable to speak, or cannot return to the present. I squeeze the client's hand, and ask him or her to squeeze mine from time to time, to indicate that s/he can hear me. I pre-arrange "stop" signals—one for the client to give me if s/he cannot speak, and one for me to give the client that will automatically stop the memory (for example, I may hold the right shoulder firmly and say "Stop!" loudly). I practice these first with easy memories. If the memory belongs to pre-verbal parts, I ask a verbally fluent part to watch. Then I process the memory in short segments, stopping to allow the older part to tell what happened.

Memory processing is different for infant parts. Stella Katz describes her experience with infant parts and memory processing as relatively quick and uncomplicated:

> Processing baby memories is essential for total integration, and it is something that can be done very quickly if you just let the person do it without verbal interference.
>
> Baby memories phase in and out because babies phase in and out during the experience. They are not like a five-year-old who remembers hours of torture. Babies only take in small parts of memories. That's why when training babies you use short quick things, rather than long drawn out things. What takes a five-year-old 24 hours to break, only takes a baby a few minutes.
> Baby memories are based on events that occur when you are at a place when life is still a complete mystery, so it is best to just take what you see as real. When traveling back to baby years, don't try to understand, just experience, and let it go. These memories are the hardest to get at, but the easiest to let go of.
> Baby memories differ from later memories because you have no verbal way of explaining what you feel or go through. It is stupid to try to get the person to talk about what they felt or saw, because they will not get an accurate account from outsiders and it is impossible to really verbalize the experience. Besides, it wastes large amount of time trying to put it into words.

Processing memories of dying or becoming unconscious

During memory work, a client may stop breathing and appears to be dead, or at least unconscious. It can last for some time and it can be quite frightening to a therapist. What if they do not wake up? Having worked through a large number of such memories, I have confidence that the client will not actually die during the memory work if they did not die, or at least did not remain dead, during the original trauma. I have worked through quite a few memories of apparent death and resuscitation by the perpetrators when the abuse went too far and the child was in the process of dying. Although it is gruesome, it is possible to go through these memories like any other. I do suggest, however, that these memories should not be the first ones you tackle. Also, it is within these memories that the hidden gems of the near-death experiences which can give the client spiritual hope are seen.

Adding in the feelings

Often, dissociated clients are in a rush to get their memories back. When asked why, they say they "just want to get it (this recovery stuff) over with." It certainly would be nice if all the client had to do was recover the knowledge of what happened. However, that is not the case. In addition to all of the preparation involved before you can even begin to address memories, in order for a traumatic memory to be fully healed, all parts of it must be put together—not just the pictures or the storyline. The emotions, and, when necessary, the pain, must also be included. If this is not done, the entire memory can easily be redissociated. When a previously unconscious memory has been completely put together, the emotions connected with it are discharged, the behaviors "programmed" by the event are brought under conscious control, and the alter personalities created by the event are free to reintegrate. That is recovery.

After the cognitive (storyline) processing, if the client's feelings are being dissociated enough to make this possible, we take a breather in the real world. If not, we proceed immediately to the second stage. In this stage we open the container that has the feelings in it, and put the memory together with the feelings fast. This is the most painful, and difficult, stage of recovery for the survivor.

With some clients, I do this by counting up to ten, spacing the numbers about one second apart. In some cases, I name parts of the memory after each number. With others, this is not necessary. I do not have to name the feelings; they just happen. As each number is spoken, the client's agony increases. Usually a ten-count is enough to contain a memory, although for some very long memories it is necessary to go to fifteen or even twenty. I ask the client to nod if the feelings have all been acknowledged.

With other clients, instead of using numbers, I just name the parts of the memory in chronological order. Some want me to read back the transcript of what they said during the first storytelling, and put in the feelings while I am reading. The feelings do not have to be experienced for the duration for which they were originally felt, but they do have to be acknowledged and incorporated into the memory with the story and the physical sensations.

When I get to ten, or to the end of the recounting, I begin counting back down to zero. (Remember that some clients have programs or memories triggered by counting, so it should not be used with them.) Whether or not I have used counting, I instruct the client to put each part of the memory back into the container where the feelings had been kept. I begin with the most distressing parts of the memory—first the pain, then the fear. There does not seem to be a "right" order, as long as everything is put into the container. I usually mention specific things that happened in the memory as I count down, to make sure that everything is put in. When I get about halfway through, I say the final words:

"Put away – everything you saw,
– everything you heard (all the sounds, all the words),
– everything you tasted,
– everything you smelled,
– everything you felt in any part of your body" (here, I name specific body sensations such as pain and sexual feelings, remembering to mention any sensations which would have happened in the particular memory we are dealing with), "and – everything you felt in any part of your emotions." (Here, I name specific emotions such as fear, anger, anxiety, and sadness, remembering to mention any which must have been in the particular memory.)

Then I instruct the client to close the container and lock it.

Not all therapists working with dissociative disorders and with mind control survivors agree with me about the necessity of including the emotions and bodily sensations in the memory work. Whether or not this is done probably depends on the goals of therapy. My experience is that alters are unable to integrate unless this is done, and the client might still get flashbacks of the worst parts of the memory—those emotions and bodily sensations—for some time after finding out the content of the abuse. If these parts are deliberately included during the processing, horrible though it might be, they will not return as flashbacks later and continue to haunt survivors for the rest of their lives.

Closure and integration of material

Once a memory has been put together with all its parts, the material integrates, and a miraculous thing happens. The emotions and body sensations from the traumatic memory disappear, leaving only a knowledge of what happened, similar to the knowledge of any other life experience. Finally, healing can occur. The wound is closed, though there might be a scar, in terms of the awareness that a horrible thing happened to the person. The alters involved can also integrate, depending on whether or not other memories still stand between them.

A physiological explanation of memory work: In physiological terms, when the memory is re-associated, then it has been taken through the hippocampus to the cerebral cortex, and can be remembered like any other memory. Its vividness and its emotional punch will gradually fade with time.

Sending the memory into storage

After all the parts of a memory, including the feelings, are joined in the person's awareness, the client and I send the locked and labeled container into permanent storage. The way in which this is done depends upon the client's inner world. One client just threw the box into the internal river, and it floated down to its resting place. Another used her inner self helper, who believed herself to be a whale, to take the container away and deposit it on the bottom of the ocean. If we had to reprocess the memory, the whale could get it back again—but the other parts could not. As you see, what we are really employing is the same imaginative creation of symbols that people with DID use to assign characteristics to their independently created alters.

Completing the processing and integrating alters

At the conclusion of the process, I like to have a symbolic cleansing and joining, an image of the client's choosing located in the client's inner world.

I like to use a (breathable) waterfall of soft warm sparkling water or colored light, in which the alters can wash away any all remnants of the memory which did not get into the container. They can cleanse themselves, inside and out, from any dirty or contaminated feelings. They can also revitalize themselves, removing their tiredness.

Now, finally, the waterfall will wash away any boundaries between parts whose separateness is no longer necessary, and will blend them together. Any alters who still need to be separate will remain separate and have their boundaries strengthened. We shall look in more detail at integration in Chapter Seventeen.

Other ways of dealing with memories

As much as what I have written might seem like a formula to follow, no treatment recommendations can ever be applied to everyone in the same way. You will need to negotiate what will work effectively for each client. The client with whom currently I am doing the most memory work has chosen to go through all the feelings and bodily sensations first, then tells me the story briefly. With some clients, I have used a fractionation process, going through the memory several times, starting with the pictures, then adding the sound, then adding one emotion or bodily sensation at a time. Stella Katz has told me that she processed most of her own traumatic memories this way. She used a bell to bring herself back to the present if she got "lost" in a memory.

A long-term mind-controlled client of mine has always processed his traumatic memories on his own rather than in therapy sessions. He reports that the memories first appear in partial form in dreams, then begin to emerge in the daytime, and gradually fill out until the story is clear. Sometimes, he has to deliberately allow the alters involved to express the feelings involved in a memory, otherwise, he will be flooded with those feelings in everyday life. He asks the alters to process particular memories which he considers important for his healing.

As you can see, different survivors have different capabilities and the potential for different levels of independence in their work. One of my ritually abused clients appears to be unable to go through entire memories because of internal resistance; they leak out a little at a time, over many therapy sessions. This is not the method I would choose, but this is all her system is capable of.

The guidelines in this chapter are just that-guidelines—and I want to remind you that there are many creative ways to deal with recovery. Remember to listen to, and learn from, your clients. Some clients choose not to fully integrate, and not to completely process all aspects of their memories. You will see more about this in Chapter Seventeen.

Cognitive and emotional processing

It is important to leave time in a memory work session to discuss any implications the memory might have after it has been processed. Although the *previous*_emotions have been put in with the memory, there will be new current emotions about what happened. These deserve to be expressed, especially if the ANP has just become aware of some trauma that s/he did not previously know about. More cognitive work might need to be done about the false beliefs which resulted from the dissociated trauma. The client needs to have time to reorient himself or herself in the present. The usual issues that close each therapy session also need to be addressed: homework, and safety concerns for the period before the next therapy session.

I find it is often advantageous to have at least one "talk session" after a memory has been processed, to discuss what came up and what it means in more detail. After all, the objective is for the client to fully recover from the trauma, and this means that cognitive processing of the trauma is important to the client's view of him/herself, and of life.

With some traumatic memories, the ANP has not been present and will not gain access to the memory content for some time longer. This depends on the particular personality system. It is not always advantageous for the ANP to know the content of the memories, as in some cases this can be disabling to present-day functioning. In my experience, there is no need to force the ANP into knowledge he/she is not ready for. In some cases, it is wisest for the ANP not to know about certain memories for some time, even when those memories have been processed. Dealing with a newly traumatized and horrified ANP can divert the therapy process from resolving the alters' pain and compulsions. The knowledge will come when the time is right.

Note

1. Never touch the left shoulder of a ritual abuse survivor, since this touch is used to call out alters. And be careful about using your left hand when touching a client, since many left hand touches turn on programs.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

Successful resolution: co-consciousness or integration

When therapists began working with persons with dissociative disorders, the explicit goal was generally integration, which meant fusing all the alters into one person. In the literature, integration is often seen as a therapist-assigned goal of treatment. It is a big deal, usually conducted through a ceremony that joins the entire system or major alters, and is artificially induced by therapist-directed hypnosis. And it often does not work, or creates more problems than it solves. LisaBri's story in Chapter Nine shows how premature integration can confuse the therapy process. In the spirit of the times, I tried fusing small groups of alters in Teresa, my first DID client. And every time, the integration came apart after a little while.

Then I noticed, when working with the teenage Jennifer, that after we worked through a traumatic memory, the alters involved would frequently join together naturally. At that point, I realized what countless other therapists have had to discover for themselves because it was contraindicated by "the literature": maybe formal integration ceremonies were not necessary. I decided to dispense with them. My experience after twenty years of working with dissociative disorders, including those with ritual abuse and mind control histories, is that alters naturally join when there is no longer a need for them to remain separate, to protect secrets or to keep toxic emotions or body sensations from flooding the whole person.

As small integrations happen in this way, at the close of each piece of memory work, they become the natural evolution of the system—and they hardly ever come apart. The real barriers between the alters are the separately held secrets and the intense feelings which belong to the memories; once these have been shared, there is no need for alters to remain divided. Many alters will have quite a few memories, so they will have to process all their distinct memories before they are able to integrate.

For alters to integrate easily and naturally, it is important that the therapist and the client do not make a "big deal" about their individual identities. Remember that a dissociative client is really one person, even though she or he feels like many and might present with a rainbow of different personalities. If s/he becomes invested in separateness, integration will become more difficult. But it will still happen, at least with some groups of alters. Clients have told me that it is impossible to keep alters separate when the traumatic memories that divide them have been fully processed.

But is full integration the only healthy resolution of DID and DDNOS? Survivor Jen Callow has thought a lot about the process of integration, and wrote this piece specifically for therapists, which addresses many perspectives about integration. In this part, she addresses that question, and demonstrates that there is no formula for how parts, individually or in relationship, will respond to this process, for what will change, and how parts will feel. She also shows what can happen if alters are not fully involved in, and prepared for, the process. She explores the value of keeping out just a bit of a memory until all parts are really, really ready to integrate. "Integration," she says, "is more of a journey, and doesn't have to mean total fusion." On the other hand, it "isn't about losing who you are, it's about becoming what you were meant to be."

Part 1: To integrate or not to integrate: Jen Callow

Just as integration can be a welcome event, it can also be traumatic when parts are not ready to integrate or merge. It was for some of my parts.

When parts integrate, two or more parts merge into one new part that is a composite of these original parts. The new part might have similar likes and dislikes to these parts, as well as their abilities and mannerisms. The new part might even be the average age of the parts who merged. For parts who are unprepared or do not understand what is happening, this merging can be terrifying.

I started out with over 700 fully and partially developed parts, although only a handful spent time in the outside world. Partially developed parts are ones that carry memory fragments, but do not have a clear identity and personality, unlike fully formed parts. Now I have about 150 parts. Many of these merges happened effortlessly without my full awareness. I sometimes felt a new energy coming into me, the outside part, but normally only noticed a shift in my perceptions, feelings, or beliefs afterward. Often, I felt stronger and more whole inside.

However, sometimes merging was more traumatic for my system. Once, I had a part crying as he merged, resisting all the way. My therapist held him and tried to comfort him, but it did not help. One of the issues with Pete was that he was not warned or given a choice about integration, and was not prepared for what was happening to him. It was even more traumatic because he had just processed a long and terrifying memory on the assurance it would help him and my system feel better. Pete (the name he chose) had not realized he would merge when he helped process a particular memory, and it was an awful experience for him. Afterward, he fought the merge, moving in and out of the other part involved. I had no idea how to help him and thought he would eventually merge on his own.

As I wrote this article, I discovered he was still trying to keep out a piece of the memory so he could stay separate. But by this point he hated being half in and half out and realized he could not go back to being fully himself. Pete released the memory piece, we processed it, and he merged with the other part. This took only a few minutes, now that he was ready. The new part still contains elements of Pete, and, as I type this, he tells me everything is okay, although he still carries some of Pete's anger and sadness about the merge. Had we made it clear that he might merge if we went through the memory, and offered him the opportunity to address his feelings, merging would not have been so traumatic. Pete did not need to spend so many years in limbo.

All parts respond to integration differently, depending upon how close they are to the parts being integrated, whether it is happening directly to them, and their beliefs around what is happening. With my system, it also depends upon whether they are fully or partially developed parts. Merges between partial and full parts seem to be easier, with the partial part being strongly pulled toward the full part. Merges between fully developed parts have the potential to be more emotional. Still, for many of my parts, integration is just "something that happens". Some are quite positive about it, seeing it as becoming stronger and wiser, gaining in life experience. I have child parts who look forward to "growing taller" through merging with another part. However, there are many parts who still fear integration. Some parts see the inner world decreasing, with a physical loss of playmates, friends, and caregivers as various parts merge. This can result in a huge sense of loss, and parts might need time to grieve. This reduction in numbers can also be interpreted as people "disappearing" and parts may be afraid of disappearing, too. Others see integration as a loss of self, like Pete, and are terrified at the prospect.

The following exercise might provide a way to understand my experience: Imagine yourself as a child with a favorite set of grandparents. They spend time with you and are familiar and trusted faces. One day, they merge into a new person that looks sort of like your grandma and sort of like your grandpa, but also looks different from either of them. This new person says they are still your grandma and grandpa, but in a new form, and gives her/himself a new name, in this case, "Grand". Grand acts a bit like grandma and a bit like grandpa, and you really do not know what to make of this new person. Then Grand assures you s/he will look after you, the same as before. Only you now have one, different caregiver, instead of your two familiar grandparents. How would you interpret what just happened? How would you cope? Now imagine that you are an abused child who has not known much stability. After years of therapy, the inner world where you live has become a safe haven for you with other parts you know and trust. How would you feel when parts around you start merging in ways similar to Grand? And how secure would you feel about your own presence in that inner world? For people who are multiple, their inner world is every bit as real as the outer world we all share, and what happens there can have just as significant an impact on them.

Parts that have merged might also need support to adjust. In the outer world, people treat you differently when you change. You might put on weight, get grey hair and wrinkles, or need a wheelchair or assistance to move. Maybe you have not just changed physically, you have also had a profound experience that changed you emotionally and spiritually, and people do not know how to relate to you any more. It may be hard for you to fit in, to find your new role in the world. In the inner world, it is the same. Grand might struggle with what it now means to be "Grand" and with the child's difficulty in accepting him/her. Or a merge might suddenly result in a part becoming older and no longer at the same developmental level as his/her playmates, or any number of other changes.

My merged parts seemed to adjust fairly easily because my therapist and I had made a point to help all of the parts involved find new roles in my inner system, whether they had merged or not. So, parts often had fairly clear roles before they merged, and afterward their roles were simply amalgamated or expanded. With merging, the walls completely disappear and there is no barrier between certain parts any more. This can lead to a stronger sense of self.

After many years of painstakingly processing every piece of a memory, my system is able to do a lot of memory work on our own and not being nearly so triggered by events in our daily life . . . our parts are increasingly willing to work together and we have many more inner resources to draw on to help us through a memory, no matter how intense it might be. We now have more options when dealing with memories, particularly since our abusers are no longer in our life to reprogram or trigger us. Sometimes we choose to talk to new parts, and, when they are ready, help them leave their program line. We do this by simply "flying over" the memory, seeing it from a distance in our mind without having to feel it all and getting drawn in. Our goal is to understand what happened, what we learnt from that event, and how those enduring beliefs and feelings are impacting our life now. We remind ourselves that we are safe and work with the old beliefs and feelings so that we can move beyond them and forward in our life. This may involve using art, affirmations, physical activity, crying and yelling, whatever feels right at the time. Sometimes it is simply a matter of an "aha" moment where we realize those beliefs are false and replace them with beliefs that work for us now.

We can often disable a whole program line in this manner, part by part. The disadvantage is that the line is still there; however, the higher the cooperation between parts and the higher the survivor's safety level, the less likely it is the line will get reactivated, since parts will not go back to it and their programs.

Other times, we do have to process the feelings from the memory after we have flown over and understood it, as they continue to leak through. Even this takes less time than it used to, though, and the processing tends to flow smoothly with less resistance.

We do not use our therapy time for memory processing as much any more, and now have a therapist who does not know much about dissociation or ritual abuse, but is willing to learn. Most of the memory work we do on our own, and our therapist is there to help us deal with any remaining issues or feelings.

For a number of my parts, integrating is scary, because it means giving up their identity and becoming someone new and unknown. The resistance my parts feel toward merging encompasses a spiritual element. In my view, merging is a micro-version of spiritual bliss, nirvana, and the like. In both of these situations, giving up the self or ego to a higher power is called for, in order to achieve a greater unity and sense of inner peace. With integration, I am achieving a greater unity within myself, as opposed to merging with a greater spiritual force, although I find my spiritual connection deepens, as well. Many books have been written on the subject of spiritual enlightenment and a common theme is how terrifying and difficult it can be to give up your sense of self, your individuality and identity—in other words, your ego. This fear exists even with the promise of an incredibly joyous and peaceful state. Their thoughts, feelings, and personality will not be their own any more. Integration, in both a dissociative and spiritual sense, is a leap of faith.

Discussion of feelings surrounding merging can continue formally or informally throughout therapy. A client's parts need to know they can talk with their therapist about integration at any time, and without a general knowledge of integration, it can be hard for parts to even know what to ask. It is important to remember that each integration affects the client's self and world view. Outer parts might have their way of relating to the world shaken or changed, inner parts might also be adjusting to life with new merges. Although the topic of integration does not need to be a bigger deal than any other aspect of therapy, it does need to be an ongoing topic of conversation.

It might be helpful under some circumstances to arrange to leave a small piece of a memory unprocessed until resistant parts are ready to integrate. The memory piece could be a smell, a sound, an image, or even a short scene, whatever works best for the client and will create the least disturbance if it's left in the client's system. Regardless, whatever is left unprocessed needs to be something that was directly held by the part, otherwise the part could merge. If a part chooses to leave a piece unprocessed, it is important to set the piece aside in such a way that it will not get added into the memory, or affect the rest of the system. For example, the part could put the memory fragment into an inside container, label it for easy retrieval should the memory need to be finished, and then put it in a safe spot where it can be found, but will not be accidentally opened. Use this technique sparingly, though, as each memory piece dramatically increases the chance that one of the associated memories could be opened again and negatively impact the client. This is regardless of how much of the memory was actually processed. Only when memories are fully processed are they gone and have no risk of impacting the client.

If a client has not experienced integration yet, it can be hard for him/her to imagine what it might be like. If some parts have merged successfully, it can be helpful for parts that are scared of merging to talk with them. This can be done directly in the client's inner world, or with the therapist as a mediator. Some parts might need to understand that it is not a painful process and that they will be okay in the end. This should never be done to coerce parts to merge, but rather to help alleviate their fears so they can make a good choice for themselves.

Integration is more of a journey than a specific goal, and it does not have to mean total fusion. During the course of therapy, I found that the "walls" between my different parts grew thinner. At first, my parts became aware of each other's presence. Then it got easier to communicate with each other and to work together to build a community. From there it became easier to communicate with a wide variety of parts inside. More parts were able to participate in my daily life and to feel that they mattered. It also became easier to find and rescue parts that were still in unpleasant situations inside.

Properly supported, integration can be a natural part of the healing process and a catalyst for personal and spiritual growth. What was most useful for me throughout my therapy was developing a strong sense of self, and self love. Through this, I have discovered a deep sense of spirituality, a positive sense of being looked after by a higher power even as I find my own power. With this in place, my parts become less afraid and I feel happier in life.

I believe my fear of merging is in part due to never being allowed to develop a separate sense of self while growing up. To survive, I had to adapt myself to whoever people wanted me to be, and as I developed my sense of self in therapy, I became scared of losing it or having it ripped away. This fear also came from abusers forcing me to switch (change parts out in the body) at their whim, and not knowing if I would ever be able to bring any given part back or for how long. As my sense of self became more secure, I became less scared of losing it. Integration is not about losing who you are, it is about becoming who you were meant to be. This does not mean that I want to fully integrate all my parts, or that none of my parts are afraid. Rather, it means I have a stronger foundation to draw upon when integration does happen.

My personal choice has been to integrate, but not completely. My system is now cohesive enough that I can experience a high degree of personal safety and I have come to view my inner world as my family. Some day I may become "one" person, but that is not my goal. I am happy in my life and enjoy the company of my inner parts. I have come to love and cherish them in a way they did not experience in the outer world, and would miss their distinct personalities and spirit should they fully become part of me. They have taught me how to increasingly love myself as I come to love each of them.

And the parts that have integrated have taught me how to trust, to know it can be safe to connect deeply with others, and that as I connect within, I am also connecting with the divine.

Callow also wants to warn therapists not to make a big deal about integration with clients for whom it would not otherwise be an issue. If the client's alters are not scared about it, just allow it to occur naturally.

Here, in Part 2 of Callow's discussion, she offers many helpful and creative suggestions for creating inner cooperation, nurturing, and happiness, for those whose systems will continue as separate parts. This is not a process that one waits until the end of therapy to do; it is also the inner work that is part of ongoing healing from the beginning. It begins as soon as possible, and continues to grow over the course of recovery.

Part 2: Building inner community: living happily without integration: Jen Callow

When I first discovered I was multiple, I had well over 700 inner parts and very little communication between them. Most of my parts did not know the others existed. They were still very afraid and alone. After years of healing, I now have a loving community inside. We support each other and have inner cities and towns where we live and play together. Now, when we find new parts, we can help them leave their program lines and become a larger part of our inner world (my abusers set up my inner system as a spider web of interconnected lines holding programs and parts). Throughout this process, we do our best to make sure everyone has a voice and is heard. We meet competing needs, and organize, plan, and develop a growing inner world that in turn helps us to increase a sense of belonging and connectedness, supporting and caring for each other.

When we finally started therapy with a therapist who understood dissociation, many of us were isolated and living in terror. We were shut away in our inner world—in boxes, cold basement rooms, and in any other number of locations depending upon our memories. We were locked in our programs, often starving or in pain. Our inner system had torture and abuse going on similar to what our abusers had inflicted upon us. We did not trust each other, and only a very few of us knew and trusted our therapist. We were afraid that we, someone we cared about, or the world would be destroyed if we started working with our inner system.

Over time, we came to trust our therapist and then slowly learned to trust each other. After we learned how to be co-conscious and to create inner TV screens so parts could safely view the outer world, we created an inner movie of our life that we could show newly discovered parts, to bring them up to date and show them that we were safe now. (This movie's content was huge and growing, but it only took a few minutes for parts to see and absorb it, and now we can share it in seconds.) Eventually, we got so we could talk to each other clearly in our minds and did not need the therapist as much for communication.

Our inner world's physical environment evolved, as well. At the end of each session, our therapist would make sure any new parts had a comfortable place to live with their immediate needs met. We built a welcoming mansion filled with many bedrooms, a large common area, full bathrooms with large tubs for bubble baths, a large kitchen and eating area with long benches and tables, and several playrooms. Each bedroom could be decorated and furnished however its resident(s) wanted, and had doors that could lock, and a window, if one was wanted. Stuffed animals were an important comfort item, as were pets. We made sure that none of the pets would harm any of the other pets (e.g., cats would leave hamsters and fish alone) and that they were friendly. When we later discovered infant parts, we added comfortable nurseries with caregivers, and created items such as slings to carry the babies in, bottles, rattles, and changing stations. Now, there was a more harmonious feeling inside.

Eventually, we developed many more buildings. We now had a healing area full of herbals, liniments, and soothing sights and sounds: beautiful gardens and grounds; an ocean and beaches; forests; and opportunities for expression and recreation. We created spaces for soccer games, a dance hall, music and art rooms, safe rooms for yelling in and letting out anger, even a skateboard park. Every addition encouraged us to work together, to interact more, and to have more relaxation and fun. As we played soccer, ate, and lived together, we began to feel more and more like the family we had missed out on. This was every bit as important in our healing as the actual memory work.

Some of our parts needed a lot of time on their own, so it was important to create and give them some quiet space. Some parts preferred to live in tree houses, or in cottages in the woods. Sometimes our inner towns did not work at all for certain parts. Rather than force these parts to assimilate, we created other inner worlds for them. There was a group of teenagers that loved the Dragonriders of Pern series when they were growing up. We created a version of Pern with them, where they could live together with their dragons and fly through the skies each day. Several children were very attached to an animated adventure show they had watched when they were out in the body, and created a world like this for themselves to live in, complete with all the good guys. The bad guys were created as a vague danger the children were in complete control of; the bad guys would take whatever form and strength the children wanted and the children, who were the heroes, always won. Parts could travel between worlds whenever they wanted, so no one was truly alone and we could still access these worlds and parts when processing memories.

Running the programs and keeping constant vigilance over our system had been the only way for many of our parts to feel powerful and to avoid feeling physical or emotional pain. After we had processed a memory, our therapist made sure to help each part find a new job and purpose. This included the children, if they wanted a smaller job. For example, the soldiers who had terrorized our system were put in charge of security, record keeping, and maintaining the soccer field.

Some responsibilities in our inner world are large and time consuming, such as cooking, cleaning, and looking after the infants. Another task we struggled to fill consistently was taking the children on field trips to places inside, such as a fun version of school where we could teach them about the outer world. It was hard for the few parts doing this to come up with enough ideas. At the suggestion of a friend who was multiple, we set up a rotation of chores and responsibilities. Now, older parts that take on a larger role can take regular vacations and we have parts who have been taught how to fill in. Over the years, we have also created inner people (different from the parts already in our system) to help with various tasks, such as a healer, gardener, cook, and caregivers for the infants. We find it works best to still have our parts help with chores, as it builds a sense of pride in our community and shared responsibility, but this way the risk of parts burning out from overwork is reduced.

Many of our parts lived in suffering and deprivation. One aspect of their healing is recognizing that they matter and that their needs can be easily filled, providing no one will be harmed in the process. If a part wants a specific toy or needs an extra blanket, those items can appear for them right away. However, sometimes more work is required to ensure a need is met. Although we can have food items available immediately, for reasons unknown to us we still need to cook and prepare these items for a proper meal, so outside of meal times we try to have pre-made snacks readily available. In addition to inner people to help with chores, we have added many other helpers to our inner world, from a therapist for the children to caregivers who give us back rubs before bed. The caregivers also help the younger parts with baths, getting changed, and getting tucked into bed. Many of our parts enjoy tending large flower and vegetable gardens, and we created several gardeners who help with bigger jobs. Female vocalists (we do not trust men easily) sing lullabies to parts who enjoy this, and can soothe crying infants.

After much debate, we also recently added loving, sexual partners for those parts who needed this inside. Many of these parts were children, but their sex needs were huge as a direct result of the abuse. In the end, we felt it was better to create people who could provide loving sexual contact, respecting the children's wishes and needs, rather than have these parts feel ashamed and suffer from their overwhelming urges. It has worked well for us, as several months later, many of these children are now asking more often for non-sexual, loving touch, with these inner people taking on more of a nurturing friend or caregiver role.

In addition to caring for each other inside, we take care of our inner environment. At one time, we were concerned that all the emotions we were releasing would have a negative effect on our inner world. We are very sensitive to energy and were taught that our feelings were toxic to others when we were growing up. So, we created some areas that transformed the energy from our feelings into the good feeling energy of our waterfalls, trees, and other natural spaces. In keeping with our own beliefs, we think of this transformative power as "earth energy", the earth changing the energy and helping good things to grow. This helps us in the outer world, too, as nature has always been grounding and nurturing for us. We envision our outer environment and the earth transforming our feelings, so it now feels safer for us to express emotions. In the interest of environmental sustainability, we also have inner areas where we bury our garbage, recycling it so the earth can transform it into electricity, food for plants, and other new kinds of energy for our inner world.

Our outer and inner worlds are deeply interconnected. In caring for each other and our inner world, we learn how to take care of ourselves in the outer world, and also how to care for the earth and other people. As we experience caring from others in the outer world, we learn that we matter and discover how we like to be treated, which we can then mirror inside.

Without the care and attention spent both on our parts and our inner world, we would never have made it this far. Even today, when things feel chaotic in our outer world, as is the case for us now during some major life transitions, we can look inside and help calm ourselves through creating more stability in our inner world and attending to parts' fears and needs. Lately, we have been holding regular inside meetings for any parts who want to attend. In our inner world, we sit out in nature; we sing, talk, play music, and release feelings and outdated beliefs (e.g., often we will write these on pieces of paper and throw them into a small bonfire, over which we later roast marshmallows, which makes it feel less like a ritual and more like fun). The buildings, recreational areas, nature, and living spaces play a huge part in our sense of inner peace and security.

How we built our inner world is specific to our preferences and to the way our inner system was initially set up during the abuse. Every survivor's system is unique and offers many ways to build a community or create objects inside. It is important to work with what is already in the inner system, as opposed to fighting it and trying to shut it all down. Although areas can be transformed, in our experience the building blocks of the inner world remain the same. Through creativity and patience, it is possible to have cooperation and harmony between any number of parts, and a thriving inner community. With an increasing sense of inner peace and community, it is not only possible for survivors to create happier lives for themselves in the outer world, it is possible for them to truly heal.

Callow's choice, to integrate some parts but allow others to remain separate, is a valid choice. Even if that is what the survivor plans to do, it is not always what happens. When one of my clients was in the last stages of her therapy, she wanted to keep a particular little alter separate, for two reasons—because he was helpful to her as a separate inner part, having been the main helper in memory processing, and because he was somewhat autistic as a result of some of the abuse he experienced. She was concerned that the autistic features, such as "stimming",[1] might become characteristic of her. However, one day, her last significant traumatic memory suddenly came up and forced itself to be processed. And the child alter popped out and said, "If we process this memory I will integrate"—and he did. And sure enough, the integrated person acquired some of his autistic characteristics, though in a diluted fashion. It appears that something that had been segregated in her brain was no longer segregated.

In contrast to Jen, Stella Katz chose to integrate fully. As she worked through the final memories, she described herself as having "a case of galloping integration," as the process gathered steam and put together what had been fragmented all her life. Here is Stella's story of her own healing. She wrote it for survivors, so feel free to share it with any clients who are ready to receive it. In fact, any of the survivors' healing stories in this book may be shared with your survivor clients.

Reclaiming me: Stella Katz

I am writing this for one reason only, and that is to prove to others with DID that there really is LIFE beyond the dark tunnel.

I spent the better part of forty years fragmented. I had one stable alter personality who lived everyday life, went to school, took dance and skating lessons, dated, married, and had children. That person knew nothing of what was going on in the rest of my life. All I knew was that from a very early age I would go to bed at night and wake up with dirty feet, or completely clothed with unusual makeup or markings, and bruises. What I found odd, though, was that I only did the sleepwalking at my Grandmother's house, and never at home until after my Grandmother died. As a young child I assumed it was because I missed my own bed, but I had no explanation for it happening later on. I was told that the horrible things I remembered in the morning were just bad dreams and to forget about them and not to tell anyone because they would think I was insane and lock me up in the home for bad crazy people.

At the age of thirty-five, when all came to light, I was horrified. I was told to go to a group for people like me, only to find out that most of the people never really got better, or ever integrated, and were in therapy for most of their lives. Being stubborn and pigheaded, I was not going to hear of that. I wanted to get well. I wanted to know every detail of my secret life, and moreover I wanted the loud opinionated taunting voices in my head to shut up.

So began the journey that helped me reclaim "myself".

I can still remember the feeling of horrific physical pain of the memory that first brought it all to light. Though it was only a memory, the pain was so intense I was sure my foot was broken. I could barely walk on it for days after. I still remember the smell of wax from the burning candles and leftover incense that permeated the room where the memory all took place. Even now it was like yesterday. It was all so horrid but it answered a burning question I had had since I was five years old about how I broke the heel of my foot while I was supposedly sleeping.

The more I learnt, the more I wanted to learn. I wanted forty years of unanswered questions answered. But the more I learnt the worse I felt about myself, because the one thing I learnt was that I was still going somewhere where these things happened. I needed to find the people inside who knew the most and I knew that once or twice a week in a therapist's office, no matter how good she was, just was not going to cut it. I needed to get out of the group not years from now, but right now, and unless I learnt more about my internals, I would never be free of the group. So I began my version of homework.

On the days of my sessions, after my children were in bed and my husband safely tucked in front of the television for the night, I would go down to the rec room where I could be alone and go over the therapy session of that day. I would try to figure out what seemed to be missing from what I had learnt or worked on during the session. It meant that I had to go back into myself and try to talk to those who had been out that day in the therapist's office. My biggest fear was that I would get in and get stuck. So I bought myself a silk rope, and a timer. I would set the timer for thirty minutes, tie the rope to the chair and hang on so tight you would have thought I was dangling from a ten-storey building. Somehow, the rope gave me safety, as if it was a lifeline to pull me back from falling over the edge. I would close my eyes and visualize a dark tunnel and, step by step, I would walk through into my inner world, still hanging on to my rope, calling out to the name of the last insider I remembered from the session.

As I got to know each member of the Clan, as they called themselves, I began to see them as real people. Some were easy to talk to, while others were so dark and scary it was all I could do to look at them. There were adults on the light side and the dark side, and children, oh so many children. Some rather happy, some so terrified they would only peek out of little holes in the fabric of our mind. I saw houses and places that were familiar, and places I was sure I had never seen before, yet felt strangely familiar. At times I was so terrified I just wanted to run. I felt so foolish because I knew I should not be scared of these people—after all, they were part of me. I equated it to being afraid of my own arm. It seems so silly now, but then it was terrifying.

After a few years of twice weekly therapy sessions and twice weekly homework, I finally realized that, although I liked my therapist a great deal, I did not want to grow old with this woman. So I stepped up the work I was doing on my own. Along the way something happened, and the therapist and I parted ways. I went on to another, who was sweet but useless, and then to another, who was both unpleasant and incompetent. All that forced me to work harder on my own. So I left therapy altogether, for a while.

Night after night I worked getting to know my system, one alter at a time or sometimes in little groups. It was amazing and intricate and I did not think I would ever get to know everyone in it. Just when I thought I was through most of it, a little floater child would introduce me to a whole new level. A floater child does not actually belong to the structured system created by the abusive group, but is "born" by accident. As Fiona the floater did not belong to the structure, she was free to travel throughout the system and was no threat to anyone in it

After about six more months I was taken on by another wonderful therapist. I got to know so many more in my system with her help, but her office was too far away. The beauty of living in your head is that you can do things you cannot do in the real world such as creating a holodeck like the one on Star Trek. When I became afraid of a memory or a dark Clan member I was dealing with, I would simply "freeze program" and go around and look at the entire situation from every angle. I discovered that so much of what had been done to me was nothing more than smoke and mirrors. I was able to see the Devil who had abused me from all angles. I saw that he was not eight feet tall, he was just a grown man while I was a small child. He did not have scales and claws and a tail, he wore a stretch suit with a zipper up the back, and you could see the line of his boxer shorts under his costume. It made me laugh. The fear I had was now gone. The more comfortable I got with processing my memories, the more I increased the time on the timer from thirty minutes to forty-five, sixty, and eventually two full hours.

I became friends with my Clan, with the help of Fiona, the little floater child, who knew every single member of the clan. I was able to get through to members who would have been blocked otherwise. Fiona trusted me, and because she trusted me, the others came to trust me as well.

I was often in awe of the structure of the system. I learnt so much about the missing years and answered so many of the burning questions of my life. I discovered the reason my real-life children spoke languages I did not. The Clan had an internal nanny who cared for the internal children. She had the ability to come out and take care of my real-world children when I slipped inside. She spoke Gaelic to them and sang songs with them, and they learnt and had a great deal of fun. The only thing that bothered me was that she was a better mother than I was. In time, I found out why I hated highly textured food, and especially raisins. I will not tell you why, but I can tell you it was disgusting. I came to love the little internal children, and animals, and even my little demons, who were all under the age of five. I came to understand that my black heart was not black as in evil, but black as in a mix of all the wonderful colors of the world.

I knew that every member of the system had to be in agreement about integrating. They had to be able to decide for themselves and choose to join the healing plan because they had never had any choice about what had happened to them. I knew this could only be done by helping the little ones grow up, or at least to understand what we were hoping would take place. So, after the real-world kids had gone to school, I would set the timer, bring out the toys and cookies without raisins, and let the children out to play and watch television and read books. Once they were allowed out into the world they grew quickly, not like real children do, but years in a matter of weeks. One by one they grew. One by one they joined.

All through this healing process, I still had one big problem, which was that I still belonged to the group. I was still a high priestess; I was still part of the inner circle. I was still a trainer. I knew I had to get out of it but I knew they were not going to let me just walk away because I knew too much.

For the next couple of years I was stalked and harassed daily. My children were threatened. I had dead animals put in my car, snakes in my mailbox, and dead kittens nailed to my door. I was driven off the road at night and raped. I did not think it would ever end. I got tough and looked at the rapes as just lousy sex. Once I was sent a photograph of a person dead and mutilated with a threat saying that would be me. I called the police and an officer came eight hours later. I gave him my statement and the picture. I took his business card, only to find out when I called to talk to him it was fake.

The more I worked on my system the less use I was to the group. Eventually they got tired of stalking me, and let me go. It took a few more years, but I was free, or at least felt I was relatively safe.

Once I was free, it did not take long before I was pushing through the system, had everyone catalogued, knew where, when, and how each had come into separate being. With that all done, I was able to get everyone in the system to set a date and time that we would join as one. Some were afraid they would die. Others were afraid that the body would not remember them, others were afraid it would hurt, but we worked through the fears. We planned the day it would all happen, and so, on a beautiful day while the children were in school, I gathered the members of the Clan, had everyone line up in order of their birth, hold hands, and form a circle. One by one, in a very ceremonial manner, the newest member stepped into one who came before and so on down the line until we reached the child whose body had been born. It felt wonderful and frightening and strange and a little like a house of cards ready to collapse at any second. It felt like the house's foundation had been built on jelly, but it felt right.

I was one with myself. I was not who I thought I would be. There were a few times when I was sure we would fall apart, but I hung on. No one died, no one was forgotten, and I had to fight to get rid of the Celtic accent I had acquired unexpectedly. In the first few months, when I recalled something I saw it through the eyes of the person who had experienced it. As time went on, all the memories became mine. And it was an amazing feeling, though a little lonely at times to have only one voice in my head. The thought I was thinking was my thought and mine alone, and to know that I would no longer hurt little children or animals or wake up with muddy feet was amazing.

I was not prepared for what came afterwards. I was stupidly under the impression that all would be well once there was only one of me. I could not have been more wrong.

What I did not expect was the unbearable remorse for what I had done. The faces of every child I had hurt, their cries and their anguish, kept flooding through. It was a dam that broke in my moral conscience.

I no longer had a therapist because "I was well and integrated". I really could have used someone at that point, even if it was just to cry on her shoulder but I had no one. I had to hang on and let myself feel the pain. It went on for two years. There were rivers of tears, torment and guilt. I had never been so depressed. I had known the pain while fragmented into mini me's, but now I understood that all the pain I had felt in those years of abuse had been dulled by an imaginary coating of Novocaine brought on by the fragmentation; now it was just the raw pain of remorse and I had only one of me to feel it.

I also went through a spiritual crisis. I did not know what I believed. I had the guilt teaching of the Catholic Church running through my head, telling me I was going to hell. I had the Satanic beliefs that God is weak and worthless. I had my mother's Pagan beliefs that Dark and Light are equal and balance life. I had Jewish beliefs of the group I had belonged to, and I did not really feel any of it was worth my time. I think this was the hardest part to try to work out in my mind.

It all came to a head at a stop light one sunny afternoon when a song triggered a memory that forced me to ask the question "What do I believe?" Between stop lights and stop signs I went through the list. The questions were everything from my belief in a god to my personal beliefs about life in general. I gave myself ten seconds to answer each question. I felt that what I answered in ten seconds was what I truly believed without the process we all have of overthinking, and justifying what we say. By the time I got home I felt as light as a feather. The weight of the world had been lifted off my shoulders. I could not stop grinning. I finally knew who I was, and what I truly believed in. I found my life at the end of that long tunnel. I was integrated on all levels. It had been a long, long road.

It is not my dream life, but it is mine. I now have terminal cancer, but I worked through what I believe about death, and I am okay with it. I do not know how long I have left, but I see every day that my name is not in the obituary column as a great day, and more so as a gift. I have made my peace with myself.

For all of you who are still going through the torment of memory and the chaos of an untamed system, know that there is Life at the end of your tunnel. Know that you are not alone because we are all connected in the universe. Know that every member of your internal self is part of the whole and worthy of love and of being heard. And know that it is okay to remain divided if you can get your system to cooperate. No one member is more important than another in the long haul. The tunnel to yourself is long, painful, and more often than not extremely frustrating, but it does have an end. If you all work together even through the chaos and pain there can be peace.

You may notice that Stella integrated all her parts through a ceremony, and had considerable difficulty afterwards. My guess is that this was because the alters' emotions, particularly guilt and shame, had not been fully worked through when she processed the memories. This is an alternative way of integrating to the gradual process I recommend. Richard Baer's book, Switching Time (2007), tells the story of a therapy in which the alters were deliberately integrated with the ANP, after which the ANP acquired their memories and gradually went through their body sensations and emotions until they were resolved. Apparently, this can be one way to bring the alters together, but it risks the ANP being overwhelmed by the traumatic feelings, as Stella was for some time.

Generally, it is helpful for the alters who are just memory fragments or partial "people" to join with stronger ones, and it is easier for a personality system to work together with a smaller number of alters. But whether or not to fully integrate is up to the person. Stella chose full integration. Trish Fotheringham, as reported in her DVD (2008), did not choose either way. All of her alters remained for a long time as separate parts inside her, but then one day, when she was experiencing anguish and despair about her life, all the parts came together and integrated into a single identity.

Stella does warn us that for clients who are still being accessed by perpetrator groups, it is unsafe to continue to have child alters, because the groups can re-split them to create new alters, whereas they are unable to do this to a fully integrated person.

I mentioned in Chapter Fourteen that Jennifer had an alter come temporarily "unstuck" years after her successful integration. Trish Fotheringham tells me that she had the same experience after her mother died. Two alters reappeared, shared previously unknown memories involving her mother, then reintegrated. Trish recommends that survivors who integrate keep at least part of their inner world intact, so that newly emerged alters have somewhere to "live" on the inside. I have not seen her suggestion addressed in the literature, probably because such post-integration "re-emergent" experiences are not generally acknowledged there. This might be, at least in part, because full integration is not a common outcome, especially with polyfragmented survivors of ritual abuse and mind control.

There is no "right" way for all multiples. Keep in mind the goal of therapy with this population. It is not to make multiples into singletons, but to help those with many parts to become more functional and free of disabling symptoms. For mind control survivors, the goal is to remove all the external controls over their minds so that they can be full human beings—free, in charge of their own lives, choosing their own life goals.

And survivors will choose, at every step. Each system will naturally blend to a smaller or greater degree as memory work goes along, and, at the end, find its own resolution. As someone once said, survivors might integrate, or become a corporation, or become a collective. But what happens will happen naturally, and that is as it should be. You can follow any therapeutic trend you want, but, in the end, the choice is your client's.

I use two different images in explaining integration to my clients. The first is two rivers joining. All the water that was in each river is contained in the new, larger river, which contains both of them. The only thing that is gone is the strip of land between them, which represents the secrets that they did not previously share. The new river will probably carry the name of one of the original smaller rivers, but it will contain all the water—all the memories and experiences—of the other small river too.

The other image I use is that of a stained glass lamp. Many colored pieces come together to make a beautiful lamp through which the light can shine, displaying all the colors and making a picture that could not be seen as long as the pieces were separated. This image can be used for cooperative co-consciousness as well as for integration.

What happens then? After integration, or cooperative co-consciousness, is achieved, these survivor clients will need to decide what they want to do with their lives. That, alone, is a big deal for people who have not only never considered such major questions, but whose right and ability to think for themselves and make choices has been derailed. So much of your work with mind control survivors has been devoted to the task of allowing them to take control of their own lives rather than having them controlled by others. As much as therapists should always be careful to not impose their own agendas on their clients, you have seen how much more important it is with these people. Sometimes, when we are very dedicated to healing survivors, it is a temptation to get our healed clients enrolled in that same cause. I must remind you that in your enthusiasm, you will need to be sensitive to any message you might give that leaves your client feeling pressured, or expected, to join the cause.

Some will choose to become outspoken survivor advocates. For them, recovery might resemble what it means to alcohol and drug addicts, whose sobriety requires that they "pass it on;" or they might find the meaning they need to attach to their suffering, and the suffering they were forced to cause, by bearing witness to the truth in a public way. Some will choose to "go public" through telling their stories to the world, by helping others through such forums as web discussions, by "fighting back" through lawsuits against their abusers, or by making their survivor status publicly known in other ways. If they are not fully integrated, however, there are considerable dangers in this. Programming can still be triggered through words, nonverbal signals, or what appear to be innocent questions. One of my clients who was involved in a court case recently had programs reactivated when a lawyer (who had access to my clinical notes) asked him about certain alter personalities. Another had programs triggered through words spoken to her by a participant in an online forum she was helping to lead. As I mentioned earlier, I lost a client when a man found her in an online discussion group and figured out her personality system. I have also, on two different occasions, seen well-known public speakers on the topic of ritual abuse use deliberate triggers as part of their talks.

Never forget that these abuser groups have a strong interest in keeping their secrets, and survivors who expose their status publicly, even by attending lectures on the subject, need to be alert for triggering events.

Once again, there is no right or wrong way. So, yes, of course, it is the survivor's choice, but it is a choice that needs to be considered carefully. I recommend that survivors be very cautious about "going public," and only do it if they truly feel it is their calling.

Many, perhaps most, clients may decide of their own free will to leave all those awful experiences in the past and get on with lives that have nothing to do with ritual abuse or mind control. The real issue is that the choice, the decision, must be entirely the survivor's.

In relation to this point, LisaBri sends the following message.

To all survivors

If I had the chance to say anything to all survivors I would repeat what my therapist has said to me all along, but that I was only able to hear for the first time today. She said I can have a life outside of ritual abuse. That my whole life experience now does not have to be ritual abuse. I can live life on my terms. And that I don't have to spread my healing to the world. I always thought that was expected of me. I thought I had to do more than survive and heal, I had to go public and follow my fellow survivors who have taken their healing and speaking out to the next level. In the cult it was all or nothing, and if it was nothing you were dead. So I have spent my life trying to do it all and failing. It feels selfish that I heal and not share it with the world.

What I can do is to keep writing articles for my website, which is a comfort zone for me and I hope to my readers. That feels right to me.

I want to thank my therapist for giving me permission to be just that, me: an individual with DID who was subjected to ritual abuse. But that is just a small part of who we are.

Therapists, give your clients permission to be all they want and ask for nothing more. That will be your gift to them.

Note

1. Stimming is a repetitive body movement engaged in by autistic children, hypothesized to stimulate one or more senses—such as hand flapping or spinning a coin.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

Ritual abuse and mind control treatment: greater than the sum of its parts

It is my hope that you have learnt from this book that successfully treating survivors of ritual abuse and mind control is possible. I hope that, if you are not already doing it, you will take the challenge and embark on this great adventure, and that if you are, you will feel more secure in your work and be able to hone your skills. There are too few of us doing it, and fewer doing it correctly. Survivors need—deserve—to be able to find competent therapists no matter where they are located.

The following summarizes the guidelines that have been the basis of this book. Some of them might seem deceptively simple; I assure you, they are not. But they do provide a straightforward, clear template that should inform your work:

First of all, recognize that it is who you are, not what you know, that makes you effective as a therapist. It is your ability to "sit with a shattered soul." This is true even if you are a novice at working with survivors of ritual abuse and mind control. I recently consulted to a very experienced therapist who was working with her first ritual abuse survivor. In her zeal to share with the client what she had learnt from me, she forgot to "tune in" to what the client was telling her in the next session, and there was a breach in the therapeutic relationship. She was alert to this, recognized it, and mended it, but it was a good reminder to both of us. Never forget who you are and never move away from the basic empathy, warmth, and genuineness that make a good therapist.

Your first step is to routinely screen your incoming clients for signs of childhood trauma, and of dissociative disorders, and, if there are such signs, to do a more thorough assessment. Remember that a large percentage of mind control survivors have a "shell" ANP, so the absence of "time loss" does not mean they do not have a complex dissociative disorder of the kind associated with ritual abuse and mind control.

Then, if there are indications of a dissociative disorder, the need for an accurate differential diagnosis suggests that you look for signs of ritual abuse and/or other forms of mind control.

We do not yet have data on what percentage of those who suffer from dissociative disorders have experienced RA or MC, and estimates I have heard range from almost none to 100%. So, you should not assume that your client either has or has not experienced these kinds of abuses.

If your client has strong indicators of a dissociative disorder, it will help if you provide some education about dissociative disorders and what they mean. It is often a shock to a person to obtain this diagnosis, but it can also be reassuring, as it gives an understandable explanation for their mysterious symptoms.

Some indicators of a ritual abuse or mind control history are listed in the chapter on "Initial stages of therapy", and you need to be familiar with these indicators. If you do see such signs, however, you should obviously not inform your client that s/he is a survivor. Just keep your eyes and ears open, and wait for your client to disclose at his or her own pace. The important thing here is that if such disclosures happen, you respond with both empathy and confidence, letting the client know that you can handle such matters. Know your limits. Clients only tell us what they think we can handle. Wait for the evidence to emerge, and in the meantime do not get caught up in the "false memory" controversy, but stay with the client's experience.

Become familiar with the unique features of a personality system which has been formed by organized or deliberate mind control, such as internal structures, a complex inner world, a filing system for memories, a hierarchy of alters, a security system with "booby traps" which goes into effect after disclosures, and learnt triggers for trained behaviors. Be aware of the types of jobs held by alters, such as "garbage kids," gatekeepers, demons, animals, recorders, reporters, recyclers, spinners, and introjects of the primary perpetrators. These might all seem very strange, but you will become familiar with them once you have experience working with this population.

Your focus in the initial stages should be on getting to know the alter personalities and respecting them and their roles in the personality system. As each alter emerges, orientate them to the present, and develop trust with them. People severely abused in childhood do not trust easily, and this is especially the case if they have been trained by an organized perpetrator group not to trust "outsiders." Take as much time as necessary to prove you are trustworthy. There is no substitute for time and consistency. Make sure to make your boundaries clear in order to preserve the safety of the therapeutic relationship for both parties. Prepare for a long haul.

It is important to learn about being multiple, and what works for their healing, from your client. To work with the alters, rather than trying to get the ANP to control the rest of the personality system. To be careful not to have favorite alters or reject those who seem to be "bad." And to treat all parts of the person with kindness and compassion, including the frightening and negative voices. These people are indeed survivors of the unimaginable, and deserve a compassionate witness who will not shy away from any part of them or of their experiences.

Do not assist one side of the personality system to battle with the other side. When protector alters (often disguised as persecutors) emerge, get to know them. They emerge when they are ready to engage in therapy. Work with them before you attempt to work with the hurt child parts they are protecting. Reframe their role as protectors, and offer to help them protect in ways that are more effective for the present day.

If there are strong indicators of a ritual abuse or mind control history, do not assume that your client is presently physically safe. Watch for signs of ongoing abuse. Do not say "That was then and this is now" until you know the abuse is over. Recognize the possibility of continuing contact with abusers, and continuing abuse. Recognize also the possibility of the client becoming unsafe as a result of premature disclosures. Identify reporter alters and find a way to disable reporting to the abusers, if possible.

With any person with a dissociative disorder, but especially with ritual abuse and mind control survivors, do not press for disclosure of abuse memories early in therapy. Recognize that in mind control survivors this might precipitate reporting to abusers. Recognize also that disclosures could precipitate self-harm, suicide attempts, and flashbacks caused by alters doing their jobs.

If your client does have strong indicators of a history of ritual abuse or mind control, recognize that the client's flooding of feelings, flashbacks, self-harm, or suicide attempts might be the result of alters doing their jobs when disclosures have been made. Slow down disclosures in this event, and focus on creating safety and confidentiality within the personality system and the therapeutic relationship.

Do not buy into a client's belief that perpetrators know everything, are everywhere and all-powerful, and that the client and/or the therapist will be killed for talking. If they have disclosed organized abuse, let them know that organized abusers deceive their victims. As you uncover the traumatic memories behind the mind control, take the time to help the client's alters recognize the lies and tricks involved. Do not buy into any of the beliefs imparted by the abusers, such as that certain alters are not human.

Do not pursue the memories represented by flashbacks. Make it clear to the client that the purpose of therapy is to help the person heal and have a worthwhile life in the present, rather than to unearth traumatic memories. (Though working through the memories is essential for full healing.) Learn how to strategically select memories to work with, and develop an effective method that is not too traumatizing for your client. Then, when the client is ready, work systematically on resolving the trauma.

When you work with the memories, remember to include all alters involved in a particular traumatic memory, especially if it is a training memory, and to follow it "from safety to safety," including all elements of the memory (sound, sight, taste, and smell, bodily sensations and emotions), especially the part held by recycler alters. Do not forget the infant memories which caused the initial splits.

Whether or not to fully integrate or to remain multiple with a cooperative personality system is a choice your client should make for him or herself. Healing will be needed in many areas of life—emotions, sexuality, spirituality, and interpersonal relationships. Pay attention to the sexual programming and make sure it is fully resolved, as many survivors have serious difficulties in this area, including pedophilic desires. Even when the memories are worked through, there will be more healing and growth to pursue.

Since the client has had his or her freedom taken away through mind control, it is important to keep focused on restoring that freedom. Do not replace one ideology with another or become your client's new "handler". Assist your client in taking his or her own life back, including body, thoughts, emotions, and spirituality.

Study the chapters in this book thoroughly, so that you are familiar with what you might encounter. There are many other resources for this work, some of which are listed in Appendix One. Pursue opportunities for continued learning. Never stop. There will always be more to know, and our understanding of this relatively new issue is continuing to develop. As you keep learning, along with your clients, you will become more and more competent in working with these deeply traumatized people, and perhaps one day you will contribute to our knowledge of how to help them heal. I look forward to reading what you have to say.

Satanic calendar[1]

January 01	NEW YEAR Party, fun, “raising hell.”
January 07	ST WINEBALD DAY, correlates with Christian Epiphany. Gifts are brought to Satan. Infant child, preferably eight days old male, or adult male 15–33 (age divisible by three) is dismembered and consumed.
January 17	SATANIC REVELS Sexual orgies. Virgin girls ages six to eighteen are first given to Bishop or Grand Master, then down the line of hierarchy until all have had a turn.
January 20	ST AGRE’S DAY Magik, divination, spell casting, conjuration of Telal (wicked warrior demon).
February 01 or 02 or 1st full moon of Aquarius	IMBLOC or CANDLEMAS Sexual conjuration of Gelal (incubus) & Lilit (succubus).
Shrovetide	The three days before Ash Wednesday, Christian calendar. Preparation for full Black Mass. Collection of blood (menstrual), water (holy) and firewood (oak). Burning of human flesh which will be used as the ashes on Ash Wednesday, in the Black Mass. A Black Mass is preferably held in a church, using human flesh and blood.
February 25	ST WALPURGIS DAY Communion of blood and dismemberment. Begin collection of victims for March 01, usually with dismemberment of small animal.
March 01	ST EICHATADT DAY Conjuration of Ninkharsag (queen of demons). Homage paid to Ninkharsag and Ninkaszi (horned queen of demons). Drinking of human blood for strength. Victims human or animal, any age, any size, human preferred.

March 20–21	SPRING EQUINOX. Feast day. Homage paid to Uggae (god of death). Victim male or female animal.
EASTER	(1) Satanic baptisms: Children dedicated to Satan or Tiamat, given to hierarchy for first vaginal penetration, fingers only. Age six weeks to eleven months.
EASTER	(2) Satanic rebirth: Children ages three to five reborn through cow corpse (goats are sometimes used). (3) High Black Mass. (4) Mock crucifixions (some groups).
April 19 to May 01	PREPARATION FOR SACRIFICE Gathering blood, water and firewood. Preparation of the persons to be sacrificed, by confinement, fasting, sleep deprivation, anointing with sacred oils, putting them in an altered state.
April 21 to May 01	GRAND CLIMAX DA MEUR CORPUS DE BAAHL Sacrifice of female victims age one to twenty-five (unregistered children, prostitutes, street people or volunteers). Celebration goes for several days, depending on how long the gathering and preparation takes.
April 30	WALPURGIS NIGHT (CORPUS DE BAAHL)
May 01	BELTANE Fertility rites, orgies, usually if possible in an open field. Seminal fluid is mixed with dirt and insects and injected into the vagina of a virgin. Their virginity is first sacrificed by the Grand Master or High Priest. Children conceived of this are the children of Tiamat and Dur(Indur). They will hold great power and position in the coven.
June 21	SUMMER SOLSTICE Great celebration with feasting and orgies. Torture, rape and sacrifice of enemies or traitors. Forced labour of breeder, sacrifice and consumption of infant.
June 23	MIDSUMMER'S EVE Magik. Excellent night for black magikians for fire magik.
July 01	DEMON REVELS Blood sacrifice, female victim, human or animal, any age.
July 17–23	Sacrifices of first born males (newborn to eleven months). Communion given with their flesh and blood.
August 02	LUGHNASSADH Worship of moon for magik, practised only by some groups.
August 03	SATANIC REVELS Sexual orgies (anal, oral, vaginal), victim female age 7 to 17.
August 26	Preparation begins for the Feast of the Beast or Marriage to Satan.

	Fasting and anointing with sacred oils of those who are betrothed to Satan. Virgins, male and female, average ages nine to thirteen, but all ages accepted. Some cult members are betrothed to one another.
September 07	FEAST OF THE BEAST Marriage of virgins to Satan. Severe sadistic intercourse with statue of Lucifer or the Grand Master dressed as Satan. Phallus has spikes or razor blades attached to it. Great feasting and orgies take place after all virgins have been given.
September 20–21	MIDNIGHT HOST (FALL EQUINOX) Reaffirmation of sacred vows by hierarchy. Fasting for previous week, cleansing and anointing with sacred oils. Requires personal blood sacrifice, such as finger of the individual, or hands or finger of their own child, or paw of favorite pet. New branding is done. Hands and fingers will be planted in the ground for power, fertility. Followed by feasting and orgy.
October 29	ALL HALLOWS EVE Conjuration of the dead. Sacrifices (human or animal) appropriate for specific demon or dark ancient one. Sex magik.
October 31	SAMAIN Beginning of the new year. Conjuration of the dead. Orgies with demons. Sacrifice of enemies or traitors. Sacrifice by fire. Induced labour of breeder, and sacrifice of infant by dismemberment. Consumption of flesh and blood of infant, as well as placenta.
November 01	HALLOWEEN Sex with demons.
November 04	SATANIC REVELS—see above
December 12–22	WINTER SOLSTICE Impregnation of breeders for use during summer solstice. Animal sacrifice and live burial of victims to celebrate the dark time.
December 24–25	DEMON REVELS (CHRISTMAS) High Grand Climax. Mock birth of Christ and subsequent murder to mother Tiamat. Victim female age thirteen to sixteen. Forced labour of breeder, communion with body and blood of infant.

BIRTHDAYS

Some groups also celebrate the birthday of the individual and the birthday of the hierarchy. These days are very important within Satanic groups as they will always hold the recall programs of the individual.

MOONS

The New Moon is when Satanists "begin things", e.g. a magik spell, or preparation for a sacrifice. The Full Moon is the most powerful time, and the time when they end things, e.g., a spell or a life. Celebrations often held on the Full Moon nearest to the official date of a Satanic holiday, rather than on the day itself. Abduction risk is highest at the New Moon and at the Full Moon.

Satanic celebrations occur from midnight to dawn on the day listed. For example, January 01 means midnight New Year's Eve to dawn New Year's Day.

"Sacrifice" means letting of blood (cutting), not necessarily killing.

A "virgin" is a person who has not "given freely" sexually. Rape does not count.

Though many of these holidays correspond to the traditional pagan holidays the witches, Druids, or Wiccans celebrate, do not confuse these groups with Satanists. Satanists also celebrate Christian holidays but this does not make Christians Satanists. Traditional Pagans do not worship Satan, as they do not have such a deity in their belief systems; "Satan" is strictly a Judeo-Christian manifestation.

Note

1. Spellings vary between groups as the original words are not in English. The Halloween season has a series of related rituals which take place from 29 October to 1 November. Other calendars can be found in Sinason (2011), and on the Survivorship website.
